

1. A Nobody in the Day and Night

Whether distance, physical distance, from his family, was a worthy criterion of success for a son to embrace, Luther Garatdjian had, since childhood, seen removal from the apartment and the building where he had been raised as necessary to his survival. He longed for separation, not closeness, his life mission being to prove that he was not like the floundering older siblings ensnared on the very premises where they and he had lived since infancy. Oh, he loved his mother to a degree as great as any child could love his mother, seeing her as warmth and softness and love itself, and he loved his brother and his four sisters in varying degrees, but he did not love failure. He did not love weakness and dependency and the excuses that accompanied them, and such deficiencies seemed in strong evidence in his immediate environment.

Like his family, the building, which towered thirteen stories over Broadway, was showing signs of deterioration. Periodically bits and pieces of masonry would break off from the cornices and crash to the sidewalk below, scaring the pedestrians witless and prompting the police to temporarily section off a portion of the block. Over the years the façade had grown grimy from the exhaust of the cars and trucks and buses down on Broadway and cried out for sand-blasting, and the window sashes were rotting and in need of replacement. If the building's neglected features called attention to themselves, so too did the huge mural of John 3:16 from the Gospels painted in pastel colors on a side wall and visible to the pedestrians below:

For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son

That whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life.

Auntie Eve, Luther's aunt, managed the building, with the assistance of his mother. His aunt occupied the ground-floor apartment and the Garatdjian family lived on the second floor in the only other apartment. The remaining units were single and double rooms furnished with stoves and small refrigerators and sinks. There was a public bathroom for those tenants whose rooms did not include a private bath. Rents ranged from ten dollars to twenty-two dollars a week. Some of the tenants were elderly, men and women who had never married or whose spouses had died. Increasingly, they were foreign-born, young men and women from India, Pakistan, Korea, Kenya, Ethiopia, Kenya, and other third world countries who had come to New York to continue their education.

Here and there among these tenants could be found members of the Garatdjian clan in a kind of mini-diaspora. Next to Arvin Singh, in 9D3, lived Naomi Garatdjian, age thirty, married to Chuck Bolan, age 55, neighborhood drunk who went about with wine stains on his shirt. And in the penthouse, a rooftop set of rooms, lived his brother Luke, age twenty, though only, he said, until he had saved enough money to rent a pad down in Greenwich Village. And in room 2C2 lived his oldest sister Hannah, with her six-year-old son Moses.

Even his sixteen-year-old sister, Vera, had a room in the building, hers being 2BB.

And now, there in room 2E2, in September of 1965, lived Luther Garatdjian, the room having been given him rent-free by his mother, as all the Garatdjian children lived rent-free in their rooms.

It was not supposed to be that way.

Since his girlfriend Jane Thayer's departure, emotional pain had made his life a daily struggle. When she boarded an Aeronaves de Mexico jet in New York City in August for what was planned as a two-week stay in Mexico City, it wasn't for him to know that she would do for him what he could not by writing him that she would not be coming back.

His mother was a party to this matter only insofar as, following air mail receipt of the letter in which Jane said goodbye, Luther approached her with his pain and suddenly realized that she didn't care and that her work with him was done and never would resume. In that moment he saw that he was neither her sun nor a star of any magnitude in her consciousness.

And what mother should have to think excessively of a son afflicted with the dullness that he exhibited? Was it not obvious to one and all that he was poor material for love, let alone success? What would possess a girl to give her heart to an ectomorphic boy, all of one hundred thirty pounds distributed over a 6'4" frame? And what could be more grotesque than a young man who, as his eighth-grade classmates had gleefully pointed out in the yearbook, lacked the back of his head? His mother had never called him Squarehead or Flathead, but surely she had heard the words applied. If once he had been her blond Svenska pojka, that conception of him had long since fallen away, given the reality of his poor appearance in the passing years.

Nor could he turn to the compensatory gift of intelligence, if his high school record, which was excellent before his grades plummeted, or his poor performance on college entrance exams, were any great indicators, and he knew they were. He had been defeated in all the categories that seemed important—physically, mentally, and in the realm of love.

All the more reason to stay separate, to avoid the family apartment just down the hall or stop by the rooms of his siblings scattered throughout the building. Avoidance lessened the pain of seeing he might one day become just like them.

Of course, there were practical reasons to remain at home and attend a public college. A boy with his SAT scores was not suitable material for Princeton or Yale or Brown, and even lesser private colleges had hefty tuition fees and weren't about to offer scholarships to the likes of him. Where was that money to come from? It wasn't as if his parents had set aside anything for his further education. There was one school in Maine that wanted him, and he might have managed with student loans, but going off to college would have taken him away from Jane, a circumstance that he could not easily bear to initiate and that her trip to Mexico City had solved, as it was far preferable to feel that she was leaving him than he was leaving her.

And yet family was family, blood was blood, and called to him through the walls he hid from them behind, as on the evening he stepped in the elevator and pressed the button that bore the initials “PH.”

“Man, you’re all bones. I mean, don’t you eat?” his brother Luke said that night, in the rooftop shack he called the penthouse.

“Geniuses don’t need to eat. They live on air. Einstein. All those cats with big brains. They’re different from the rest of us,” said Lenny Cerone, who could take his Bonneville apart and put it back together again blindfolded. Luther felt paralyzed by his excess.

It was for Jerry-Jones Nobleonian to say what he, Luther, was thinking. “Einstein didn’t go to no Queens College, Jim.” Luther and Jerry went way back to grade school. Close. Inseparable back then. But not anymore. Jerry was Lenny’s friend and Luke’s friend now. “And Einstein’s pussy didn’t walk out on him. That’s why he’s all fucked up,” Jerry cackled.

“That’s some bad shit when a girl does you wrong like that. It’s got to put a serious hurt on you,” Lenny declared.

“Here. Have some. It’s chianti.” Luke poured wine from the wicker-covered bottle into a mug but Luther shook his head no.

“Lenny, remember that time we saw him coming out of Davega, down on Forty-second Street, with some some guy from the store, and loading a box of weights into the trunk of a cab? Like he was going to stop being a 99-pound weakling,” Jerry went on.

“Come on, man. That shit ain’t right. He looks OK,” Lenny said.

Ever since his trip to Europe following high school, Luke had been settling back into the building. For a while he had a railroad flat downtown, near Klein's Department Store in Union Square, but it was hard to meet the monthly rent on the office temporary job he had. All day filing papers for a few bucks an hour and the girls paying him no respect but going out with the guys in suits, the ones who had their own offices. And then for a while he went to some college up in Vermont that Luther had never heard of, a college that took kids at the bottom of their class. Luther remembered going up to the used car lot above One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street and Broadway, where Luke bought the big old Buick with fins that he drove up to Vermont in, and a month later the Buick was parked outside the building and there Luke was, back home, living in some room on the seventh floor and he had never left since. Started working as a night watchman for Auntie Eve and doing maintenance work and now and then painted a room. Then the missionary who had been living in the penthouse went off to China and Luke badgered his mother to let him have it until she gave in. Living on the roof wasn't the same as living in the building, Luke said. It was like you weren't living in the building at all is what he said. And Luther listened, because that was all Luther ever did when his brother spoke. Because it wasn't for Luther to tell his brother the truth, even if he suspected that's what his brother wanted him to do. Because even if Luther told his brother the truth, what good would that do, given that his brother wouldn't be able to do anything with the truth Luther told him.

"I've got to be going," Luther said.

"Don't be doing anything we wouldn't do," Lenny said.

“Who was Lenny Cerone, Luther?”

“He was the part of America that needed no education because everything he needed was stored in his genes, as he did not need the sun to maintain his true nature, being Italian with olive oil for blood.”

“Can you tell the reader where he came from?”

“He was Lenny from Long Beach, Long Island, and mythical in his proportions, having not only the bronzed body but the capacity to fill his jeans and T-shirt so well in the bandana days of his youth. He drove a white Bonneville, and I was with him when Terry Stafford sang ‘Suspicion,’ so full of intensity and yet buried alive in the air of the 1960s.”

“What else?”

“The girls could not resist his power or his knowledge. One he spoke of as Body by Fisher, Face by Accident, which cracked him up and got Jerry Jones-Nobleonian to go ‘Ho shit, ho shit,’ words that when he spoke them made me move away, at least in my mind.”

“What else?”

“They were the tie that binds after Jerry Jones-Nobleonian fell out of love with me and I fell out of love with him.”

“What else?”

“It was when I first heard the Beatles’ song ‘I Want to Hold Your Hand,’ and that caused electricity in the New York City air.”

“What else?”

“A graveyard is a graveyard. We don’t have to walk too long among the bones.”

He stopped in the lobby to stare at himself in the full-length mirror on the door to Auntie Eve’s apartment. Full face he thought he looked OK. It was only when he turned profile and bent his leg and saw the meagerness of his thigh that he grimaced. Well, what could he do but feel hurt and wounded that they had spoken to him in such a way about his body. Not that he hadn’t heard it before. And then mocking him, paralyzing him with that Einstein stuff.

He headed down the hill and along the bridle path in Riverside Park in the direction of the George Washington Bridge. A southerly walk would have mired him deeper in the city, whereas the direction opposite was to follow the Hudson and gain the promise of freedom. So it had been since childhood.

By the time he reached Riverside Church and then Grant’s Tomb his mood had brightened. For the first time that day he felt release from the pain that had become a constant. He knew that walking changed his breathing, but he didn’t know that his breath was a factor in how he felt and how he thought. He didn’t know anything about his mind except that it had the capacity to torture him.

He followed the curve of the pathway down toward the nameless bridge that stretched ten blocks north from One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street and imagined himself in a world far from the grim and desolate warehouse-lined streets below. Soon he saw himself wearing the black and yellow road uniform of the Princeton Tigers and performing as he had seen all-American Bill Bradley perform against Columbia, the smell of wintergreen strong in the Lions’ small gym. The shots he made were from farther and farther out until he was practically at mid-court. The number of points, rebounds, and blocked shots were unheard of. His mind filled with accolades and looks of awe on the amazed faces of teammates and opposing players as well. He was simply doing things that had never been done on a basketball court before fleeing into the night, where all alone in a hidden away apartment high above the street he could savor the memory of his performance. A desire to be recognized and idolized but not to be known.

And now there were the Jaynettes singing “Sally Go Round the Roses,” singing it silky before they sang it strong and insistent inside his head. But what was the secret the roses wouldn’t tell? What was the mystery his mind could never solve? Oh, it didn’t matter. Only the sound, so glorious, mattered. Saying, I have never listened to what a song means. I have only listened to what a song caused me to feel. Because that is all I can do.

The desolation at the other end of the bridge dissolved the fantasy. He should go no farther, unless he wished for the men with the long knives to appear and begin the stabbing thing. He turned back, grateful for the occasional car that came and went. He still lived in the Salvatore Negrón alias Cape Man world, and had since that day when the Cape Man did his stabbing thing in the Hell’s Kitchen playground, making two white boys fall down dead, some years before. The Cape Man cast a specter over New York City. You must remember this was 1965. In Luther’s mind it was the purpose of Puerto Rican boys to make the white boys all fall down.

That night he dreamt he was naked in Chock Full O' Nuts, up on One Hundred Sixteenth Street and Broadway. Not only was he naked but his head was shaved so one and all could see how flat and ugly his head was. Another boy, even thinner, sat across from him smoking a cigarette. All the sadness that would require one to seek death or not wish it away was in his eyes, and yet in spite of his condition, the boy had loaded his hair with gunk in some gesture of hopeless vanity. Suddenly, the boy called out to him in a loud voice, "Is your name Skinny? I hear your name is Skinny."

"Yes, my name is Skinny," Luther said.

"All right then. We can do some business," the even skinnier boy said.

What business that was the dream did not reveal.

"Your mother is a saint. A saint. What she needs is a few good men. I'm praying for her. I'm praying very hard," Mr. Fitzpatrick, Luther's neighbor, said the next morning, there in the hallway as Luther emerged from his room to use the public bathroom.

Mr. Fitzpatrick's white-haired head listed and his eyes closed and he began mumbling inaudibly. His left arm was in a permanent sling, having been mangled in a machine accident that ended his career with the transit workers' union. The exact nature of the accident Luther had never inquired about, suspecting, as he did, that a gruesome report would follow. Even at this early hour Mr. Fitzpatrick wore the oversize denim jacket that was a staple of his dress with his one good arm through the sleeve.

Luther was aware of an attitude of dislike in regard to Mr. Fitzpatrick. It was that prayer he incessantly prayed, or said he prayed. Who were those few good men Luther's mother needed? Luther suspected some sly malignity attached to the man, that he was seeking to hide his cruelty behind a pose of piety.

The bathroom was heavy with Mr. Fitzpatrick's old man smell, causing Luther to crack open the window even with the fall chill in the air. He couldn't easily imagine Mr. Fitzpatrick stepping into the shower, not with his disability as he stood at the mirror and shaved away the fuzz that had begun to appear on his face the month before.

The trip to Queens College required three subway changes and a bus ride and took over an hour, and yet without much regard for the practicality of such a decision, he had registered for an 8 a.m. math class. He told himself that his mind was in need of strengthening, and what better way to accomplish this goal than to take on, right at the outset, a subject in which he was weak? Anyone could read or write, but how many could successfully manipulate numbers and come up with a correct answer? Reading and writing were for those who could not do the heavy lifting. They were akin to selling ice cream at the Central Park Zoo while real men blasted off into space powered by rockets with enormous thrust.

It was the wound of his SAT defeat, that abysmally low math score. Underweight in his body and underweight in his mind. So his dream had signified.

At Times Square he descended two levels to the Flushing Main Street Line. Soon the sweet, slightly chemical, and pungent smell from the nearby SilverCup bakery filled the car as the train screeched from the tunnel onto an el overlooking the sprawling rail yards. At each elevated outdoor station men boarded in their Dickey work pants and white socks and shirts with their names sewn on them in red or white thread. Some carried metal lunch boxes and The Daily News under their arms. They appeared tired and worn down by the sameness of their dismal days. He imagined their meager earnings, the diners they ate in, the single rooms they slept in. Men without women, he imagined them to be. Men like the men of the building with whom he had grown up, men of the single rooms and the single, woman-less lives and of the diners. He, too, with the Daily News, while Jansson's History of Art, enormously heavy and impenetrable, sat unread in his canvas bag. A feeling of terror gripped him. He was seeing not only his past but his future. He too would be a lunchbox Louie without love in his life.

The sudden desire seized him to return to his room as proof of his goodness. He would show Jane Thayer that he was not moving away but waiting anxiously for her to return. In that moment it had no significance that Jane was in Mexico City finishing high school or that her letters were full of the names of new girlfriends and of boys and parties as she integrated herself into the life of the American community she had found down there. But then he remembered an earlier time, that before Jane Thayer there had been his mother. The voice he heard now he recognized as the same voice he had heard then telling him on school-day mornings to turn around and run back home, that his mother was weeping and needed him to dry her tears.

He boarded a bus from the Flushing Main Street station to Kissena Boulevard, a name lacking all warmth that would not be allowed in Manhattan.

An old and gentle man placed Xs and Ys on the blackboard. The boy seated next to Luther in the back row, with fluid motions of his pencil, moved these Xs and Ys to their logical conclusions, solving the mystery of one equation after another. Luther could only watch in helpless admiration this wonder of the earth with his unassuming excellence.

Strange, but the writings on the blackboard were hard to read when only the week before they hadn't been. How could that be? The room was rather small; he was at no great distance from the board.

Later that morning a man named Milton Marcus-Britton (yes, there was a hyphen) stood on the stage of an auditorium. A pointer stick in his hand, he referred the students to slides of the architecture of old churches and cathedrals, but he was the work of art in the seasonally correct earth tone colors he wore while reserving the right to shock with his burning yellow tie. "You're all bright. After all, you're here at Queens College," Milton Marcus-Britton said. What was it when you said one thing but meant another by the tone you adopted? Was it irony? Was it simple sarcasm? One thing was clear. Milton Marcus-Britton wanted his students to know that he was elevated above them more than physically on that stage where he strutted and held sway.

It didn't seem right that Milton Marcus-Britton should drive him down any lower than he felt. But then it became all right. He could live with Milton Marcus-Britton's assessment and his chatter about flying buttresses. He could find a place within himself where the words could live without destroying him anymore than he had been destroyed. And he could sort of understand what his professor was up to. Milton Marcus-Britton was on a search-and-destroy mission, like the American soldiers in Vietnam Luther read about with great fear in the newspaper. Milton Marcus-Britton was just seeking to rid his environs of mediocrity so his excellence could live.

Two girls, both of them attractive, spoke outside the cafeteria that afternoon, in the tone of quiet intimacy that girls adopt and with their books cradled to their chests. Seeing them, Luther came alive in his longing, but they had the intricacies of their acquaintance and a force field operating that separated him from them and ruled out even the thought of connection. The chasm was too great. He had his low numbers to remind him of that.

There was no stove or running water in his little room, nor a fridge, as most of the other units in the building had, so he could neither cook nor store food. But it was important that he not go next door to his mother's apartment and eat the food she served. Such a regression could prove more than he could bear. It could break him beyond the point of being able to come back together.

That evening he ate at Tad's Steak House on One Hundred Eleventh Street and Broadway. For $1.19 he got a steak and a baked potato and garlic bread and even a small salad with French dressing. The steaks were cooked right before your eyes on a charcoal grill. He sat alone at a small table with his tray of food and the hope of feeling nutritionally sound and expanded in all his dimensions so he could see his reflection in the plate-glass windows of the stores out on Broadway and be satisfied with the image of the body reflected back to him.

As he was finishing his meal, Skinny, the boy in his dream of the night before, walked in. Skinny was wearing a shirt two sizes too big and swimming in his oversize jeans. Jesus, he looked ugly, his skin so papery you could see his veins and that gray complexion and those bad teeth. Skinny took the table two down from Luther and stubbed out his cigarette before starting in on his steak. Jesus, what a sight.

“I was just down to Whitehall Street,” Skinny said, as Luther was leaving. “They sent me my draft notice. But they told me I’m too skinny and gave me a 4-F. It don’t make me feel right, hearing shit like that. Makes me feel real bad.”

“I know what you mean,” Luther said.

“You been down to Whitehall Street?”

“No, I haven’t,” Luther said.

“How come? You in college, or something?”

“For now I am.”

“That’s good. What college you in?”

“Queens College?”

“Why do you go to Queens College when you live here in Manhattan?”

“It’s the college that accepted me.”

“Maybe I’ll go to college, too. They can’t keep you out because you’re skinny, right? I mean, look at you.”

“That’s right, Skinny. Look at me.”

“I wasn’t saying nothing. It’s just you ain’t exactly Johnny Weismuller either. You know?”

“Oh, I know,” Luther said. “I know.”

That night he took a break from his room and the park and headed down Broadway. Passing under the bulging marquees of the Riverside and Riviera movie theaters, one next to the other, he came to the Thalia, an art movie theater one block south, on Ninety-fifth Street. A foreign film, The Umbrellas of Cherbourg, was playing. There on the screen was Catherine Deneuve singing and her young lover singing and her parents singing and everyone was singing. They were singing about love and the joy of love and the pain and danger of love and then the young man was singing of going off to war, in Algeria. He and Catherine Deneuve sang of eternal love, a love that could not be broken by time or distance, but then there were the strategies of her parents, who knew the young soldier was not right for her and had never been right for her, knew this from the perspective of their years and the wretched practical sense it had given them. Oh, you know how it ends. You know and you have always known how it ends, how reality always ends up doing its victory lap. But Luther didn't know. He didn't know even as he did know. Love is not supposed to end, he screamed, if only in his mind. It was simply not supposed to end with Catherine Deneuve pulling her expensive car into a filling station, not realizing it was owned by her young lover. It was not supposed to end with each of them having found new partners and moving on with their lives. You were not supposed to tell a young person that there is young love and then there is mature love. You were not supposed to say that.

Luther cried. He cried and cried in the darkness of the movie theater where he had gone to spend his evening.

Daylight gave way to darkness early now. The college had empty spaces. Wherever he was, they seemed to occur. He didn't speak, and when he did, no one heard. He was at the bottom of something and began to suspect it had no top.

By now he had the glasses that his failing eyes required. He could see the blackboard in math class, but solutions remained elusive.

A sweet sadness began to manifest. Love was an arc, and he was slowly climbing it. Things became holy. His room. The sidewalk. The subway cars he traveled in. The city at night, with store windows burning bright. It was OK being alone in the New York autumn, with the brisk, clarifying wind as your companion.

In the newspapers images of helmeted young men and body counts. Thirty-nine Viet Cong killed. Search and destroy. The perimeter secured. Incoming rounds of mortar. Soldiers dying in a tangle of jungle. An enemy that couldn't be known or contained. Things out of control. Frightening. And if the unknowns won, what would that mean for Australia, the Philippines? Would they not soon be in New York City? He was alone and he was afraid, for himself and the world.

The boys from Amsterdam Avenue, Fatso Scully and Jimmy Jone and Luis Alvarez and even little Kevin Donnelly, the boys with whom he had drunk the quart bottles of Schaefer and Rheingold and Knickerbocker, in his high school years, were all gone. The military had come calling and they had answered.

But not Skinny. And not him.

One night, as he lay on his sofa reading, there came a knock on the door. It was December by now. There had been no knocks to this time. And yet, when he called out, “Who is there?” no answer came. And when he called out a second time, still no answer came. It was not for him to open a door under such circumstances, but the sense of a presence in the hallway was strongly felt. With his free hand he turned the lock, the other hand now balled into a fist. But there was no need to deliver a blow and smash the startled face of the person standing silently outside, not when that person was Jane Thayer herself.

“Is that any way to greet a friend?”

“I guess I got a little nervous.”

“Your past coming back to haunt you?”

He cleared away his books so she could sit on the sofa. The barrier of pain and hurt was there in him, but he sensed, from her upbeat manner, no corresponding state of mind in her.

“I came back to see my mom and dad. And guess what? They’re allowing me to throw a party. You can come, if you want.”

If you want. Her words made the invitation sound like an afterthought.

Her parents lived in a walkup building some blocks away. He remembered, from his few visits, the thin bulge of the extension cord that ran under the worn rug in the crowded living room and the dusty surfaces and the dirty windows and the tired furniture. Jane’s mother spent her days on the bottle while her father worked two jobs as a printer.

“Why did you come?” he asked.

“Because we’re friends. That’s why.”

“Are we?” he asked.

“Of course we are.”

“You seem to like parties,” he said.

“People aren’t so bad, Luther. You should try meeting a few yourself.”

“Yes,” he said, as she grabbed her bag and headed for the door.

It had been more painful being together than apart. He was not unhappy that her visit was brief, wanting as he did to get back to the life he had established in his aloneness.

He sensed the influence of Jane’s beautiful and popular cousin Jeanne down in Mexico City with all this party stuff. Jane bragged about her a lot in her letters, how she was a model as well as a first-year student at the University of Texas and the endless socializing. He had tarnished Jane. They shouldn’t have started going all the way. There had only been Jane and him and him and Jane, and now Jane wanted something more, a life beyond that tenement apartment where she lived with her parents on One Hundred Twenty-Second Street and the little world she and Luther had created. Still, that didn’t mean he had to show up at her party and be one of many, a face in her crowd, someone from the past being flattened by her present and her future.

Some days later he saw her with a tall young man, the two of them walking with their arms around each other on the snow-covered streets of Broadway in what seemed, even from a distance, an ostentatious way. Surely the young man would have been at the party. The fact that Luther had seen them and they hadn't seen him meant something. He felt safe and protected; he had stayed out of harm's way.

He did not always pass by the family apartment on his way to and from his room. His life was not an endless detour around his mother. Besides, he had big news to tell. He was going away, down to Miami for the beach and sunshine and fun.

"Is that so?" his mother said. "But how will you get there?"

"I'll take the train from Penn Station. It will be a real adventure."

"And where will you stay?"

"I've rented a small room in walking distance from the beach."

"My word. But will it be safe?"

"Oh, sure. Lots of college kids go down to Miami Beach on Christmas break,"

Luther said. How old his mother looked, with her gray hair and careworn face and those beige rubber support stockings she wore to ease the pain of her varicose veins. But she was forty-three when he was born, and so she had always been old to him. His mother deserved better than she had gotten. None of her children had turned out right. It was no wonder that she was always turning to Jesus.

Luke came in the apartment that night. He was not always respectful of their mother. Sometimes he even talked to her in hateful ways, as when she would come calling on him in the morning in his penthouse and bang on the red door, saying "Luke, I have need of you. We have an emergency. The bathroom in 7C is flooding. A pipe has burst," or some other crisis, and he would not answer, being still asleep from the excesses of the night before, and so her pleas would grow louder and louder until he would shout, “Get the hell out of here and leave me alone.” In just such a way would Luke go against their mother with angry words, reducing her to saying, through her tears, “My children treat me like the dirt beneath their shoes. In just such a way do you treat me. I have no one to help me. No one.” And in those times of despair she was back in her childhood, that familiar place of sorrow and pain and hopelessness, with that father who had gone missing with his bottle into the snows of Sweden.

And it was the same on this night.

“Luke, could I ask you not to play loud music on the radio when you sit in the lobby tonight? Some of the tenants have complained. It does not look right.”

“I’ll play what I feel like,” Luke said.

“Must you speak in such a willful way? Can you not be reasonable?”

But Luke was not hearing anything more she said, or if he did, he was not responding, and the smile on his face was one of satisfaction at having reduced her once again to pleading. It was not right that Luke should go against his mother with his words and tone, and then to continue in his ways after seeing she was upset, and further, to see him go on because he saw that she was upset. It was clear in such moments that Luke wanted to bring their mother down—bring down her hegemony. Because she was there. She was always there, but their father wasn’t, at least with his mind.

“Hey, Luke,” Luther said.

“Fuck off, Bones.”

“No, Luke. This isn’t right,” Luther said.

“I said fuck off,” Luke said, with added vehemence.

But Luther did not fuck off. He stood up. He did not want to see Luke proceed with his malice toward their mother. A tussle ensued. Luke broke free of the headlock Luther had placed on him and shoved his younger brother to the floor.

“Do you want to put an end to me, my sons? Would you have me suffer a stroke before your eyes?” their mother asked. She was gasping for air and her chest was heaving.

Afterward there was shame. What was it that someone with all his bones showing should be fighting in the first place? Such was the thought that his mind gave him. And his mind’s eye—because everyone had one—gave him the picture of those bones.

Mr. Fitzpatrick was waiting for him outside his door the next morning. “Did I tell you a few good men? Did I?” he asked. His face reddish and sharp like that of a fox, his hair gray, the coldness of Catholicism emanating from him.

The motion of the train had its effect, turning Luther’s thoughts to things he could not consider in the same way in the confines of his room and during his daily routine. When darkness claimed the day, his thoughts turned to Luke. He imagined his brother sitting in the lobby in an old upholstered chair, guarding the building with his presence because the junkie world was now on view on the city streets, addicts going into a nod right out on Broadway in the daylight, rooted to the spot like human pretzels. You expected them at any moment to topple to the sidewalk. And stealing anything they could for their daily fix when they weren't nodding out. Like the skinny little junkie running down the street with one of the upholstered chairs from the lobby upside down, like a weird giant helmet over his head, and Luke giving chase.

Another scene presented itself, his brother walking through Straus Park just north of One Hundred Sixth Street on Broadway, the one with a fountain originally meant for horses to drink from and where the elderly liked to come and sit on benches amid the pigeons, but for Luther it was not a park for resting in, not with traffic flowing to either side that left no refuge from their fumes or sight. But now Luke and Luther were walking through that park when two boys approached. The boys did not like Luke's face or the attitude it conveyed, their own faces conveying attitudes of blazing seriousness, a statement that they had no play in them. The bigger of the two did Luke four times in the belly before he could know what happened. He fell down with blood pouring from his wound and soaking his white shirt. When they ran he took his knife with him. It was a knives he would need again, a knife to make him proud.

Luther was right there to see his brother fall, as he had been when Winston and Butch, two black boys from the neighborhood, had made Luke fall with their blows and bleed from his nose and mouth into the snow some years before for having called them a name when he hadn't called them that name at all, when in fact he hadn't said anything to them, the fact of him saying that he hadn't said anything of that kind or anything at all only making their rage greater, so that they said to him, "Are you calling us liars, motherfucking white boy? Is that what you be doing?" And before he could answer they brought him low with the blows they had to inflict. Because hatred was hatred and fury was fury.

His stupid brother. Falling was what happened when you walked too freely as yourself among the aggrieved people of the earth. A person needed caution in his face and a degree of fear. You could not walk heedless of what was out there. This was New York City, and something was spreading, block by block, that required you to contain yourself more and more. How could Luke not see that the Puerto Ricans were angry and the blacks who had made him fall before were angry?

Luther had not been his brother's keeper. But he could kneel and place his fingers in his brother's gaping wound and have his brother's blood on his hands.

The train made its way. It had a pace all its own. Newark, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington. Those were American names. Alexandria, Richmond, Rocky Mount, Florence, Kissimmee. Those were American names, too. Whatever else they had once been, they now belonged to America, and Luther could say he had been to them, if only to have passed through, even as a voice not his own said distance was no substitute for depth.

The beach, windy and deserted, was in easy walking distance of his rooming house on Collins Avenue. Though the temperature never rose above seventy degrees, the skies were clear and remained that way as he lay on his towel amid a scattering of palm trees. Every afternoon he could see, as he stood under the shower down the hall from his room, the progress that the sun was making on his skin. The rest of his body was leaving behind the sickly whiteness that the area covered by his bathing suit still showed. A tan would make his body more than it was. The sun would bring his flesh to life and make it look all right.

Not that he felt so good about himself in the shower itself. Naked he saw what he lacked, tan or no tan, and was grateful for the comforting cover of clothes.

Every morning he had business to take care of before he set foot on the beach. At a diner owned by Cubans, he would order huevos and French fries and whole wheat toast with lots of butter. In this way was he getting filled up so he could have a more substantial look when he stepped out of his clothes and showed himself in his bathing suit. He could see his shadow looking temporarily fuller in the sand when the sun came around to cast it.

In the evening he found a restaurant with jumbo fried shrimp on the menu, served with tartar sauce that had the tartness its name promised and French fries that he bathed in ketchup and a slice of tomato on a bed of lettuce. He washed his meal down down with a Coca-Cola in a glass of crushed ice. Then he had some coffee and smoked a Marlboro cigarette. Sometimes he bought the flip-top box. Other times he went for the soft pack, not being wedded to either.

Except for brief exchanges with waiters and the hotel clerk and the like, he had nothing approaching a conversation and felt no crying need for one. He was OK with his solo status.

One thing he thought: I am 1,500 miles from home. I can go away from that building. And even if I return, I can go away once again. I am not my sister Hannah. I am not my sister Naomi. I am not my brother Luke. I am not any of them in the sorrow patch where they have committed to spend their lives.

On the beach he read The Iceman Cometh and other plays by Eugene O'Neill in a Vintage paperback edition. Professor McGonigle had liked a paper he wrote on Yeats. His words had started a song of sweet love in Luther's heart. But Professor McGonigle then found his essay on Long Day's Journey into Night too emotional. Those words "too emotional" came to Luther now as he read about the drunks in Harry Hope's bar. He was practically naked on an open expanse of beach, with only the ocean in front of him. With no place to hide, how could Professor McGonigle's words not have found him again? Luther put down the book and whispered into the sand so no one could make out his words or even know that he was saying them. And there were only two words, "Help me. Help me." Over and over did he say them staring down at the sand until the words of Professor McGonigle went away. Because Professor McGonigle had seen the nakedness of his mind, if not his body, and no one must do that. No one.

What else do you remember about that time, Luther?

I remember the barren beach and the chill; the blinking Christmas lights behind the front desk of the rooming house; the Spanish spoken by the Cubans and the aroma of coffee and the feeling of warmth in their diner; the spare, damp room and the peeling paint on the walls; the wrinkled brown skin of the worn-out waitress who served me the jumbo shrimp; the comfort of soft ocean air against my skin; the train trip home with Luke nowhere in sight, emotionally speaking—these things I remember.

Jane Thayer was not patrolling the streets of Broadway when he returned. She had finished with her parties and walking up and down the avenue with her boyfriend of the week. She was gone from his sight.

But Luke was not gone. He was still upon the earth and hanging out with Lenny Cerone and Jerry Jones-Nobleonian in the lobby in the performance of his night watchman's duties. "Man, I have to tell you. I thought you were dead, over with," Luke said.

"Over with?" Luther asked.

"This kid who looked just like you is crossing Broadway last week right near here. It was around one o'clock at night and this car comes tearing along with its lights off and flattens the kid. It was a sickening thing to see. It wasn't you but it could have been you. And then we thought how maybe it was you. Like maybe you had come back from Florida early. You know what I mean?"

"Was he killed?"

"Oh, yeah. He was dead," Luke said.

"Gone. Finito," Jerry added.

"That ain't right, man. It ain't right. Some sick shit," Lenny said.

"And a Columbia student, too. It was in all the papers," Luke said.

"That's how we really knew it wasn't you. You don't go to no Columbia," Jerry Jones said.

Just up the block from Tad's Steak House a bar with a loud sound had opened, music pouring from its dark interior that made Luther come alive in a way that he didn't deserve to feel alive each time he passed on by owing to his college entrance exam failure. On this particular night "Mickey's Monkey" was blasting into the street, Smokey Robinson and the Miracles doing it up right. The amplified music just held him, intoxicated, to the spot. Lonely and depressed only a moment before, he was now bathed in a brief emotional delirium. Yes, yes, he was number one and going higher, he could feel, before the reality of his circumstance returned to him.

Back past the few patrons at the bar, on a runway, a young woman danced under colored lights. The sight of her in a white bikini and matching boots drew him in. And yet, once inside, he feigned indifference, forcing himself to stare straight ahead as he sat on a barstool sipping his beer.

He had drunk on and off during high school, starting with the six-pack of beer he bought the night after walking Jane Thayer home in the spring of his freshman year. He and his friend Jerry-Jones Nobleonian drank the beer in Riverside Park, opening one after another of the cans with a church key. As he shared his happiness, his joy, at having met and kissed this girl, Luther had a distinct sense that he was using the beer to try to preserve the feeling of elation from the night before and perhaps even go higher with it. He drank sporadically in those years, mainly with the neighborhood Irish kids. Schaefer, Knickerbocker, Rheingold. Beers from New York City breweries in dark brown quart bottles. But he had never been in a bar, not until now, and the thought occurred that he might want to spend the rest of his life there.

But he mustn't do as the other men perched on their stools, who openly gawked at the dancing girl. He would present himself as too sensitive and good for that. It did not occur to him that she might want to be looked at, considering the fact that she was up there undulating and gyrating to the sound of Sam the Sham and the Pharoahs singing "Wooly Bully" or shooting out her arms in a dramatic interpretation of the thunderous imperative "Stop! In the Name of Love" or getting downright slinky to the sound of "Love Potion #9."

Her youth and the freshness of her beauty—surely she was no older than him—made her seem two cuts above such a bar, a nightspot too dark and smelling of lonely sex for those of quality like the Columbias and the Barnards to enter. And yet there she was. How bold and maybe defiant to step into this world and display her thinness and those miracle curves and the swell of her breasts and those full, kissable lips and that lustrous black hair, cut so daringly short, and those eyes so big and dark and the power they possessed.

The bartender wore a black knit short-sleeve shirt buttoned at the top and had a long tattoo of a dagger on his right forearm. He was surely a man with takeout power in both his big fists. His anger beamed out at you through his small, hard eyes, and so Luther's requests for more beer were of the entreating kind, as he knew what anger was, its language and its smell, and how you must act in its presence. He had seen it written on the walls of the family's apartment growing up.

And he knew something else. He knew the girl. Not well, not intimately. Not so as she would necessarily know him. Her name was Imelda. She had lived across the street from Jane Thayer. Maybe she still did. A lesbian, Jane Thayer had said, only repeating what she had heard. The rumor only added mystery to Imelda's natural appeal. And now a lesbian go-go dancer. A girl who could go where others couldn't go.

Luther approached during her break and introduced himself.

"I've seen you in the neighborhood through the years," Luther said. He felt no need to mention Jane Thayer.

"And?" Imelda said, not adding, as he might have hoped, that he looked familiar as well.

"Are you a student?" Her bright-eyed matter-of-factness had not eased his terror.

"I'm in my first year at City College," she said.

The information triggered a mental collapse. The girl was higher on the intelligence grid. He had been trying to connect with her, but the information had brought down a painful barrier. Even so, fortified by two beers, he tried to reach across the divide.

"Could I maybe walk you home?"

"You can if Joey doesn't show up, and I have no idea if he will."

She said Joey's name as if Luther would know who he was. As if everybody would know who Joey Szyborska was. And Luther, at least, did.

A train black in the night traveling at a very high speed and smashing him into kingdom come. That's who Joey Szyborska was.

Woozy from the beer, he returned to his room and lay his head on the pillow. In the dark Imelda's face appeared. What would it be to walk her home, and to kiss her, as four years before he had walked Jane Thayer home on a spring night and kissed her? Imelda, and the beer, and the music, had opened the door of possibility. It had felt safer, if not better, to be mired in depression, to see a monochrome world rather than the world of color that had briefly opened up to him in that dark bar.

She had said that he, Luther, could, if he, Joey, didn't. She had said that. He ran his hand over his naked and bony frame, his meager chest and thin legs and all the rest. The electric alarm clock glowed in the dark. It said 1:50 a.m. He fumbled for his pants and shirt and sneakers. And then it occurred to him—he hadn't thought of Jane Thayer since laying eyes on Imelda. She had banished Jane Thayer from his consciousness. Once again that couplet from Romeo and Juliet came to him: "Take thou some new infection to the eye/ and the rank poison of the old shall die,"

The shops on Broadway were closed, except for the all-night grocery, and the streets empty, and yet, like a beacon, the lights burned in the bar, drawing him toward it. And there she was, stepping out in jeans and a black turtleneck and a suede jacket. Luther stopped as she came toward him, a smile spreading on his face. Oh, what a strange world. Oh, what a strange life. She waved with her right hand. He waved back. But then she waved again. Luther turned and saw bearing down on him a huge young man who, in passing, dealt a blow with the back of his hand, catching Luther square across his face, separating him from his glasses and sending both to the pavement.

"You want more? You want me to knock your head off, too?" Joey said.

"Come on, Joey. Come with me, baby." Imelda's voice was soft, but it traveled far. It had no competition on the desolate street. It was just her voice and big Joey, of course, and how they walked off, and how he suddenly turned, with his lips thin and compressed, as if to finish the job that he had started, before she pulled him back.

“It’s OK, Joey. It’s OK. Don’t be getting in trouble for a nobody in the night. You just come with me, baby, and let me give you something good.”

2. Sister of Mine

Every day, coming and going from his own room, Luther would pass by the room of his youngest sister, Vera. Hers was bigger, with a private bath and a view out on the courtyard his mother would ask him to sweep as a child. He rarely saw his youngest sister, and on those occasions when he did, a feeling of fear, even danger, ultimately would seize him, preventing communication. Some wound had been suffered that made him freeze in her presence. He sensed they were at cross-purposes in their lives. She had taken something from him. She had taken their father. And she was planning to take more.

His youngest sister was an irritant he could live his life around, and the same with his older sisters as well. He had no capacity for sweet surrender to her, nor could he act like an older brother should, with affection easily shown. She had her anger. She held it in reserve, but it was there. And she had her talons.

Defensive. That was a word he heard used a lot, as in “He or she is so defensive.” Around Vera he was just that—defensive.

With Jane Thayer in his life, there had been no need for Vera. There had been no need for anyone but Jane Thayer. All chambers of his mind had been flooded with her. But she had gone away, and now he had the sense, every time he passed Vera’s door, that his sister was counting on his vulnerability to lean him toward her. (He could not call her his kid sister, not when less than two years separated them. Her close pursuit had followed from the womb.) When will Luther come to me? So he heard Vera thinking.

When will he break? When will his desperation in combination with his innate weakness compel him to exercise his only option. She was the gate he would have to pass through if he was to emerge from the limbo of his life into a new chapter.

And that's all it was, a matter of time. When he passed her door one afternoon, she was standing just outside, as if anticipating his presence. He didn't head on by because he couldn't. The loneliness was too much. He entered and she closed the door behind him.

"It's the best. Twinings lapsang souchong. Exotic, smoky, flavorful. See if you don't agree," she said, as she served him a cup of tea.

The tea was hot, but he managed a small sip. "It is good," he said, and it was, better than the Lipton he occasionally drank.

"So tell me about college? Are you liking it?"

"I feel a little lost. Just a face in the crowd. It's a change, going from a small private school to a huge public college, that's for sure."

"But what about your classes?"

"They're OK. I'm taking some required classes to get them out of the way—math and French and even a speech and music class."

"I can't wait to go to college," Vera said.

"Who is that on the wall?" he asked, motioning to a poster of a blond giant of a woman in a triumphant pose.

"That's Verushka. A Russian super model. She's over six feet tall and beautiful. Don't you think so?"

“Oh, yes. She is that,” Luther said. It was easy to see why his tall sister would admire such a woman.

The room was filled with plants: a diffenbachia with white-spotted leaves stood on the table and a philodendron hung in a basket in the window and on the floor was a tall rubber plant. Not that Luther knew their names, but Vera did.

On the wall was another poster, the foursome in it more easily identifiable. He had heard “Satisfaction” and “That’s How Strong My Love Is” and “Play with Fire” and “The Last Time.” He had heard what the Rolling Stones, Mick Jagger and Keith Richard and Charlie Watts and Brian Jones, dressed in black and staring down at him with jeer and scorn, could do.

“What do you see when you look at that poster?” Vera asked.

“I see four pretty famous guys,” Luther said.

“No. Really, really look at it and tell me what the poster is saying to you.”

He stared at fat-lipped Mick Jagger and sullen Keith Richard and slightly more affable Charlie Watts and pretty boy Brian Jones. “Something a little darker than the Beatles?”

“No, no, no. Keep looking.”

And so he did, but after a minute shrugged and said, “I give up.”

“You aren’t seeing it yet?”

“I don’t know what you want me to see.”

“You don’t? You really don’t?”

He shook his head.

“Their long hair.”

“So?”

“So that’s what you should do, Silly. Let your hair grow out.”

“Such beautiful, curly hair. Hair like that belongs on girl,” his mother would say, when he was still in grade school, before sending him to the Puerto Rican barber down the block who would shear off his long locks and give him the crew cut that his mother thought would make him an American boy. But here came his sister saying something different. Grow your hair. An imperative, she had uttered. And so he did, and his sister rewarded him.

“You look beautiful. You know that, don’t you?” He didn’t answer, but his sister’s words made his heart sing. Who had ever used such a word to describe him? Who?

And something more. Never again would he have to be exposed. Never. Now could he reclaim his secret and not be subject to ridicule, as who could tell the back of his head was flat as a board with so much hair to hide its sheer, monstrous shape?

Unlike his older sisters, Vera possessed some core of strength that didn’t allow for defeat. As with him, her goal was to escape into a life beyond the building.

He began to look forward to their get-togethers, if only warily. Still, he noted that Vera’s favorite book was Charlotte’s Web, which she had read and then reread many times. He couldn’t be sure that his sister too wasn’t spreading a web.

“Daddy, Daddy, Luther smacked me. He smacked me in my face. Tell him to stop,” she had called, back in the long ago when they were young enough to still share a room. His father appearing from the bedroom across the hall from theirs in his sleeveless undershirt and scorching Luther's face with a hard slap, or smack, as Vera described such blows. A word Luther had come to detest, for all the falseness and exaggeration that attached to it, and for all the treachery as well. Vera had turned their father against him. She had betrayed him.

He lived in the wound she had inflicted. It didn't matter that he had behaved badly. It didn't matter at all. She shouldn't have done that. She just shouldn't have. And then to gloat while he cried out in pain. What did that say except that she wanted him to suffer and could even possibly live with and enjoy his extinction. He had not received justice. He had not been heard. It wasn't fair. It wasn't fair.

He held on to things. He couldn't let them go. Even when he thought he had let them go he hadn't.

He wanted the love of a man he himself had killed, or said he had killed, the way that some children kill their fathers by making the decision to be the child of one parents, their mothers, and not their fathers. And if other children didn't do that, he had. And yet his father was still alive, sort of. It was not for him to think about too much. He had his feelings. That was all he knew.

My relationship is with the air. This he sometimes said too, if only to himself.

He could tell you these things with the passion such memories aroused, and you could tell him, rightly, that he was in the land of the infantile or lost at best in sibling rivalry. And you would be right. He would be defenseless against your truth.

All his roads led back to Vera. All his wounds led back to Vera. Or maybe they didn't and he would just tell you that they did.

They went out together to the coffee shop of the Turk on the other side of Broadway, where they sat at a booth drinking Cokes and eating cheese Danishes. Jack Jones sang “Wives and Lovers” on the jukebox. It sounded in his ears like an old song and made Luther feel old as he listened to it.

On the street Vera would introduce Luther to male acquaintances and friends without identifying him as her brother. This omission Luther noted, but didn’t call it to her attention, as he feared a penalty might attach and return her to the rancorous state. He could put a hold on his words but not his thoughts. She is letting them believe I might be her boyfriend, he sensed, growing fearful that she might shine a light into his mind at that very moment.

One day he would move away from her. One day he would not be hers the way he was right then, hiding out with his sister in the neutral zone because he could not have a life of his own. This much he permitted himself to think. Hope was a right he would not give up.

3. The Life Around Him

His mother had a love that required her to stay and look, not to run. Auntie Eve, her older sister, was weak and often bedridden, and Luther's father hobbled about on an artificial leg, following the amputation of his gangrened left leg below the knee. She did not flinch from the signs of mortality but did what was needed so their lives could go on.

But Luther did not have that kind of love. He saw his father, with his ancient face longer than a horse's, shuffling out of the lobby with the aid of his walker and wanted only to run and run, as if his father were the embodiment of decrepitude and imminent death. From a distance he watched his father make his way to the traffic island in the middle of Broadway, where he would sit and sun himself now that the warm weather had arrived.

A word about his father for those who didn't know. Katchair Garatdjian had been born in Constantinople in 1901. He had two sisters and two brothers. Those sisters now lived in Marseilles, in an apartment with drawn curtains they peeked out from behind. His brothers had disappeared. The Turks had been castigating the Armenians as traitors and insurrectionists, a fifth column bent on the destruction of the Turkish nation. Then World War I came and they turned to hitting the Armenians very, very hard, hitting them with the intention that they exist no more, not as individuals or as a race. The Turks had a master plan for the elimination of the Armenians so the Turkish people could breathe more easily in their own country and see sameness, not differentness, when they looked at other faces. The Turkish servant answered the door and told the authorities the Garatdjian family was not home and went so far as to say he couldn't be sure when they would be returning. While it was true that some of them were away, it was not so that all of them were. Thus, the Turkish servant had told a lie to the Turkish authorities, who were not to be played with, given their fierce and ruthless dispositions. Thus was Luther's father spared. Luther had no understanding why the Turkish authorities would not have pushed past the brave Turkish servant to see for themselves that the dwelling was free of Garatdjians, or why it was that those same authorities did not come back at another time or simply wait for the reappearance of the Garatdjians. The story had not been told to him by his father but by his mother. His father he did not go to for stories about the Armenians or for anything, for that matter, his father being a danger zone in his mind. (A father you cannot get enough of, even when he is gone. A father must be come back to, as he was there at your beginning and your calculation is that he will be there at the end.)

But enough of a past he would never really know or understand, a past that was handed down to him in bits and pieces, a past as blown to the winds as the way of life his father and his family and all Armenians lived in in the time of the Ottoman Turks.

The fall and winter had been rough. The power grid had failed and there had been a blackout in New York City and all of the Northeast in November. Then, in January, the entire transit system was been shut down because of a long strike. Michael Quill, the short and fiery union leader, called the new and tall and Ivy League mayor Linsley when he knew full well his name was Lindsay. Spring was a welcome arrival, and it was good to see his father taking advantage.

Overcoming his instinct for flight, Luther approached.

“My son,” his father said, from his seat on the bench. “How are you? Are you being a good boy?”

“I’m doing OK,” Luther said. His father’s face seemed to have grown longer through the years, and his nose as well. Something else was different. Luther was used to seeing him in the suit and tie he dressed in for his job as a cashier, not the old pants and white shirt with the frayed collar he now wore.

“You are different, my son. I almost do not recognize you.”

“I have to wear glasses now. And I’ve let my hair grow longer.”

A small flock of pigeons had gathered near the other end of the bench, where another old man sat feeding them crumbs of bread. Luther never paused at such rest stops. The idea of setting out benches for people to sit on in the middle of rampaging traffic was an abomination, a gross insult to civic life. Cars were key to the mayhem madness of contemporary life, and someday they would be roaring through dwelling places while you slept as well if the nefarious ones had their way. And who were the nefarious ones? Oh, everyone knew. Everyone. They were the ones who macadamized the trolley tracks, the trolley being the sole legitimate purpose of these traffic islands, a place where the citizenry could wait for their ride on public transit. And now they were gone so cars could run more fully riot through the streets of Manhattan.

“I am preparing to leave,” his father said.

“Leave? Where are you going?” Luther asked.

“Where would my son expect me to go?”

“I should know?” Luther said. It was a conversation they had had before.

“You must do a better job of understanding your father, my son. Your father is preparing to enter Heaven. And Mommy will be joining me shortly thereafter.” His father turned to a newsletter he had brought along. Luther instantly recognized it as a religious publication from the cheap paper and the blue ink.

“Well, I should be going,” Luther said.

“Be well, my son. And be good to your mother. Your mother is everything. Everything.”

Luther nodded. It was a sentiment he had heard before.

That evening the Thalia, and the memory of its cozy confines, drew him back. Darling, an English film, was playing.

a bright light

a shining star

a radiant queen

Luther could not begin to comprehend all the blond actress, Julie Christie, meant to him as he witnessed her on the screen. Nor could Dirk Bogarde, who played a TV reporter. He succumbed to her beauty and left his family. But he was quiet and bookish, and she was on the go, walking with a swinging, carefree gait and displaying attributes of fineness that made you want to be as she was or at least walk and shape your lips as she did and be loved as the star that she was.

Dirk Bogarde didn't anticipate that Julie Christie would leave him for Laurence Harvey and the rich, fast-paced, and glitzy world he moved in, as Dirk Bogarde had left his own family. Dirk Bogarde didn't imagine that he would find himself alone at night, with no wife and no family and no Julie Christie, and only a book to read.

And so Luther tried to walk as he had seen Julie Christie walk on the screen, swinging his arms freely, and he tried to shape his lips as she had shaped hers. It did not matter to him that he was six feet four inches tall and only one hundred thirty-five pounds or that he was a male. To be a blonde, as Julie Christie was a blonde, was to bathe in the light of love.

In that same season a tenant named Bill Bucke took an active dislike to Luther, and all because Luther spoke words Bill Bucke could not agree with. Bill Bucke lived in room 2D8 with his wife, a woman very much in his image. Bill Bucke had teeth that were white and prominent in a feral face, and sunny blond hair and a disposition that was on fire with a truth he claimed to possess. There were 289 Communists in the House of Representatives and fully 83 in the United States Senate and the antichrist himself was sitting in the Oval Office, and don't let those elephant ears of the president fool you.

Bill Bucke held forth on the threat to the nation down in the lobby at night, when the brazenness and scale of the attack on American institutions of government would not allow him to sleep. Luke, who was on duty, was his skeptical audience, along with Lenny Cerone and Jerry Jones-Nobleonian and Luther, who had happened by.

"My real father was runned over by the Communists," Jerry said, sharing the same version of history he had offered Luther when they first met back in grade school.

Sensing an ally, Bob Bucke said, “That’s their signature action. They run you over.”

“They ran him over with a tank. A Communist tank. He was defending Estonia from the invasion of the Communists, and the tank just crushed him when he tried to stop it.”

“I wouldn’t be surprised if the one who did it is sitting right there in Congress now,” Bill Bucke said.

“A Soviet Communist is sitting in the United States Congress?” Luther asked, having been silent to this point.

“Communists are like chameleons. That’s why they both start with the letter C.”

“But Christ starts with the letter c,” Luther said. “And carpet and cow and candle.”

“Are you apologizing for aggression and iniquity in high places? Is that what you are doing?”

“I’m asking a question.”

“The Communists always try to put the side of righteousness on the defensive,” Bill Bucke said.

“Where did you learn all this stuff?” Luther asked.

“It’s in the public record.”

“What public record?”

“The congressional record.”

“And where can people get a copy of this record?”

“I have a copy right in my room.”

“It would be great to see.”

“Then see it you will,” Bill Bucke said, and tore off up the stairs.

Luke shook his head. “You shouldn’t get him upset like that,” he said, as if he had some better understanding of Bill Bucke than Luther possessed.

“I guess not,” Luther said, staring nervously at the stairs and wondering now what he had set in motion. Would Bill Bucke come bounding back down the stairs in a crazy wig and a granny dress wielding a huge carving knife, a la Norman Bates?

They didn’t have long to wait. No wig, no dress, no knife, apparently. Just Bill Bucke at a new level of intensity, his face gone deadly white, slamming a staple-bound document on the nearby table and tearing through one page after another until he found one with text that had been boldfaced, underlined, capped and set in a box, and the headline COMMUNISTS ON THE MOVE: WAKE UP, AMERICA, and the statistics Bill Bucke had previously cited.

“But this doesn’t look like a congressional document,” Luther said, noting the cheap paper and screaming capitals and other pyrotechnical formatting of the text.

“A document about the United States Congress is not a congressional document?”

“It’s a document about the United States Congress, which is not the same thing as a document issued by the Congress.”

“I’m warning you,” Bill Bucke said, pointing a threatening finger at Luther’s face.

“Hey, don’t be warning him. He’s my brother,” Luke said.

“You’ll be sorry. You’ll all be sorry. The day will come when even your mothers are Communists.” With those prophetic words, Bill Bucke tore back up the stairs, his document in hand.

All that night Luther thought about the harm’s way he had placed himself in by riling Bill Bucke, just as he had placed himself in the same path with Joey Szyborska at the bar that night, and could only wonder if the world had one agent of destruction after another waiting for the opportune moment to demolish him, and he were collaborating on some level with those forces for his demise. After all, what had he done but try to make himself better than Bill Bucke by ridiculing the man for his convictions? It wasn’t a good or a nice thing to come between what a man loved and the object of his affections, whether a woman or an idea.

And he saw other things as well that made him want to turn his face to the wall and say shame, shame, double shame.

Professor Corwin Blackner had a bulging brow, but you did not need to be a phrenologist to measure the deep capacities of his mind. He cavorted and pin-wheeled through history, from the Peloponnesian War to Charles De Gaulle and along the way drew easy parallels between the Edict of Nantes and the Bill of Rights and meditated on the word sabot and its implications for world history. What he could not do was maintain linearity and a base on the ground. The professor’s mind summoned gusts of wind that blew solid matter around so that all sense of order got lost. Luther felt dropped into a strange forest with a compass he couldn’t read. He felt a crying need for orientation. He needed to be able to write facts down so he could have them to know and be fortified by the possession of them.

Luther went with his complaint to the administration, and at the next World Civilization class, heard from Professor Corwin Blackner noise such as he had not made before. Once again I have been a trespassing fool, Luther thought, seeing the effect of his action on the yowling professor. How could he not have seen what was so obvious? The professor was young and ambitious and passionately in need of expressing his mushrooming ideas. Wounded and angry, Professor Blackner challenged the student who had gone over his head to criticize him to declare his identity.

Luther felt only shame at what he had wrought. Though he could not come clean in front of the class, the weight of his guilt became intolerable as the week progressed and he sought out Professor Blackner in his small office before the next class and was not surprised that he had to identify himself, as the class was large and conducted in an auditorium.

“I was the one,” Luther said.

“I’m sorry. You were the one what?” Professor Blackner asked.

“I am the one who made your life unhappy with my unjustified complaint, and I will go to the administration and withdraw the complaint.”

“Well, it is very brave of you to come to me, and I appreciate your honesty. But can you tell me, if only for my own edification, what led to your unhappiness with my method of teaching?”

It was one of those earnest moments that Luther blamed himself for sullyng life with, that he should bring a high-flying young man with a Harvard pedigree down from his lofty airspace into the mundane realm of the personal and confessional. What a thing, that he should be burdening Professor Blackner with his presence. But Professor Blackner had asked a question, and Luther felt obliged to answer.

“It is only that the torrents of history you unleashed were pouring out of a powerful hose and flooding my mind and I felt in danger of drowning. I thought, if I could have just one fact to hold on to, like a man being swept downstream reaching out for an overhanging branch only to have the branch snap. My mind has been slow and lackluster, so much in need of the fixed space and the security of names and dates to get me from one place to another.”

Professor Blackner put a studying look on Luther’s face, as if to go beyond it and extract some missing information. But for a man of many words, his response was brief.

“I will see you in the next class,” he said.

One night that spring there came a knock on Luther’s door. But no, it was not Jane Thayer making a seasonal visit to announce some new party plan with a triumphant look on her cold-reddened face. It was just a man named Sean with a snub nose and a head, like Luther’s, that called attention to itself. Sean had the back of his head, where Luther’s was missing, and it was round enough to make him human, and yet too abundantly present. The neighborhood kids had called him Hammerhead, though never to his face, unless it was the time of month that a beating was what they wished to order. Sean was squat and could take you down with either fist and make you stay down once he delivered. It was not nothing that he could make you fall in love with all his power.

Sean made a disapproving appraisal of Luther's new coiffure. "You forget where the barber is?" He himself was not one to let his hair rise too far off his scalp.

"It was suggested to me to let it grow out."

"It was suggested. The way you fucking talk. That fucking hair of yours has seven parts in it."

"Everything you say is true, and yet I have to go where I have to go."

"You are one ugly fuck face. Let's go for a drink. I'm buying."

Sean's battlefield prowess had won Luther's heart when he put it on display on the baseball field down in Riverside Park in the long ago, routing Frenchie the Algerian, who had been dropping shavings of dry ice on the neighborhood kids from atop the batting cage as they took their turn at the plate in a pickup ballgame. When Sean, swinging from the left side, felt the burn of the dry ice on his neck, he did not ignore the neighborhood bully, as the other kids had done, but had it out with Frenchie in the middle of the diamond, separating him from the bat he swung at Sean's head with a punch to the head that crumpled him before strutting off with his bare chest out and his head thrown back.

That had been the summer before seventh grade, but it wasn't until ninth grade, when Luther began to hang out with the boys from Amsterdam Avenue on Fatso Scully's stoop, that he really connected with Sean. Not that there wasn't ambivalence. Sean liked boys, not girls, and he was predatory and definitely dangerous. And probably he was a crook, given the large roll of bills he often flashed and the expensive theater tickets and box seats to ballgames he bought for them. And yet all those things were part of his appeal as well. Life attracted life.

But now Sean was out of the context in which Luther had known him. That old life was over. The boys of Amsterdam Avenue were no more and Jane Thayer was no more and high school was no more and dreams were no more. Luther was on a plain of bleakness now.

He did not want Sean. The mystery and aura of excitement that once attached to him had faded. He now seemed to Luther seedy and corrupt as well as dangerous. Only you could not say such a thing to anyone, let alone someone with the tendencies and the disposition of Sean.

“Murray’s not showing me any class and class is everything,” Sean said. They had gone to Torlini’s, where a fleshy girl with none of Imelda’s dark beauty, was on the runway, doing her whiskey a go go thing. Luther had felt insane suggesting the place, but he seemed to lack the means to stay away.

“Class?” Luther asked, holding up the word, like a glass, for inspection.

“Isn’t that what I just said?”

“But why, I mean, how, didn’t he show any class?” Class. The word really did clank with stupidity.

“The boy is a complete whore. I take him to a party in San Francisco and the next thing I know he’s in the bathroom with some jerk. Class, he should have more class.”

Though Luther didn't care for the word, he had to accept that class was a driving force in Sean's life. If it wasn't San Francisco, then it was Chicago or Los Angeles Sean mentioned. He was a man who wanted you to believe he was going somewhere and had been somewhere. A man with a hard-shell Samsonite suitcase strutting through airports in expensive Italian shoes.

Such a big head Sean had, but his face with the smallness of a monkey's. Murray had left him. That was why Sean had come knocking on his door, Luther was sure. Sean's life was unraveling. The money he had stolen—and he had stolen money, whatever air of mystery he tried to surround himself with—was probably running out. And even if it wasn't, the fine restaurants and swank hotels and trips he lavished on Murray weren't enough to hold someone with his beauty and physical endowments and inclinations. Murray was built to turn heads—not just those of homosexual men but everyone's—with his body and looks like that of a Greek god.

Sean had done a crummy thing, exploiting a lonely old widow, Mrs. Harlow, to whom he had delivered groceries from the Daitch Shopwell down on One Hundred Tenth Street. She did not know that Sean was more interested in her money, of which she had a bundle, and the uses he would put it to, than he was in her. The last Luther had heard, Sean had drained her bank account and was badgering her to liquidate her investment assets.

It was all quite tawdry and predatory, and Luther understood he had no business with such a person. Sean had done violence not only to other people's lives but to Luther's as well. Had he not beaten him senseless twice in the past four years, and on the flimsiest of pretexts? He too had felt the power of Sean upon his face so that he lay unconscious on the street where Sean had struck him. It had been Luther's laughing way about some matter or the other that provoked the rage. And had he not ridiculed Luther as a bag of bones he was embarrassed to be with the one day they spent together out at Jones Beach?

"What college did you say you were going to?" Sean asked, after ordering another round of drinks.

"Queens College," Luther said.

"That's what, like a step up from Manhattan Community College?"

"I guess so. It's a four-year college and Manhattan Community is a two-year school."

"You know, I can respect these Columbia kids. They work hard and they're bright and they study all hours of the night. But you, I don't see it."

"I don't see it myself sometimes," Luther said. "Sometimes I think I should just get a card at the New York Public Library and borrow books and get some kind of job."

"Then why don't you?"

"I don't know. I'm afraid of falling, and that if I fall, then there will be no bottom. It will just be some endless plunge into darkness."

"The way you fucking talk."

"I guess," Luther said.

Sean's words should have stung, and maybe they would in the morning, but the three gin and tonics Luther had drunk provided an anesthetic. People had roles in each other's lives, and if Sean's was no more than to tear him down, both physically and mentally, then so be it.

"I got something going on," Sean said, dispensing with the auxiliary verb to force language into a truer expression of who he was.

"What would that be?"

"You getting sarcastic?"

"I'm just asking."

"Don't be fucking with me."

"I'm not fucking with you. Really."

"Uncle Sam is going on."

"Uncle Sam?"

"Uncle Sam wants me, baby. Uncle Sam wants me bad. But you know what? Uncle Sam can suck my mick dick. That's what Uncle Sam can do."

"Wow. What are you going to do?"

"I'm working on it, baby. I'm working on it. I got me a plan, baby. A plan."

"Oh."

"What's that mean, 'Oh'?"

"Just oh, like OK."

The dancing girl who had flailed her arms and gyrated her hips now sat forlornly in a corner, a light jacket over her two-piece outfit. Or maybe she wasn't forlorn at all. Maybe she wouldn't go home and cry and cry. Imelda's face came to him. It shone there in the small dark space. She was no nobody in the night, that was for sure. He wondered where she had gone and where she possibly could go with an ape like Joe Syzmborska hovering near.

“I’m blowing this big town soon. You want to hop the big bird with me, baby? You want to go and go and go?”

“Go where?”

“You name it. It’s on me.”

“Dawn (You’re Too Good for Me)” was playing on the sound system. Frankie Valli at his best, better even than “Rag Doll” and all those sad rags exchanged for glad rags. Oh, the drinks had lifted him into the stratosphere and the music was taking him even higher.

“There’s only one city I want to go to.”

“Yeah? Which one is that?”

“It’s south of the border, down Mexico way. Do you know that city? Do you?”

“You fucking guy, you. You fucking crazy guy.”

He had never been on a plane before, nor had he ever been out of the country, but now he would be accomplishing both. And the advantage of surprise would be with him by journeying to Jane Thayer in a foreign land. He would close the distance between them in a way that the occasional air mail letter couldn’t. Spring break had come and it was time to leave behind the darkness of winter.

Whatever the cruising altitude of the plane, Luther felt like he was flying even higher. The contents of those miniature bottles served by the stewardess in plastic cups made for potent drinks. Oh, the happiness of this new world, beyond any he could have imagined only hours before.

And in the hotel bar that night their drinking continued. A mariachi band struck up “Bridge Over the River Kwai.” The grinning accordion player showed teeth as big as piano keys. Even drunk Luther had to wonder if some dangerous mockery was going on.

It was near noon before he could get out of bed the next day, while Sean remained fast asleep. Lightheaded, he wandered about in the motorized mayhem of downtown. A twelve-year-old crouched forward on his motorcycle around a curve wearing a jackal’s smile, his abundant black hair blown back by the wind. Farther on, a barefoot peon in a long white shirt and loose cotton pants sat against a building wall with his knees up and his head down. He had seen all this before. He was tired and in the shade, away from the ferocity of the noontime sun.

On the wall of a building a bullfight poster with the bright colors of life. Torrero. Corrida. What was it to bring a bull’s head low and drive your sword into its neck?

Luther pulled out the air mail envelope with the red and green border and checked the return address. Paseo de la Reforma was Paseo de la Reforma, whether on a street sign or an envelope. Soon he passed through the unlocked front door to the coolness of the lobby. It felt like a place he had been before. A great commotion had started within him. What would he say? He had entered the drama of his life. He was no longer distant from it.

She had come knocking on his door. Now he would be knocking on hers, though not quite.

She was not long in coming. About fifteen feet separated them when she entered the lobby from the street. He had pictured her arriving alone, but she wasn't. A girlfriend was with her. Jane waved and then turned to her friend. The two giggled and walked up the stairs.

He had gone where he didn't belong. Ashamed of the way he looked, she had given him the brushoff. He was not suitable for presenting to her new friends. She had found men with more meat on their bones and heads with some roundness and without all that hair.

He did not linger in the lobby but made a beeline for the hotel. He needed to touch base with who he was. He thought he could go there and regroup. It was either that or disintegrate on the street.

The bed in the hotel room was neatly made. A note was on it. Under the note Luther found an airline ticket and two one hundred dollar bills. "This place not for me. See you. Sean."

Luther began to cry. He had hurt Sean's feelings. He should never have suggested Mexico City, even if Sean had made the offer to go anywhere. He had just been using Sean for his own selfish purpose, namely, to see Jane. It wasn't right what people did to each other. It just wasn't right. He remembered something Sean had said in the long ago, before the Daitch Shopwell plopped down on the neighborhood and he was still working for the little grocery on One Hundred Thirteen Street and Amsterdam, right next to Fatso Scully's stoop, where Luther hung out with the neighborhood Irish. "I feel so dirty coming to see you after you've been with Jane," Sean had said. And now Sean all lonely and hurt and out there in the world with no one.

So much money Sean had left. And the ticket home. It showed something about him. It showed he had a heart.

He lay curled up on his side on the bed and stared at the phone. Calling Jane was hard. He did have his pride, but he just couldn't see leaving Mexico City without a little more than a wave and a giggle from her. She picked up on the second ring.

"Oh, it's you," she said, seeing that she had all the power and he had none. He wondered if her girlfriend was still there with her and Jane was rolling her eyes that she should have to talk with him at all. But his days of displaying anger to Jane Thayer were over. He couldn't be angry at a girl who didn't want him and he didn't want either, if the truth were only known and embraced.

"Yes, it's me," he said.

"So what do you want?"

"I was just passing through. I had some business to attend to."

"What business might that be?" she said. He could hear the disbelief in her voice.

Luther looked around the hotel room. The curtains were drawn against the sun.

"Some important business," he said, as if he was on a secret mission a la James Bond.

"And how long will this business take to complete?"

"Could be a day. Could be two."

"What kind of business could you be doing with your hair like that?"

"Just business. That's all."

“Well, I’m having a party tonight. You can come if you want. If you can get away from your business, I mean.”

And so he did, only to sit in a chair for most of the evening, apart from the good-looking American kids with tans and white teeth and the look of money to support their easy ways. They saw his fear and insecurity and steered clear. It became the kind of party where he looked at them but they, having seen what they needed to see, stopped looking back at him.

After a while Jane, tired of the social whirl, came and sat with him.

“So what’s this secret mission you’re on down here that you couldn’t tell me about? Are you with the CIA or something?”

“The truth is I’m on my way to Costa Rica.”

“Costa Rica?”

“Oh, yes. Something very big is happening down there.”

“And what would that big thing be?”

“I’m flying down there to get married.”

“No one would marry you.”

“That’s what you say.”

“What’s your fiancée’s name?”

“Estelina del Nina.”

“And where did you happen to meet this Estelina del Nina?”

“In New York City, where she’s attending college. She has a room in my mother’s building.”

Jane Thayer laughed in a loud and unkind way, briefly attracting her friends' attention. "You look like you're on your way to a funeral, not a wedding, and your own." There was meanness in her voice.

Since arriving, he had been fighting the drowsiness brought on by the thin air of Mexico City, and now, quite powerfully, he felt the call of sleep. "I should be going," he said.

"Nice seeing you, mister," Jane Thayer replied.

Luther returned to his room and slept and slept. He had thought down Mexico way meant that he was going down, down into a hotter region of the earth. Only later did he learn that Mexico City was up, up, where the air was thin and drowsiness-making for those who hadn't yet acclimated to its great height above sea level.

That spring he moved out of his little room but not out of the building. He took an even smaller room in the penthouse, across the landing from the two rooms his brother occupied. There was a bathroom on the landing that he and Luke both could share. Luke was strong in his insistence on the rightness of the move for Luther.

"It's what I've been saying, man. Being up here is like not being in the building at all. You'll be that much farther away from where it all began." Luke said.

"Where what began?" Luther asked.

"Don't ask me questions you know the answer to," Luke said. "You know what it is. It is it."

“Sure I do.” In that moment Luther was remembering their childhood dream of escape, and because he was remembering, Luke saw it in his face and grew challenging.

“Are you saying something different? Are you saying I’m not far away?”

“I’m not saying anything,” Luther said.

“Then tell that to your face,” Luke said.

“OK. I will. I mean, there’s nothing to tell. It’s fine, and even kind of exciting.”

“Didn’t I tell you I would get a place and you could come live with me?”

“Sure. Sure you did,” Luther said, and this time tried to keep his face from saying something different. In any case, there was no need to tussle, as they had back in December. It wasn’t that kind of row. Luther had an understanding that Luke was feeling hurt and defensive, and so he was at pains to alleviate his brother’s distress, as he did not want for his brother to suffer at the merciless hands of the truth. Because what was telling his brother the truth but an act of sadism if his brother could only be crushed and made to cry and even die by speaking it. In that way Luther was his brother’s keeper, the protector of his vulnerability. But if it wasn’t for Luke to get away, it still was for Luther to do just that. The roof could be a steppingstone, but it could not be a final destination.

Luther gave the walls and ceiling a fresh coat of flat white paint and applied to the wood floor two enamel coats of forest green so he could make the room his own. He had taken with him the radio his mother had given him to listen to the broadcasts on Sunday morning from Calvary Baptist Church but on which he mostly listened to 1010 Wins, all news all the time, so he could be abreast of all developments local and worldwide that needed his fretful attention. A small wood dresser held his few clothes, but he left his desk behind, as the space did not allow for such a thing. Nor did he have a bed, but he did have a mattress and rather liked lying close to the floor in the night listening to the snapping wind off the river trying and failing to get at him. Through such times he came to understand that the wind had a personality and to recognize its moods. Yes, it could be a zephyr caressing his face and yes, it could be no friendlier in its intention than the wolf at the door of the three little pigs.

Luke had gone to the roof. He hadn't gone to the moon. And so his mother needed only an elevator, not a spacecraft, to reach him. Some mornings she came calling, in her long black gabardine skirt, with the keys on her big ring jangling, and her words stayed the same. "Luke, I have need of you. It is urgent. I must speak with you this minute." Because the weight of the building was on her. The weight of Simon Weill and of her life were on her. But Luke had a way of responding to her cries for help in a way different from Luther. He did not feel that he would have to fall down and die if he did not match her sense of urgency with his own. He did not, in this instance, go against her with words, as he had at Christmas, and put his laughing thing on her. He met her instead with the silence of his snoozing. But her pounding on the door and cries for help continued, eventually rousing Luke from slumber and awakening his rage.

"Leave me the hell alone."

"But Luke, we cannot have this. I have need of you."

"Later."

"But I need you now. It is urgent."

"I said later."

Soon would come her tears. She would just stand there weeping while her two sons hid behind their locked doors. She had failed to come to him, as he was not a man in the way that Luke was a man who could replace a burst pipe or even a blown fuse. He was only good for his paperback books, if he was even good for those. He saw once again that his mother had stopped seeing him and was gone from him now.

Luther held his hands to his ears to try to block the sound of his mother's suffering. To never have a man she could count on. Not her father, whom her mother dispatched her to find so he didn't die drunk in the snows of Sweden. What a job for a child, to not only retrieve her father but to smash his bottles against the rocks, as she had told Luther years before. And then Daddy, a man she could not count on not because he drank but owing to his temperament. A man with a condition, she would say of him. A man who could not handle stress. A man who stood behind a cash register all day at Jack Dempsey's restaurant and sat in the Automat drinking coffee and spent money on burlesque shows and had time for his God but not for his family. A man for whom everything was too much. A man whom it was beyond imagining changing a light bulb or replacing a fuse.

But Luke had a story, too. He was a man of new beginnings. His song would always be "Don't Fence Me In," with all due respect for his thing for Elvis. It was said of him that, as an infant, he had kicked a crib apart in protest against its containment policy.

"Two good men. That's all your mother needs. Two good men," Mr. Fitzgerald called after him as Luther tried to slip by him in the lobby, where Mr. Fitzgerald had been doing his upright prayer with his head bowed.

He must have some kind of monitoring device that enables him to detect my presence. Such an essence these Irish Catholics project, as if only fists and coldness are to be found behind their faith, Luther thought.

Later that day, back from school, Luther visited with Luke in the quiet of the afternoon. He found his brother in the penthouse suite with his big nose pressed into his forearm for minutes at a time, as if trying to bore into his flesh and smell his blood to ascertain its degree of freshness. Blood could be stinky, Luke had told him when they were kids. It could stink to holy hell.

“Your blood is stinky. That’s why you’re all bones. Your flesh can’t stand to be around you,” Luke had informed him, back in the long ago.

Luther sat quietly, as when they were children. It would not do to call him from the spell; that would be a violation, and even dangerous, like shaking a sleepwalker into consciousness. Several minutes passed and his brother lowered his arm and went to the mirror, where he pulled his lips apart to inspect his teeth. Then he gave them a couple of chomps to test the soundness of his uppers and lowers.

“What are you doing here?” he asked, having determined that everything was good to go.

“I heard the ruckus this morning.”

“Get used to it.”

“Mr. Fitzgerald says she needs two good men.”

“I don’t listen to people who smell as bad as that guy,” Luke said. “Besides, she needs one good man, and that one good man is me.”

“I guess,” Luther said.

“What do you mean, you guess? You don’t hear her knocking on your door, do you?”

“That is true,” Luther said, not especially surprised that Luke should articulate what he himself had been thinking only that morning. Thoughts were readable. You saw them on people’s faces all the time.

“You see, she recognizes that I have the goods. She saw us both naked so she would have to recognize that. We’re talking endowment now. You understand what I’m saying?”

He was talking about his dick, but it wasn’t for Luther to say as much, cast as he was into the place of shame. “I guess so.”

“You see, you can’t be a man without that. Just ask any woman.”

“Stop it. Just stop it,” Luther found himself shouting. “You’re talking about our mother.”

“I’m just saying that how we are physically can suggest how we are mentally, too.”

“Right,” Luther said, repressing the impulse to ask his brother if he had never seen a bozo with a pea brain.

Having served up his aggression, Luke now offered his insecurity.

“I can’t have people looking at my face. You understand what I’m saying?” His brother needing a receipt for his words. asking for a receipt for his words.

“There’s nothing wrong with your face.”

“Don’t tell me there’s nothing wrong with my face. What do you know about my fucking face?”

He had blundered, gone where he hadn’t needed to go. Better to let his brother express whatever it was he was trying to express. When his brother went dark, to let him go dark and not try to shine some light into that darkness. Because, for all he knew, his brother needed that darkness as a place he could call his own.

Luke saying, “I’m going to get some plastic surgery so my face can be what it’s supposed to be.”

It was the acne. Luke’s face not as bad as it had been in his teen years, when it was one big red zone and Luke went through a bottle of special skin cleanser every month. The pustules had dried up, leaving his skin like some cratered planetary surface after the fire had come and gone.

That summer the Lovin’ Spoonful came and went, but then they came again, having their way with “Hot Town, Summer in the City,” an assault that revved you up but left you stranded when it ended. Rock took you into the sky and dropped you without a parachute. It left you twisted and destroyed with its sadness and its joy. He wondered that a violin sonata never did that to him, how instead it led you into the contemplation of your life in peaceful shadow and not in a state of internal commotion.

He took sick that summer, a condition that lingered, his throat continually sore and his glands swollen and walking a city block a fatiguing exercise. He lay about a lot on the mattress he had placed on the floor of his room, listening to the cable winding and unwinding from the winch in the elevator housing while living on Tropicana orange juice and the antibiotics prescribed by Doctor Edelbaum, whose office was across the street in the building of normalcy and order. When he could, he lifted ten-pound barbells so he was not defenseless against his emaciation, the gray face of Skinny never far from his mind.

At night lonely men would ascend from their rooms to the roof and peer with their binoculars into the apartment windows in nearby buildings, scanning for signs of female flesh. Others, more ethereal, brought their telescopes seeking constellations beyond the smoggy sky over New York City. Some nights Mr. Fitzpatrick would show, somehow managing to climb up on the parapet and stand at its very edge, a foot from the deep drop to oblivion, and pray from this high vantage point for the mass of mankind.

Luther himself would climb the ladder to the roof of the penthouse itself, where he would lie until his fear of the darkness and of danger would drive him back inside behind his locked door. There on the roof one night he saw a flying saucer, and spoke to Luke and other disbelievers how it had hovered, a luminous disk-shaped presence, not ten feet above him, before departing. What he didn't say was how special the flying saucer made him feel that he should be chosen for exposure to it, or that, curiously, he experienced no dread that the aliens had come to abduct him.

Jane Thayer came calling, in her Jane Thayer way, in August of the summer. No written warning. No phone call. Just with her knock, knock.

“So, are you among the living?” she asked, having tracked him to his room.

“Oh, yes, I very much am,” Luther said.

“And where is your Costa Rican lovely? Gone out for a quart of milk, has she?”

“Oh, yes. A very special quart of milk,” Luther replied.

“How can you live like this?” she asked.

“Like what?”

“This tiny room. No furniture. Just a thin mattress. What’s wrong with you?”

“Actually, I am getting better. The worst is over, I think.”

Jane Thayer made no mention of parties. Not a single one did she say she was throwing or attending.

She was there and not there, having come back to Manhattan to visit with her parents before returning to Mexico City, where she would start college in the fall. He found himself wanting to be with her all over again, but she did not want to be with him, or be with him in the same way. In Central Park, when he had regained his strength, he heard Dionne Warwick sing “Walk On By” at a free concert and wished so that Jane Thayer was with him to hear the singer tell her lover to keep walking on by so her tears would not be visible to him. Luther thought it magical to be back among the living in the night in New York City and yet agonizing too that Jane Thayer should be so near and so far.

Her parents moved that summer to Prospect Park, in Brooklyn. Several times Jane Thayer called on Luther to journey down to be with her while her parents were away and protect her from her isolation and aloneness. The borough’s dark, lonely streets frightened and disoriented him, and the apartment felt drenched in history but no present, as if only the spirits of the dead were in its rooms. And yet it may have been his relationship to which he was referring, he sleeping apart from Jane on the floor through the night because he was with her and not with her at the same time. In the morning he left without a goodbye.

And what was the smell of that perfume she wore that spoke to him of lonely teenage nights and the ache of desire? And what was that laugh of hers across the table at a coffee shop booth that said she was having it all her way with him once more?

And that song, that damn song, “Hot Town, Summer in the City.”

There was another with whom he spent time that summer, a young man named Daniel. He and his wife, Therese, had taken a room in the building, which they paid for with the salary she earned as a secretary in a midtown office. Daniel frequently flashed a mischievous smile on his narrow face and his walleye gave the impression of strangeness. Therese, a young woman with long brown hair and a soft smile, had an Ingrid Bergman-like beauty that spoke for itself. To look at her was to see that sincerity was part of her makeup.

While Therese was off at work Daniel sunbathed on the roof in black jockey briefs. The question arose in Luther’s mind whether the two were actually man and wife. Daniel’s indolence wasn’t the issue. There were many such men married to women who tolerated them for one reason or another. It was more his vanity and exhibitionism, the abundant sense of wantonness he conveyed with his look and manner. Seeing Daniel sun himself as smoke and embers blew from the incinerator, Luther would be aware of an attraction he felt for the man, who did, with his short blond hair and lithe, athletic, and bronzed body give the appearance of an Adonis. And perhaps he would have succumbed to Daniel's power, were it not for the smirk Daniel also displayed, which strengthened Luther's resolve not to give him the victory he was seeking.

Sometimes the sadness in Therese's eyes seemed to suggest a story she wasn't at liberty to tell. The two were from a small town in Michigan. They had come to New York City for their freedom, the way that many people do. She was afflicted with pleurisy, a condition which sometimes laid her low and even required hospital treatment. Her illness, suggesting a fragile hold on life, only added to her beauty and her appeal. Surely she had to know how much Luther longed to touch and hold her and receive her caring warmth. One day Luther would tell her everything he wanted to say. One day he would have the opportunity to do just that.

Toward the end of summer Daniel startled Luther with his plan to divest the Cathedral of St. John of some of its precious relics, which it displayed under glass in a wing of the edifice—gold cups and jewel-studded artifacts, as Luther vaguely recalled. He might just walk out wearing a gold-layered chasuble, Daniel said, giving truth to Luther's suspicion that he did have mischief and more in that mind of his, a felonious nature.

“How do you plan to do such a thing? Are you an international jewel thief, like that character in Topkapi. Because you don't look like one to me.” In fact, Daniel was coming to look more and more like a blond Norman Bates, with the fixed and birdlike intensity of those eyes.

But Daniel was not deterred. “I have a plan,” he simply said, summoning a smile to support his confident tone.

“There are people in prisons who had plans,” Luther said.

“The problem with you is that you are in a negative groove. You really do need to begin to think positively.”

“I’ll see what I can do,” Luther said.

Daniel surprised him with the presumptuousness of his observation but also with its accuracy. And yet the fog of corruption enveloped him, too. How else could he explain the presence of people like Sean and Daniel in his life?

In the same room with the relics was a long wooden bench. Daniel came before the closing hour and, when he was alone, lifted the seat on the bench and hid himself away in the hollow. When the cathedral closed its massive bronze doors for the night and the guard had made his obligatory round, it was Daniel’s intention to rise, and, supplied with a glass cutter, to liberate the artifacts from their enclosures. But he hadn’t counted on the sedentary nature of the guard, his large appetite, or his flatulence. For what seemed like hours the guard smacked his lips and loudly passed gas. Along with each emission the guard provided commentary. “Massive bombing campaign underway... Operation Rolling Thunder... Let her rip, big guy... Stinkaforium, you are me.” Nor had Daniel counted on the dictates of his own internal plumbing. He had to go, and go badly, and in a state of terror pissed his jeans in the box where he lay while Fatso bombed away. Hours later, through a side door of the edifice, he emerged, wet and stinky and relic-less.

Luther never had the chance that summer to pour out his heart to Therese. Her sickness kept her away, and those times he encountered her alone it was as they were passing in opposite directions, he going in and she going out of the building, for example, or vice versa, strongly suggesting to him that the flow of their lives was in opposite directions and he must let her go because he didn't have the necessities for securing her to his person. In fact, the closer they were physically to each other, the more improbable he saw the fulfillment of his longing ever being realized. He could find no segue into the realm of involved conversation and so could offer her only his niceness, his blandness. What is this goodness thing that I cannot move beyond? He would ask himself in the isolation of his room.

And then came the day that they were gone, without so much as a goodbye, as there had been no heralding of their arrival. But it was that way in the building without order, people coming and going while the Garatdjians, or most of them, remained.

There was another who, for a time, was on Luther's mind. Eddie Finkle was his name. With his disconcertingly small nose and fretful expression, he resembled a pug. Eddie had gone through life, into his forties, alone, gray now showing in his wiry black hair. Though he had the look of an escapee from an asylum, his single status was about to change. There was a woman he had taken to, and she to him. Her name was Eleanor Perron, as small and delicate and of good cheer as he was big and brutish and brooding.

Luther saw the collision coming. He had no hopes for the future of the odd couple. For one thing, Eddie had a smaller mind than Eleanor. It was the pairing of a cretinous Cro-Magnon man with a songbird. More distressingly, he was avaricious. She had means and he didn't. He gave up his room, moved in with her, and went on an alarming buying binge—a big color TV, high-priced stereo equipment, a fancy dining table set. Eddie's consumer bent gave rise to her suspicion that his main interest was her money. Another man who used and abused women. This too Luther saw, in anticipating the quick dissolution of the marriage.

That summer he received a letter from CCNY accepting his application for transfer. He remembered it had been called "Harvard on the hill," back in its glory days in the 1930s and 1940s, when quotas were in place that kept Jews out of Ivy League institutions. Luther, with his low SAT scores, was indicative of its decline. Still, he was grateful. No more one and a half hour journeys to the outer reaches of Queens and back. Now the IRT local would get him to the campus in ten minutes.

Not one campus but two, north and south. Shephard Hall. Wingate. Decrepit Lewisohn Stadium. Not Columbia. Not Teachers College. Not Union Theological Seminary. Not Juilliard, up at 122nd Street and Broadway. None of those, but north of them all, as if in exquisite seclusion. A college like a second baseman who shows occasional flashes of power. Good for twenty homers a year. In this way did he also think of the City College of New York.

That wasn't it either. He was going north, with all the promise the north contained, and yet he would still be within the bounds of the city he loved on a campus with gothic features amid the new.

That now he would be among the anonymous mass in a respectable and affordable college even if his board scores did not entitle him to be there.

That by anonymous mass he meant the public school boys and girls he should have been with all along if only his mother had not been scared of the boys of violence who might have at him in such a setting.

He lacked a retentive mind. Quickly he would forget the pages of text he read, no matter how much highlighting of the material he did. The small academic abilities he possessed were in the humanities, but English and history and even the social sciences, were suspect in his mind. They were for those like him who were poor in math and science and lacked minds that could quantify and calculate and fathom the mystery of complex equations. What was that to read paperback novels and yet be at a loss in a physics class or chemistry lab?

Disregarding past failure, he enrolled in a calculus course. The words on the glossy white pages of the hardbound text he could read: the sine of the curve, the differential of this, the tangent of that. But the elegant mathematical notations represented a language he could only dream of comprehending. (f) x + y something. And yet he had set himself up for failure by going with his weakness, not his strength, as if, only by prevailing in the manly domain of math or science could he in fact be a man.

For a week his mind was a torment, giving him no respite from his dilemma: drop the course or stay on. He sought out a counselor. Perhaps he could help him with this acute feeling that he was meager in both body and brain. The counselor had Luther's transcript in front of him on his desk for the meeting. He was a young man of few words, a quantifying sort with a hard exterior.

“I don’t feel worthy of being here. Can someone with my mental resources survive in this world?” Luther said.

Pained hesitancy showed in the man’s face as he looked up from the unimpressive data on Luther’s transcript. The room filled with coldness. It was a room in which no life, no spirit, was allowed to exist, only numbers.

“You may need help I cannot give you,” the young man would only say.

His romantic poetry class was only a little less punishing. How Does a Poem Mean? he was supposed to have read in high school, but if he had, its message was mostly forgotten. Be suspicious of meaning altogether or find one that is non-linear. Something like that. The girls in his class seemed not to read but to inhale Keats and Shelley and breathe out insights about this sonnet or that. High board score girls bored with their dull professors.

In this time Luther encountered someone from what seemed the long ago, prompting not joy but alarm bells to ring in his mind. The solution of flight was denied him by the fact that their eyes met, and so there was now the social cruelty of two students who had little in common and little to say to each other in high school having to acknowledge each other in their new environment. Though it was sad to regard another person with such fear and so little basis for understanding, certain information about the fellow student flooded Luther’s consciousness immediately and colored how he saw him. One, he had scored well on the SAT and was seen as gifted in mathematics. Two, the most intense engagement Luther had with the young man occurred on a basketball court during a varsity scrimmage in which Luther decided the young man was showing too little discipline and desire. Luther took personally his seemingly cavalier attitude toward what was, at that stage of Luther's life, supremely serious business. Suddenly Luther flung the basketball hard, hitting the young man in the back. He then barked angrily at the young man. Luther had not shown this aggressiveness at the school previously, and though he later apologized, the hostility shown the tall, gentle young man only extended the gulf that exists between the intelligent and the less intelligent, the pacific and the violent. It grew large in Luther's consciousness that his overly serious approach to what was, in reality, simply a game revealed his inferiority to his acquaintance, whose general air of amusement supported the notion that he possessed a higher consciousness.

With surprising directness, Boris, simply said, "I can't tell you how uncomfortable it makes me to see you on this campus."

"Yes, I understand," Luther replied, as he surely did.

"Let's keep this brief, shall we? You go your way and I'll go mine."

"Yes, of course," Luther replied.

And there their connection ended, insofar as any further verbal communication. Harsh as the treatment was, Luther accepted the justness of it. People had a right to live their lives free of his oppressive presence. People had the right to assess who had things they wanted and who didn't.

“I don’t like the subway anymore,” Luke said. “Too many people down there looking into my mind. You understand what I’m saying?”

“Sure.”

“I’m going to buy a motorcycle. That way I can get around all on my own. Know what I mean?”

“I do.”

“You like motorcycles?”

“They’re OK.”

“What’s that mean? You like them or not?”

“I like to walk.”

“I like to walk too, but you can’t walk upstate, can you?”

“Maybe take the train upstate. I like trains.”

“Yeah, all right. Trains. But you have to think of the future.”

“Right. The future.”

“You all right, man?”

“I’m fine.”

“College is OK?”

“Sure. It’s OK.”

“That’s all you want to do is read books?”

“There are other things, I’m sure.”

“I was reading about this course in 16 mm and 35 mm film production. I’m thinking of getting one of those Bolex cameras. Maybe make some movies. You know what I’m saying?”

“I do,” Luther said.

“You see the new stereo I put together? And cheap, too. Turntable, amp, receiver—all for under seventy-five bucks. Listen to this sound.”

It was a loud sound. Eric Burden and the Animals coming through strong with that hideous song “House of the Rising Sun” and the even more lamentable “War (What Is It Good For)?” which featured a whole lot of grunting. Hairy beasts in some sort of cave. The man of many stinking shits. In such a way did Luther think of this Eric Burden and the same held true for his animals as well. Who in his right mind called the rest of his band “the animals” anyway? Or if he insisted on staying with the name, why not call the group “Eric Burden and the Other Animals”? At least be decent about it.

“It’s great,” Luther said, when his brother finally turned down the volume. “You really do know how to put things together.”

“And take them apart, too. You know that the Coast Guard contacted me?”

“What for?”

“They wanted me to enlist. I scored in the ninety-ninth percentile on their test. But then they found out about my arrest and withdrew their offer.”

“Oh, no. That’s so unfair.”

“It’s OK,” Luke said.

“OK? But you didn’t do anything.”

“I said it was OK, didn’t I?”

Luther went to his room and closed the door. He stood with his forehead pressed against the wall and his eyes closed. He stayed like that for a few minutes.

In the not so long ago, when he was first back from Europe, Luke befriended a boy named Andy Collingwood, who wanted to appear tougher than he was by wearing his hair in a duck’s ass and going about in a T-shirt and leather jacket in all kinds of weather. In spite of his rebellious pose, Andy was a high achiever at the Bronx High School of Science. The persona was one some of his type committed to, boys from prosperous homes and possessed of supreme gifts play-acting at rebelliousness and failure but never committing to the real thing. Andy encouraged Luke to take off on an escapade with him one spring evening. With little money and only a few supplies, they hitchhiked upstate and found themselves sleeping in a public park in Albany. In the morning, cold and hungry, they wandered into a residential section of the city. Seeing a car in the driveway of a private home, Andy said, “How about we take it for a spin?” There was the key in the ignition and the front door was unlocked. Luke had a conscience that would not allow for thievery, at least of money or material goods, but he was afraid he would disappoint his younger friend if he didn’t take up the challenge. And so Luke got in behind the wheel, and with Andy in the passenger seat released the emergency brake. As the car rolled down the slight incline and into the road, a warning voice sounded in Luke’s consciousness. No, no, the voice said, which was only an amplification of his initial trepidation.

“Hey, Andy, maybe we shouldn’t,” Luke said.

“Shouldn’t what, man? Let’s go, go, go.”

Luke couldn’t drive off, as Andy wanted, but he couldn’t leave the car in the roadway either. He turned the ignition and the car came loudly to life. What he didn’t know was that, it being Monday morning, the couple inside the house were preparing for work and that the husband had been drawn to the window by the sound of the car engine starting up in time to see Luke returning the vehicle to its rightful place in the driveway.

Minutes later, Luke and Andy heard the wail of sirens heralding the arrival of the Albany police with guns drawn in a swarm of squad cars. After handcuffing and frisking Luke, he was driven to the precinct and booked, placed in a holding cell minus his belt and sneaker laces, and later fingerprinted. Bail was set at five thousand dollars at his arraignment two days later, and when he could not meet it, he was remanded to the county jail to await trial. In this new location, he had the company of older men with lengthy rap sheets and younger men who were in the process of developing such records. Some of these older men had favors to ask of him, and when he denied the requests, unable to accept their sexual agenda, force was applied and he was compelled to fight.

The calls he made to home did not gain the response he had been seeking. “Is that so? But what is the meaning of this?” his mother asked, when finally he got to hear her voice, but her sound was one of bewilderment about the things beyond her immediate vicinity.

“Can you get me out?”

“My Lord, Luke, where am I to get such money?”

A few days later a delegation of the righteous and the scornful, as Luther later dubbed them, arrived at the county jail in a prayer van, owned and driven by Pastor Cohn, from the tabernacle where their mother worshiped. With him were Brother Johannssen and Brother Gluck, vested members of the congregation.

“We are come to set you on the path of righteousness, son. We are here to blind you with the Light, as Saul of Tarsus was blinded by the light. In the name of Jesus are we here,” the name Jesus pulled from Pastor Cohn’s mouth like taffy.

“I am not Saul of Tarsus and you are not the Lord,” Luke replied. “I need someone to get me out of this hellhole.”

“Jesus will get you out of this hell and every hell you could ever imagine,” Pastor Cohn continued. “This is your come-to-Jesus moment, son. You see where iniquity has brought you, and if not iniquity, then the path of foolishness.”

“Go away and do it now,” Luke said. He saw the entourage as his parents’ offering, and it filled him with self-pity and anger that what he perceived as smug rectitude should be offered in place of genuine assistance. Because he knew with them it would be words and more words and never any action, that they came from a place of judgment and self-righteousness, and that a God such as this that they embraced gave them license to show cold indifference to him as a human being, the same indifference the congregation at the tabernacle showed to the world as it sat there in those pews assured of their ticket to a heaven the rest of the world would never possess.

He was six weeks in jail before a plea bargain could be worked out by his legal aid lawyer.

As for Andy, he too was held for a night but released in the custody of his father the next day, his father having driven to Albany to reclaim his privileged son. And that summer he went off to an arts colony to which he had applied and in the fall enrolled at Harvard University, his father's alma mater.

This is only to explain why the Coast Guard didn't want Luke after wanting him so badly and why the world that came calling to him, whether the military or his mother, he could not readily go to. In truth, he showed no regret that the door that had opened and through which he could have walked onto a bigger stage was now closed. It was enough to bask, for a time, in the validation of the high test score and the Coast Guard's initial ardor. He did have worth. He was not the washout those at his high school, St. Andrew's, would have had him believe, from his desultory grades and SAT scores. The Coast Guard meant the loneliness of the water. It meant men without women. It meant regimentation, whereas the penthouse meant the freedom of the night. That which had called to Hannah and Naomi was now calling to him, silently and insistently, to stay where he was in the coffin that the building had become.

That fall Luke bought a 500 cc Yamaha motorcycle, a thin red and white and black death machine with chrome fenders. Luke kept the bike on the roof, in spite of the protests of their mother, who raised the prospect of monstrous fines should the fire department marshals see it during one of their inspections.

"Do my words mean nothing? Are they lost to the wind?" she exclaimed.

If her words had value, it was the smile her exasperated sound brought to Luke's face, and the impetus it gave him to kick over the bike's engine and do a wheelie, as if he were rearing up on a mechanical stallion, right there on the roof. But while Luke's disregard was brutal, Luther did not come to blows with his brother, as he had that Christmas season the year before. Luther did not want the job of quelling his brother's defiance. He wanted now to bear silent witness.

For Luke now, mornings were a time of despair. His defenses down, he would awake to the reality of his life, that his high school classmates had moved on while he was pushing a mop and doing other small chores for Auntie Eve and his mother while still living at home, penthouse or no penthouse. He turned to wine and a joint to soothe his pain and get him right for the day ahead. The night became his refuge, with the cloak of anonymity it provided. He would wheel the Yamaha onto the elevator and, from the basement, tear up the ramp and onto the street, waking and enraging those in the vicinity who thought 11 pm was a reasonable time to be fast asleep. From high up on his rooftop room Luther would lie in bed in anticipation of the engine's roar.

“Do I need people looking into my face and my mind on the subway when I have this? Well, do I?” Luke asked, pointing at the bike. And the answer was no, he didn't. He had claimed his autonomy with the helmet on his head, the spare one strapped to the buddy seat, and the throbbing engine between his legs. Led on by the promise of connection, he would take the hill down to Riverside Drive and onto the West Side Highway at Ninety-sixth Street, where under the verdigris base of a lamp on the arching bridge he and Nancy Becker, his teenage flame, had placed two pennies as an avowal of eternal love only several years before. But Luke was beyond Nancy Becker now and those “Blue Moon” high school days when she loved him only to not love him and then loved him again, those days when her rejection caused him to take aspirin by the bottleful and have his stomach pumped. He was a hunter in the wilds of lower Manhattan, flying over the cobblestone roadway down by the Fifty-seventh Street piers, a treacherous stretch particularly in the rain, which mixed with the motor oil dripped from the leaky pans of passing cars to make the surface slick as glass.

Greenwich Village was lonely streets calling to lonely, willing, footloose girls wandering in the New York City night around the perimeter of Washington Square Park. It was Rienzi and Café Figaro and other haunts along MacDougal and Sullivan Streets. Far from his own territory and free of the abashment that daylight brought, he could pursue his desire, like the girl walking south through the memorial arch of the park and past the fountain and turning down West Fourth Street in a pocket of aloneness—no one with her and no one near her on this late weekday night to paralyze him by reflecting back to him his predatory intention. A girl in jeans and a turtleneck and a suede jacket and boots. A girl just for him. Saying to her not “Are you lonesome in the night just like me?” but “Hey, would you like a lift? I’ve got an extra helmet,” the girl responding with a smile and the one word “Sure,” swayed by his size and strength and vulnerable eyes to climb onto the buddy seat and, as the bike gained speed, to place her arms tightly around his waist.

Soon Luther would be woken by the elevator door opening and voices on the landing and some minutes later jazz coming softly from Luke’s stereo as the smell of grass spread across the landing. There was no envy of his brother for the success of his nightly adventures. The repetition spoke of desperation and emptiness. It wasn’t much, but Luther at least had some books and the possibility of a future, whereas Luke had mops with which to swab the landings while serving as his mother and aunt's not so little helper.

The girls were always gone by morning. All that needed to be said had been said in the night, and now it was necessary to flee from that which they had done or allowed to be done to them. Daylight brought guilt and shame and the feeling that their lives were out of control, and the control couldn't return until they were gone from this place.

On occasion the girls would oversleep, only to be woken by the pounding of Luke's mother at the door, and the emotional scene that ensued, with Luke and his mother going at it, did not fit with the image the girls had of Mr. Motorcycle Man in the Night.

And yet, late that fall, Luke did meet a girl he could stay with for more than one night, and not on one of his motorcycle forays but at the Cheetah Club, near Times Square, where he had gone dancing to the Dave Clark Five and yes, Eric Burden and the other Animals and all the rest. Addy was a rugged girl who needed something more than a flyweight boy. It did not matter that she was in her last year of high school and Luke was some years older. He had meat on his bones and was in her image of what a man should appear to be.

Addy was from Darien, Connecticut, which Luke understood to be one of the wealthiest communities in the country. She was the real goods, a top-shelf square-faced girl with a straight A average, and not some waif on the street. When Luther was introduced to her, he bounced right off. He found no way he could draw near. It was his lightweight status that kept him at a distance from her, he sensed. The judgment was felt acutely. But he had an observation of his own. If he had too little flesh on his bones to constitute a real man, maybe she had too much flesh on her own to be a real woman. All he really knew was that he felt meager in her presence.

Addy had a girlfriend, Dahlia, who had accompanied Addy to the Cheetah. Luke had some idea that Dahlia might be right for Luther. “She may have a screw loose, but she is pretty,” Luke warned.

“A screw loose?” Luther asked, knowing his brother’s tendency to believe he had special insight into people.

“You’ll find out,” Luke said.

Luther didn’t try to dissolve the mystery with close questioning. He saw the smile that came to his brother’s face, a sign that some complicated judgment was being made and one it was not in Luther’s interest to subject himself to anymore than he already had. The smile was also a reminder that mischief was not foreign to Luke’s nature.

But if Luke had assured Luther that Dahlia had homicidal tendencies, such an assertion would not have been enough to keep Luther from her once he stood in her presence. Dahlia dazzled with her blond hair and perfect white teeth and big green eyes, and possessed an elegant thinness that put him at ease in a way that he couldn’t be with heavier Addy. A girl like that.

Luke had no time for “Hot Town, Summer in the City.” It was the wrong season for the Lovin’ Spoonful. But he did play Bob Dylan, whom Luther had heard before and suspected might be right for any season with his words and images and a sound that did painful things to his mind, somehow diminishing him and at the same time creating wild longing. Music that roiled his still waters and left him dancing in his chair with the bobbing movement of his head.

When an hour and then another passed, it became clear that Addy was not going home. And if she wasn't bound for Darien, then neither was Dahlia. It did seem to Luther a miracle beyond description that a girl with Dahlia's looks and worth should be sitting next to him, and even if they could not really talk because of the loud sound of the stereo, he sensed a strong connection was developing from the smiles she offered and the way she casually brushed against him as they drank their scotch. And when he took her by the hand and led her to his little room, he had even more reason to believe he was not hallucinating but that Dahlia was really there with him.

He reached for her in the dark and she did not pull away. And when she removed her yellow top and bellbottom jeans, she seemed to be saying that there were things she wanted in the night, or if not, that she would give him those things that he himself wanted. But when he tried to enter her, she began to whimper and push against his chest with her hands. Whether he was hurting her physically she would not say. Instead she just pressed herself against him, as if all she was seeking in the world was to be held. Several times the same impasse was achieved, and he grew tender and protective of her in his thoughts. He understood to let the matter stand as a mystery that did not require explanation.

In the morning he awoke and found that overnight Jane Thayer had gone somewhere into the past. There was only the bright light of Dahlia burning in his consciousness now.

He made plans to meet her the next weekend at the information booth at Grand Central Station. He didn't want to go back to the penthouse. The thought of Luke's presence bothered him, like some unwanted shadow. Luke was leaning too much into his life, more than a brother should.

"Didn't I tell you you two would hit it off?"

"You did," Luther said.

"So how was she?"

"How was she?"

"Was she good?"

"It was nice being with her," Luther said.

"Is she OK?"

"Sure she is."

"Is she really OK?"

"She is," Luther said, not wanting to voice any doubt that would open the door for more of Luke's knowingness.

There was a hotel verging on seedy on lower Broadway, just north of Houston Street. Idle-looking men hung about in the lobby, next to the vending machines, eyeing Dahlia as Luther registered at the front desk. A rats in the walls sort of place with mildewed carpets where life of a lower kind got lived. Luther left Dahlia in their room with the bottle of gin and Seven-Up he had purchased and ran to the bar below for a bag of ice, not without fear that she might be attacked in his absence.

He poured the crude but potent concoctions into waxed cups. If Dahlia noticed the poverty of imagination and the seediness, she didn't say. Together they drank and drank, as if it was the pathway to change and adventure that would allow them to truly be together. And yet, though the location was different, the same impasse of the weekend before was reached. Again she pressed with her fists against his chest and gave little cries in the night. How different her demeanor in the dark than the serene, smiling manner she showed with the lights on. Though he did not understand, he knew not to push, her little cries conveying that she might not understand either.

The morning light brought separation and self-conscious unease, dispelling the closeness he had felt in the dark. It was a time for dwelling on differences—her fully tanned and perfect body next to his too white flesh and the burden of having learned she was a straight A student and thus her mind was a notch or two above his own. Feeling ill from the drinking, he could not defend against the abysmally low SAT score and the image of a thin mind housed in a square head atop a meager body.

They headed uptown for Grand Central Station, where he held a hot dog he had ordered at a concession stand. "Eat. You're a growing boy," Dahlia said, with her mysterious smile, minutes before bolting through the gate for her train. She herself was not much for food, nor was he on that morning, and so he tossed his purchase in the garbage.

"Now it's your turn to come to me," Dahlia said, when next they spoke. As a strategy he had waited until Wednesday to call her, fearing severe punishment if he appeared too eager. He fretted that the alternative she proposed to the city venues they had been was a way of registering her disapproval. Still, he would get a chance to ride on the railroad, even if it was just the New Haven Line, with its engines of many colors. He had only been to Connecticut once before, a brief visit to Trinity College, in Hartford, Connecticut. The college had not wanted him. He lacked the academic stature for enrollment, the admissions officer had firmly told him. But now he would be journeying to see Dahlia, not a steely-eyed admissions officer delivering the quick brush-off.

As the overheated coach car pulled into the Stamford station, he stared through the window dulled by dirt and saw below Dahlia, her face upturned to the falling wet flakes, which settled softly on her golden hair and the brilliant red scarf wound around her neck and her blue parka.

“You have a car?” he asked, as she led him to the parking lot.

“Of course I have a car. Did you think we get around by subway up here?”

“Well, no, of course. But how can you have a car and still be in high school?”

“Everyone drives at age sixteen up here. You don’t have a license?”

“My brother has a license.” Mentioning his brother in what she would see as a better light than his own made him suddenly anxious.

As Dahlia pulled out of the parking lot, the car went into a skid. She gave a scream like he had never heard before, her hands flying from her face.

“It’s OK. It’s OK. Just a bit of black ice under the snow,” Luther said, he himself recovering from her blast of sound. He rested his hand on her shoulder, the shuddering of her body like that of some cars that stall out before coming to rest.

“It’s not all right. It’s not. These things are not supposed to happen,” Dahlia said, enunciating every syllable.

“They happen all the time. That’s the reason for cars to exist, so people will get hurt.” It was an angry and extreme thing to say, though he tried to make his assertion in a calm, matter-of-fact manner devoid of extremism. It was a way of establishing his power, his authority.

“That is the stupidest thing I have ever heard,” Dahlia said, and began to laugh, uncontrollably.

It was OK if she laughed. It was better than hearing her scream. And it was OK if she chose to be dismissive of his idea about the malevolence of vehicles. True was true, regardless.

He got out and walked around the car. “Your tires all bald. All four of them,” he said.

“I know that,” she said, her tone resentful.

“But should you be driving on tires without treads?”

“I’m saving just for new ones,” she said.

“Saving how?”

“I have a part-time job as a secretary.”

“Can’t you ask your father for the money?”

“I don’t ask my father for anything. Anything,” Dahlia said.

A real passion statement is what Luther heard. He could feel the heat in her words.

“Killing yourself is a pretty extreme way to achieve independence,” Luther said.

“Did I say I was going to kill myself, mister? Did I?”

“No.”

“Stay out of what you don’t understand.”

They drove to a Wetson’s, a hamburger joint ablaze with white fluorescent lighting in nearby Norwalk and a Saturday night mecca, judging from the kids packed into it. It looked like a place for pain and reckless Saturday night violence. It was a kind of life Luther didn’t know, driving in your car to get some food.

“You wait here,” Dahlia said.

“I shouldn’t come in?”

“Just stay put and keep Ellie company. She needs a lot of love.”

“Ellie?”

“My car, silly.”

“Could you leave the engine running so the car doesn’t get cold?”

“The heater is not working,” Dahlia said.

“Well, hurry, please. I’m freezing.” He had only a sweater and shirt under the light pea jacket he wore and his breath made small clouds when he exhaled.

“I’ll be back in a jiff,” Dahlia said.

He wondered that she wouldn’t have him accompany her. Were her friends among those inside? Was she ashamed to be seen with him, as Jane Thayer had been when he came calling in Mexico City? He got out of the car and walked around it, rubbing his arms to try to generate some warmth. She was a while before returning with a big white bag. Minutes later they had left behind the commercial strips for a community of private houses with snow-covered lawns.

“Is someone home?”

Dahlia had pulled into a driveway and Luther stared at the lighted upstairs room of an otherwise darkened house.

“Of course someone is home,” Dahlia said.

“Who?” Luther asked.

“My father.”

“Just your father?”

“Isn’t that enough?”

“Where is your mother?”

“My mother? My mother is away.”

“Away where?”

“Just away.”

Such a presentable house it was. The clean, comfortable kind Luther would see on TV or in magazines. As he ate the burgers and drank the thick vanilla shake, he kept thinking of her father upstairs alone. It was more like he felt her father as an oppressive weight coming from above.

“It was so nice of you to come,” Dahlia said, as Luther finished with the burgers and the French fries. Dahlia herself had only sipped at her Coke.

“Really?”

“Yes. It was delightful to have you here.”

So nice. Delightful. Her words didn't sound right. They sounded formal and distancing, like words offered to a stranger.

She drove him back to the station but didn't wait with him for the train. She had things to do back at the house, she said. He watched the taillights of her car as she drove off, waiting until she was out of sight around a bend before going inside the station, where he stared at the posters for Broadway shows. Out-of-towners getting the best of New York and then leaving. Not seeing that Times Square was like raw sewage. Come on. We'll take in a show. Is that what they said?

Something had been done to him but he didn't know what. It was like when he and Dahlia were in bed and she let him in but didn't let him in. Only this was worse, much worse. She had let him in but not let him in to her life. Oh, it was all too much to contemplate and he mustn't go toward darkness in his mind. He mustn't.

Twenty minutes passed. More than enough time for her to arrive home. He would call her from the pay phone. Things would be different when he did. He experienced a surge of love to melt all the coldness he had experienced as he dialed and there she was on the line.

"Oh, I miss you, too. I'm in bed shivering under the covers. I wish you were here to warm me. I wish it so much."

"Me, too. But we'll see each other again soon," Luther said.

"Everything will be all right. Everything will be fine," Dahlia said.

Oh, how different he felt as the New Haven Line train arrived. He could even feel a measure of compassion for the foppery of the behemoth of an engine and its overhead pantographs. Surely it was doing its best, decked out in those silly and jarring black and white and orange colors, even if they did lack the brilliance and subtlety of turning leaves for which the region was famous. Still, it was in the best interest of a train to know where it was if it wanted to be received well, and that went for him as well.

Once again, when it came to the phone, Luther was aware that a strategy was needed. While it was true that love depended on making himself scarce for a brief while so he did not doom his bond with Dahlia with a premature call, to delay too long could mean disaster as well, as then she might make other plans for the weekend. And then what would he do, when time went by so slowly as it was without her for a few days? Like an alcoholic trying to postpone the first drink till 5 pm, he struggled to hold off reaching for the phone until Wednesday.

Around the corner from the building was a luncheonette, and it was there Luther went to call Dahlia, as all throughout high school he had used that bank of phone booths to ensure that his family would not overhear when he spoke with Jane Thayer.. Enclosed in the booth, he spun the rotary dial, fearful that his voice would reveal anxious concern. His brief euphoria in the Stamford train station had passed. Once again he was interpreting his aborted time with Dahlia as evidence that she was moving away and that he was suddenly reaching out across a greater and greater divide. But she wouldn't even have to hear his voice to discern his fear. Vibrations in the air would have told her as much already.

“Are we meeting at Grand Central Saturday night?” he asked.

“Oh, Luther, I can't,” Dahlia said.

“Why is that?”

“There’s a party I’ve been invited to that I don’t want to miss.”

He had no reserves of strength on which to draw. The rejecting breeze was enough to defeat him. And yet, though crushed, he opened the door for more pain, ignoring the warning voice that told him to hang up. “What about the weekend after next?”

“I’m afraid I have plans for that weekend, too.”

“Oh,” he said.

“I’ve got to r.un. Someone is waiting for me,” she said.

“Sure. Run. Go ahead,” Luther said.

Skinny was sitting at the counter, as if waiting for him. That reedy neck. That pale, shiny face. Even his hair was skinny, skinny and greasy.

“I’m getting me some London broil to fill me up and make me strong again. Everything all right with you?”

“Sure it is, Skinny,” Luther said.

“Your roof’s OK? It ain’t sprung a leak?”

“My roof’s OK, Skinny.”

“You know my real name ain’t Skinny, don’t you?”

“Right,” Luther said.

“But if people want to call me that, I don’t mind.”

“You should be called whatever you want to be called.”

“Skinny people like us have to keep up our strength. You want to have some London broil with me?”

“I don’t think so, Skinny. I think I need to be going.”

“What’s the matter? You don’t want to be seen with me?”

“That’s not it at all,” Luther said.

“Just remember you’re skinny, just like me. You should be called Skinny, too. You mind if I call you Skinny?”

“Call me what you need to call me,” Luther said.

Though the luncheonette was patronized by Columbias and by locals, Luther was squeamish about the fare and so never ordered anything more than a Coke while sitting at the counter. A narrow metal cabinet with sliding drawers held the hot food. It wasn’t anything to tell Skinny, but Luther imagined rats and other vermin having first dibs on the London broil or that the meat had gone bad or was of poor quality to begin with.

Lev, the owner, intercepted Luther at the door.

“So, Luther, you don’t talk? You don’t say hello?”

And so Luther paused and turned to Lev, a balding Jew with a robust physique and numbers tattooed on his right wrist, an indelible reminder of the horror of Auschwitz. His full lips, his giant nose, the slope of his face—a face the Nazis might have used in an anti-Semitic propaganda posters. A face so ugly and yet so alive that it almost became beautiful in the power it conveyed.

“My boy, he is at Cornell University. Is a good school, yes? One of best in the country?”

“Yes. An Ivy league school. Very good,” Luther said, desperate to be gone.

“He is studying to become a doctor,” Lev said.

“Yes. He must be very smart.”

“Full scholarship he won to the school.”

“That’s great,” Luther said.

“What you do now?”

“I am a student at City College.”

“What you study at this college?”

“English.”

“What is that, English? Why you need to study something you already know?”

Luther had no answer for muscular Lev, whose progeny would wrest from life all that was good through intelligence and force of will. Once again did Luther feel a need to be alone, to just close the door on the world. He had run enough of a gauntlet with Dahlia and Skinny and now Lev.

But there was one more before he could be safe for the night. “A few good men, boys. A few good men,” Mr. Fitzpatrick called out, interrupting his prayer vigil in the lobby so Luther could be reminded of what his mother lacked.

For his father he did not cry. To his father he did not say, “I love you.” His father was only decay and death at this juncture of his life, with his walker and his prosthesis and his daily insulin injections. It would be years and years and then more years before he could say that he knew what he had missed by not having his father in his life in the way that a son could have a father in his life—someone who could coach him into his world in a way that would not leave him fated to exist solely in the power of women.

Because he had no words to convey the evisceration that Dahlia had performed and no one to say them to, he bought a fifth of gin and a bottle of Seven-Up that Saturday and sat alone in his room. He had no bag of ice but he did have a glass and so he broke the seal on the gin and began drinking. He did not find Dahlia, but he did find his anger. The girl had hurt him, she had really, really hurt him, and she had done so with a smile. And now he could do some hurting. He threw the bottle and the glass through the window, then punched the remnant of the broken pane with his fist and emerged onto the landing with his bloody hand and shouted at Luke's door, "I will kill you. I will kill everyone. Every last one of you."

He remembered his brother opening the door and a couple of tenants coming from the floor below. And he remembered the bright lights of the emergency room and continuing to carry on and the nurse, as she applied stitches to his hand, saying, ""You don't shut up I'm going to have you sent to Bellevue. You want that?"

The nurse, stocky and thin-lipped and red-haired, saw through him, saw that he was in performance, saw that in the moment before he threw the gin bottle through the window that he didn't truly have to do that, just as she saw that he didn't have to go all histrionic and shout that stuff about killing his brother and everybody else. Saw that the only genuineness in him was sadness and depression and saw further that even that was suspect. Saw and saw and saw and, in seeing, shamed him back into his small, withdrawn space.

It was some days later, the bandage still on Luther's left hand, that Sean came calling, just stood there outside Luther's door after knocking, his face blasted by the cold winter wind. Gone were the silk shirts and dress slacks and other expensive duds; he had squeezed himself into pale blue corduroys, a tight blue windbreaker and red high-top Converse sneakers. The ill-fitting outfit made his shorn head appear bigger, like a balloon that has been squeezed.

"I'm on the lam, man. AWOL. The military police are after my ass," Sean said, too engrossed with his own drama to see the utter dismay with which Luther had greeted his arrival.

The story was a long one, and Sean was eager to tell it.

After leaving Luther in Mexico City, Sean returned to New York City only to find that the MPs had shown up at his parents' apartment. And there were letters waiting for him from the military citing the penalties for refusal to ignore his draft status. His father, especially, put pressure on him to surrender. America had been good to them and Sean needed to fulfill his obligation, his father said. Sean had himself been feeling something similar. How many different cities could he run to? How many lonely hotel rooms could he stand? And so he turned himself into the draft board and began basic training at Fort Bragg, in North Carolina, and was doing well. He would, like the rest of his army buddies, get shipped overseas and shoot him some guerrillas, as he put it. But the daily regimen and the barking drill sergeants and the close quarters of barracks life began to wear on him. He remembered the freedom, not the pain, of his civilian existence, and began to miss his lover, classless Johnny. And so, after several months of army regimen, he took off from Fort Bragg, and had been running ever since. His funds were pretty much gone and his father wouldn't let him back in the apartment.

All along Luther had sensed, with dread, where Sean was going with his tale, and so it came as no surprise. "How about it, Luther? Can you put me up for a few days?"

Even in his diminished state, Sean had great power and Luther felt his weight now pushing against him. How much he wanted to rid himself of this incongruity, this dangerous and depraved appendage, to his life. Was he really supposed to let this marauding man-child into his humble sanctuary and forfeit any comfort or peace of mind for the length of his indefinite stay? But it was not only cowardice, the fear of Sean's wrath, that led him to say yes when he wanted to say no. There was also the moral question. Sean had done things for him, like the trip to Mexico City and all the box seats at Mets games and theater tickets and dinners he had paid for. Didn't these constitute a debt of sorts?

"Sure. You can stay," Luther said.

"You know, I can see you taking a rifle and shooting people," Sean said that night, in the room they now shared. With the help of Luke Luther had found an extra mattress to serve as Sean's bed.

"Why would I shoot anyone?" Sean had asked him how he got the cut on his hand, and so Luther had told him.

"You're like that Charles Whitman guy picking people off from that tower in Texas."

“I don’t think so. I don’t do that sort of thing.” Sean was making him uneasy with all his talk of violence.

“All I know is that I wouldn’t like to be around you if you had a gun in your hand,” Sean said.

Sean left him with that thought and went to sleep.

“That man must go away,” Luther’s mother said, having seen Sean with him as they passed through the lobby the next day.

“He won’t be here long,” Luther said.

“He is not normal and you have become less than normal with that hair of yours and the height you have risen to without any flesh on your bones. You are a hanging string, my son. Why is it that you do not come to the dinner table and eat my normal food? Why do you go on this way so that soon you will disintegrate from the earth?”

“I am doing fine,” Luther said, though his mother’s words hurt.

“I have no one to help me. No one. Do you know this, my son? Do you know anything of the last days that are coming for all of us?”

They were in the lobby, within earshot of Mr. Fitzpatrick, who had his prayer session going before a framed verse of scripture hanging on the wall:

For the wages of sin is death
But the gift of God is eternal life
Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Romans 6:23

“I have been working with these boys of yours. I just want you to know.”

“What is that you say?” Luther’s mother had crossness in her voice.

“Working with them night and day. They are in my prayers,” Mr. Fitzpatrick said.

“I see,” she said, as she took in Mr. Fitzpatrick, with his fallen face and humped back and mangled arm. A Catholic man tied to the apparatus of an oppressive church. For the Virgin Mary and the saints and the liturgy she had no use, and the Pope, with his cardinal cohort, had the markings of the antichrist. Coldness, the coldness of stone, she saw in the ravaged visage of Mr. Fitzpatrick and perhaps all Catholics.

If Columbia was a supreme institution in all their minds, the sign on the side of the building sought to address it with Gospel words about God and his only begotten son and eternal love. The sign sought to stand up to the perceived haughtiness of the Ivy league and direct it away from the vanity of great intelligence to the world of spirit, where all were one and distinctions that divided and separated could not be made. But such perspective was not available to Luther or many others in the neighborhood who struggled, with varying degrees of success, to accept that they lived outside the realm of excellence.

“Such fine minds those young Columbia students have,” even Mrs. Garatdjian was heard to say.

Word was out that a Columbia couple were throwing a New Year’s Eve party, and even though it was not Luther’s way to be around the Columbias if he could not be one of them, his loneliness led him, in the company of Luke and Sean to a building on the next block. When he heard the Beatles singing “In My Time” and saw, through the open apartment door, the crowd already gathered, he had no power to resist.

The couple were well matched, the woman voluptuous in a short skirt that showed off her long, thin legs, while the young man commanded your attention with his dissipated handsomeness. His shirt hung from his gaunt frame and his Jesus-length hair needed a comb or a brush.

It was said that the two were heroin users, but while nodding addicts with corkscrewed bodies were a common sight on Upper West Side streets, Luther thought use of the drug was pretty much restricted to the poor and uneducated, like the scrawny junkie desperate for a fix who tried to make off with an upholstered armchair from the lobby balanced on his head. Luther didn't associate heroin use with a Columbia University graduate school math whiz, and the thought that the young man was in its progressive grip and slowly diminishing his own excellence saddened him.

It was an easy party to crash, and for all he knew, the couple had thrown open the door to the neighborhood. In fact, across the room stood Skinny. Somehow, in such a crowded space, he had managed, through force of negative energy, to create an unfilled zone around him. Seeking to ease his discomfort, Luther headed for the bar and poured himself a large glass of Scotch, to which he added a splash of soda, fearful that there might not be enough whiskey left when it came time for a refill. The warm glow of the whiskey spread quickly.

A short, thick-necked man arrived with a woman and powered his way through the room, a motorcycle helmet under his arm. Drawing on his newfound confidence, Luther smiled at the woman and she smiled back. But the man was less than friendly.

“Buzz off, Scarecrow,” he said, prompting Luther to punch him in the face with his left hand, the other having received the stitches. The man tried to bull his way forward, his face reddened with rage, but several men held him back, while the handsome host clamped his arms around Luther’s chest from behind and moved him out of the apartment.

A woman emerged and led him by the hand up the stairs to the next floor, where he lay with his head on her lap on the landing. Her enormous and frizzy hair made her face appear tiny, like that of a monkey. “You’re not violent. You’re not violent. You’re just a child of fear.” She whispered those words over and over while stroking his brow, as if they were words he needed to hear.

Down below could be heard a commotion as the man emerged from the party. Suppose the man sensed where Luther was? Suppose he climbed those stairs and beat him senseless, as he surely could? But slowly the racket faded, like that of a plane moving into the distance. “He may be waiting outside. He is very angry. Stay with me for a while. Stay here where it is safe.”

The woman came from a world that was not his that she could talk this way and be this way with him. As the minutes passed his discomfort grew at this intimacy with a stranger. Beyond simple gratitude, other feelings began to emerge. He sensed in her an intelligence he couldn’t match. The only thing that had attracted her to him was the thing she was asking him to disown. Why else would she treat him like an unruly and misguided child in need of attention.

“You were very, very lucky,” Luke said the next morning. “That guy came back with even scarier-looking friends. He was meaning to hurt you real bad.”

And Sean had something to say, too. “You sick fuck.”

That fall he had been required to take a medical exam, along with others new to the college. Stations had been set up on the basketball court in Wingate Hall, on the north campus. Lab-coated physicians inspected him, applying a stethoscope to his chest, tapping his knees with rubber hammers, applying a tight wrap to his bicep to check his blood pressure, recording his height and weight, using a tongue depressor to check his mouth and teeth. Stripped down to his Jockey shorts, his emaciated frame exposed to one and all, he felt humiliated and tried to avoid the looks of disgust on the faces of the other students by keeping his eyes from theirs.

“You are badly underweight and in need of immediate dental care. You have significant tooth decay and your gums bleed easily,” the final doctor said, surveying his chart. He showed Luther a clinical gaze and clearly was one of those for whom warmth was not a necessary attribute in life.

“I see,” Luther said, borrowing his mother’s expression and clearly deflated by the empirical evidence, which only corroborated his worst feelings about himself.

In this corner of the ring, standing six feet four inches tall and weighing 133 pounds, with holes in his teeth and bleeding gums, we have....

“I’m not feeling too good. I’m feeling like a bum. You know what a bum is, Luther? You’re looking at him. I’m a bum. That’s all I am. That fucking roof of yours. I’m afraid to go out on it. I’m afraid I’ll jump off the fucking thing. I feel like a ghost in my own fucking life. I feel like I’m in a fucking desert or something with nothing around me and I don’t know where everything went. I feel so fucking lonely I don’t know what to do. Look at me in these ugly clothes and with this big fucking head. I look like a fucking ape, a white fucking ape. An Irish fucking ape. That’s me. I’m almost as fucking ugly as you, and that’s saying a lot.”

“That is saying a lot,” Luther agreed.

“I don’t mean to insult you.”

“No, of course.”

“But you are an ugly motherfucker. You know what I mean?”

“I really do,” Luther said.

“I just feel so fucking lost.”

“Yes,” Luther said.

“You’re lost too, you know. You ain’t going anywhere either. Pretending to be a student when you’re just as big a dope as me.”

“It’s true,” Luther said.

“Look, I know I sound mean, but I love you. I mean it. I don’t know why. You’re ugly and you’re dumb just like me, but you’re OK.”

“Right. I’m OK. And you’re OK, too.”

“I’ve got to go back. I’ve got to turn myself in. I can’t do this anymore.”

“Right. You can’t do this anymore.”

They sat in the bar where Luther had first seen Imelda. A new disco damsel was doing her thing. It seemed they changed every week. But none of them were Imelda. Luther and Sean finished their drinks. They left nothing in the glass. Then Sean went his way and Luther went his in the night.

Luther liked the burgundy turtleneck sweater he had worn the night of the party, but because of the incident, the sweater remained in his dresser, lest it identify him more easily to his victim and bring on retribution. To further obscure his identity, he removed his glasses when out in public. The street lights were a blur, as were faces, but it seemed a prudent measure to take. Day after day his fear grew, rather than lessened, of a savage beating. Some days he curled up in a fetal position and comforted himself with soft moans. If he was a coward, so be it.

But who was that other person at the party, the smiling, serenely confident mongoose flirting with another man’s girlfriend before socking her mate? And what about that drunken threat against Luke the night he cut his hand? The woman on the landing had gotten it right. He wasn’t violent. The threat against Luke and the punch he threw were little more than histrionics, instances of playacting and nothing more. He wouldn’t do serious harm to anyone. Not to sound like Norman Bates, but he wouldn’t hurt a fly.

“She was sick,” Luke said, speaking of Dahlia.

“You keep saying that, but you never say why.”

“Didn’t you notice? She never flushed.”

“What?”

“When she went potty, she left it there for everybody to see.”

“No way.”

“I’m telling you she left her mess floating in the bowl. I mean, come on, you must have noticed.”

“What? I’m a toilet inspector?”

“I’m just trying to help you, man.”

“Well, thank you, I’m sure.”

“You’re welcome,” Luke said.

That grin Luke displayed, suggesting some special knowledge about Dahlia, as if trying to goad Luther to inquire further. But that was a road Luther didn’t have to go down.

Addy had gone out of Luke’s life, as Dahlia had gone out of Luther’s, but without the pain and the tumult Luther had experienced. Luke just resumed his late night cruises on his motorcycle of the Greenwich Village area and found other women to share his bed with. That was before he met Maureen.

She was a local girl, brown-haired and pretty and Irish, from One Hundred Ninth Street. Her mother had died of ovarian cancer, leaving Maureen, who was seven at the time, and her two younger sisters, in the care of their father, a man who spent good parts of the day in Mulligan’s on the corner of Broadway having his beer and shots.

Maureen loved her father with an unyielding love; his excesses did not matter. She refused to have her life set in sorrow but lived instead in the high spirits she was born with. And when she saw Luke on the street one day, she took a shine to him and let him know, and that was that.

At the time she was a senior at Julia Richman, a public high school over on the East Side, where she had a standing near the top of her class in a commercial course. Like Addy before her, she had a partiality to virile men in the mold of Luke, and looked askance at those like Luther who lacked meat on their bones. From the start of her visits to the penthouse, it was Luther's sense that Maureen didn't care for him. He heard it in her tone of voice and saw it in her eyes and her dismissive smile.

Two months into his relationship with Maureen, Luke came to Luther, and told him she was pregnant.

"How old is she?" Luther asked, fearing that his brother could be liable for statutory rape.

Luke showed no similar concern, if the big smile on his face meant anything. "Nah. Forget that. She just turned eighteen. But isn't that something? I mean, I got a girl pregnant. Wow," he said, exulting over his potency.

"But what are you going to do? I mean, what is she going to do?"

"She wants me to marry her."

"Marry you? Marry you how? You have no money. Where would you live?"

"We'd live here."

"Luke, don't do it. Just don't it, unless you want a disaster."

“What disaster? You worry too much.”

“This is true. I do worry.”

“You see, I have a big dick, but you don’t. And when you have a big dick, you have to use it. I have power you don’t have.”

“The way you talk,” Luther said, his brother landing on him that way.

“There will never be a right time for you to have a kid, while for me, anytime is the right time. That’s because I can tear things apart and live with the chaos. You, you’re still back there arranging your baseball cards in alphabetical order. You think that’s life, but it’s really death. Fucking is life.”

“Or maybe this penthouse is death.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing.”

“No, tell me. What?”

“I didn’t mean anything,” Luther said.

“You did. You meant something. You think there’s something wrong with this penthouse?”

“There’s nothing wrong with anything,” Luther said. His brother a big stupid with that big dick of his, saying anything that came into his head, while Luther said one thing and his brother went and fell apart.

He went to his room and lay face down on his pillow. Abortion was dangerous. Quacks, butchers. Luther had heard hideous tales that made him shudder. Procedures performed with coat hangers and knives. Girls dumped in alleyways and left to slowly bleed to death. He didn't want any such thing for Maureen or for any girl or woman, but he also didn't want to see Luke burdened with a wife and child he would inevitably leave. Did the family have to embrace any more irresponsibility than some members, like Hannah and Naomi, with their progeny and abject dependence on their mother, had already shown? Did Luke, who had already shown signs he could not negotiate his way in the world, have to tie himself to the building even more?

Luke was right. He didn't want to break the mold. Not if it meant ending up with the life Luther saw all around him.

Someday he would enroll in law school. The idea had come to him as a child when in the grip of anxiety about the oppressiveness his mother endured in her daily life at the hands of the building owner, Simon Weill. Luther remembered his terror that she would perish before she could witness him rushing to her aid with a law degree and all the powers an attorney could bring to bear in a court of law so that justice was served and ancient and ongoing wrongs were righted. But now, somewhat older, there were other reasons to pursue a career in law. It provided a path open to someone with his small abilities.

Lawyers did rely on words, did they not, and didn't, at a minimum, everyone except mutes have the ability to speak? Lawyers could be perceived as manly while avoiding the manly pursuits, like spending their time in science labs or tackling insoluble math problems. The law was meaningfully applicable in the world, unlike the substance-less world of ideas a PhD would gain him access to; what, after all, was that to lead a class of students in a discussion about some work of literature or another, to just gasbag it within the walls of academe? To his mind, teaching did not equate with doing.

And what better preparation for the law than political science as a course of undergraduate study. Fear gave him a modicum of interest in politics and even bound him to it, and the word science in the name did not have to scare him, because he suspected no science was to be found among all the words he read in the books he would be assigned.

From the back of the room Sandra Leventhal, the instructor, appeared young and pretty, but she aged significantly the closer Luther drew to her that first day. There was wrinkling around her eyes, the luster was gone from her strawberry blond hair, her bosom sagged, and her teeth were stained yellow by cigarette smoke. She was a woman living in the ruins of the beauty she had once possessed.

But her green eyes had not lost their fire. Or maybe the fire had come into them with age and hurt and pain. He would never know. But he did hear and feel, when she spoke, laceration and vileness of a taunting kind, though he had no words for what was happening at first.

She had spent time in Cuba helping, with her thin arms, to harvest the sugar cane crops and support the revolution; she let you know she was on a first name basis with Fidel and Raul and Che. Had any of the students in her class done such service? Had any of the middle class white boys in the room set foot in Mississippi or Alabama or elsewhere in the Deep South and sought to advance the cause of civil rights? Were they going to remain collaborators with the white power structure or were they going to help to tear it down? In this way did she throw down the gauntlet.

Luther wondered about this woman with the flame of self-righteous anger burning so bright and threatening to consume her. Might she not be considered a poor messenger for her social causes with her tone of mockery and castigation? Was such jeering truly an effective way to engage them with the sugarcane fields of Cuba? And was Cuba really such a good cause in the first place, with its oppressive leader little more than a demented and verbose tyrant tormenting his captive household?

Across from him in the class sat an equally enervated black student. A giant cushion of hair had sprung from Willie Sumner's scalp, and a fragile pair of wire-rimmed glasses gave his narrow face a bookish look. Luther tried to close the divide he perceived between them by suggesting that the black struggle for racial and economic equality meant more to him than it did and suppressing the fact that he was conditioned to come from a place of fear of blacks, stemming from childhood experiences on the streets of Manhattan. But Willie Sumner, from Brownsville, Brooklyn, heard the falseness of Luther's social concern and soon moved away.

A letter came, addressed to "Lucer Garrajun."

I need yore help. I am in the rong place. I dont want to shoot no gorilas. I dont want to shoot no one. Come down and get me out of here.

Sean

And so Luther did go to the South, not the Deep South that Sandra Leventhal had ordered him to but to North Carolina, and stared in disbelief at the street scene outside the bus depot in Fayetteville, one bar after another with swinging doors like a stage set for a western. But drunken soldier boys in drab olive garb, not cowboys, were flying in and out, brawling in a mud-slop alleyway even as helmeted MPs wearing armbands rushed to separate them and save them for the larger war.

He had seen the softness of America on TV and in the movies and heard the nobility of America in the speeches of the American presidents, but now he was witnessing the heartlessness of America, the great roundup of the young and the regimentation of them into a precise military machine poised for carnage. He feared for the soldiers and for himself as well, a longhair among the buzz cuts in this bustling army town.

Ten minutes later he was in the barracks on the enormous base among freshly showered soldiers, those who were dressed snapping towels at the bare butts of their buddies. And there among the young lions was an apologetic Sean, sitting on his bottom bunk and saying right off, "I got you down here for nothing."

"How is that?" Luther asked.

In a whispered voice, Sean said, "My parents and my brother were down to visit. They left only an hour ago. No way I can take off now. No way. You understand what I'm saying?" He wore a fresh white T-shirt with his fatigues that showed him slimmed down, honed, but it was still that buzz-cut, enormous head where his power seemed to reside, as if it were a weapon itself, a many megaton bomb.

Luther had met Sean's parents in the long ago. His father was a small, gruff man, his catlike face fixed in a permanent scowl. He had been a maintenance worker in the subway yard up in Inwood, at the northern tip of Manhattan. When Luther thought of Sean's mother, he pictured the antimacassar over the sofa and the upholstered chair in the living room of the small, tidy apartment that looked out on the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. "The Swedes. They are good people," she had said to him, after inquiring about his last name. He had explained to her that he was Armenian on his father's side and that his mother was from Sweden. Clearly, she had been baffled by his mention of his father's ancestry. The invisible Armenians. The unheard of Armenians. The Armenians who gave people pause when they were mentioned.

"I do," Luther said, feeling, even as he spoke, that he was surrendering Sean to his fate, allowing him to be funneled into some bone-crushing madness.

"Y'all down here to join our little party?" A soldier in a top bunk was smiling down at him.

"Just here visiting," Luther said. Something about that smile, like the soldier was toying with him.

"We got an extra bed for you. Course we got barbers down here. Might have to see one of them first. You a college boy?"

"Yes, I'm in college," Luther said.

"What you studying in college?"

"Not a lot," Luther said. It wasn't the answer to give but it felt like an honest one.

“You know how to take a rifle apart and clean it? You know how to kill a man quick with a knife or with your bare hands? You know any of these things?”

“No, I don’t.”

“Then maybe you’re in the wrong college.”

Luther’s fear grew with each exchange, fed by the soldier’s insinuating tone and the undercurrent of menace. He was grateful when Sean said, “Let’s take a walk.”

In the nearby canteen, Sean said, “You need to get out of here. Once these guys start ragging on you, it can lead to trouble. That kid’s a hillbilly. Comes from someplace in Arkansas where they’re lucky to have running water. You got all kinds of shit here, but it’s all right.”

“I did bring the bus fare for you, just so you know.”

“I knew you would, but my mother said it would put her in her grave if I ran away again and my father talking about how the army would make a man of me. It was just too much.”

“It’s your life, not theirs,” Luther heard himself say.

“It’s lonely out there. This is home to me now,” Sean said.

It was a conversation they had had before.

The strip was ablaze with light when he arrived back in downtown Fayetteville and even thicker with soldiers. From a rack inside the depot he took a paperback with a beige and maroon cover. In Cold Blood, the title said. He recognized the name of the author, Truman Capote. He had written a novella called Breakfast at Tiffany’s. Luther hadn’t read it, but the movie had grabbed hold of him. It was that song, “Moon River,” the big sound sweeping you up in tide of emotion, and at the end, George Peppard and Audrey Hepburn embracing in the rain. A movie that would make anyone cry as well as laugh, with the way zany and beautiful Holly Go Lightly carried on and that neighbor of hers, Mr. Yunioshi, from Japan played by Mickey Rooney, and Sally Tomato, to whom she delivered the weather reports in prison.

But this was a different sort of book, Luther discovered, turning on the light above his seat. Normally his mind wandered when he read. Whole passages would be lost to consciousness before he became aware of his distraction and he would have to go back. But here the narrative pulled him along. It did not matter that the outcome was known. Imagine that, two drifters murdering a whole family. What could be more awful than to inflict ruin on beauty?

He read and read until he fell asleep, and woke some hours later to daylight and the New York skyline. He turned and across the aisle a curly-haired blond girl was smiling at him, a shy smile but one of genuine interest, as if she had been studying him for a while. And though nothing came of it—some friends were waiting for her at the terminal—that look spread warmth all throughout him. It seemed like a long time since a girl had received him in that way.

As the months passed, Maureen began to show, and when her father saw that his eldest daughter was pregnant, he demanded to know the father. Drunk and belligerent, he confronted Luke, and threatened bodily harm if Luke didn't form a matrimonial bond with Maureen. And so the two were hitched in a City Hall wedding. Maternal and domestic by nature, Maureen began to set up house in what had been Luke's bachelor pad, pushing him to install a washer and drier and space for a crib.

"Don't you suppose it's time you found your own place?" she said to Luther, shortly after moving in. Smiling hatred illuminated her face, but it was hard for him to feel offended by a girl headed down the path of pain and sorrow, with her foolish notion of domesticating Luke or his rooftop lair. Besides, he could now realize his dream of leaving not only the penthouse but the building.

He had passed the post office exam and was now working a four hour shift five evenings a week. Twice a month he received a government-issued check, with instructions not to fold, spindle, or mutilate it. That income, plus the student loan money he had received, allowed him to take a dingy, mildewed room in the Morningside Arms and share the public bathroom, which had ring marks in the bathtub and a toilet that routinely overflowed. Though the room was only half a block from where his family lived, it was a start, was it not, the realization of his dream of leaving the building and tangible proof that his journey outward had truly begun.

"You won't last," Luke said. "You'll see. You'll be back in the building by next week."

"Thanks," Luther said.

"I'm just saying," Luke said.

"I understand what you're saying," Luther replied.

In fact, he had tried some months before. A lovely studio apartment with a wood-burning fireplace on a quiet, tree-lined block of old and pretty walkup buildings just off Riverside Drive, but he was soundly defeated by the ceaseless roar of anxiety.

“Tell us about it, Luther. We will give you the time you need.”

“There was a building of blond brick, new at the time, that Luke and I would pass when we were kids and out walking the dogs at night. It stood on the corner of Riverside Drive some blocks south of where we lived. There Luke hoped to move some day, away from the tormenting squalor and strife of family. In the grip of modernity, we would have a big color TV and an apartment with shiny wood floors. And so the block called me back when I began college, if not to that particular building, to one farther up the side street. But an aloneness feeling sitting in that apartment came over me that I cannot describe and the monthly rent became a weight that threatened to crush me. And so I vacated the premises less than a week after moving in. As I made the retreat to the building I remembered the shame I would feel when taunted for being homesick at the camp for Jesus where I would be sent to spend parts of my childhood summers.

“But how did you expect to pay for the apartment in the first place?”

“There is something I haven't spoken of. For a time in my later years of high school I would enter Auntie Eve's apartment while she was elsewhere, unbeknownst to her or anyone else, with a duplicate key I had made. Ashamed to ask for college tuition from my family, given that it was money my mother did not have, for a time I took modest amounts on a weekly basis from the rent receipts my aunt kept in her apartment as preparation for my future. At some point my conscience would not allow me to continue on this path. In any case, some of the small sum I had accumulated I used to pay the rent and security for this apartment I briefly took.

“Do you have anything you wish to add?”

“Coming clean is an apt saying. When we are honest, we feel cleansed inside.

“Is there anything else?”

“Thank you for allowing me to preserve some sense of order with this addition.”

He was assigned to the General Post Office, on West Thirty-Third Street and Eighth Avenue. The gray mass of the granite, block-length building, the sweeping expanse of stairs, the columned entranceway, and that motto chiseled into the pediment, “Neither rain nor snow nor sleet...” suggested permanence and stability and had meaning for him. The entire stretch between Eighth and Ninth Avenues, beginning with the Horn and Hardart on the corner and the parking lot and the series of vine-covered single-room occupancies had meaning. There had been few Sundays since early childhood when he hadn’t walked along the north side of the street, just across from the post office, to the He Is Risen Tabernacle for Sunday school and then upstairs for the afternoon service, where he and Luke and Vera would be joined by their mother.

“You know we are living in the last days. You know that, do you not?” she would say.

“You have had your life. Please let me have mine. Please.”

His angry, pleading retort would bring a smile to her face and a week later she would say the same thing. It was his mother’s way to speak about Jesus.

“I came to the conviction at age thirty-two that the world had nothing that I wanted. Nothing,” she had told him. Told all of them. But he lacked the intelligence and its hallmark, curiosity, to inquire why this conversion should have happened at age thirty-two. Why not age thirty-one or thirty-three? Her faith was as authentic and her conversion as mysterious as Saul’s on the road to Damascus; she was one with her Jesus and her God and in this world but not really a part of it. As a car needed gasoline, so too her spirit needed replenishment. The Sunday afternoon service was her time to gain strength and hope for the week ahead, and when she was so moved, to speak in the tongues of angels.

But now here he was on the other side of the street, about to enter not the tabernacle but the world of the postal workers. He had puzzled over their harsh and gruesome fate as a child. Would they really be consigned to the eternal flames of hell because they were not part of the congregation just across the street in the old church with the big rosette window listening to the endless sermons delivered in a deep baritone by Pastor Cohn? Someday he would go back to visit and try to better understand those first thirteen years of his life. Why he couldn’t say, but something had happened there sufficient that the sight of the church now filled him with longing, as the whole area did—the long expanse of the arcade he passed through in Penn Station, the Horn and Hardart on the corner. He and Luke in their sailor suits. Vera in her white church dress. His mother in her brown dress with the white polka dots on days she didn’t wear the red one with the white polka dots. There was a story someone should hear and know about. It shouldn’t just be lost. All of it. It was his. Something had happened here. His life had happened here. And no one knew, and would never know, if he didn't tell them. He would simply be consigned to oblivion in this government monstrosity across the street.

He punched a time clock and sat for four hours at a box scheme, sorting envelopes from the bin in front of him into small compartments for each of the fifty states. When one bin was empty, he would then go to a nearby conveyor belt for another and empty that one as well. Initially he had wanted to cry, that his life should be so low and pedestrian as to find him here as a government drudge in a line of mostly older men all sitting on stools performing their little task. But the activity itself dispelled the sense of drudgery; it brought a feeling of urgency. He grew competitive with the man to his left and his right as to who could empty the most bins. Clearly some sort of industrial psychology was in play to spur productivity, and yet this awareness was insufficient to detach him from the race. He swelled with pride that, unlike some others in his family, he could have a place in the world, small though it might be.

As for his fellow workers, he saw men considerably older, some with thinning hair or no hair, men negligent of their appearance with big bellies and bad teeth and faces reddened by alcohol. One hummed "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" as he slouched on his stool and another sported a pirate's patch over his eye and then there was the one who went about on one leg with the aid of crutches, the pants leg for his missing limb pinned so it wouldn't flop. Luther saw them as men of indolence, men of the Automat, men whose lives were the New York Post or Daily News tucked under their arms as they reported each day for their shifts. He had seen them before even if he hadn't. They were the men of the long ago, the Tall Tommys and the Little Tommys and all the other handymen of the single rooms whom his mother and Auntie Eve called upon for manual chores, like replacing blown fuses and painting rooms, that the building required. And while he feared the lassitude that had led them to succumb to life in such a way, he couldn't say that he didn't understand.

That evening a Bunyanesque man made his way down the aisle. He wore his long and frizzy brown hair in a ponytail and a beard of biblical proportions hung from his Old Testament prophet's face, on which a smile more a caricature of merriment than the real thing played. As the man's right hand opened, revealing a pink, heart-shaped pill in his palm, the smile seemed to intensify into a beam and he nodded his head several times, the go-ahead for Luther to take his offering.

Luther didn't question the man about the proffered gift. His silence was strange and yet benign, and with no other basis for trust than an impression, Luther took the pill and, a minute later, swallowed it, with the aid of tap water from the bathroom sink.

He soon reached a level of happiness he could not have imagined. He had accessed a source of love that seemed to encompass everyone on the floor and in his little world. Barriers of misunderstanding and hurt were gone and harmony reigned. And now as well there was newfound confidence in the power of his mind to handle the challenge of college, the pill having dispelled that nagging feeling of intellectual deficiency which plagued him daily. He had been made whole.

Energized, he finished his shift and walked northward through the city, staring into the faces of passersby and feeling that he was good enough for any girl in town. No streetlamp could have burned any brighter than the incandescent light in his being. And if that light began to dim as the night progressed, and his hands and feet grew cold and sweaty, and dark thoughts replaced the joy as sleep refused to come before the dawn, it was no matter. Nothing could erase the memory of having found that space of warmth within himself.

Efram Ellsberg was the enigmatic giant's name. He was no post office lifer but, like Luther, a student at the City College of New York. The raiment of his self-worth was not the staple jeans and work shirt he wore, being a champion of denim duds, but the dressing he gave his mind with works of philosophy beyond the reach of Luther. He was a 1500 SAT score man who had had his pick of colleges but chose to stay at home and make the long trip from Midwood, Brooklyn, to the Harlem campus five days a week. A rabbi's son, he was also the youngest of four brothers, the other three either medical doctors or on their way into that field.

“Most of my friends are very bright. That's not why I like you,” Efram said, breaking his silence and establishing the basis of any friendship they were to have. These words he spoke in the PO bathroom, where he opened a window and blew smoke from the lit joint out into the night.

“How do you know I am not bright? Luther asked, when he was able to speak.

“Looking bright and being bright are two different things,” Efram would only say.

Though Efram's words hurt his feelings, Luther found himself over time surrendering to his newfound friend, assigning him the role of a wise older brother on whom he could lean when fear and insecurity overwhelmed him. From Efram emanated a vibe of great peace, even if was often chemically induced, and sadness and kindness as well as the wisdom of the ages could be seen in his big, memorable face.

Efram it was who introduced Luther to his friend Zach Zeckler, the Scale Master, as he came to be known in Luther's mind, for the small scale he carried about to measure out grams of hash and ounces of grass, and later, the harder drugs that were to earn him notoriety in the media if not in Luther's mind. It was Zach who told Luther of Efram's mental prowess while also asserting that Efram was a sleeping giant. The two of them had been friends since childhood and had attended the same high school, Brooklyn Tech. Efram may have been the higher college board score man, but how far behind could Zach be, given that he enrolled in college at age sixteen. He had grown up a motherless child. She had died of cancer when he was only three.

A sleeping giant. That meant Efram was like China. Luther liked thinking of Efram not as Mao but a giant Buddha.

"Are you going to Elliot Zweiger's reading this Friday?" Zach asked Luther.

"Who is Elliot Zweiger and what is he reading?" Luther asked.

"You don't know who Elliot Zweiger is?"

Luther shook his head.

"He's a terrific poet and is teaching a course this semester on contemporary poetry. Do you read poetry?"

"Percy Bysshe Shelley. 'Bird, thou never wert.'"

Zach laughed. Efram laughed. So did Luther, there in Finley Cafeteria, the walls covered with day-glo murals and the smell of grease thick from the kitchen, on the south campus of the City College of New York.

Luther took a dislike to the poet. Even from the farther reaches of the auditorium he saw that beard as pubic hair grown wild and his red red mouth as a vagina. The image was grotesque, but all the venom his jealousy could summon was visited on the poet as he read. The way he waved his arms with a flourish. The adulatory throng three deep against the walls and jamming the aisles, ready to ooh and ah at his every word. The man should be punished. Something should be done about him.

In such a way did Luther respond. Some malign conspiracy had been established by the poet and his audience that caused them to offer up such undeserved reverence, its sole purpose being to make Luther feel bad. The man could have read from a phone book and received the same acclaim.

And yet he stayed. Poetry was the mysterious domain of the chosen few. Poetry was meter. It was rhyme. It was dactyls and anapests and trochees and enjambment and all the rest, words laid out and calibrated with slide rule precision. Certainly it was attention to language that eluded the likes of him. He thought of those bright girls in his English class. In what he saw as skimpy lines of verse they saw universes. And some of those girls were at the reading, sitting cross-legged in the aisle of the overflow auditorium, chins pressed against their clasped hands.

A sad-eyed woman approached him afterward. "We're having a party. I only know you as the landlady's son, but will you come?"

“Landlady’s son?” He could only repeat her words.

“The building with the Bible verse on the side of the wall and the framed verses of scripture in the lobby. I live there.”

“Oh, I’m not there anymore. I now live in the Morningside Arms,” Luther said, recoiling in shame that this woman should know so much about him.

“That’s where I’m going now. My boyfriend is having a party in his room. You should join us.”

The woman’s small head and beaked nose and frail frame gave her a birdlike appearance. To think that she had seen him at the family building and he had never seen her and that now she was inviting him to a party.

As he trailed after Elinore and the small group headed down Convent Avenue, he reached into his pocket and pulled out the very small manila envelope containing the ten feel-good pills Zach had sold him, the same kind Efram had given him on that golden night. He had been planning to reserve the pills for studying, but the night was calling to him now, with Elinore’s invitation. To meet the social demands of the occasion, he swallowed one right there on the street.

By now they were at the bus stop at the corner of One Hundred Twenty-Ninth Street and Convent Avenue. At the bottom of the hill, a bus emerged from the depot, sluggishly making its way up the cobblestone street. When it finally arrived, the driver kept the doors closed, offering them no mercy from the cold. They were like that, some of them, in their exercise of power. If they weren’t keeping you out, they were applying a heavy brake so as to throw the straphangers around a bit. They had their tricks.

A girl in Elinore's small group smiled at him.

"Where's your coat?" she asked.

"I'm wearing it," he said. He had on his navy blue pea jacket and a sweater underneath.

"I'm cold just looking at you."

"You don't look so cold," he said. A scarf, a long wool coat, and a knit cap seemed to be giving her all the protection that she needed.

On the bus some guy sat next to her with a guitar case between his legs. Some kind of troubadour, Luther surmised, trying to claim her with his musical gift. Now and then, Luther, sitting off by himself, would look her way and find her looking right back at him, as if some understanding had been reached that their conversation wasn't over.

He was really flying by the time the group arrived at Elinore's boyfriend's room. The night was now full of promise. He was sufficiently fortified by the drug to indulge the boldness of his base intention. He wanted the girl. He would have wanted her under any circumstances; the drug only made him want her more.

Luther stayed to himself, flipping through a thick collection of record albums. Despite being high, a wall remained between him and the others, who chatted easily among themselves. The folksinger unpacked his guitar and started strumming, and soon he was croaking out lyrics. One of his own compositions, he said. Something about the wind and silver bells.

The girl abandoned her seat on the sofa next to her singing beau. "Can I look with you?" she whispered.

“Sure,” Luther said. Like him, she feigned preoccupation with the albums she flipped through.

A circle formed on the floor, the lights were turned down low, someone placed an album on the record player, and a hash pipe circulated. Two tokes and Luther was flying, the room a ring of concentric circles his body moved into as he rode the hook of Keith Richards’ electric guitar on “Satisfaction.” Someone quickly transitioned to Rubber Soul. Mick Jagger couldn’t sing, but John and Paul and George really could. No album had the right to seize such full control of his emotions.

He had positioned himself beside the girl, who sat cross-legged in the circle. A run in her black tights made a clear line under the hem of her short skirt. He inched the index finger of his right hand against her leg, following the trail of the run, the notion having seized him that the candle would serve as a talisman so long he remained focused on the dancing flame. The girl didn’t rebuff him, either by moving her legs or slapping his face or publicly denouncing him. Even when she did stand up and exit the room, why should that be a matter of concern, as she was only seeking the public bathroom down the hall? Oh, what a night it was, with the best yet to come, Luther could only conclude, his head having undergone a complete stoning from the potent hash on top of the feel-good pill.

But now, other, less welcome changes were occurring. The overhead fixture came on, the brutally exposing light vanquishing the soft candlelit ambience where dreams could flourish. And the needle had been lifted from the vinyl album, right in the middle of “I’m Looking Through You.” And now the troubadour had metamorphosed into an angry colossus, standing before Luther with his legs spread.

“You touch her again and I will break your ass. Are you listening, Fuckhead?”

“This needn’t be a call to arms. I mean no harm,” Luther surprised himself by saying, supporting his pacific words by maintaining his gaze on the overmatched candle, fearful that to turn his face to his inquisitor would be to trigger a physical assault. In his mind’s eye, the stillness of his head suggested no resistance, like the hands raised chest high with palms outward by those gentle Buddhas among the statuary in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. And what choice did he have? His skeletal frame, the incapacity the hash had brought, his own guilt, and the troubadour’s fury would only result in a severe beating.

“Liar. Filthy fucking liar. You molest my girlfriend and say you mean me no harm? How about you get the hell out of here? How would that be for no harm? You belong in a freak show you’re so skinny. I could snap you in half like a twig.”

The young man’s words fell like a hard and hurtful rain, but Luther understood he was worthy of them. After all, the young man had a proper sense of justice and the courage to express his outrage.

“Fred, please, come sit with me,” Elinore said, as mobilized for peace as Fred was for war. Such gentleness in her delicate, somber face, in which could be seen the mournfulness of the ages. She took Fred’s hands in hers and led him to the sofa.

With irate Fred in Elinore’s precarious custody, Luther raised himself from the floor and headed out the door just as the girl was returning.

“I have been sent into exile for my deplorable behavior. You will find me in room 28. Please come. We must talk,” he said.

Whether her half-smile was a mask for incredulity or horror or sheer excitement he had no idea. When she said nothing, he went on his way.

Removed from smoke heaven, he sat on his single bed, the room lighted only by the glow of his electric clock and the Marlboro he smoked. He had some idea that the young woman would be led to his room by the momentum of the evening, but as the minutes passed he became less sure and more inclined to think a posse of the outraged, led by irate Fred, would storm his room and beat him half to death. He dropped the still-burning cigarette in the empty Coke bottle he used as an ashtray and as he lay down on the narrow bed there came a feathery knock at the door. A sound such as that, so feminine, he thought he had never heard.

“Please don’t be offended, but are you crazy?” The half-smile was still in place, suggesting that his sanity was not a matter that concerned her more than it needed to.

“Why would you say so?”

She began to laugh but caught herself. “Is that your normal approach at a party, to place your hand on the thigh of a girl who is there with someone else?”

“I don’t really go to parties.”

“Why is that?”

“No one asks me.”

“That girl Elinore said that she only invited you because you’re the son of the landlady of the building where she lives. She says your family has problems.”

“Problems. Yes.”

Beyond the hallway, out on the landing, the familiar sound of Fred's ire could be heard. As the noise came closer, the girl stepped inside.

"What room is the freak in?" the troubadour shouted, while standing in front of Luther's door.

"I don't know, Fred. Please, let's stop." Elinore was evidently with him. How blessed the peacemakers.

"I don't want to stop. I want him to pay."

"He'll pay, Fred. He'll pay. You know what goes around comes around. You know that."

And there it was, the ruckus slowly leaving town.

"Should we at least introduce ourselves? I'm Maura," the girl said.

"And I'm Luther. Pleased to meet you."

"Poor Fred. He's so upset."

"So I noticed. Have you been with him a long time?"

"No. Not at all. We met through a dating service. He came to pick me up earlier tonight, and I knew right away that it was a terrible mistake."

"A mistake?"

"You can tell about these things. He's so full of his own importance."

"Folksingers are important."

"Not if they can't sing."

"Bob Dylan can't sing. He can't sing like Caruso or Frank Sinatra, and he's important."

“That’s ridiculous. Bob Dylan can too sing. He can carry a tune, something poor Fred sure can’t do.”

She was not a girl he could give himself to easily. If he had far too few pounds, she had far too many, a fact she somewhat disguised by the black tights and black top and black skirt she wore that first night. The faint, dark line of a mustache was also troubling. And yet he took the gift she made available to him, tried to blind himself to the too-white flesh of her soft, heavy thighs as he sank into her, afterward feeling the happiness that came from a connection of this kind with a girl, and perhaps any girl would have done, after the rough time he had had getting over Jane Thayer and then the Dahlia debacle.

Her name was Maura Golden, and she was a second year student at New York University down at Washington Square, where she had transferred from a small college in Iowa. Her father, a fur importer, agreed to allow her to return to New York City to attend school on the condition that she live at home. Her mother had died when Maura was still in grade school and with her stepmother she was on cool and distant terms.

“He likes to keep an eye on me,” Maura said.

“But you’re nineteen,” Luther said.

“Not to him.”

“You’ll have to leave sooner or later,” Luther said. “Or maybe not,” he added, thinking of Hannah and Esther.

“Of course I’ll leave. Just not today.”

“Every day has to be Independence Day in America,” Luther said.

“That’s a silly thing to say.”

“People make a lot of money saying even sillier things,” Luther replied.

But Maura had her mind on other matters.

“Even on really cold days you wear only a light pea jacket. And your closet is so empty. I want to buy you clothes. I want to take care of you.”

“I’m doing fine,” he said. It hadn’t occurred to him that two shirts and a couple of pairs of corduroys hanging on hooks shouldn’t have been enough.

“And you’re much too thin,” she went on.

She sought to surprise him: a pair of wide-wail corduroy slacks; a wool sweater; a high-collared blue shirt he wore outside his pants as a tunic, all purchased at Paul Sargent, a trendy shop on Waverly Place, in Greenwich Village. But the gifts did not endear him to her. He saw the strings attached, the request that he love, or at least value, her more than he could.

Her parents lived near Lincoln Center, in a newly built white-brick high-rise, the kind whose apartments had low ceilings and modern fixtures. As Dahlia had rejected the dingy downtown hotel, Maura wanted to avoid his room at the Morningside Arms.

“It brings me down to be there. That public bathroom. Doesn’t anyone clean it?”

He thought of the older, broken, and solitary sorts who lived there, the kind who lacked the stability or the wherewithal for apartment living. It didn’t occur to him that he might be broken and solitary as well.

“It’s not the best, I guess,” he said.

“Come over to my apartment. Don’t worry. My parents won’t hassle us.”

He visited with her at night, after her parents had already retired to their room. Even so, he spoke in a hushed voice treading the white carpet to her room, fearful that the sound would travel through the thin walls. A sterile apartment, with no personal effects showing. An apartment for cold, impersonal people. Not that Maura was.

“Do you like this?” she asked, feeling her way below his abdomen with her soft lips.

“Sure. Sure I like it.” It was just that with her he progressively didn’t.

A nobody in the night, disco Imelda had called him, and yet maybe now he was a somebody in the day and night worthy of more than Maura could offer, a girl without that faint line of dark hair above her upper lip and skin less chalky white; what he longed for were the sleek, tanned contours of Dahlia, from Darien, Connecticut.

And yet she had been good for him. She had received him where others hadn’t and brought his losing streak to an end. In doing so, she had boosted his confidence sufficient that he began to make overtures to other girls, often in the sharp clothes she had gifted him with.

Troubadour Fred had staying power in his mind. A man with a social context was always better than a loner who had only himself; a man who sang and played an instrument, regardless of the level of his talent, was always better than someone who didn’t. Fred was game for the orderly processes of life; he did not need to appropriate another man’s date for impulsive sex. He had the patience to become friends with a woman before coming to “know” her. This too gave Fred clear superiority. Luther did not fight this reality; he accepted it as so that the karmic wheel would turn.

Luther and Maura took in a foreign film one night. Maybe it was the soulful banks of the Seine or the Champs-Elysee or the shimmering beaches of the Gold Coast or the high-speed chases through the French Alps, but the movie unleashed a yearning to leave behind his small life for an international stage filled with beautiful women and expensive cars and intense intrigue.

“If I had money, I’d get on a plane tonight and explore that city from one end to the other,” he said, as they sat in a Horn and Hardart automat on Fifty-seventh Street sipping hot chocolate.

“We could, you know,” Maura said, surprising him with her equal enthusiasm for escape.

“My post office check should take us far,” he said.

“There are other ways to get the money,” she said.

“Like the jewelry heist we just saw?”

“How about my father’s safe? No jewels, but bundles of cash.”

“No,” Luther said.

“And I know the combination.”

“You’re making this up.”

“My father is extremely wealthy. He is the biggest fur importer in Manhattan. And that is saying a lot.”

“You’re proud of your father,” Luther said.

“I was thinking of what you said. He shouldn’t have made me live at home. He shouldn’t try to control me.”

“Going out with someone like Fred doesn’t seem so out of control.”

“As you may remember, I am not with Fred. How can I say this? You would not be my father’s number one choice for me. Is that hurtful to hear?”

“Maybe.”

“All I mean is that he has some set ideas about the kind of boy I should be with. A nice Jewish boy basically.”

“It’s true. I’m not very smart.”

“Not all Jews are so smart.”

“All the ones I know are.”

“I only have an IQ of 140. That’s not very smart.”

Luther looked away, pained by the numerical quantification Maura had just expressed.

“But wouldn’t he know? First the money was missing. Then his daughter and her boyfriend were missing.”

“We wouldn’t necessarily have to clean out the safe. He might not miss what we took.”

Now and then, in the weeks that passed, Maura would bring up the safe and the trip to Europe they could take on the stolen assets but Luther heard it as the foolish talk of a not so foolish girl, an attempt to keep him close to her as Sean had used money to try to keep him close. But the proposal was also terrifying. Following though on it could get him arrested and thrown in jail, or worse.

For two weeks he did not call her, and when finally he did, she said, with weary acceptance in her voice, "Nobody controls you." A free-wheeling sort, an independent spirit, he heard her to be saying, and her words lit him up. He thought back to the bondage to Jane Thayer he had lived in through those high school years. Women didn't care so very much about men who cared for them. At least this one didn't. You could just go and ask the troubadour if you didn't believe him. So his thinking went.

Her girlfriend Jill was coming to town for the weekend. Maura had told her all about him.

"She really wants to meet you," Maura said.

He didn't have a good feeling about this friend of hers. He sensed a one-person jury whom Maura had charged with the task of delivering a verdict. The fact that she went to Smith College only added to his anxiety, as it meant she could claim a pedigree he so obviously lacked. The prospect of cold and unforgiving eyes upon him was not a happy one. Clearly it would be an occasion that called for another of those pills he had purchased from the Scale Master.

"How do you find time for your studies while working at the post office?" Jill asked, that Friday night, at a booth in the West End Bar, on Broadway and One Hundred Fourteenth Street, where Luther had joined them after his shift.

"I don't do a lot of studying. I mean, I do read the books, but a not a lot sticks."

"Not a lot sticks?" Jill was poised at the edge of incredulous laughter, of the kind that high-spirited, highly intelligent girls display.

“Like I’m reading this sociology book but the only thing that really stays in my mind is this one word, anomie.”

“Anomie?”

“It means being rootless, disconnected from society, and was coined by this French thinker named Emile Durkheim.”

“I know what the term means,” Jill said.

“No. Of course you do. But what I mean is that it is the only thing I remember after reading one hundred pages. How can that be? Where did everything else I read go?”

“Where did you say you go to college?”

“I didn’t, but I attend the City College of New York.”

“Maybe you only remember what pertains to you, and everything else is extraneous,” Maura said.

“That could be. The word didn’t frighten me, but it did excite me when I read it. It was exactly that. It had personal application to my life.”

“You suffer from anomie?” Jill asked. Luther heard dubiousness in Jill’s voice.

“I’m not sure. But it’s comforting to think there’s a name for it if I do.”

They ordered a second large pitcher of beer after Luther drank most of the first. His consumption did not go without notice.

“Do you always drink so much?”

Jill’s pointed question shook him. “It’s what people do on a Friday night.”

“And what do you do other nights?”

“I don’t understand.”

“Never mind.”

But he did understand. He heard the judgment in her voice and saw it gather in her narrow face. A frail, pale-skinned girl with scrutinizing eyes.

“The moon is full and watching warmly over us,” he said, looking up into the night sky over Manhattan as they left the bar. Minutes later, in his room, they were passing a joint as rock music poured from WNEW-FM on the radio his mother had given him. As he sat on the floor with the two girls, an intuition came to him, received from some lunatic portion of his mind, that Jill’s coldness was little more than a pose to hide her attraction to him. How transformed, how soft and alluring Jill’s face appeared in the light of the candle. All of life should be by candlelight. How else could the authentic self emerge, the self that said I want you, I must have you, you are the door I must enter on this night, as surely Jill was thinking now, their minds in accord on the need to move forward.

And Maura, was it not possible that she, her face suspended like a full moon in the dark, was complicit with this urge of his to explore new and forbidden territory, to bridge the gap between the thinkable and the unthinkable, and in so doing make the whole world ripe for exploration, so that he who had been denied everything now could be denied nothing? Why was there so little space between Jill’s folded legs and his if she didn’t want him? What more proof did he need, after her acquiescence in coming back to his room and her willingness to enter smoke heaven with him and Maura?

Well, there was just one more thing, something of a more tangible nature.

Suppose he were to graze her leg with his knee? And now that he had, and she hadn't moved away, why not inch his index finger onto her leg and see where that might lead?

And so he did, though not with the result that he had anticipated.

Jill sprang up like a jack-in-the-box. "Get out, Maura. Get out. He is completely insane." But while Jill fled out the door, Maura remained in place.

"I don't want you to go, but you can, you know," Luther said.

"I know," Maura said.

"Why such a sad face?" Luther asked.

"I should be happy? You do whatever you want to do."

"That doesn't sound right."

"You place your hand on my best friend's leg and say it doesn't sound right?"

He lit another joint. As the minutes passed, a feeling of dread came over him. Of what, he couldn't say. In the distance he heard the hallway door open and a commotion of voices draw closer, followed by a knock on his door, a loud, announcing, and insistent knock that promised fury should it not be heeded. And now there was a voice to go with the knock, saying, in an imperious tone, "Open the goddamn door." Luther was drawn to his feet with the coward's logic that appeasement rather than defiance was the safer path. Surely Jill had run for the police. How could he not have understood that would be her course of action if she imagined he presented a real and present danger?

And so he opened the door that he had relocked after Jill's flight but what kind of policeman was this who would punch him full in the face and kick him in the ribs and stomach when he fell to the floor and who would shout, “I will kill you, you fucking longhaired faggot son of a bitch. I will break you in half and feed you to the sharks.”

Luther scrambled on the floor to get away and then rose and wrapped his assailant in his long arms. His attacker was breathing hard and Luther could feel the man’s chest heaving as he moved him toward the door and out into the hallway.

“Take your hands off me, you faggot fool,” the man demanded, and so Luther did. All the fight had gone out of the fireplug of a man; he had nothing left with which to further batter Luther.

Out on the landing stood Jill, her face flooded with righteous wrath, and behind her Elinore and a few others, all of them watching as the man pointed a finger at Luther.

“You come near her again and you’re dead. Dead. I have people who will dispose of you so you will never be found. Now give me my hat, scumbag filth. Give it to me.”

Luther reached down for what looked like a legionnaire’s cap and tossed it to the man who, after placing it back on his balding head, rushed at Luther once more, but not quickly enough to prevent Luther from slamming the hallway door.

From the other side came Maura’s imploring voice. “Oh, Daddy, Daddy, please let’s go.”

One morning, a week after the altercation, he received a letter:

You must stay away. My father keeps knives and guns as well as cash in his safe. While it is true that as he has grown older he has more and more left the termination of his enemies to his underlings, he still takes a personal interest in this aspect of life from time to time.

You were very, very lucky the other week. You do have your own peculiar contribution to make to the world and I have developed a liking for you.

For this reason I hope you will heed this morning.

Fathers. They were a strange and lethal bunch. And daughters, were they any less dangerous?

Shaken and yet peculiarly exhilarated to have absorbed and survived a father's blows, he returned for imagined safety to the company of Vera, who coaxed him one weekend into attending a party thrown by one of her high school friends. The host, a stringy brown-haired girl, showed no interest in him and so he turned to a pretty girl with long curly blond hair who appeared to be there alone. But she met his chatter with stony, obdurate silence, returning him to the reality that a great gap still existed between him and the girls he truly desired, such as Dahlia and this serious-looking girl.

The following Saturday evening he heard footsteps in the hallway as he lay on his bed. He thought of Maura's father's goons and her father's proclivity for doing the job himself in some cases. Had her father or his emissaries come to perish him from the earth?

The footsteps stopped at his door and a knock of menacing softness followed.

"Yes?" Luther called out, trying to sound strong.

"It's your sister, Vera. Remember me?"

He opened the door and the room filled with her tall, strong presence.

“For this you’re paying money?”

“I don’t want to go back,” he said.

“That I can understand.”

She had come for a reason. Could he spare some of his feel-good pills, about which he had told her? She had schoolwork she needed to do.

From the packet at the bottom of his underwear drawer he gave her several pills and watched as she swallowed one right on the spot, with the benefit of two gulps of his Pepsi. He didn’t like the idea of his younger sister taking such things, but he was afraid to say no, as he was afraid to say no when she asked him to step over to the End Bar for coffee. The thaw in their relationship hadn’t allowed him to forget their previous difficulties. If anything, the current harmony only brought their prior discord into sharper relief. He found himself handling her, as he would a dangerous explosive, his sense being that her anger was not far away.

“I shouldn’t tell you, because it will only go to your head, and I probably wouldn’t if I weren’t feeling so great on this pill, but there is a girl from the party last week who is interested in meeting you.” They were seated at a booth by now, with patrons three-deep at the horseshoe-shaped bar. Even with the din generated by the Saturday night crowd, he heard every word she spoke.

“Who would that be? I didn’t meet anyone.”

“Didn’t you?”

“There was one girl, but she didn’t have two words for me.”

“A girl with long blond hair?”

“Yeah.”

“That’s the one. Her name is Sarah. She’s Pam’s best friend. Pam says she’s really wild.”

Pam was Pam Becker, the younger sister of Luke’s high school girlfriend Nancy.

“This doesn’t seem possible.”

“Maybe you intimidated her. Anyway, she wants you to call her. That’s what she told Pam. You’ll have to look her up in the phone book.”

“What’s her last name?”

“Van Dine.”

“Van Dine?”

“Two words. Like Van Gogh.”

The speed pills had a way of turning his face into a somber mask. Odd, as it was so in contrast with the joy he felt when he was on them, at least before the crash began. And yet that mask was useful now. It wouldn’t do to have Vera see the excitement her news had generated and the door she had opened leading away from her. It wouldn’t do at all. If she could open the door, she might have the power to close it as well.

He did not question his assumption that his youngest sister had the dark intent to keep him within the confines of family and from the richer, fuller life he sought. It was not his way to see her in terms of the generosity she had shown—her invitation to the party the week before and other parties in years past and even pushing him to go out with her best friend, Pam Becker, back when he was in the eleventh grade. No spirit of reciprocity did he show when, that same year, she asked him to introduce her to his high school friend Thurman Vorster. His shame was an enveloping and separating thing that required him to ignore her request.

That image of a door opening and of his youngest sister as a potential jailor remained powerful in his mind. Opportunities like this did not come often—maybe once in a lifetime. And so a lot was riding on the call he postponed making, until the force of inevitability led him the following week to pick up the phone.

“Van Dine residence.” The voice on the other end was mannered, cultivated. Luther had never heard anyone answer a phone in such a way. It sounded like something an English butler might say.

“May I please speak with Sarah?”

“Who, may I say, is calling?”

Luther identified himself. There followed a pause, as if the man, who could only be her father, was considering the request.

“I will see if she is available,” he finally said.

From the glass encasement of the phone booth on Broadway he watched as his sister Naomi and her husband, Chuck, passed by. Their pace was slow, their rushing days behind them. A feeling of pain, horror, disgust—he hardly knew what to call it—came over him. Thirty-four she would have been by then, fifteen years his elder. And was Chuck pushing fifty? Naomi would have stopped off at the renting office and asked for some money on their mother’s account, and she would have been given it. Twenty dollars, forty dollars. A woman and her husband on the family dole.

And their daughter Jeanne, with her sullen, aggrieved face? Where was she? She would be home from her day at school and in the family apartment on the second floor. Three didn't fit into a single room, not when the third was a thirteen-year-old. They were just going to bed when she was getting up for school. So she lived in the family apartment, and Luther's mother saw that she got to school on time and would see to it that she had clothes to wear and food to eat. Naomi would go to the Moon Palace above the Daitch Shopwell, where Sean used to work, and Naomi would order the green pepper steak with white rice, her very favorite, before they headed back across One Hundred Tenth Street to the Earvin Bar, next door to the Whelan's Drug Store. An older person's bar, where you would hear Sinatra and Mario Lanza and Tony Bennett on the jukebox, not Bob Dylan and the Stones and the Byrds. The sort of bar where people drank themselves to death. A feeling of anger, of bitterness, gripped him, that he should have to witness the spectacle of their failure year after year.

"Hello?" In Sarah's voice he heard uncertainty, a sad earnestness. The husky voice of a girl coming from a place of aloneness.

"It's me, Luther. We met at the party, where you didn't have two words for me."

She gave a startled laugh. "I'm glad you called." Yes, she was free that Friday night. And yes, a movie would be fine.

The conversation was brief. He did not wish to gamble on something going wrong.

He passed the tavern, where he saw his sister and brother-in-law seated on stools at the bar with drinks in hand. Well, that was their life. He was enrolled in college, headed for his job at the post office, and soon he would be seeing the prettiest girl to ever show an interest in him, he told himself, as he took the stairs two at a time to the subway to catch the train roaring into the station.

It was one of those Riverside Drive buildings he had dreamed of living in, the kind that would fill him with longing and aspiration just to look at, the sort of building where he imagined happy, prosperous families and clean, orderly rooms with tasteful furnishings.

“She’ll be right down,” the doorman said, after calling upstairs on the intercom.

A woman tore through the lobby, pausing only long enough to say, “God, you look ridiculous.”

“I know,” he heard himself respond, as she sped out into the street. Astonishment seized him in the aftermath of her hit-and-run, the words having flown from his mouth as if she had all power and he had none except to acquiesce and defer to whatever mocking thing she might say.

He thought of her as a woman, but she was really a girl, a Vassar College girl, and not any girl, but a girl Luke had seen through all four years of high school. Nancy Becker, her name was, the older sister of Pam Becker, the girl who was friends with Sarah Van Dine.

Always full of talk about Nancy Becker Luke had been back in that room Luther shared with his older brother. Nancy this and Nancy that. As if Luke had discovered her, a diamond in the rough. And then she outgrew him, the way a Vassar girl would have to outgrow a boy who could barely get into any college. Well, Nancy Becker might think he was ridiculous, but no girl would outgrow him. Sarah Van Dine would be a steppingstone. He would have access to more and more girls of her quality. His mentality was like that on this raw night in early spring.

Footsteps sounded on the marble floor and there she was, like no girl he had ever been with before, with those golden curls falling down her back and that serious, intelligent face. And her clothes. That beautiful suede jacket to go with a black skirt and her thin, strong legs in those black tights and the lavender top over that riveting swell of breasts.

Over the phone he had proposed that they see A Man for All Seasons. A highbrow sort of film that would reflect well on him for having chosen it, and playing at the Plaza Theater, right next door to the Plaza Hotel on Fifth Avenue. Couldn't get much classier than that, to use Sean's word.

But she swept aside his plan for one of her own.

"We need to talk. Let's go to that bar up near Columbia."

How she knew about the End Bar he didn't ask, nor did he argue. After all, what was that, two strangers sitting together in the dark watching a movie?

In one seemingly continuous action, the number 5 came zipping past the gloomy old mansion on the next corner, flung open the front door at the bus stop right across from the Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument on the park side of the street, and sped them away.

"Those bruises I saw on your face last week. Where did you get them?" she asked, as he returned to the booth they had settled into with a pitcher of beer.

“I had an accident,” he said.

“What kind of accident would that be? It looked like somebody had hit you.”

“I deserved it.”

“You deserved to be hit?”

“Oh, for sure.”

“Deserved it for what?”

“This girl I was seeing. Her father got it in his head that I was mistreating her and so he beat me up.”

“How were you mistreating her?”

“I guess I wasn’t liking her as much as I was supposed to.”

“That’s a reason for the bastard to hit you?”

Bastard. A vibration of vehemence he felt coming from her that took him back.

“I did do things. I wasn’t an angel.”

And so he told her the story of how Maura and he had met, and of his compliance with Fred’s demand that he leave the party, and how soon after Maura came to his room. Somehow it was easier to tell her of that initial fracas than about the pass he had made at Maura’s girlfriend Jill the night Maura’s father came calling on him.

“I’m glad you did what you did. Screw them if they want to treat you that way.”

She asked him about the war. What did he think of it? She wanted to know.

He heard himself say that, like her, he was a child of the Cold War and had grown up with a perception of communism as an implacable force, a metastasizing cancer spreading across the globe. Vietnam was upsetting. The massive bombings, the endless body counts, the napalm showers, the possibility that we had some ulterior motive for our involvement, that our crusade against Communism was masking an insatiable appetite for Vietnam's resources. But then his fear would hold sway again. And so he was somewhere in the middle, not for the war and yet not sold on the Vietcong and their northern sponsors. On the one hand this, on the other hand that.

“God, you're so smart, much smarter than my father.” Her father was a historian. He would soon be publishing a book. But he was a man in middle age and only now earning his PhD, she said, in a tone he heard as disparaging.

The bar was a magnet on weekend nights, drawing Columbia and Barnard students but also those with no such affiliation seeking to connect with the Ivy League chosen. He was grateful on this night that he didn't have to be one of the lonely ones in the cavernous space.

While he went through two pitchers of beer and held forth on matters of international importance, the hours passed, and now it was midnight. Wouldn't her parents expect her home? But no, she said. Her parents were away for the weekend at the family's country place in upstate New York. Only her oldest sister, Claire, was at the apartment, but she had her boyfriend over for the weekend and already knew not to expect Sarah back.

“I'll be spending the night with you,” Sarah said, quite bluntly, as he noticed for the first time the oversize bag she had brought along.

Like a Botticelli Venus he had seen at the Metropolitan Museum of Art she looked to him now in the soft glow of the bar lights. How could he bring someone such as her back to his dingy room at the Morningside Arms, perhaps only a small cut above some of the other SROs on the Upper West Side? The Oxford, the Belvedere, the Cortlandt, names that conveyed neither the conditions nor the quality of the occupants. Drug addicts, alcoholics, convicted felons, the criminally insane, the feeble, the lost, the unwanted, those who routinely peed in the sink and ate unheated Chef Boyardee ravioli out of the can. Men and women and whole families awaiting the welfare check in rooms with roaches and rats and mildewed carpets and broken fixtures in the public bathrooms and greasy stoves in the public kitchen. Buildings that radiated a sullen darkness, no matter how clean they looked from the outside, the collective misery of their tenants projecting through the walls and out onto the street. The kinds of buildings that cause you to see the world in terms of them and us and to move with fear and distress quickly past and to hope that the blight would be contained, or even better disappear.

Not that the Morningside Arms—or his family's building, for that matter—was really close to that category. Even so, it was too soon.

And yet she did come home with him and they did make love, or what passed for it. He came too fast, and could not touch her without fear that she would recoil at the feel of his cold, clammy hands on her smooth skin, as earlier in the evening anxiety had driven him to drop a speed pill, which now was diminishing the flow of blood to his extremities. It was one thing for her to see him drain glass after glass of beer and the suds drying on the emptied pitcher, but it might give her the creeps should she see that he was on drugs and that they were producing some false, inauthentic self.

The pill kept him up, his thoughts growing darker as the hands of the illuminated electric clock turned so slowly. Sarah had no such problem. She slept soundly and contentedly, never waking once and hardly stirring in her sleep. In the morning she wrapped herself in a sheet and headed for the public bathroom with her big bag and returned having shed her skirt and tights for brown bellbottom jeans.

There was an antiwar demonstration that same morning in Central Park. Would he come? No, he couldn't, he replied. There were things. Exams he had to study for. Would she think less of him for making, what sounded in his ears, like a poor excuse? But his concern was dispelled by the words she left him with.

"I'm going to be around for a long, long time," she said.

A girl like that, saying words like that, to someone like him. Hard to imagine, but definitely words to savor, to hold onto. Words to give meaning to his life.

He staggered out into the sunlight for a quart of orange juice and a muffin at Mama Joy's down the block. Some nourishment was needed after a night like that.

"You look like a gargoyle," the counterman said, adding up the total on the brown paper bag with a pencil. He had a mustache too wide for his narrow fallen face, a face faithful to the sour depression the years had brought. "You're a college boy. You know what a gargoyle is, right?" he went on, when Luther made no reply.

"Sure. Sure I do," Luther said, taking his purchase.

She was not a girl like Dahlia, impenetrable, nor one he had taken from another, as in the case of Maura. She had come to him not entirely without complication. There was a boy,

Ned, whom she had been seeing for some months. Actually, not a boy but a young man of twenty-four she had also met at a party. But their relationship was shaky. He was a bookkeeper who aspired to a career as a singer and songwriter. On her last visit to his East Village apartment, he had asked her to leave, having taken offense at some comments she had made about his singing and guitar playing.

“He has no talent and is so skinny,” she said dismissively, one evening.

“Skinny? Who could be skinnier than me?” Luther asked. He had arrived home from his post office shift to find her sitting outside his door on a school night.

“Believe me, he is,” she said. He wondered at her disparagement of Ned. It was no small accomplishment to have an apartment and a job and a career you were building toward in your spare hours. Altogether, he didn’t mind talking about Ned. After all, Ned was on his way out and Luther was the one displacing him, and so he could afford to be charitable and kind. He heard himself going further, actually cautioning her to keep her options open. She was young. She was still in high school. It made him feel good to show genuine regard for her and be free, for the moment at least, of self-interest. And there was no nagging sense as he spoke that he was in conflict with anything he truly believed. His advice to her applied to him as well. He too would keep his options open. Never again did he wish to return to the living hell of his relationship with Jane Thayer, and all the bondage and obsession and misery that it had brought.

“But really, won’t your parents be concerned? It is a school night.” They lay in bed. Sex happened fast for them now. It was spontaneous, natural, and needed no drugs or alcohol, not after the first night.

“They can’t control me and they know it. I was doing the same thing with Ned. I’d disappear and sometimes spend the whole night with him. As for school, it’s a cheap factory.”

It made him sad to hear her talk in such a way. School was a lifeline. Without it something bad happened. You were left behind. You were forgotten. He should know, having run into difficulty in his junior year of high school. One day of playing hooky led to two and then a week and then a second and third week before his mother was notified. A painful period of dislocation, the feeling that his dream was disintegrating and he was allowing it to happen. It wasn’t right that she should throw away her opportunity for an education at one of the city’s elite public high schools and fall—like those older sisters of his.

She said he lived like a starving Russian poet. But he was not starving. He was not Russian. He was not a poet. He wondered who she was seeing.

“That Coke bottle in your room you use as an ashtray. That makes you a poet,” she said.

She herself was an artist, or wanted to be. She drew stylized men in velvet jackets. Slim and sensitive men with long hair. A painter named Aubrey Beardsley had influenced her.

Beyond its use for lovemaking, he was uncomfortable having her in his room. He was afraid she would open his notebooks and see his bad handwriting and the meager entries taken during classes. He didn’t want her to see that his mind was dull and that he was at best ordinary. He didn't want to feel the pain such disappointment would cause her or him.

On one such afternoon he walked with her through Riverside Park south along the bridle path, telling her how he and his brother would imagine the different buildings they might live in when they were older to escape the chaos of their family life. And he showed her the Riverside Drive mansion that had once housed the Episcopal school he was expelled from in sixth grade for tossing rolls of toilet paper from the window of the boys' bathroom at the nuns down below on the sidewalk. Recalling the incident only seemed to draw her closer to him.

“God, I wish I had known you back then,” she said.

Verdant spring was showing in the trees and grass, and the wild shrieks of children carried on the soft breezes. The younger ones could be seen with their plastic pails and shovels in the sandboxes and the older ones with their endless energy on swings and seesaws. The world seemed primed for happiness, the sun still high over the Hudson River, on which a green and white Circle Line boat was headed north past a tanker that had dropped anchor.

They came to a bridge spanning an access road to the West Side Highway. Spaced along the brass railing were several lamps on blocks of granite. Luther bent and peered between the stone slab and the verdigris base of one such lamp and saw the two pennies, set there by Luke and mocking Nancy Becker, back in their high school days, with the pledge to always stay together. Luke had shown him the coins on one of their walks after his return from Europe, a trip he had saved for following high school graduation.

“What were you looking for?” Sarah said.

“Nothing really,” he said.

“You must have been looking for something.”

“I was just looking at the patina on the base of the lamp. That’s all.”

It was not for him to tell her about the coins or about Luke. Some things she didn’t need to hear about, not then, like how Nancy Becker had defeated and discarded Luke. She didn’t need to hear about dependency or sentimentality regarding his brother that she might then apply to him. Pam Becker may have told her, but that didn’t mean he had to. Those coins under the lamp were about failure and vanished dreams and he didn’t want anything to do with either.

“That’s us, seven stories up, and that’s my bedroom, three windows in from the corner,” Sarah said. At the base of the beige brick building stood a low border of hedges, and as his gaze rose, he saw that the block-long structure accommodated the gentle curve of the street with a slight concavity of its own. His eyes settled on a window with the curtains pulled back and a clear view down of the phallic Soldier’s and Sailor’s Monument and over the trees of the park to the Hudson River and the Jersey shoreline.

“Someday soon you’ll come and meet my parents. I’ve told them all about you,” Sarah said.

He stayed in place, on the park side of the drive, as she crossed the street and entered the building under its subdued gray awning. Someday soon her parents? Her words sent shock waves through him. Some lines you never crossed. You had to know your place and accept it, he thought, as he headed toward the subway and his evening shift at the post office.

There was a boy in her building, a popular, handsome boy. Jewish. One afternoon, when she was thirteen, she went with the boy to his apartment on the floor above her own while his parents were out, took off her clothes, and slept with him. She thought they could be friends. But he became cold and rejecting of her afterward. He said she was sick and demanded that she leave as she lay naked in his bed. Sarah went to her mother and cried and cried. It was hours before the tears ceased, but the pain lingered long after. She had suffered a wound. A boy had wanted her and then hadn't wanted her.

Angered, her mother upbraided the boy, telling him he wasn't to treat girls, or anyone, that way. The boy listened in silence, keeping any thoughts he had to himself, though his expression conveyed fear and contempt, as if he knew something that Sarah's mother couldn't or refused to know.

Sarah told Luther this story when next they met. It was a story she wanted him to have and to hold onto. Luther felt pained and sad for Sarah. But why had she taken off her clothes? Had the boy asked her to? These were questions he could not put to her directly because then he would have appeared to be finding fault with her. And if he did wonder about this quick transition to nakedness, he also found himself wondering about the boy, whom he did not like as the boy was described to him. Still, the boy was notable not only for his coldness but his strength. Because the question was: how did this boy, or any boy, find the power to reject someone with the quality of Sarah Van Dine? Someone had to be feeding the boy. Someone had to have created a structure in the boy's life that mitigated against neediness and left him impervious to her allure. Luther could only imagine the boy's father having a role here. He pictured the father with his hand around the boy's shoulder. Such fatherly girding of the boy was not something Luther wanted for himself necessarily; it was just something to note.

And there was another story, told with no trace of rancor in her voice. Pam Becker had a boyfriend, Larry, an on again, off again student at CCNY who supported himself selling drugs. Larry had an apartment way over east on Ninety-sixth Street, at the border of Spanish Harlem. One afternoon, Sarah had gone with Pam to Larry's apartment, and while Pam went to the bedroom with her boyfriend, Sarah went off to another room with Larry's friend, a boy whose name she had already forgotten, where she slept with him. What she didn't forget was the boy's penis, which she laughingly described to Luther as having the shape of a banana.

Fear entered the picture, not fear for her but fear of her that she could go to bed with a stranger the first time and coolly analyze his penis. And that she and her girlfriend should be having sex in the same apartment with two different boys—this too stayed in his mind as something terrifying but also painfully arousing. And that this boy Larry could have an apartment, not a room, when all Luther could have was a room, and a room a half block from the building where he had spent all the years of his life since infancy, was something for his mind to retain.

One evening, as they lay naked in his bed, footsteps approached in the hallway, stopping outside his door. The presence of someone out there came to Luther strongly. It seemed the longest time before the knock came, but when it did, Luther pulled on his pants and a T-shirt. "Who is it?" Luther called out.

"My name is Peter Van Dine. I have come for my daughter," the man said, seeming to carefully enunciate each word, but giving special emphasis to the last.

Sarah had sprung from the bed at the sound of her father's voice, and now was at the window, ready to jump to the alleyway below, if Luther was to take her at her word.

"You would only hurt yourself if you did," Luther whispered. "Just get dressed."

When he saw she was doing just that, reaching down for the small clump of garments on the floor, he opened the door and stepped outside and was greeted with the sight of a man wearing a belted white trench coat with the collar turned up and a black turtleneck. Though in middle age, he had a full head of still blond hair, which he combed straight back as if unafraid to fully present his face. It was a handsome face, weathered and tanned, the face of a man who had experienced a lot of life. Of medium build and only five feet eight inches tall, he stared up at Luther with steady gray eyes that conveyed not only resoluteness but a hint of fear and anger. He was a man to be handled, Luther sensed, a man he needed to extend himself to. Somehow he must convey that he was on the man's side and that he meant no harm. The man had been harmed enough.

"She will be right out," Luther said.

"Thank you. I will wait outside on the landing," the man said.

Sarah was standing, fully dressed, in a far corner of the room when Luther returned.

“He’s going to kill me,” she said.

“He’s not going to kill you. It’s 11:30 pm on a school night. He’s just worried.”

Sarah had been waiting for Luther in the lobby when he returned from his post office shift. It was no surprise to him that her father should now have come for her. No father wanted to lose his young daughter to the forces of the night. But he had handled her father’s fear. He had treated him with gentleness and consideration and respect. And her father had shown restraint as well. He had not pummeled Luther with his fists or tried to use his head for a soccer ball or uttered dark threats about henchmen arranging to have him sleep with the fishes. Not one such word had Mr. Van Dine uttered. Like two great powers they had come together and found their common ground. Mr. Van Dine would see that he had an ally more than a rival. For the rest of the night Luther basked in the glow of good feeling his kind and sensitive and thoughtful behavior had brought.

Through his daily round of classes and work at the post office the glow persisted. But when several days passed without her being at his door or in the lobby of the rooming house, he began to worry. He understood that night visits would be out of the question, at least for a while, but why was she not seeking him out during the day? Was it possible that she came by his room at 3 pm and then left when he didn’t return shortly thereafter? He raced from the campus to ensure that he didn’t miss her. And once he was back in the room, he didn’t dare to stray until he had no choice but to leave for work.

He wouldn't pick up the phone. He had done that once, but only because Sarah had made the request, through Pam Becker and Vera. Without such solicitation, it would be the beginning of the same path to bondage he had experienced with Jane Thayer. And look what it had gotten him with Dahlia. All his weakness and dependency would be on display.

And yet, by the next week, he understood his mistake. Mr. Van Dine had no desire for a friendly accord. One look at Luther's skeletal frame and tumbleweed hair and that hovel he lived in and Sarah's father was resolved to separate his daughter from such a poor choice for a boyfriend. He saw that Sarah's father had come to claim her for someone better or maybe even he, Mr. Van Dine, was that someone better.

Or suppose it had nothing to do with the machinations of Sarah's father? Suppose she had woken up one morning and realized she was tired of Luther? But to be so cruel as to not let him know, to just impose this hideous silence. She would pay for this. She really would. He was no one to fool with. He would show her what power was, he thought, as he entered the pharmacy at the corner of One Hundred Twelfth Street and Broadway and headed for the phone bank.

Enclosed within the booth, he spun the rotary dial but then hung up, too afraid of what he would hear on the other end to continue. A great divide now existed between them that no phone conversation could possibly bridge. His inadequacy would have been revealed to her, leaving no choice but to dismiss him. How quickly her natural superiority had allowed her to gain the upper hand. And yet he couldn't just leave the booth. To do so would be to relegate himself to a wasteland of pain too punishing to survive.

“The Van Dine residence.” Again that tone, not of affectation but of cultivation, of emphatic declaration. A tone you couldn’t be born with but had to learn and meant to set you apart from the coarse and unthinking of the world.

“May I please speak with Sarah?”

“May I say who is calling?”

“This is Luther.”

“I will see if she is available.”

The shoe on the other foot now, of course. Now Luther as the petitioner.

“Hello?” Her voice cloudy, tentative.

“I was thinking about you, and so I called.”

“I’m so glad you did. I’ve been thinking about you, too.”

“It seems like a long time since I’ve seen you.”

“I know, but Daddy came down pretty hard on me. Mommy too, but mostly Daddy. He wanted me home at night and then he had tickets for a Broadway show so I had to go to that and then he insisted that I come to Camp this past weekend.”

“Camp?”

“That’s what we call our country place. Someday you’ll see it.”

Someday you’ll see it. Reassuring words that told him he did have a place in her life. But his fear hadn’t been unfounded. Her father was trying to rein her in, and now Luther could have no confidence that he wouldn’t succeed.

“Well, OK.”

“Look, I’ll be over tomorrow. I promise.”

He placed the receiver back on the hook and pressed his forehead against the side of the booth and closed his eyes. I promise. Sarah had heard his concern. She had heard his neediness. He had come to her and she had comforted him, but it was comfort that would come with a price. He would have to find a way to regain his strength and his advantage if he didn't want her to completely destroy him in the name of love.

In the second trimester now, Maureen was showing, and glowing with pride at the swell of her belly. At Maureen's insistence, Luke had installed a washer and drier in the kitchen.

"We had a great wedding. Too bad you weren't there," Maureen said.

"I can't go to something I don't know about," Luther said.

"It wasn't anything. Just a City Hall wedding," Luke said.

"It wasn't anything? We had a reception afterward at my father's apartment. That was something. My sisters were there and my best friend, Carmen, and your mother came."

"Yeah, we did. That's true," Luke said.

"When are you two getting married?" A crafty look came over Maureen's face.

Luther had brought Sarah along, wanting her to meet Luke.

"Never," Sarah said.

"What do you mean, never?" Maureen asked.

"Never means never," Sarah said.

“You mean you’re never ever going to get married? Why would you not want to get married?”

“For the same reason that you got married.”

“What is that supposed to mean?”

“You got married because you thought it would make you happy. I’m happy not being married. We both want the same thing. We just have different pathways for finding it.”

“Are you saying I wasn’t happy before I got married? Because I was. I was plenty happy. And now I’m even happier.”

“And I’m happy for you,” Sarah said.

“Babies are important.”

“Life is important.”

“Are you saying babies aren’t important? I guess you weren’t ever a baby, were you?”

“My parents tell me I was.”

Maureen so invasive and judgmental and Catholic, in keeping with the parochial school system she had been a part of before enrolling at Julia Richman. And that combativeness. It was stamped on her face. She either jeered at you or fought with you. It was all she seemed to know.

“Well, he wouldn’t be anybody to marry anyway,” Maureen said, training her eyes on Luther, then turning back to Sarah. “I doubt he’s even capable of making a baby, seeing how skinny he is.”

“Hey, everybody. Let’s cool out. Come on out to the roof. I’ll show Sarah my bike,” Luke said.

Luther and Sarah followed Luke out of the tight quarters, while Maureen stayed behind. Some yards beyond the door to the roof the bike stood sheathed in a tarpaulin flapping in the blustery wind. Luke removed the shroud to reveal the metal and chromed beast. He then inserted the ignition key in the base of the lamp, gave the throttle a couple of twists to ensure the flow of gas, and kick-started the engine.

“Come on, I’ll take you for a spin,” he shouted to Sarah, over the noise of the throbbing machine, one hand on the throttle, the other on the brake handle.

“Here? On the roof?”

“Best place for it. No traffic. “Keep your feet on the foot rails and hold on to me,” Luke instructed.

Luther watched, buffeted by anxiety, as she climbed onto the buddy seat and placed her arms around his brother’s waist. The next few minutes were a torment of dread as Luke raced the machine to all the corners of the roof. An image of the bike surmounting the parapets and plunging with the two of them to the concrete pavement thirteen floors below assailed him, as did the sight of Sarah with her arms around Luke’s waist.

“Now it’s your turn,” Luke said, after concluding the agonizing tour.

“Now it’s my turn for what?” Luther asked.

“Get on and take it for a spin yourself. Just climb aboard and I’ll show you.”

Luther looked at Sarah, but she returned him a neutral gaze. “This is your thing, not mine,” Luther said to Luke, even as he seated himself on the machine.

“Now give me your left hand. That’s it. That’s the brake. Now your right hand goes here.” Luke then instructed Luther to pull in the clutch with his left hand even as he depressed the gear shift into first with his left foot and to turn the throttle.

Instantly the machine flew forward in the direction of the lowest of the retaining walls, three-feet-high. Panicked, Luther gripped the throttle tighter, increasing the bike’s speed. He saw what was coming, the bike flying over the wall with him on it. No room had been left in his mind for what did happen, the bike colliding with the retaining wall and stalling out as it fell over with Luther on it.

“Man, I told you what to do. You didn’t listen. Next time listen to me. OK?”

“Sure. I’ll really, really listen,” Luther said, as he struggled up. “I’ll be all ears.”

“Hey, come on, man. I was only trying to help. You’ve got some things you need to learn.”

“Some things to learn?”

Maureen had come out on the roof. “What’s going on out here? Has there been an accident?”

“No accident. I’m just teaching my kid brother how to ride a motorcycle. That’s all.”

“That’s a man’s world,” Maureen said, addressing herself to Luther. “Got to be a man to ride those one of those machines. Got to feel like you own it. Otherwise you’re going to have trouble. Know what I’m saying?”

“I always know exactly what you are saying and what both of you are saying,” Luther said.

“Hey. You don’t have to be like that,” Luke said. “I was just being friendly. No need for an attitude.”

“Attitude is all he’s got,” Maureen said.

“Let’s go,” Luther said, taking Sarah’s hand. “Let’s just go.”

She had come to him after school, as he had hoped she would. Her father hadn’t reclaimed her after all, and she hadn’t as yet punished him for his weakness in calling her when she was absent for those couple of weeks. And as for Luke and Maureen, she would only say that Luther’s family was incredibly interesting and that his brother was handsome and strange and maybe dangerous.

“Maybe? He would have jumped for joy if I went sailing off the roof, though he might have shed a tear for his motorcycle.”

“Your family really is like something out of Dostoyevsky. There’s so much crazy passion. You’re much more interesting than my family.”

“Failure isn’t so interesting,” Luther said.

“You haven’t failed. You’re much smarter than my sister Claire.”

“I am smarter than your sister Claire?”

“Sure. She has to study morning, noon, and night for good grades and you hardly have to study at all. And you have a job, too.”

Her sister Claire was a freshman at Barnard and lived at home. Sarah had told him as much. First he was smarter than Sarah's parents. Now he was smarter than her sister, who had gained admission to a prestigious college.

"City College is not exactly the Ivy League," Luther said. "Even so, I could still find myself flunking out."

"No, no, I can tell," Sarah said. "You're really, really smart. You know things she and my parents will never know."

"What exactly do I know?"

"You know about the Vietnam War."

"The Vietnam War? I read the stupid newspapers and say some vacillating, incoherent things about the war. That makes me smart?"

"Of course it does."

"Stop it," he said, with his back to her.

"Stop what?"

"Stop comparing me to your parents and to Claire."

"I'm only saying what is true."

"You are saying what you want to be true."

"But it is true."

"Why do you want to send me off a cliff? Isn't it enough that my brother tried to do that?"

"Nobody is trying to send you off a cliff."

“I’m not who you say I am. I can’t be.” Because he would be nudged off the cliff if he did not say these things. The misperception had become dangerous, to him if not to her.

“OK. Be whoever you want to be. How’s that?”

As he turned the corner with Sarah onto Broadway, there was his father shuffling directly toward him with the aid of his walker. Like an oversized creature from the insect world he appeared, month by month his face seeming to grow longer and his nose bigger, while baldness claimed more and more of his scalp. His father’s decrepitude evoked overwhelming shame. How was he to introduce his vibrant, talented girlfriend to such a specimen of disintegration?

“My good son,” his father said, his face breaking apart in a smile, revealing a mess of silver in his mouth. “Your mother and I don’t see enough of you.”

“I’ll be by soon,” Luther said. “Oh, and Daddy, this is my friend Sarah.”

“It is very nice to meet you,” his father said, offering her his smile.

“It is nice to meet you, too,” Sarah replied, as if she wasn’t sure it was.

“Look, do you want me to help you across Broadway?” Luther asked.

“God is my helper, my son. God is my helper,” his father said, and inched forward, alternately lifting the aluminum walker and setting it down.

Suppose his father was struck by a speeding car or run over by a bus? But the sound of screeching brakes and the thud of impact did not come to Luther’s ears. His mind turned to Sarah, and the cool way she had regarded his father. Perhaps she too had been seeing an insect. She had not been seeing anyone important. That much Luther sensed and noted. It was one thing for him to attach insignificance to his father; it was another for someone else to do the same. Somehow this awareness that had come to him was important, terribly important, even if he didn't know why.

They were not kind people, the management of Morningside Arms. No Christian charity, no letting tenants slide with back rent for a week or two or three, as might happen at the rooming house managed by Luther's family. If you were late by a day, you got a loud, early morning knock on your door from a thick-necked thumper with the message being that you paid that morning or you dealt with him on a different level. Luther had no interest in such an encounter with a powerful black man in a gray sweatshirt and porkpie hat.

The woman in the renting cage at the rear of the lobby snatched the bills from Luther and after counting them, said, "You owe another ten dollars."

"Why? I just gave you the rent," Luther said.

"Louise," the woman barked, at a cleaning woman with her cart headed for the elevator. "Come over here."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Tell him what you told me."

Louise looked him up and down. Her skin was so richly black as to show a hue of blue. A heavysset older woman with a kerchief around her head, her big eyes grew hard at the sight of him.

“I tell him right now. I tell him I don’t appreciate no piggish ways. Expecting me to remove sheets red with blood. Tell me if that isn’t a special kind of piggishness expecting me to deal with such filth. You got a mind not working right if that’s what you expect, mister.”

“Ten bucks for the sheets, mister. And it happens again, you’re out on your ass. Understand?”

“Yes, of course,” Luther said. As he fumbled for the additional payment, he remembered that Sarah had warned him about her period on her last visit, but he had gone ahead anyway. And now the landlady and the cleaning woman had the goods on him. Well, the world was as it was and the day was calling to him.

Like Luther, his sister Vera had an aspiration of her own. She too was bent on finding a pathway clear of the building so she would not have to lead a sorrowful life in one of the rooms to which circumstance had consigned her sisters Hannah and Naomi or be on the same sad track as her third sister Rachel, still clinging to her independence in a dreary SRO somewhere nearby. And though her prospects for college were not good, she had an inner resource, a buoyancy, that suggested she had not been born for defeat.

In this time she had a boy friend. There was little use in joining the two words, as that would have been to distort their connection. His name, Roddy Blakely, was as pretty as he looked, with full, sensual lips and the eyes of a doe. He came with an Ivy league pedigree, having failed out of Harvard and numerous lesser colleges before coming to New York City, where he was enrolled in Columbia University’s School of General Studies. Now in his mid-twenties, Roddy too had descended to SRO status, his room and tuition paid for by his parents. His father, a professor of English at Smith College, Roddy dismissed as having a far inferior quality of mind than his mother.

Seeing Roddy on Broadway, a Gauloise dangling from his lips, Luther would stop and follow him with his eyes, noting the scarf thrown around Roddy's neck and his downward gaze and the soft, silky brown hair falling over his brow and the fat Gaulois dangling from his lips. He would observe Roddy's odd gait, how, with his right foot, he seemed to be stepping into a small hole. For a while Luther even tried to copy Roddy's manner of walking. Roddy was worth studying and emulating not simply because he was beautiful but because he had a way of making failure appear attractive. How glorious to have been given so much to throw away. At times Luther could hear his heart cry out that he had not received a comparable gift to squander.

As much as he looked and noted, Luther could never approach Roddy. That would have been to place himself in danger of annihilation. Even a fallen angel like Roddy had the power to kill. If Roddy had exterminated his father with a withering judgment as to his cast of mind, what on earth would he say of CCNY Luther? No, no, best to stay away.

But he didn't stay away, or not entirely. "Roddy can get you even more powerful speed than the pill you gave me. You should talk to him," Vera said. Somehow Roddy had come into possession of a prescription pad. And while Luther didn't talk to Roddy, Vera did. And so Roddy issued Luther a scrip, through Vera, for 15 mg. Eskatrol, a time-release capsule that would last an entire day. "He's filled dozens of these prescriptions. It won't be a problem," Vera assured Luther.

The pharmacist, a middle-aged man in a white lab coat, stared at the forged prescription and then turned his gaze on Luther. How all-seeing his eyes appeared through the clear lenses of his wire frame glasses. Such gravitas. Holding Luther in his gaze, he said, in a quiet voice, "Come over here, Stan." Had Roddy been wrong in the assurance he had given Vera? Had Luther made a serious blunder in walking into this pharmacy on One Hundred Fifteenth Street and Broadway? He thought of leaving, but fear froze him to the spot.

His partner, a slighter man also in the grayness of middle age, did the same, looking from the prescription to Luther. He took him in slowly, head to toe, all six feet four inches and one hundred thirty-five pounds of him.

"A diet pill for him, a bone-thin young man?" the first one asked, incredulousness in his voice.

"It's a different world," the other shrugged.

He felt their eyes on him as he left the store with his purchase. They would be seeing him as a freak, an alien. The partner had been right. A different world, yes, a challenging world, with a formidable girlfriend and exams coming up. A world in which he needed the things that hadn't been given him so he could meet his responsibilities as they were meeting theirs. Everyone needed a little something.

He moved that spring. Now he would be six blocks from the family building, on One Hundred Nineteenth Street, and even more, actually, if you added on the fact that his new place was just off of Amsterdam Avenue, a block east of Broadway. And a long block that was too, the equivalent of three north-south city blocks. He would have his own room. True, he would have to share the bathroom and the kitchen, but that had been the case at the Morningside Arms as well. And now he wouldn't have to face the threat of bodily harm if he fell a little behind in his rent. Not that he was likely to come up short, not with a monthly rent of sixty dollars, including phone and gas.

Of course, the room needed attention. He gave it two fresh coats of paint, then sanded the wood floor and applied a polyurethane finish. And he even bought an old oak office desk for thirty dollars so he could have a surface other than his bed on which to study.

The leaseholder on the apartment was Roberto Espillat, a young man with a sunny smile except when he spoke of his stepfather, whom he had endured for many years in that same apartment. When Luther asked where Roberto's mother and stepfather had gone, Roberto motioned upward with his thumb. Requested by Luther to clarify, Roberto said they were now living on the floor above in a smaller place.

"My mother promised me this apartment when I got to college age, and I held her to it. I wanted her out of here. And that creep, too."

Roberto's eviction of his mother and stepfather became the lens through which Luther saw him, not the fact that he had played ball with Lew Alcindor at Power Memorial or was a philosophy major at City College or that he had hopes of going on to Columbia University's business school. Luther couldn't say exactly why the matter stayed in his mind. It just did. The information seemed to give him an edge on Roberto. He could leave home, whereas Roberto could not.

And yet he had a natural affinity with his new roommate, with whom he did not feel socially challenged. He suspected that Roberto had grown up somewhat unsheltered as well. In fact, Luther was sure that he had seen Roberto here and there in his growing up years. He was not an unfamiliar face.

That first week Roberto told Luther of his true love, a girl named Imelda, and how some brute named Joe—Joe Syzmborska—had moved in on him and taken Imelda away. And when Roberto shared this information, Luther could only feel he knew him even more.

One weekend evening Luther went with Roberto to the End Bar for beers. On the way, his sister Vera called to him. She was not alone. Roddy Blakely was with her, and there was a third person, short and with the girth of Falstaff, holding a Great Dane by the leash. In the man's hand was a bottle of Yoo-Hoo, which he shared with the enormous dog before draining the remainder of the beverage.

“God, Simon, how can you drink from that bottle? That dog's mouth is a germ factory. It's filthy,” Vera said.

“My mouth has been on filthier things than that,” the man said evenly. He was expensively dressed, in a dark blue silk suit, and his gold-colored tie seemed to glow in the cool spring night. A powerful sort of man, with big all-seeing eyes. Not only his dress but his age set him apart. A man in his early thirties, Luther estimated. A man established in the world.

Vera and her friends were on the way to the bar as well, and so Luther and Roberto sat packed in with them at a booth. In the short time Simon stayed before retrieving his dog, which he had left hitched to a parking meter, Luther learned that Simon was a graduate of Yale, had earned a first at Oxford, and was enrolled in a PhD program at Harvard while teaching at Babson, a school, as he put it, of little distinction. He also learned, from the reflexive way Simon's eyes turned to Roberto, that he was taken with him.

"Here is my card. Call me. I have a friend who runs a modeling agency. He might be able to help you. You would be a good fit for Esquire. Alas, I can't say the same for your somber friend."

"Don't mind Simon. He tends to be full of himself," Vera said, following the Harvard man's departure. She had seen the pained look on Luther's face.

Though it was hurtful to be spoken to in such a way, Simon's verbal lash was in accord with what Luther heard him to be saying, that he was a man committed to excellence.

"He's full of a lot of things," Roddy said.

"Are you liking your new place?" Vera asked.

"I really am," Luther said.

"Didn't you say you would like to move?" Vera had turned to Roddy.

"Well, I've been thinking about it," Roddy said, after lighting another Gaulois and removing a bit of tobacco on his tongue.

"Are you looking for another roommate?" Vera asked Roberto.

"That was my plan," Roberto said.

“Why don’t you go over there and see the place, Roddy? How would that be, Roberto?”

“Sure,” Roberto said.

Luther didn’t know whether to marvel at or be horrified by his sister’s ability to navigate socially. Yes, Roddy had the untended to look of a falling angel, but still, his pedigree was intimidating, and Simon, if anything he said was true, was in the full flush of Ivy League power. How had Vera positioned herself among such worthies when she would be fortunate to graduate from a run of the mill public high school? Democracy was all well and good. Everyone was equal under the law and a man could rise from log cabin origins to become president of the United States, but still, there were stations in life, and intelligence was one of those stations, and those with lesser intelligence were not meant to mingle with those who had been given more. City College was not Harvard, and Julia Richman was not the Bronx High School of Science. People should stay where they belonged. There was only trouble to be had if they didn’t. But her aspiration wasn’t new, and so could not be considered a passing thing. For several years now she had been going to parties thrown by the frat boys at Columbia University and hanging out in their hovels. If she couldn’t be one of them, she could at least be among them. And now she was pushing them on him, if he was reading the situation correctly. A young man he was afraid to so much as talk to would now become his roommate?

In the not so long ago the barrier of fear and pride had been fully erected, the dividing line drawn between those who had and those who didn’t. It happened that night that his high school friend Tom Smits had come calling on him, and not even calling on him but surprising him with a one-person invasion, saying, as Luther entered the lobby from the family apartment on the second floor, “So, I’ve finally found you.” Because Luther hadn’t told him where he lived. He hadn’t dared. Not since he first met him, that summer between sixth and seventh grades, on a basketball court down in Riverside Park. Even then, that very first time, something screamed in him not to go to the tall, pale, skinny boy at the other end of the fenced-in courts, not to go to him at all because the boy was from the snooty private school Luther had been enrolled in the year before. But Luther had gone, drawn from one outdoor court to another until he reached the one where Tom Smits had been shooting hoops. And though Luther had beaten him in a game of one-on-one on that first day, Tom Smits had been beating him ever since, just beating and beating and beating him, a beating so savage he could hardly stand. Beating him about where Luther lived, saying “Why don’t I come over and watch the game at your place? You do have a place, don’t you? And you do have a TV, don’t you?” because Luther wouldn’t tell him where he lived. Couldn’t tell him where he lived. Couldn’t tell anyone at that school, lest they put the laughing thing on him that rich kids reserved for those who weren’t like them. Because Tom Smits had an art history professor father and a PhD candidate mother and a Riverside Drive apartment could he throw open the doors of his life. And so the more secretive Luther remained, the more Tom Smits pressed him, though to no avail because fear was fear and death was death if Luther’s secret was revealed. But if Tom Smits couldn’t find out where Luther lived, he could ascertain the quality of Luther’s mind, could say, having rummaged through the booklets in the cardboard box from the Educational Testing Service outside the principal’s office and found the one with Luther's scores on the verbal and math portions of the SAT, "I admire your test scores. You'll be lucky to get into Slippery Rock U." Beating Luther socially, beating him mentally, and then, finally, beating him athletically, on the basketball court in a varsity game against some equally small private school. Because the game was not about beating the other team, or if it was, that was secondary to beating Tom Smits, because if he didn't beat Tom Smits on the court, then where and how could he beat him? But he wasn't beating Tom Smits in that game. Tom Smits was beating him, beating him in points scored and rebounds. No, no, this could not be. It couldn't. The hell with them, he thought, that afternoon, the hell with all of them, as the team tried to regroup in the locker room at halftime. He didn't join them back on the court but quickly dressed and rushed out of the gym, saying a loud fuck you to all of them and to his life.

That high school in which he hadn't existed except as a body, a smiling cipher, the boy with the flat head and unpronounceable last name and the big nose and the big lips. "Are you a Negro? Someone says you are a Negro? Are you?" some boy with bad breath snicker-whispering to him back then.

And now here Tom Smits was again, in the lobby of Luther's building, hungry for more beating, simply insatiable. Saying to Luther, "In case you're wondering how I found you, I saw this guy standing on the corner and I asked him if he knew you and he said 'Yeah, that's my brother,' and so he told me where to go. Tell me. Does your brother always stand around on street corners with his shirt hanging out of his pants?" Every word from his mouth a beating. He was just back from a summer on the island of Guadalupe, where his mother had been doing research for her doctoral dissertation. "She didn't want to be made," Tom Smits said, referring to the men on the island whom she turned away following the breakup of her marriage. And now Tom was back in the city and drawn to Luther by neediness, a pain that Luther couldn't see, as how could someone with fifteen hundred SAT scores and acceptances to Harvard and Yale and Princeton know pain? In a coffee shop that night, Tom pressed him for his plans. He would be attending the City College of New York, Luther said, unable to tell Tom that he had in fact been accepted by Queens College, not City College. "Jesus," Tom said. "Well, it used to be a pretty good school."

That same night, back in his room, Luther wrote a note to Tom. "Please don't try to contact me again. I really must be alone. I will have to hurt myself if you don't respect my request." The note was as brief as that. He placed it in an envelope and mailed it that same night. It would not do to wait until morning. Tom had to be disposed of right then and there. With each step that brought him closer to the mailbox on the corner, his savage joy increased. Tom Smits had had many words. He had bathed those words in acid, the better that they might burn and burn. But now Luther Garatdjian would have the final word. Go away, Tom Smits. Go away now. Just go, go, go.

And so he killed Tom Smits so that he, Luther, could live, because with Tom Smits alive there was no way for him to live, no way at all.

Roddy Blakely was not Tom Smits, Luther told himself. Roddy Blakely was descending, not ascending. In four years of college he hadn't accumulated a year's worth of credits. According to Vera, he shot methamphetamine. No, he did not have quite the power to kill, as did Tom Smits, not in his diminished state, though he would bear watching, given that he had been Harvard even if he no longer was Harvard.

And now Roddy would especially have to be watched, as he did come to check out Roberto's apartment and liked what he saw enough to take the front room, a narrow space separated from the living room by French doors.

And Simon Berlinger liked enough what he had seen of Roberto that one night at the End to come calling. Roddy was an old flame and now Roberto was a new one. He took Roberto to expensive restaurants, let him air out the Porsche in fifth gear on the interstate, and suggested he had connections at the Columbia Business School who could help Roberto gain admission when he finished his undergraduate work. Simon might even be able to arrange a special deal for the Triumph motorcycle Roberto had a longing to own. The Fat Man, Roberto referred to him as, though never to his face, and laughed helplessly at the love notes Simon sent through the mail.

Luther had seen this lavishing of gifts before. Like Sean, Simon had an appetite for life and for love, but Simon was not Sean. Simon did not browbeat lonely old women for his daily bread. Simon was up there on the achievement ladder, with his Harvard and Oxford affiliations and his ability to fend for himself in the world.

"You should see him. We're in some French restaurant where he gets drunk and tells me how much he needs me and starts blubbing. It's really disgusting to see," Roberto said, unable to contain his amusement. The image of importunate Simon, his round face stained with tears, stayed in Luther's mind. It saddened him that a person could acquire things but not love. He thought of Simon lonely in the night in his expensive suit and fancy car and of his own loneliness after the breakup with Jane Thayer and of the seeming chasm that seemed to open between him and girls thereafter, as if he were living on an island with no way back to the mainland.

The apartment opened on a long hallway, off which there were two rooms, the first belonging to Roberto and the second to Luther. Roberto's room had become a shrine to the past, a clutter of books and photos and trophies that overwhelmed the small space. Seeing the room, Luther had the sense that Roberto was not simply living in that apartment but entrenched in it.

Roberto met a girl that spring. Blessed with a generally happy disposition, he was ecstatic about his new love. "She's the one. I can tell," he said, after the girl had spent the night. A pretty girl, with curly black hair cut short and dark glittering eyes. Luther could see why Roberto would be high on her. But some difficulty arose. The girl was living with her brother. They were close. She needed to spend more time with him. Roberto didn't understand. He pressed her about the matter, but the more he did, the more adamant the girl became. And so, after two weeks, Roberto and the girl were not on speaking terms. It was a mystery, or maybe it was a revelation. Luther couldn't say.

Sarah would come over after school. All his self-consciousness had fled by now, as had hers. They were lovers, accepting of each other's bodies. It seemed a great gift to Luther that he should have her in his life, and both Roddy and Roberto corroborated his sense that she was a treasure, someone truly special.

She knew by now of the speed Luther sometimes took and the prescriptions Roddy forged. She had no judgment to make, and in fact took a 15 mg Eskatrol herself on a couple of visits. The pills brought her out of herself, she said. She could talk to Roddy without fear and cited their deep conversations. But after her second experiment, she stopped. She grew tired of the synthetic happiness the capsules induced. She said she wanted herself back. And she was no more receptive to grass. “All it does is make me paranoid and hungry,” she said.

Luther wasn't unhappy that Sarah let go of the speed. It was bad enough that one of them was in dangerous territory. To see her high on the stuff was to see himself. Besides, she had a natural endowment that didn't require that sort of boost. An artist. Luther had never met such a person before, not in college or in high school or ever. Actually, there had been one, old Mrs. Kindelberger, back when he was a child. He would find her standing at her easel in room 3B6, overlooking Broadway, with paintbrush in hand dabbing at a watercolor painting, when he arrived some mornings with a plate of pancakes with lingonberries his mother had made for her. How purposeful she had looked, as if in defiance of her age or circumstance, her husband and children gone and her life reduced to that one room. She hardly did more than nod to him when he entered through the open door.

That school Sarah attended, the High School of Music and Art, on Convent Avenue, just beyond the gates of the south campus of CCNY, seemed a place of wonderment to him. It brought him happiness to see the tanned edifice with the strange gargoyles and turrets. Some quality of light and excellence emanated from the building. A school for the musically and artistically talented. Imagine that.

One afternoon, while he sat alone in the rear of the Finley cafeteria, Sarah appeared in the entranceway, accompanied by a tall boy with a high forehead and brilliant blond hair. The collision of the two worlds, the world of excellence that their school represented and the world of CCNY mediocrity, came as a brutal shock. They had come upon him in the extremity of his isolation, the desultory nature of his student life right there for them to see. Should she spot him and the two come to his table, it would all be over. She would feel his sadness, his insecurity, his dismal ordinariness, and turn in horror and revulsion toward her more vibrant and upwardly bound companion. And yet she and the boy headed to the food counter without glancing his way, affording him the opportunity to slip out the rear door with relief as immense as if he had just given the slip to a hit team.

Sarah mentioned the boy and how they would sometimes cut class and head over to the City College cafeteria. She said he was a rock climber who had scaled the dramatic cliffs up at New Paltz. The feat she related gave credence to Luther's image of the boy as strong and ready to take on the world. And yet she wasn't with that boy. She was with him. Imagine that. Just imagine that.

And she talked to him, confided in him, about the things that troubled her mind, as if he was a friend she could turn to. She spoke of Pam Becker, and of how Pam had flat-out betrayed her. She told him this. She did. She said in her freshman year at Music and Art, Pam wouldn't leave her alone. Pam was with her all the time, after school and on weekends, practically living in Sarah's family's apartment and going with them to their place upstate in the spring and calling her father not Mr. Van Dine but Van. She just could not get enough of Sarah and her family. But the next school year Pam dropped her. It was as if their friendship had never existed. In the hallways at school she would see Pam with Deborah Ault, one of the more popular girls, and feel jealous and resentful and like a social outcast at the sight of her former friend flaunting her social prowess. The two of them would pass Sarah by without so much as a glance her way. And the calls and visits that she had received so frequently completely ceased. It was lonely without Pam. She had grown to love her. Had she done or said something wrong? What had happened to bring their friendship to such a cold and brutal end? Then, when the self-questioning finally ceased, there was Pam again, in the new school year, acting as if there had been no break at all. Sarah was to trust her after such a breach of loyalty? And yet Pam overpowered her. She was so outer-directed, so connected. She pulled her along to this party and that. The alternative was solitude.

“I have to tell her I can’t see her anymore. At some point I have to. This friendship is not genuine. I am with someone I don’t know,” Sarah said.

Terminating her relationship with Pam sounded to Luther as brutal as Pam dropping her the year before. He had no frame of reference for such a thing. It was not like Tom Smits killing him and him turning around and killing Tom Smits. He had no real understanding of friendship from which to speak, and so it was better to just listen.

And he listened to her about her family, and her youngest sister, Lenore, in particular, about whom she had fear that showed itself in her raised voice and panicky tone, as if she was desperate to convey the level of distress this sister caused her. She had held this sister down, pulling down her underpants and in other ways humiliating her. But now she couldn't hold Lenore down. Lenore was beyond her control at a boarding school in Vermont, where she was a straight A student and had an Adonis of a boyfriend.

However, Lenore was not crazy about the school. She had thoughts of asking her parents if she could finish high school back in the city.

“If she moves back, I have to move out. I have to. I won't be humiliated by her socially. I won't. Do you understand what I am saying?”

“I do. I really do,” he said. A beautiful younger sister. That is the way his mind received her words. Like a drop of dye in a glass of water the mention of this sister spread through his consciousness. Lenore. More. Evermore. A door to sexual adventure opening. Not right to betray Sarah. Not right at all. And yet the fever of excitement. He did not understand. He did not want to understand. It was not his time to understand.

On the express hurtling between Ninety-sixth and Seventy-Second and then down to Times Square, Grace Slick boomed to him “Somebody to Love” and “3/5 of a Mile” and then there was Marty Ballin singing “Today.” Other times it was fat-lipped Mick Jagger snarling “Under My Thumb” or Bob Dylan being wise beyond his years on “Ramona.” He never knew who, from the musical bonanza of that time, would be making a guest appearance in his head. On still other days the hymns of his childhood would play in his ears, brought on by the rhythmic motion of the train, “Blessed Assurance” and “In the Garden” and “Bringing in the Sheaves” and “Rescue the Perishing” and on and on, and his eyes would fill with tears as his mind took him back to his mother and the church and the time of togetherness.

Penn Station, less than a one-minute ride from Times Square, was thick with rush hour commuters as he passed through the arcade to the Eighth Avenue exit. Over the loudspeaker came departure announcements for Long Island Railroad trains bound for West Babylon, Oyster Bay, Massapequa, Quogue, Huntington, Hempstead, Mineola, Freeport, Bayshore, Great Neck, a roll call of names that summoned, for some reason, open sky and the smell of fish, and served as a reminder that the thin island appendage to the city, was mostly, for him, unexplored territory, a place for the Dashing Dans, those trench-coated men toting attaché cases depicted streaking for their trains after a busy day at the office in the railroad's advertisements. Neither the railroad nor the island held any special allure, certainly none of the mystery or longing that flooded his being at the sight of those behemoth burgundy diesels with overhead pantographs of the Pennsylvania Railroad, or the similarly colored coach cars they pulled, that Luke and he would race from the arcade to see, diverted from their Sunday trek to the tabernacle by the romance of the rails. The station, with its announcements of arrivals and departures, and its brightly lit shops and its sweet smell of roasting caramel, was a reminder of the world beyond the stuffy confines of the tabernacle's walls, a world of people in transit under a dome of elegant wrought iron and glass and a concourse of heavy masonry.

He stopped at the Horn and Hardart on the corner of Eighth Avenue and Thirty-Third Street. The cashier took his two one-dollar bills and down a metal chute poured quarters and nickels and dimes into a marble tray, which he took to the banks of small, windowed compartments where sandwiches and side dishes and desserts were displayed. In the slots to the side of the compartments he deposited coins for a green oval dish of macaroni and a small brown pot of baked beans and a cup of coffee, then took a table for two at the rear of the automat, in a section set two steps above the main area. He twirled the condiments tray, suspended on a spindle, bypassing the crusted mustard pot and the slimy oil and vinegar holders for the ketchup dispenser. How good it felt to eat the food of his childhood, the macaroni and the baked beans flooded with ketchup, just the way he liked it.

“Let us go for some normal food,” he could hear his mother say, when the Sunday afternoon service was over, and together he and Luke and Vera would walk with her down the long, inclined street to the Horn and Hardart. Normal food. She could talk that way. Nothing fancy schmantzy but food that was real. If they wanted an extra piece of pie or a second glass of iced tea, she would give it to them. She could never say no, and not on a late Sunday afternoon, not when she had been so filled up on the Lord, summoned by the spirit moving within her to stand during the service and cry out to the Lord in those unintelligible words that flowed from her mouth, words that transported her beyond time and space into the reality of the Holy Ghost—the experience of the Holy Ghost. If once she had been lost, she was now found. How long did the spell last? Was it two minutes? Three? To Luther it had seemed an eternity, and that God, or whomever, had absconded with his mother and might never return her to him. But always she did come back. Spent and slumped on the bench, she would softly weep, just weep and weep, a commingling of sorrow and joy and gratitude. She lived the week for such moments. The service was her time of renewal, her fuel. Gone were the cares of the week, the grinding anxiety that Simon Weill, the building owner, would take the management of the property away from them, or that some calamity might befall the building, like a raging fire, or that her sister, Auntie Eve, would pass away, and leave her all alone to deal with Mr. Weill and the tenants. Gone too were her concerns for her children, dark and moody Hannah and Naomi, lost to all the drugs those psychiatrists gave her, and Rachel, so angry and crazy. And her concerns and even anguish about Luther's father, who was not always there and not to be counted on when he was, owing to the condition he had. "My only prayer is that we will all be in Heaven together some day," his mother would say, perhaps in recognition that they were not so together here on earth. And was the weeping that she did there in the tabernacle not preferable to the other kind of weeping he had seen her succumb to, when there had been some new disappointment or horror? "What have I done that I should deserve children such as these who treat me as if I am no better than dirt beneath their shoes?" This too she had also said, through her tears, words not at all unintelligible but entirely clear, unlike those uttered in the tabernacle.

His mother's tears. His life had been about them in some way.

It was Friday. Sarah was away for the weekend. Her father wanted her at Camp. He wanted her closer than she had been. And it was payday for Luther. A check, written on stiff, thick paper and tinted a light green, had come in the mail. Do not fold, spindle, or mutilate—those words printed on the check. That word spindle, used as a verb, had sent him to the dictionary. Do not impale on the spike of a spindle. The check's value voided if he did. How little he knew. Someday he would know more, have the armor of knowledge around him as protection from harm.

He paused outside the entrance ramp to the post office, held there by the soft spring air, and stared up at the big rosette window of the church across the street. He still had some time before his shift was to begin and so he crossed over and entered through the side door of varnished wood. There was an identical entrance at the other end of the church, and in between a wide set of stairs leading up to the main floor to the church proper. He climbed the narrow, twisting stairs to the next level, bending as he went. The main floor he had climbed above, with its wainscoted walls, was where the Sunday school services were held, and where the restrooms could be found, the sense memory of the strong, ammoniac smell of the small cakes in the urinal coming to him. He peered through a porthole window in one of the swinging doors and saw a scattering of congregants standing in the pews. The men were plainly dressed, in shirt sleeves only. Even with a limited view, he could see that they were predominantly Asian.

“Luther, is that you?” A tall, stoop-shouldered man, had emerged. Luther recognized the man from his mother’s building. His name was Melvin. The immediate aversion he had felt grew stronger as the man, gaunt and pale, approached. “Are you here for the Friday hour of worship?” Luther heard it in his soft, hesitant voice and felt it in his timid manner. His blanched, scrubbed, wholesome face and neutered stance were everything that made godliness off-putting.

“No. I just stopped by the old place.”

“That is good, Luther. That means you still have a feeling in your heart for the Lord. The Lord is very good to me. He walks with me and he talks with me, and he tells me I am his own, just like the hymn says.”

“Of course.” Despite his annoyance at Melvin’s religious zeal, Luther couldn’t help but feel kindly disposed toward the man. Unlike Mr. Fitzpatrick, Melvin wasn’t attacking him. A purity born of desperation drove him, some recognition that without the church, all that awaited him was his lonely room. For whatever reason, Melvin hadn’t been born for this world.

“The Lord calls to us, Luther. Are you listening for the Lord?”

“In my way, I do,” Luther said.

“That is good, Luther. That is so good. It gives my heart such joy to hear. You will come back, Luther. The strays always come back. Your mother knew what she was doing raising you in the Lord. And when you return, I will be waiting.”

Luther was not prepared to say that the prospect of well-meaning Melvin waiting for him was less than appealing. He thanked him for their talk and went on his way.

That evening, while sitting on his stool and sorting the mail into the small boxes in front of him, Luther was visited by Efram Ellsberg.

“I’m going to kick his ass. That is exactly what I am going to do.”

“You’re going to kick whose ass?” Luther asked, looking around and seeing no one worthy of such treatment.

“Ruggiero’s ass. That’s who.”

“Why would you want to do that?”

Carmen Ruggiero was the floor supervisor, a squat middle-aged man with bulging eyes in a big, meaty face, like the actor Ernest Borgnine.

“He’s on my case all the time. That’s why. Says I am not working to capacity and that the breaks I take are too long.”

“Well, don’t kick his ass. You could get in trouble.”

“I’m kicking his ass.”

Though Efram was jumbo-sized, Luther couldn’t imagine him following through. The tough-guy talk sounded embarrassingly out of character for someone so pacific. And yet the lapse, if it was a lapse, was also illuminating. In Joseph Heller’s Catch-22, Luther had read of a character described as possessing all intelligence and no brains. Certainly Efram had brains, but just as certainly they were taking a back seat to his emotions. Suddenly Luther found himself looking at Efram differently. In his denim overalls, Efram now appeared to Luther not as an prophet of old or as a Whitmanesque bard but as an oversize baby. He saw an element of infantilism in his friend, and sensed Efram had assumed a reflexive posture of defiance toward his rabbi father that he was now transferring to another authority figure. Such was the picture that came to Luther.

His shift over, he found himself restless and unable to bear the thought of returning directly to the confining Upper West Side, where Columbia reigned supreme, or suffer shackling inhibition through association with his family’s building. And so, down the steps of the subway he bounded at the corner of Eighth Avenue, where he caught the A train and headed for Greenwich Village.

At Waverly Place he surfaced, bypassing the bright lights of MacDougal Street for the quieter stretch along Sullivan. He had in mind Café Figaro or Rienzi’s but stopped outside a small bar called Gosees.

The soft amber glow having called him inside, he ordered a beer and stood back against the wall away from the traffic. Jesus, the beer tasted good, so light and yet creamy. Two quaffs and nothing remained in the stein but suds. He ordered a second and lit a Marlboro to slow himself down.

He stood to the side of the jukebox, attentive to the music. “I’ve Been Lonely Too Long,” a song that made him feel good all over. And then that crazy song, “Hot Town, Summer in the City,” but he survived it. And then “Working My Way Back to You.” It didn’t move him the way the best of the Four Seasons did, like Frankie Valli singing “Dawn” or “Rag Doll.” Too much effort. Too much heavy lifting, and for what? But then it was the power sound of the Supremes with “My World Is Empty Without You.” No “Ruby Tuesday,” as at the West End Bar. Minute after minute of Mick Jagger smelling up the place with that slow, mournful tune. And yet something passé about the Four Seasons and even the Supremes. Relics from his high school years. The bar itself, with sawdust sprinkled on the floor, and the fake-Tiffany lamps, something from the past. Not quite the kind of bar to play the Stones, when what was better than December’s Children, an album of Roberto’s that he played over and over, especially “Under My Thumb”? And could anyone beat the Beatles on Rubber Soul and everything they did or Dylan or the Beach Boys with Pet Sounds, which wrapped him in its warmth and took him to a special place of longing and sorrow?

No matter. He was home. Nobody there to call him the landlady’s son. No oppressive shadow of Columbia University to confer on him inferior status and fuel the endlessly punishing thoughts about his intelligence. He was free. He was home. He wanted to stay for a long, long time.

The following Friday he called to Sarah to meet him at this boozy oasis he had found. He took a table at the rear with a direct view of the front door and experienced a jolt of terror when several young men clustered at the bar turned and called to her as she entered and walked past them in tight jeans and a suede jacket. Strong, good-looking young men, the kind who could easily win a girl, any girl, to them. And yet Sarah hadn't smiled. She hadn't given them any notice. That didn't mean she wouldn't, not under the right circumstances. She had already told him what she was capable of in the sexual realm.

"Burn me," he said on that night. "Go ahead. Hold it under the palm of my hand." He pushed the small, lit candle toward her.

"No," she said.

"I know you want to."

"Stop it," she said.

"Just for me."

"I said no. I don't like this kind of talk. And I don't like this place."

"Someday you'll do it. You'll see." He felt rebuffed. All he had been asking for was a little pain. She could give him that, couldn't she, the way all girls, all people, gave it to each other? Was that asking so much? And yet he was relieved that she hadn't complied. The pain would come, he told himself. He had no need for an advance on it.

“That’s him. That’s him. That’s my baby boy. Can you believe it?” Luke nudged Luther and pointed to a bundled infant in the front row. He tapped the glass window, on the other side of which the baby lay, not easily distinguishable from the twenty or so others laid out in the hospital’s maternity ward. But the baby appeared to have other things on his mind than instant recognition of his poppa. How old the baby looked. How old they all looked.

“Such a beautiful little baby boy. And Maureen will be such a good wife and mother. I have a good feeling about her. She is a down to earth and sensible girl,” Mrs. Garatdjian said the following week, when Luther came to visit.

“But that’s it. She’s just a girl. She didn’t even finish high school,” Luther said.

“She is mature for her age. She is not one of those foolish, silly ones,” his mother said.

The front door opened and a chubby, sullen-faced girl in a navy blue jumper with a yellow and green crest entered.

“Well, hello, Jeanne.”

“Hi, Grandma. Hi, Uncle Luther.”

Her voice had a mournful quality.

“Come sit with us and have a bun,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“I want to go to my room. I’m not feeling too well,” Jeanne said.

“But what is it, Jeanne? Are you coming down with something?”

“I just need to lie down.”

“You are not running a fever, are you? Come and let me feel your forehead.”

“No, Grandma. I am not running a fever.”

“Come and let me see.”

Jeanne obliged, and Luther’s mother felt her forehead and her cheeks. “No, I don’t think we need to take your temperature. Is there something you ate that did not agree with you?”

“I just need to take a nap.”

“You do that, Jeanne. We will keep our voices low and I will wake you for supper. We are having lamb chops, your very favorite.”

“Thank you, Grandma.”

Jeanne entered the narrow little room off the living room and closed the door. Luther wondered, not for the first time, about the equanimity of his mother, her ability to tolerate chaos, when everything about the family disturbed him, including the shabby apartment. The same box spring with a spread thrown over it served as a sofa as when he had been a child and there remained the unsightly dark blotches behind the sofa caused by people using the wall as a headrest. The clutter. The dirt. The roaches. It was too much.

“She does not have it easy, the poor girl,” his mother whispered. “You must be nice to her. She needs a lot of love and support.”

He remembered staring down at his newborn niece in her baby blanket on that same sofa the day Naomi brought her home from the hospital and badgered him to make a fuss over her. He was seven at the time. But there was no fuss to be made. There was just horror. He saw the infant as simply additional chaos in their lives and, as she grew older, a surly annoyance. First he had had to deal with her mother. Now he would have to deal with her mother's offspring?

"I try," he said.

Some minutes later, as he descended the stairs to the lobby, he saw Naomi at the window of the renting office. "I will need thirty dollars. My mother said I could have it," she said to the woman behind the grille. Luther moved past without acknowledging her. Only Mr. Fitzpatrick, in that filthy oversize denim jacket remained between him and the street.

"A few good men, Luther. A few good men," he called out.

Luther spun and faced him but said nothing.

"We're praying for you, Luther. We're praying for you," Mr. Fitzpatrick said, showing a face of good cheer from which Luther fled.

"His name is Hegel," Roberto said, of the longhaired gray cat he had taken in.

"You call your cat Hegel?" Roddy stroked the cat's fur tentatively.

"Thesis, antithesis, synthesis. The dialectical principle at work," Roberto said.

"And how exactly does this dialectical principle work in a cat's life?" Roddy asked.

"Hegel sees me place a bowl of milk on the floor. Hegel thinks, 'My master is offering me something nourishing because my master loves me.' Then comes the antithesis. 'My master is trying to poison me. My master is no good.' Then we come to the third stage, synthesis. Hegel says, 'If I cannot know with any certainty that my master means me well or harm, is there a midpoint between faith and fear that will allow me to determine whether the milk is a nourishment or a poison? And so synthesis comes to equal experiment. Hegel will sample the milk, having weighed the alternatives of faith and fear. At either extreme the consequence could be death, but at the midpoint it is reasonable to assume that a mere tad of the milk on his tongue will result only in mild suffering if in fact the milk is poisoned.”

“Very good,” Roddy said, as if he were speaking to a child.

The smile on Roberto’s face said he was only too pleased with his explanation,

Roberto amplified on his studies in symbolic logic.

“You see, I am inventing a whole new language of figures that will displace the everyday language of words. The day will come when we speak only in numbers.”

“But there is more to life than numbers, isn’t there?” Luther asked.

“The problem is you don’t have enough numbers in your life so you can’t know what you’re missing,” Roberto replied.

“I don’t have enough numbers?”

“That’s right,” Roberto said. “You have to get with the numbers or you will be lost. It’s all about quantification.”

“If I had the money, I would see a therapist,” Luther said, somewhat off the subject.

“Why would you do that?”

“Because maybe a trained listener could help, and I don’t see how numbers can replace thoughts and feelings,” Luther said.

“No, but they can represent them,” Roberto replied, with a wave of dismissal.

Undeterred, Luther did seek out someone within a couple of weeks at a mental health clinic across from the Museum of Natural History. He told Dr. Bruqualini of his defeat when he tried to move out of Luke’s penthouse suite toward the end of his first year in college.

You weren’t ready. That’s all it was. Don’t read anything more into it than that.”

“But now I’m thinking that I need a place of my own. I’m not sure I want to live with roommates, or at least the roommates that I have,” Luther said.

“Wait before trying again. That would be my advice. It will happen. Just give it time.”

Dr. Bruqualini’s rate was only ten dollars an hour. He could help Luther, Dr. Bruqualini said. But Dr. Bruqualini was a thin man with a reedy neck and meekness showing in his face. The suits he wore were not good suits, and the degree he had was not from a medical college but from a school of social work, which meant that he could not do science, and that meant he was like Luther, poor in his mind as well as his body. As for his name, it was a jumble of syllables that went on beyond the point of reason and order. And so, though Dr. Bruqualini had helped him, he didn’t stay beyond three sessions, because his doubts about Dr. Bruqualini grew and grew, a torment as much as being alone in that studio apartment the year before had been a torment.

“Someday you will be able to be where your feet are. You just haven’t reached that place as yet,” Dr. Bruqualini said.

They were good words, words worth pondering even if Luther didn't quite know what Dr. Bruqualini meant. But Luther had savaged Dr. Bruqualini in his thoughts, had given him a worse beating than the men of violence administer to each other. He had left Dr. Bruqualini bleeding from many places on the floor, and a few words were not enough to undo the damage.

Sarah felt safe and understood with Roddy, but Roberto made her uneasy. She said he had wildfires burning in his eyes that his amiable manner and congenial smile could not hide.

Luther had his own fire burning, dreaming on consecutive nights of a blaze engulfing a barn somewhere upstate and of men with bloodhounds and flashlights pursuing him as he ran frantically through a forest. The dreams filled him with wonder and excitement, seeming to herald a new and exciting chapter in his life, and he marveled that in sleep he could go where his feet could take him in daylight hours. Was the sun pouring through his window in a blaze of morning glory the cause of his joy or was it Sarah, or were they one and the same? Oh, it did not matter. Life had become good, so good.

One weekend morning Luther and Sarah set out for Camp. The idea had been Sarah's. Pam Becker came along, too, Sarah being unable as yet to shake free of her. Why not invite Roddy as well, Luther said to Sarah. Sure. Roddy would be fine, she said. She would like to have him along, she said. But it was agreed that they would not invite Roberto, even though the exclusion weighed on Luther. It did seem a wrong and hurtful thing to go away for a weekend with one roommate and not the other, especially as Roberto was supposed to be a friend. But they had taken to laughing at Roberto for the strangeness of his mind. Luther could not talk with Roddy about Schopenhauer or Wittgenstein or any of the other great thinkers of Western civilization beyond cogito ergo sum and bird, thou never wert, which even though it was but a stray line from a Shelley poem he had some idea might be applicable, but he could talk with him about Roberto and together he and Roddy could put their laughing thing on Roberto. All that weekend Luther was pained by his mistake and tried to make right in his mind the wrong he had done. People have died for less, he heard himself say to the air.

Sarah said they had no need of a bus or train. They need only go to an entrance to the West Side Highway, where she would hold out her thumb to flag a ride. She said it worked every time.

“Your parents let you hitchhike? It could be incredibly dangerous,” Luther said.

“Dangerous for who?” Sarah challenged.

“Dangerous for you.”

“Dangerous for them, you mean.”

“How is that?”

“If they try something, I just punch them in their balls and jump out,” Sarah said.

“That’s crazy,” Luther said, in that moment grasping that her dwelling place was the realm of the innocent lacking all understanding of what terror the men of violence could summon.

“I know about cars in a way that you will never know about cars,” she said.

“Why do you say that?”

“My father is a car man. Do you understand?”

“Sort of.”

She was right about her allure. She and Pam stood at the Ninety-sixth Street entrance to the Henry Hudson Parkway for less than a minute before a Volkswagen van pulled over. The driver was a good sport about taking on Luther and Roddy as well, who had sprung from their hiding place behind a bush.

“Don’ be insulted, but you boys would be out here a long time without these girls,” the driver said. “You hold on to them. They’re your ticket to the good life.” He whisked them over the George Washington Bridge and onto the manicured Palisades Parkway all the way to the first rest stop on Interstate 87. But their progress was slower thereafter. They needed another two rides to reach the Kingston exit and another two before they got to Woodstock.

Pam frightened Luther. “Whatever image of yourself you are trying to sell to Sarah Van Dine, remember that I know who you really are and where you come from, having been inside your family’s squalid apartment. Who you really are is the boy who struck out with me when you were in eleventh grade.” So he imagined her thinking. It was there in the way she looked at him. Back in the eleventh grade he had gone with her to see Wuthering Heights. The book he had not read and the film he had a hard time grasping. There were things he remembered and would always remember, like placing his arm around her during the movie only to find that self-consciousness prevented him from removing it. And those white sweat socks he wore with his charcoal gray school uniform pants to make his legs look thicker and the kiss he gave her to which she did not respond and during which she kept her eyes wide open, as if to say, “What exactly do you think you are doing?” But the debacle that followed was what most stayed in his mind. To give the impression of a bigger life than he had, he told her he would be meeting some friends at a party uptown. There were no friends and there was no party to which he had an invitation, only the noisy affair at one of the string of Columbia frat houses on One Hundred Fourteenth Street, between Broadway and Amsterdam, where he drank indiscriminately from the bottles on the kitchen counter and bragged to an older girl about the great college he would attend on a basketball scholarship. That night struggling to place his foot on the floor to stop his bed from spinning like that whip ride at Coney Island. Daylight found him covered in his own vomit. The alarm had gone off but he had slept through it, and so had missed the PSAT his junior classmates would be taking at the school that morning. He saw right away that his drunkenness the night before had been driven by fear of the exam and all the deficiencies in him it would expose.

Pam Becker had been a part of all of that, his weekend of failure heralding a life of failure.

“What a great day. Pam said, as they sat in the Bear Café, sunk several feet below Tinker Street, the main drag. Woodstock was a pretty town: the big white Dutch reformed church with a tall spire overlooking the greensward and the traffic circle and the small bridge nearby spanning a little brook and the tiny shops.

“Hyperbole appeals to you,” Roddy said.

“That’s not fair. It is a wonderful day.”

Pam's disposition was as sunny as her silky blond hair. What Roddy wanted to ridicule as an affectation was only her nature, even if it covered some sadness she couldn't admit to.

"Are you someone who says every day is wonderful?"

"Suppose I am? Isn't every day wonderful if I say so and truly think so?"

"Is Norman Vincent Peale on your high school's reading list?"

"No, he isn't, but it's OK to be positive and hopeful. Not everyone has to be dark and gloomy. What do you read all day?" Pam was beginning to look like things weren't so very wonderful. In fact, she was looking close to tears.

"I start my morning off with Schopenhauer."

"Who?"

"You've never heard of Schopenhauer?"

"No. That's why I'm asking."

"Every possession and happiness is but lent to us."

"That's Schopenhauer? I don't have to read him to know that. I can find that in Ecclesiastes. 'For every thing there is a season...'"

"There you go. Ecclesiastes gives you everything you need," Roddy said, using his age and his bigger mind to toy with Pam.

Schopenhauer. Another German with a cliff-like forehead signaling a giant brain. Available in Penguin paperback with a black cover and printed on that fine paper Luther associated with England. Another book to read and then give shelf space to.

“That’s him,” Sarah said, with a start, hearing the car horn outside. They had arrived at the café at dusk, tired and hungry. The last stretch, along less traveled two-lane country roads, would make for really difficult hitchhiking. And so she had called for help.

“Van, I am so happy to see you,” Pam gushed. “Is your book coming out soon? When will I be able to read it? You’re going to be famous. Famous.” Pam’s father was a writer too. So Luke had told Luther. He was trying to finish a novel while supporting the family as a waiter at some four-star restaurant in midtown Manhattan. A man who earned his daily bread bringing food and drink to the table of strangers.

“Publication will be in mid-June,” Peter said. “And I hardly believe a book about some small aspect of Catskill Mountain history will bring me fame.”

“Well, you’ll be famous to Sarah and to me, won’t he, Sarah?” Pam went on.

Sarah’s silence was loud in Luther’s ears if no one else’s, as was her father’s, once he got behind the wheel. The black Chrysler station wagon was the length of a hearse, with white-wall tires and sweeping fins. The contagion of silence spread, even to Pam, as the car gained speed on leaving the town limits. There followed other and smaller towns, little more than a post office and general store. Shady, Mount Tremper, Bearsville. High beam, low beam, back and forth Peter clicked the lights to accommodate approaching cars, the telephone wires strung from poles like silver strands in the dark. How determined and vigilant Peter looked, as if he were piloting not a vehicle but a plane with a panel of complex controls. The road followed the curve of the Esopus River and led them to the town of Phoenicia, bigger, more substantial, the bluestone sidewalks lined with tall trees and shops and lighted by lamps.

He had been to this town, with the Greek name, in the long ago. A fever of wildness threatened to consume him at this reconnection with his personal history, as if that was all he had.

Beyond the town the Chrysler came to a straightaway, where the bracing smell of tar lingered amid the traffic cones and idle Caterpillars and steamrollers and other roadwork equipment abandoned for the night. Minutes later the car crunched gravel as it entered a turnoff and onto a rutted dirt road deep into a hollow, barely slowing to pass between two flagstone columns marking the entrance to the property. The timbers of the small wood bridge rumbled as the car rolled over it, circling a wide expanse of shimmering green lawn lit by a spotlight high on the trunk of a tall pine tree.

Luther stood on the lawn that night, surveying the property: the old wooden house with cardinal red trim around the windows and the trellised flagstone terrace; the barn converted into a garage; a shed with a stable for horses; a second barn that had been converted to a guest house with mullioned windows; a solarium overlooking a pool filled with cool mountain water. Halfway up the mountain, so he was told, was a lean-to where the family slept on warm summer nights.

He had arrived at the highpoint of his life. A riot of feeling he could not articulate held him in its grip. Just as in Phoenicia, his past, his present, his future converging. It would take time to assimilate. Time.

“It’s OK. My parents are not that way,” Sarah said, that night, as she asked him to help her remove the night table between the two beds and push them together. The red room, she called her bedroom, as opposed to the adjacent blue room, reserved for her parents. And it was a red room, with a throw rug and bedspreads in that color.

“You’re sure?”

“You have no idea what used to take place here at Camp,” she replied.

He woke to the chirping of birds and the sun streaming in through the screened window and sat that morning on the front porch, drinking instant coffee from a blue tin mug. A sight more compelling than the sculpted beauty of the estate was of Peter high up on a ladder twenty yards away applying a coat of brown paint to the barn where the Chrysler was housed. The paint shone satisfyingly fresh. It was good to take care of things, to retard if not prevent their perishing. The day was warm, and apart from an old pair of tennis shoes, the only item of apparel on his body was a pair of black bikini briefs with a white elastic band. The stretched, sagging fabric suggested the size of his endowment.

“If you and Roddy and Pam weren’t here, he would be up on that ladder in only his tennis shoes.” Sarah had joined him on the porch.

“Why do you say that?”

“My father is vain and has a cock like you wouldn’t believe.”

“How so?”

“It’s huge. I used to make fun of him. My sisters would wet their pants laughing,” she said. With her knees bent and her feet obliquely pointed and her joined hands between her legs, she walked as if she were struggling to hold an impossibly heavy object and keep it from dragging on the ground.

“That must have been strange, growing up with your father parading around naked.”

“He has a mystical relationship to this property. He can be himself in a way that he can’t be in the other world, where he feels injured and unaccepted.”

“Injured and unaccepted how?”

“A man of his kind can only be tormented by society,” Sarah said.

“But what is his kind?”

“Refined. Artistic. Aesthetic.”

“He can’t be too tormented if he is publishing a book. That’s an amazing thing.”

“Mommy is proud of him but also disappointed. She wanted him to be out in the world. She thought he would enter politics or teach or do something more than retreat to his study.”

“But to make a living as a writer. People would give anything for that.”

“He’s never made a living as a writer. He’s never made a living at all.”

“How has he lived?”

“Mommy received a large inheritance. My grandfather made a fortune in the real estate business and the money got passed down.”

“That sounds pretty good to me.”

“And to Daddy. It allowed him to stay out of the work world. It’s also allowed him to make his family his bed.”

His bed. The image was striking.

Despite the warm sun, the water in the pool was ice cold, drawn as it was from the mountain stream, and so Luther was spared unwanted exposure. Sarah drove them in the jeep to the lean-to. Like her father, she took on a look of fixed intensity behind the wheel as she slipped the vehicle into low low for the final steep ascent on the rutted dirt road. Along the way, a startled deer sprang gracefully away through the woodland and a pheasant made a shocking racket when it broke into flight overhead.

A thick mattress covered the interior of the lean-to. In a corner were rolled up sleeping bags and on a small shelf a portable stereo system and several flashlights. There was a screen, divided into three sections, to keep out the mosquitoes on summer nights. The roof sloped upward, as if rising to meet the sun overhead, and a small window on either side of the west-facing lean-to had been built to let in light. On the stone terrace that wrapped around the lean-to stood a barbecue pit.

Far below, the hollow road broke the endless vista of mountain greenery, appearing as a thin, uneven part in the scalp of the earth leading to a wider clearing and the Van Dine complex. The mountain provided perspective. From below the estate had appeared vast; from above, like a miniature replica.

Though Sarah's mother, Lydia wasn't there, Sarah made her present. Her mother had grown up on the property, in that very same house. It was a cold house, even in summer, with pockets of great loneliness. There was also the drama of her parents' demise. Lydia's dowager grandmother was not averse to exercising power and banned Lydia's father from the estate. He was of the wrong kind. He had south of the border blood. So she said from her throne of judgment. Lydia's father loved both Lydia and her mother with a love beyond reckoning and howled on the hollow road for his wife and daughter to leave that house that would not have him. But Lydia's grandmother held the power of the purse. Did Lydia's mother want to subsist on wild berries for her and her daughter? The grandmother could see it in Lydia's father's eyes that he was not constituted to provide. Believing her mother was willing to cut off both her and her child, Lydia's mother had no choice but to surrender. And so, in a final cry of protest, Lydia's father took his life on that very road, in fact, at the entrance to the estate, pulling the trigger on a pistol whose barrel filled his mouth. And within a year, as she lay in a Kingston hospital strapped to an iron lung, Lydia's mother succumbed to his pull and joined him in the earth below. And so Lydia was left in the care of her grandmother and her alcoholic uncle, Ned. At age fourteen, she was sent to Miss Porter's, a boarding school in Connecticut, where she flourished, and won admission to Radcliffe College. In Cambridge she met Peter, who had come to Harvard for graduate school on the GI Bill, having served as a bombardier in a B-52 squadron over Germany. His origins were more humble than her own, his father a plumber descended from yeoman Dutch farmers in southern New Jersey. Lydia would throw pebbles up at the second floor window of the room he rented in a yellow house near the college, calling her Adonis down to her, as she could not stay away. If not for Peter, Lydia would never have returned to her childhood home after her grandmother's death. He helped her to purge the house of the painful memories. They made improvements, including a modern bath and kitchen.

They had a life, an American life. Even with pain and death, the sun had shone on their family. So Luther heard, even if Sarah meant something different. But Lydia's Latin grandfather, with the pistol in his mouth because he had been exiled from the gates of Eden. That is what he heard the most, heard it with a howling pain of his own.

The wainscoted walls in the living room gave it a rustic beauty and warmth. On the sturdy oak table stood a lamp whose trunk had originally served as a printing roller for wallpaper. Sharp molded metal still attached to the roller. There were three sofas, at right angles to each other, the central one facing the fireplace. On the walls flanking the fireplace were bookcases with old, cloth-bound books by forgotten authors, while the shelves against the front wall were thick with more current books on flora and fauna and horticulture. Throw rugs gave the room added warmth.

I have seen this room before, Luther thought. I have seen it on the cover of the Signet paperback edition of Edith Wharton's Hudson River Bracketed.

Set into two of the walls were double windows, providing ample light. And there was a second door with small glass panes leading to the porch. To the right of this side door, if you were to face it from the inside, as Luther now did, was a gun rack. And beyond the gun rack was a closet, in which fishing rods and gear and winter coats and boots were kept. But the gun rack is what interested Luther. It held a single-shot .22 rifle; a .30-.30 rifle; a single barrel shotgun with a breech.

He did a bad thing. Because it was there and his mind took him prisoner, he lifted the .22 from the rack and held it with both hands, feeling its heft, then ran his hand over the long thin barrel and placed his index finger against the small bore. How smooth and beautiful the varnished wood of the stock. In the deep drawer of the nearby hutch were boxes of thick shotgun shells in green plastic casings and .30-30 shells in their metal casings. He reached past them for a handful of the smaller .22 shells and went out on the terrace, where he loaded one in the rifle's chamber.

When a chipmunk appeared on the terrace, he squeezed the trigger. The loud crack of the rifle followed and the creature scurried for cover. He reloaded and fired at a sparrow on the wing, missing the bird as well.

Several more times the rifle made its short report before Luther saw, in the distance, Peter climb down from the ladder and walk slowly up the driveway toward him, his bronzed body and heavy endowment still on display.

"What exactly were you firing at with that rifle?" Peter asked. Like William Holden he looked, with that weathered face.

"Just a little target practice."

"And who or what were your targets?"

"I saw some birds. A chipmunk."

"We don't do that here. We don't kill things for no reason on this property." Peter turned and walked back toward his ladder, having no seeming need to await Luther's reply.

We don't do that here. Some kind of moral instruction Peter had given him, the kind he had heard before, from that boy, Gresham Dodger, in his seventh grade class who had shouted at him, "We don't do that here. We don't do that here," after Luther had punched a classmate in his ugly face for something he had said. Gresham Dodger establishing his excellence and higher understanding as Peter Van Dine now was doing.

Peter had a dinner engagement with friends in Woodstock that night. Sarah drove Roddy and Pam to the bottom of the road in the jeep, where they caught the Pine Hill Trailways bus. Then she and Luther drove up Route 28 away from Phoenicia to the town of Margaretville. The marquee of the Galli Curci Theater was a blaze of light on the otherwise dark and deserted street. Showing was a Japanese film, Woman in the Dunes, which neither Sarah nor Luther had heard of.

A young amateur entomologist went off on holiday to a small island. Seeing he needed shelter, some locals encouraged him to stay with a woman whose house was situated in a dune, as was common on the island. A ladder was required for him to climb down and reach the house. And yet, in the morning, when he tried to leave, he discovered that the ladder had been removed. He called up for help. While the villagers did not put the laughing thing on him, neither did they come to his aid, and his attempts to climb the wall were futile, as the sand gave way under his weight. The young man was as trapped as the insects he brought into captivity. His subsequent efforts at escape all similarly ending in failure, the young man slowly began to open to and explore his new environment. His hostility toward the woman, a widow, eased and he drew closer to her.

A foreign film with subtitles wasn't the kind either of them expected to find in the small movie theater of a Catskill Mountain town. And the theme. A man who discovered freedom in a domestic prison. What a strange thing and disturbing thing, Luther thought. A film that stunned, like Umbrellas of Cherbourg had stunned.

"Is he angry with me about the rifle? Is that why he avoids me?" Luther asked the next morning. "I mean, since his warning, he hasn't said two words to me."

“You were telling him something by firing the rifle.”

“Telling him what?”

“You were telling him you weren’t under his control.”

“I was?”

“Of course you were. And he was telling you something in speaking to you as he did.”

“What was he telling me?”

“That you were under his control. That we all are.”

“Do you believe that?”

“I didn’t say I believed it. I only said that he believes it.”

Luther looked down toward the barn. Again Peter was up on a ladder with his paintbrush. Gone were his brown briefs. Red was his color for this new day.

“He looks good in red,” Luther said.

“Daddy thinks he looks good in everything,” Sarah replied.

His first night home, someone’s weight on the end of the bed caused him to wake up.

“Who is it?” he asked, sitting up in fear and turning on the lamp.

“Hello, Gargoyle. Do you mind if I call you Gargoyle? Because you are a gargoyle. You know that, don’t you, that you’re an ugly, ugly gargoyle?”

“What’s wrong, Roberto?”

“Did I say anything is wrong?”

“If nothing is wrong, then why have you woken me?”

“Since when do gargoyles sleep, Gargoyle?”

“I don’t like that name.”

“You don’t like being called who you are?”

“No. And I find this creepy, you coming in here this way.”

“So now who’s calling who names?”

“I didn’t call you a name.”

“You didn’t just call me creepy, Gargoyle?”

“No. I didn’t. And you must know I didn’t.”

“I don’t know anything when it comes to you, only that you are a gargoyle.”

“Look, has something upset you? Could you tell me?”

“Did I say anything has upset me, Gargoyle? Did I?” The fake smile, the kind that does a poor job of hiding the rage just to the other side, was now gone.

“Not directly.”

“Not directly. I love the way you speak. Look at me, Gargoyle. Look at me. I am a man, a beautiful man. And you are not a man. You are just an ugly, ugly gargoyle. Try to remember that, Gargoyle.”

Roberto went away, but without the assurance that he wouldn’t come back, Luther lay in bed with the light still on.

In the morning Luther found Roberto sitting cross-legged on the living room floor. In front of him lay the cat on its side, unmoving, on a spread out section of the New York Times. Some of its insides had oozed onto the newspaper.

“What happened?” Luther asked.

“You tell me.”

“Tell you what?”

“Tell me why you pushed the cat off the fire escape so it fell onto the spiked fence below.”

“Why would I push your cat, or anyone’s cat, off a fire escape?”

“I guess that’s for you to know. Unless you put your friend up to it.”

“My friend?”

“That guy in there,” he said, motioning to the front room, where Roddy was still sleeping behind the closed French doors.

“When did it happen?”

“The day you guys disappeared. Quite a coincidence.”

“What kind of coincidence would that be? If we weren’t here, how could we do such a thing?”

“Maybe you did it before you left as a weekend gift to me?”

“That’s not true, so stop it.”

“I should stop telling the truth because you say it isn’t the truth? What kind of symbolic logic is that?”

“Was the cat still alive when you found it?” Luther asked, seeking to get beyond the question of truth.

“Didn’t you want it to be alive? Didn’t you want it to die slowly?”

“Did you take it to the vet, Roberto?”

“The vet?” Roberto gave a derisive chuckle.

“Yes, the vet. That’s what people do when they have a sick or injured pet.”

“What vet? I am the vet.”

“Great. You’re the vet. What do you plan to do, allow the cat to decompose right here in the living room?”

“I just wanted you to see your work, Gargoyle. That’s all.”

In the next few days, with the cat disposed of, Roberto seemed to become more reasonable. He did not address Luther as Gargoyle again, though the name had bothered him as much as the accusation that he or Roddy had caused harm to the cat. He had tried to shoot cute little chipmunks and sparrows and indulged in reckless gunplay. Was it possible he could do something so heartless as to cause a cat’s slow and painful death? No, no, never. He rejected the assertion.

While living with Luke, he had met a young man named Daniel, whose frequent smile often suggested that he had mischief on his mind. Daniel had been drawn to New York City with his wife, Therese, who possessed an unassuming beauty and met the world with a soft smile. She supported them with secretarial work while he sunbathed on the roof of Luke’s penthouse in jockey briefs, like those Peter wore at Camp. He was as loud as she was quiet, and his walleye and narrow face and severely cut blond hair added to his aura of extraterrestrial strangeness. To Luther, Daniel seemed to be bursting with gayness, and so it was a question in his mind whether he and Therese were actually man and wife. Sometimes a sad expression would come over her, as if to suggest a story she wasn't at liberty to tell. The two were from a small town in Michigan. They had come to New York City for their freedom, the way that many people do.

Therese was afflicted with pleurisy, a condition which would periodically lay her low and even require hospital treatment. Her illness, suggesting a fragile hold on life, only added to her beauty and her appeal. Surely she had to know how much Luther longed to touch and hold her and receive her caring warmth. But for the months that Therese and Daniel rented a room in the building, the majority of Luther's time was spent with Daniel, while Therese toiled in some midtown office.

Then they were gone, as so many others had come and gone, and without a word as to their plans or destination. And yet here, a year later, Daniel was, on the line and speaking with Luther. Therese was fine, Daniel said, in answer to Luther's question, but would say no more about her. He was calling because he had a friend, a young woman, he wanted Luther to meet. In spite of Sarah, Luther hadn't closed the door on seeing other girls. Unfit as he might be for love, girls were the most exciting thing the world had to offer. Besides, Daniel would be coming to his apartment with the girl on a Saturday night, when Sarah would once again, under pressure from her father, be in the country. He might belong to Sarah, but that didn't mean she owned him.

Daniel delivered the girl to his door one night and disappeared. Slight and pretty, her blond hair cut short, Asta stood before Luther in fishnet stockings and a miniskirt. She was Norwegian and spoke little English, but her expression said she knew what Luther wanted and that she would give it to him, and the black fishnet stockings she wore with her miniskirt suggested the same. In spite of her limited English, she had her eyes to scan his face and that of all men to extract the information she couldn't gain from conversation. And she had sex. You could learn a lot with it and less or nothing without it. You could learn who people really were. Her gaze and her garb said she was learning fast.

He had been drinking beer and wine and smoking grass and hash with Roberto and Roddy. Soon the gathering expanded beyond his capacity to deal with it. Vera stopped by and there followed a young man named Robby, a friend of Roddy's. If Roddy, by virtue of his pedigree, cowed Luther, Robby triggered unholy terror. He was good-looking beyond description, and he was Columbia, the real Columbia, not General Studies Columbia. What was such a person doing on these premises, laying Luther bare with his steady stare and bringing to bear his laughing, mocking, scornful thing so Luther could find no place to live, even high as he was? And yet the drugs and wine finally took him where he wanted to go, so that high board score Robby could not destroy him anymore than he had.

The lights were low and the music did the talking. Don't you want somebody to love? Don't you need somebody to love? Who could talk above a driving sound like that? Who would want to? The only integration he sought was with the girl. She was a gift he must not lose or throw away. Something had started and grown between them that could not sustain itself within that circle. And yet what was this but the Fat Man arriving, in a blue suit and a red tie that glowed in the dark? And who was that behind him? Could it really be Sarah? Someone please tell him he was hallucinating.

But it was Sarah. And why wouldn't it be Sarah, who was supposed to be in the custody of her father and yet had slipped away? Why wouldn't she come crashing into his so infrequent joy? And could he not use this highly awkward situation to his advantage? Could he not practice supreme cruelty by leading the girl away from this group and into his room and make Sarah a witness to his betrayal? Could he not show Sarah just how heart of stone he could be should she ever, ever think to question his power? All these questions he answered in the affirmative by taking the hand of Asta, who showed no unwillingness to be led away.

In his room they lay, in the dark. It wouldn't do to turn on the lamp. Best to just lie there perfectly still, as even motion could draw the crowd to them. And the darkness and the silence were rewarded. The music stopped. Footsteps could be heard and the front door opening and closing. And "I'm so sorry." his sister Vera's voice. That would be Sarah she was addressing surely. And then finally, the stillness, his senses reporting no lurking presence out there. Finally, finally, he could explore this gift he had been given.

And a gift she was. No girl he had been with before—not Jane Thayer or Dahlia or Maura or Sarah—had worn such undergarments. By the light of the lamp she slowly undressed, removing her blouse and miniskirt to reveal herself in lingerie he had only seen in the pornographic magazines he would filch from the neighborhood luncheonette as a kid, slipping them between the pages of the Daily News. A garter belt. The girl was wearing a black garter belt. And her scanty red lace panties had a split in the crotch.

“You like, baby?” she asked.

He could only nod. The sight of her lit a carnal fire neither the night nor the IUD his penis pushed against could suppress.

In the morning, when he woke, he found her staring down at him as she lay propped up on her elbow.

“That girl last night. Who she is?”

“My sister? The tall, brown-haired girl?”

“Other girl. Blond, like me.”

“Oh, her. Just a friend.”

“Girlfriend?”

“A friend.”

“Friend, not girlfriend?”

“Yes, friend.”

Like some all-seeing goddess she seemed, and he like a specimen under her fixed gaze, defenseless against those probing blue eyes. After an eternity she kissed him, then trailed her mouth down along his chest. Down, down, she went, altering her position so she was now between his legs. For now, at least, he had passed her test.

He rode with her on the subway to the East Village. Something had changed in the city. Along St. Mark’s Place boutiques and head shops and legions of kids hanging out on the stoops, milling on the streets, and in strange getups—embroidered jeans, granny dresses, headbands, love beads. Everywhere the scent of grass and incense.

The scene was frightening, chaotic. He was the child of immigrants with a deep gratitude for their adopted country. “If they don’t like it here, let them go to Russia,” his mother would say of those who spoke out against America. You were supposed to work. You were supposed to do something with your life.

She was staying on Avenue A, in a walkup building not far from Tompkins Square Park. The place was not hers. Nothing seemed to be hers. She was here for “adventure,” she said, in answer to his question. Twice she had been back and forth to California by car in her short time in the States. “America big. Much to see. Free. Not like Norway.”

She was at home in the Village and in this free-floating world, coming and going like the wind. And she would never be his any more than the wind. Her body was her currency. It was how she paid her way through life, trading it for advantage, wherever that advantage appeared to be. These things he saw. He didn’t belong with her. That was the other thing he saw.

Whether lunacy or not, he had some notion that he had secured Sarah to him more strongly by going off with Asta. One night of misbehavior would not dissolve their bond; His display of power would appeal to her in a way that weakness wouldn’t. But her silence over the next few days had begun to make him uneasy when the phone rang.

“Do you still want to see me?”

“Of course I do,” he said, careful not to apologize, not to give her anything, lest she take everything away from him.

“Daddy was furious at me for hitchhiking down to the city last weekend. Now he insists that I come up to Camp this weekend. But I will see you Monday.”

She would be away. Once again her father would claim her. But thereafter she would come to him. In that moment his world grew intensely bright. He could have both her and Asta, his love and his Eros. Several days apart from Asta had renewed his desire to relive the erotic experience of that first night. And now he could. The coast would be clear.

He had the apartment to himself when Asta came to him for another Saturday night of pleasure, but he wasn't alone with her for an hour before a loud and insistent ring brought him to the door. There was his brother Luke, with an uncertain look on his face.

“Hey, Luther, I just thought I would stop by. I haven't seen your new place and Vera was saying it's really nice.”

Luther suspected that Vera had told Luke something more. Luke had come looking for something, like breaking free of the prison he had made for himself with Maureen. “I wonder if you could come back another time. I know that sounds horrible, but I have someone here.”

“I see that,” Luke said, looking over Luther's shoulder at Asta, who had come to the door wrapped in a bath towel.

“You have friend, visitor?” she asked.

“No, it's OK.” Luther said to her before turning back to Luke. “Tomorrow, Luke. OK?” His voice was firmer. His brother was not getting in the door.

“Sure. Tomorrow.” Luke said.

Luther closed the door, but he couldn't close the door on the fear the sight of Luke's grinning face had summoned. What Luke saw he could take. So Luke was telling him with that confident, knowing grin.

"Who your friend?" Asta asked.

"Just my brother. You'll meet him another time."

"Someone else ring at door later maybe?" She frowned.

"No more rings," he said.

But a half-hour later, as he was about to enter her, the phone, not the doorbell, rang, with an insistence he could not resist.

"Hey, Luther, it's me, Luke again." His voice was full of excitement.

"What is it?"

"You're not going to believe this, but as I was leaving your building guess who's walking in? Sarah. She was headed for your apartment. So I told her you weren't home and we walked over to the West End Bar. We're here now."

Luke would have been calling from a phone booth in the rear. There was background noise, the buzz of the Saturday night crowd and the jukebox turned up loud.

"I'll be right there," Luther said.

"Right where? Right where you going to be, baby?" Asta sat up and watched as Luther scrambled into his clothes.

"Family crisis. My mother fell and hurt herself. I will be back in an hour. Just give me an hour."

"An hour. Give an hour. Hour to give, baby."

Driven by terror, he raced up Amsterdam Avenue and through the Columbia mall to Broadway and down to the bar. If he didn't arrive quickly enough, he would lose Sarah to his appropriating brother. He would whisk Sarah away and make her his own. If he did arrive in time, he would lose Asta to him. It was clear as day to him what his brother could and would do, wife or no wife and baby or no baby. Either alternative meant the virus of family spreading to his personal life. He was frantic to quarantine himself from its deadly effects, and sped along as if his life depended on getting to the bar on time.

The lonely, the horny, the educated, the ignorant—somewhere she was seated and hidden from view by the Saturday night throng. And there, she was, by herself, at a booth, staring into the face of a tall guy with a mane of black hair who was leaning down and chatting her up. "Thank you, but no. Here's my boyfriend now," Sarah said. The man shot Luther an angry, withering look and disappeared into the crowd.

"Where's Luke? He just called me." Luther slid in beside her and hugged and kissed her. My boyfriend.

"He's gone to the restroom. Where were you when I stopped by?" Sarah asked.

"I was out getting a few things after being in all day. Don't tell me you hitchhiked again."

"I couldn't breathe up at Camp. I just had to get away. Besides, I know how to take care of myself." Once again he wondered if she understood the violence men could bring against women. Such violence might be unfathomable, but that didn't mean it couldn't be seen.

Luke returned shortly and sat facing them. “I was telling Sarah that I was thinking of doing some hiking up in the Catskills. Maybe some fishing, too. Just to get out of the city.”

“You should. There’s a lot to do up there,” Sarah said.

“Where did you say your family has its place?”

“In Shandaken, just up the road from Phoenicia,” Sarah said.

“Hey, that’s near that bible camp we used to go to. Remember, Luther? Pastor Chernenko and all that religious stuff.”

“I remember,” Luther said, as Sarah excused herself to use the restroom.

“You should be more careful. You don’t want to lose what you have. “Is your friend still back at the apartment?” Luke emptied hal the stein in one long swallow.

“Why?”

“I’m just asking. That’s all. It looked like the two of you were in for the night.”

“She’s there,” Luther said.

“Here’s what we do. I’ll go back to your apartment and hang out with your friend while you stay here with Sarah. You understand what I’m saying?”

“Sure. Sure I understand,” Luther said.

“I’m trying to help.”

“I didn’t say you weren’t.”

When Sarah came back, Luke drained the last of his beer. “I’ll see you lovebirds. I’ve got things to take care of.”

“I like your brother,” Sarah said, when Luke had gone. “He has nice eyes. You both have nice eyes.”

“Everyone has nice eyes.”

“No they don’t. Some people have awful eyes. Some people have murderous eyes.”

“This is true,” Luther said. He had hoped to hear something different about his brother from Sarah, something very different.

“Luther, I’ve been thinking.”

“Yes?”

“We won’t if you don’t want to, but suppose we were to stay at my family’s apartment tonight?”

“We can do that.”

“You’re sure?”

“It will be fine, really,” Luther said, trying to hide his relief that now he would not have to stall before returning to his own apartment with Sarah.

A vestibule the size of a large room, four bedrooms, a spacious kitchen with gleaming appliances, a full dining room with a mahogany table that seated eight, a maid’s quarters converted into a darkroom. He was as stunned by the apartment as he had been by the family’s country place. What was this world, this universe, that he had entered? He felt safe, here among the antique furnishings, the walnut shelves filled with hardbound books, the prints and paintings on the walls. It was the home he had been looking for his whole life, a place where he could read and think free of the dirt and disorder and agitation of his surroundings.

“That girl. Are you going to see her again?” Sarah asked, as they lay in her canopied bed. There it was, finally.

“No.”

As she slept, he sat by the window staring down at Riverside Park. All the windows looked out on the park and the Hudson River and the New Jersey shoreline. The Soldiers’ and Sailors’ Monument directly below rose like a giant luminous phallus in the light of the street lamps. One after another men passed it by from both directions. Homosexual men, driven in the dark by their hunger, as were the seekers back there in the End Bar.

He thought of Asta, and of Luke going where he had been. In his pain he told himself he had lost a little so he could keep a lot. And no one, not Vera, not Luke, would take what he had away and drag him back to where he had been. He would keep his distance and even increase it to be sure they didn’t. He was leaving the world he had known behind for a new one. If he could only hold on and not die during the night from this invasion by Luke. If he could only block from his mind all that Luke would do to Uma and that she would allow to have done to her. If he could only block from his mind the thought that Luke was on his trail and Sarah would be next in his sights.

In the morning he woke with his arm thrown over her as if, even in sleep, he had to hold her close.

Luther could easily imagine his brother tearing that night from the End Bar to Luther's apartment, as Luther had flown from the apartment to the bar. Luke's every step would have been propelled by the fear that the girl he had glimpsed standing behind Luther at the door would leave before he got there or that one of Luther's roommates would move in on her before he could. The image would have blazed in his sex-obsessed mind of the open, curious look Asta had given him. He had seen the possibilities right away.

But there she was when he arrived, only fully dressed now, and no roommates were around to contend with. Luther was to learn that Luke took her that night to the Morningside Arms, where Luther had stayed and paid for her room. He was leaving his wife, he said. He had nothing in common with her. Asta listened. She stared at his face as he spoke, scanning it for lies he might be telling.

Maureen threatened to have her father kill him for his betrayal. Luke said she should do what she had to do because if the choice was between staying in the marriage and being killed by her father, at least the latter would be a fast death and not a slow one. Maureen said he was the cruelest, crummiest man she had ever met, but Luke assured her there were a lot more out there just like him, or maybe even worse. So the story went.

"What ails you, my son? Have you taken leave of your senses? Do you think life is about having your cake and eating it, too?" Mrs. Garatdjian asked, but Luke just rolled up his sleeve and smelled his forearm.

"I did what I had to do. You understand what I'm saying?" Luke said to Luther, the following week.

“Sure. Sure I understand,” Luther said.

“Asta dug me. She really did. We had that Scandinavian connection. I told her Mother was Swedish and that really excited her.”

“Right.”

“I think we can really help each other. You know, provide support.”

“Right. Provide support.”

‘She’s going to be good for me. You’ll see.’”

But what Luther saw was that it was all a bag of shit, crummy Garatdjian shit. A marriage that fell apart in the first year, a baby that Maureen would have to care for on her own.

If Luke was doing what he had to do, so too was Asta. The look she had given him was a transferable look she gave to other men, on the street, on buses and subways, everywhere . Luke didn’t like it that she smiled at some black man in a dashiki while she stood on a grocery line. He didn’t like that she accepted an invitation by a pornographic filmmaker to be in his next movie, or that she disappeared for several days while filming it at some undisclosed downtown location.

“She says, ‘Your suspicion too much for me, baby. I need to do my thing.’ She’s gone two days and that’s what she has to say to me. And here I am paying for this room where we’re supposed to be living. So I raise my hand to her. I don’t hit her. I just raise my hand. And she says, ‘Big mistake, baby. Big mistake.’ All this ‘Baby’ this and ‘Baby’ that shit, so I told her to get the fuck out if she didn’t like it, and now I haven’t seen her in three days. It isn't right, this shit women do to you. It just isn't right. You know what I'm saying?"

Maureen had moved out with the baby and returned to live with her father a few blocks away. It was like Luke Jr. had no more meaning for Luke than Maureen. A chianti bottle stood on the table, near the washer and drier Maureen had insisted upon. Luke poured some into a coffee mug for himself. It was late afternoon now. The sun was slanting in from the west through the slatted bars on the penthouse window. In the long ago, a man named Guevara had lived in this place. Luther remembered him dimly as a small, wiry man with a mustache who had mopped the landings and performed other custodial duties. And then there was a bearded preacher named Carp, a man drunk on whiskey when he wasn't drunk on God. And now there was Luke.

"I know what you're saying."

"It isn't right the way they drive you down."

"No," Luther said.

"The fucking cunt." He hurled the cup against the wall, but not before draining it. Then he poured more chianti into another cup. It went on that way for a while. They had a history. They were brothers. Like a mirror Luke, his whole family, was, reflecting back to him the grayness of failure, of defeat. A mirror it wouldn't do to stare into too long.

When the Six-Day War broke out, Luther heard it to the sound of the fat-lipped one singing "Under My Thumb." Israeli fighter jets dominating the Middle Eastern skies. The Egyptian Air Force destroyed before its planes could get off the ground and its army in a state of surrender, surrounded by Israeli tanks in the Sinai Desert. What a thing.

At the post office Jewish workers swore their allegiance to Israel. "I'm ready to go anytime. I'll kill those fucking Arab cocksuckers with my bare hands," said one. Luther listened. He heard the passion in the man's voice, his fury, his pride. Suddenly the man wanted to do something heroic. He wanted to be on the field of battle. He too wanted to be one of the young and dazzling lions of Israel. But he wasn't on the field of battle and he wasn't young. He was in middle age and boxing mail at the General Post Office on Thirty-Third Street and Eighth Avenue.

Luther too wanted to fight for Israel. He too wanted to be Jewish and have Jewish brains. He too, like those older men, wanted substance more than he had. The war put turmoil in him he did not know how to explain.

He headed down to the West Village after work and stood by the jukebox in Gosee's drinking his beer and listening to "(San Francisco) Wear Flowers in Your Hair." He had not heard the song before and it took him over like some songs did, making him soft inside. He saw young men and women talking with each other, and some older folks as well, but he talked to no one except the bartender. He just listened to the flowers in your hair song and other songs.

A woman seated at the bar looked his way. At first, he hadn't been sure she was looking his way because of the dark glasses she wore, but then she lowered them and looked out over the top and he saw that her eyes were on him. This looking that she did made him feel good all over, even when she turned her attention back to the man she was with. The two of them were drinking martinis. Those long-stemmed glasses made it likely they were martinis. And the drinks had olives in them, the way that martinis were supposed to have. Fancy drinks. He waited for the woman to look back his way because he kept looking at her, but she didn't. She turned her head this way and that but she didn't look at him even once more. After a few more beers he came to see that she was looking at him by not looking at him, that she was studiously ignoring him, as the saying went, ignoring his hunger, his neediness.

Come June, Sarah did not graduate with her class. She would have to attend summer school in order to receive her diploma. But she had no regard for the school or the diploma it was withholding. This attitude troubled Luther and reawakened his fear that without academic certification Sarah could fall and fall. He did not understand how art called and called to a person, and made negligible considerations of importance to those who did not also have this calling. He had heard Dylan sing that someone was an artist and she didn't look back but that was a song, not real life, in which chaos and poverty were always looming.

The country was a calling, too. The family had no need of air conditioners in the windows of its Riverside Drive apartment because it had retreated to the mountains by the time the city was sweltering in summer heat. Sarah lingered a week after school let out before she too felt the pull of Camp and family. New York City in July was foreign to her. She had to go where she belonged.

Luther felt angry. He felt helpless. Sarah had always been coming toward him, but now she was going away. Had she come into his life only to leave it? The days he passed without her were painful. His mind was a torment of anxious, obsessive thoughts.

His sister Vera had given him a job lead. A club down on Seventeenth Street and Park Avenue South might need a busboy or waiter. Robby was working there, she said.

“Robby?” he asked.

“Robby Eastland. You met him. He goes to Columbia and is really, really handsome. He’s friends with Roddy and showed up at that party, if it can be called a party, that night.”

“Oh, right.” Sure Luther remembered him. How could he not remember the young man who had frightened him, with that long tousled brown hair and beautifully slender in a denim jacket and striped boat neck top, and with that Columbia pedigree. A young man playing in a league above Luther’s own.

“He says he goes home with a different waitress every night,” Vera added, as if that might be extra incentive for Luther to follow through. “You know he was seeing Pam for a while. He adored her, but she said he was too much for her.”

Too much for her. Luther had no idea what that meant. Colin Westland had wanted Pam Becker but Pam Becker had not wanted him, Luther. Because excellence chose excellence.

Luther did not have a good feeling about his chances of being hired. He had heard a little about Seraglio Pastime. Much fuss had been made about the audacious name, the sort that came to you while you were in Pot Heaven or stoned on whatnot and thought you were having a vision about how the whole thing worked but really, it lacked any more coherence than those images and thoughts that came as consciousness began to wane and sleep pulled you in. The name messed with you. It tormented your mind, like a big, ugly furnishing you had no use for and yet you couldn't get it out the door and so you tried to make your peace with. Buffalo Springfield, The Grateful Dead, Jefferson Airplane, Big Brother and the Holding Company, Grand Funk Railroad, the Moody Frigging Blues. All over America bands with strange names were sprouting. The whole country had taken to song, factories and farmyards abandoned for the electric guitar. Something was behind it. Could it be love? Luther wondered.

“Who sent you here?” A man stood at the entrance to Seraglio Pastime with lank black hair, his eyes ablaze with darkness. He had a chick pea thing going, popping the morsels in his fish-shaped mouth. A big bowlful sat atop the cigarette vending machine, against which he leaned.

“My sister. She heard of this place.”

“We don't do sisters here,” the man said.

“What?” Luther cried out.

“You're not ready for this place.”

“I don't understand.”

“Yes you do,” the man said. Luther watched the man headed past the bar and the dining area, where waiters and waitresses were setting the tables in preparation for the evening crowd. Pretty young men and women, the kind the eye responded favorably to, although he did not see Colin Westland among them. The man of mystery had spoken. He had been dropping depth charges, and Luther took the impact of their explosive power back out onto the street. Yes you do, Mr. Chickpea Breath had said.

The next day Sarah called. She said he should consider coming up to Camp not for a weekend but for a month.

“I have my job at the post office.”

“Oh, come on. Mommy said she really wants to meet you.”

“But I need my job.”

“You’ll get another job .”

The call, the invitation. Her mother wanting him. Another door had opened. What a surprise.

At the post office that evening, he told his friend Efram Ellsberg about his good fortune . “The American dream, baby. The American dream,” Efram said.

“What American dream?” Luther asked.

“Your American dream. Just be aware when and if it turns into something else.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing else comes to me, man. I’ve given you what I’ve got.” Though not entirely. Efram opened his hand and in his palm, as on the first night Luther had met him, was another heart-shaped pill, which Luther took and swallowed.

Gosees called to him that night. Once again he stood on the sawdust-strewn floor by the jukebox and listened to the flowers in your hair song. High on the pill, high on the music, high on the beer after beer he drained, high on the promise of a glorious tomorrow, and high on the promise of this one night before entering the confines of Sarah's family. And there the embodiment of that promise was, the woman in the dark glasses had returned and taken her seat at the bar, only now she was without her escort. And she was looking at him, summoning "Pretty Woman" to blast forth in the jukebox in his head, Roy Orbison bringing him to complete attention with his huge sound. The pretty woman was looking right at him, over her dark glasses. Not around him or to the side of him but at him.

"I've been expecting you," Luther said, taking the stool beside her. They sounded like words from a movie.

"You are a patient young man. Sometimes patience is rewarded, sometimes not."

"Those glasses. Why do you wear them, when it is night outside and not so very light in here?"

"Dark glasses for a dark world."

"Sometimes the world does seem dark, really dark."

"You're too young for the world to be dark. And you're too young to have those worry lines on your face."

"What worry lines?"

"Those two vertical lines between your eyes."

"Oh, those."

"What do you do when you're not standing in the corner holding up the wall at Gosees?"

"I work for the post office. In fact, I just came from there. And I'm a student."

"Where are you a student?"

“At CCNY.”

“Not Columbia?”

“Oh, no. You have to do really well on the SAT to get into Columbia.”

“And you didn’t do really well?”

“No. Not at all. In fact, I think about my numbers every day and call myself names. I guess that’s my darkness, the feeling that I lost and that I’m stupid.”

“Well, you look intelligent.”

“That’s the problem. People assume I’m smart because I look smart. I try to tell them the truth so I don’t become a prisoner of the image I think they have of me.”

“That’s pretty smart.”

“Maybe.”

He liked watching as she drank her martini. Every sip that passed her thin lips she seemed to savor. And it was the same with the slow, long drags she took on her Parliament. She was a woman who wanted things to last.

“I can’t smoke those things. They give me a huge headache. I pull too hard on that recessed filter, I guess.”

“You can come home with me, but you’ll have to wait while I have another drink,” she said, as if she hadn’t heard him. Or maybe she had heard him, heard what he was thinking if not saying, that he had lost her by telling her too much.

They passed a police car in Washington Square Park, the memorial arch at the north end pulling them toward it. He felt the scornful eyes of the cops on him that someone of his appearance should be with such a shapely woman. He did not turn to verify his intuition. He had no need of the trouble that might bring. The night had yielded him a gift; it was for him to protect it.

In the blue-lit living room the woman tended bar as some saxophonist soloed on a jazz number he hashed no name for, as he didn't for the exotic fish in the large tank. Jazz was music from some other world, the world of Slug's in the Far East and the Five Spot, up on St. Mark's Place, with whale-sized Charlie Mingus on his bass, places he had gone to a few times with Luke.

"Cranberry juice and vodka. A little something to raise you above the sodden path all that beer has set you on. And a joint to tuck us in the bleary, syncopated notes of our little sextet. Our ride commences," she said, lighting and drawing on the tightly wrapped weed before handing it to him.

"You talk like a writer. Are you one of them?"

"Language our only means of survival?" she asked, as he the joint back to her.

"The way you talk." Like she had a fire burning within her. And yet she was so methodical and slow-motion.

She watched as he removed his clothes before doing the same. "Skinny, but nice." The "nice" sounded like shows trying to convince herself.

"Those notes." He wanted to tell her that he was tucked into them now, but it was getting harder to speak.

"See if you can stay for the night," she said. It sounded like a challenge, and played in his ears an hour later as he fled in the predawn down the long side streets to the West Side IRT and the safety of his own bed for a few hours of sleep.

That night he showered. How ugly Roberto's bathroom looked, the stained tub in need of grouting, the shower curtain caked with crud. He was crud, with his pale, sickly flesh and meager frame. He had wanted to come to Sarah clean, but the poison was inside, not on his skin, and so he couldn't.

He overslept and, feeling ill, dragged himself that afternoon toward the Port Authority bus terminal. The littered streets of Times Square itself seemed hung over and a representation of the disintegration he feared in himself. Seediness was in every window display of stilettos and racy lingerie and its scent seeped from the movie theaters with the bulging marquees. Danger awaited as well as the bus pulled from gate 37 on the lower level and entrusted itself to the Lincoln Tunnel, as this would be the day the tired tube gave way before the weight of the filthy river pressing in on it. Then there was the horror of the littered medians of the Garden State Parkway and the grotesque commercial strips, some savagery of desecration civilization could not stop itself from. And yet his inner climate brightened, came more in alignment with the sun, when the bus hit Interstate 87 and greenery more and more caught his eye, as tension would ease when he stepped from the city streets to the relative oasis of Central or Riverside Park. And there was further relief, and even a spark of happiness, to see the greensward in Woodstock and the rustic beauty that lay beyond.

Sarah's mother had a face younger than her white hair. She came across the lawn with trowel in hand from the flowerbed at the lawn's border. A boy in his early teens made concentric circles in the lawn as he sat at the wheel of a gas-powered mower, leaving behind the strong, sweet smell of freshly cut grass. The idyllic tableau on a sun-filled day could not save it from an air of naivety that made him protective of these people he at the same time dreaded. They are actors and this is a stage and they are performing just for me, he thought.

“I’m sick. I’m disintegrating,” he said, in a panic, to Sarah. She led him to the red room, where sleep quickly took him from this new world he had entered, and there he stayed until the following morning.

“The oligarchic stranglehold on this country is beyond the ken of the average mind...Our political parties are Tweedledum and Tweedledee, operating fully in accord with the interests of big business...The metaphysical dictate of the members of the Constitutional Convention was profit, plain and simple. We are a country driven by greed, for more and more...” From somewhere nearby the words were coming, emphatic, urgent. A man in the white heat of his passion.

“That’s my father, holding my mother captive with his morning rant,” Sarah said.

“Your father talks like that?”

“Every morning she is a sounding board.”

He entered her, releasing what felt like poisonous discharge. How sweet the peace afterward.

Her parents were already into their routines when he emerged onto the front porch. Sarah’s mother was tending to the flowerbed again, seeking her peace in the earth while back and forth Peter shuttled from the barn with the jeep and a small wagon attached to the back of it. Sarah said that at the top of the small hill beyond the pool was a shale pile, which her father took from for one of his projects.

Lydia served a lunch of sandwiches and salad on the terrace, and the family gathered at the big round table where only months before Luther had been rebuked by Peter for shooting at the chipmunks and squirrels.

“I’m sorry about yesterday. I wasn’t feeling all that well,” he said, when Ly

“You are an ambitious and serious young man. This I can tell. And you have your hands full. Sarah says you have a job in addition to going to college. It’s no wonder that you were feeling rundown. But now you will have a chance to rest and regain your strength for the challenges ahead.”

Crashed. That is what he had done. He had come to Camp and crashed. An ugly, stupid word. Her words had a shaming effect on him. “You have a beautiful property. It must take a lot to maintain,” he said, seeking to change the subject.

“We have friends who say it is the land of the lotus dwellers, a place of indolence and forgetfulness, but not for us. It’s a chance for Peter to take a break from the strenuous intellectual activity that keeps him at his desk back in the city and work with his hands. The urban experience is wonderful, rich in culture, and we avail ourselves to the full in the fall and winter and spring, but summer is a time to drive our hands deep in the soil and feel a part of this fecund earth.”

In Homer’s Odyssey, back in the ninth grade, he had read of Ulysses and his men entering the land of the lotus dwellers, and the indolence that befell some of them as they floated free of their past and of their future. And of patient Penelope, warding off suitors, and Telemachus and Circe and Scylla and Charybdis he had read as well. He was happy that he could recognize Lydia’s allusion and the possibility that all things she spoke of might not be lost to him and so he might not always have to be afraid of her. He heard the fear in her voice that led her to fill in the hollow spaces in the life she and Peter led than it really was with words bigger and references more erudite than they needed to be.

“Sarah, maybe you would like to show Luther the little bridge I’ve been building over the brook. And you’ll want to show him the vegetable garden, too.”

“I will, Daddy,” Sarah said.

Peter was showing another side, Luther thought. He was not in a state of silent resentment, as he had been when Sarah and Luther and Pam and Roddy intruded on him. He had his wife and children, all of them. And though the weather was warmer, he had covered himself more. Now he went about in khaki shorts and an old T-shirt. He felt no need to show off his endowment.

“How are you today, Miss Claire?” Peter’s voice was teasingly tentative, as if he had to approach Claire with caution. With her black hair and brown skin greedy for the sun, she was darker than Sarah.

“I’m all right, Daddy. I was up late reading.”

“You know what Robert Louis Stevenson had to say about reading.”

“No, I don’t, Daddy,” as if the correction to come were part of a somewhat tiresome routine.

“‘Books are a mighty bloodless substitute for life,’ the great man wrote, in one of his essays.”

“Well, he should know. He wrote enough of them.” Claire’s crankiness was softened with a smile.

“Will we be seeing your boyfriend anytime soon?” Lydia asked. “You know we would love to have him, too.”

“Brian’s out on Long Island trying to put together a band, but he says he’ll be up in a couple of days.”

“Claire’s boyfriend thinks he is going to be a rock star,” Jeffrey said. He had small eyes. When they didn’t hold worry and hurt, they were laughing.

“He never said he wanted to be a rock star. He’s just following his own path,” Claire retorted.

“Doing his own thing, like thousands of other clowns,” Jeffrey sneered.

“There’s no need to make fun of him. He’s trying,” Claire said.

“I myself can’t say I understand the music of today. I’m afraid I belong to another generation. Yours has a passion and creativity mine was lacking,” Lydia said.

“Bomb Hanoi. Nuke the bastards,” Jeffrey said.

“Where on earth do such imperatives come from?” Lydia asked.

“I’m just saying what I think.”

“Well, of course, dear,” Lydia replied.

She was the bringer of reason. Luther heard it in her voice. But what or who was Jeffrey? He had not been gifted with physical beauty, as had been Sarah and Claire. His only gift seemed to be a sharp tongue, but that was not the same as intelligence, was it? Overshadowed, he had to shriek in order not to be totally overlooked. Yes, that was it. All eyes and attention went toward the girls and Lydia, and to a lesser extent to Peter. People were like thieves. They were drawn toward those who could give, or who they thought could give, even if they couldn't. As for Claire, Luther understood he would have to be careful. She was a magnet for his eyes, with that Barnard status and her dark beauty and stunning cleavage.

Brian did arrive, some days later, tanned and sleek, his thinness the enviable kind that allowed him the freedom to wander barefoot stripped to his tight black bathing suit without self-consciousness. Amused intelligence showed on his face, and the black curls on his perfectly shaped head put Luther in mind of royalty. In another century he would have been a French dauphin at Versailles in a velvet jacket. And yet his mouth warranted special attention. It was tight and ungenerous, the mouth of someone who could cut with his words and whose laughter was not rich and deep but brittle. Peter trained his Nikon F camera on Brian and clicked away. He understood the present would be past and that personal history was in the making and needed a photographic record.

Lenore arrived with a beau of her own, a boy named Malcolm who could make a statement in clothes even plainer than the jeans and green short-sleeved seersucker shirt he wore. A boy who kept his body in motion, as if repose was foreign to it. Brian was handsome, but Malcolm had a dazzling blond handsomeness as American as the white picket fence in a Norman Rockwell painting. That he was country and did not show a peacock's strut only added to his luster. And so Peter got busy again with his Nikon, shooting Malcolm from all different angles, and with the understanding that the past was an accretion of moments it was essential to capture to appreciate what had been lost.

“The pencil generation,” Peter chuckled to Lydia, his imagination and more fired up by the youngness on his property, youngness that lay down with his prized daughters in the night.

The sound that blasted from the stereo in the living room through the outdoor speakers onto the lawn was not Stravinsky or Bach or Beethoven but the Beatles in their new incarnation. Some of the songs on Sergeant Pepper’s Lonely Hearts Club Band were noisy intrusions of unwelcome sound, but others, like “I Read the News Today” and “She’s Leaving Home,” stood Luther to attention. And there was Fresh Cream, Jack Bruce and Eric Clapton and the whole lot summoning an unsubtle but harmonic sound on “Sunshine of My Love” and “I Feel Free,” the latter summoning an image of men out for a high-speed ride on the roof of a car and holler singing on a nastily windy day.

Having wounds of his own, Luther could spot them in others. What he saw in Malcolm was that he was insecure, a prisoner of others’ expectations, real or imagined. If he stayed in motion, then you could not see beyond the facade. Malcolm did not engage in conversation, or if he did, it was of the hysterical kind, as when he bragged of driving down to New York City without a license while high on acid to visit with older brother or of throwing chalk at the math teacher at the boarding school in Vermont where he had met Lenore. He spoke from the point of view of the rich boy who had others to pick up after him. But he also spoke from the point of view of failure. Luther saw it in his face and in the lack of coherence in his speech. At age sixteen he had been defeated. He was failing at boarding school, and drugs were now his solace.

“Everything comes so easily to Brian,” Claire said that summer. “Do you know that he got a score well over 1500 on his SAT while doing no work at all in high school. I had to study and study for every good grade I got and take a test prep class to get a decent score on the College Boards?”

Whether she was expressing admiration for Brian or pity for herself was hard to tell. Luther suspected he had heard a little of both from her.

“Everyone at our boarding school got miserable scores on the PSAT and the SAT,” Lenore replied. “Of course, many of us were stoned, and that may have had something to do with it.”

“How about you, Luther? I’ll bet you did well on the SAT,” Claire said.

“I’m not a whiz on standardized tests,” he said, paralyzed by her question.

“Is that another way of saying you’re an idiot like me?” Lenore laughed at the bluntness of her own question. She had some of Jeffrey’s irrepressible quality, but Luther also heard playfulness in her voice. She wasn’t seeking to pull him down. She was just calling him to her level. Perhaps there was loneliness behind her laughter and she was seeking company, Malcolm or no Malcolm. He heard her words that way.

She had been on his mind before he saw her and was on his mind even more now that he had. He saw how she was open to life in a way that Claire was not. She had jumped from the confines of family to boarding school, while Claire spent her first year of college living at home and showed no sign of moving out for her second. Slighter than her sisters, she radiated sexuality in a stronger way than either. That bowl-cut black hair.

That androgynous look. She would be a girl responsive to his touch. Her laughing black eyes said as much. His thoughts were moving unchecked in that direction.

The day came when Malcolm returned to the city. His older brother needed to see him, but he would not be gone long, he said. Lenore did not accompany him. As Luther saw it, she was alone.

The caretaker , Everett, came to the house that day. He carried in his arms a fawn, too weak to flee from humankind.

“She got separated from her mother. Only a matter of time before the dogs tore her to pieces,” Everett said. A big man with a barrel chest, he had a look of innocence to match that of the fawn, as if he might be a woodland creature, too, his baggy Dickey pants and work shirt and canvas hat notwithstanding. His words came out forced and as if directed not to any one person but to the group.

Sarah lay the fawn on a soft blanket in a corner of the living room and fed it warm milk from a baby bottle.

“He’s so gentle,” Luther heard Lenore remark to Sarah when he took his turn fussing over the fawn, running his hand over its tawny coat. And while he did want to see the fawn up on its long legs, he also suspected he was putting on a show for Sarah’s younger sister. How uncomfortable to hear any kind of goodness noted. Better that she should express a desire to beat him savagely with a stick for wickedness planned than to publicly apply such a label he could not live up to, as Peter could attest, having seen what he tried to do with a rifle.

After a game of hearts, in which Peter had triumphantly shot the moon, sleep came to the house, but Luther was not asleep. He would stay up and read, as he was not tired, he told Sarah, and so he sat with a copy of Moby-Dick. After a few pages he put down the fat Signet paperback edition of the novel and filled a cobalt blue glass half with gin and half with tonic, careful to avoid clanking the bottle against the others in lifting it from the liquor table. His hosts might be troubled to see a guest of theirs staying up late to drink their liquor, and a generous amount of it. Not that they would reproach him. They were too kind for that. Still, he had to be careful.

He felt his shirt pocket for the outline of the pill. He had stayed away from speed since his night with the Gosees woman and the awful experience in the shower afterward. But some time had passed. The country air and good food had rejuvenated him. Besides, it was now or never if he was to be with Lenore, and without the pill it would surely be never because fatigue would set in and he would fall asleep before she came down the steps from her bedroom. And she would come down. He was certain she would.

In the room just to the other side of the wall Sarah would be sleeping. How sweet she was in sleep. How warm her body. The choice was upon him. Did he surrender himself into the fold of family or explore the wilder promise of the night with Lenore? He removed the pill from his shirt pocket and swallowed it with a healthy swig of gin and tonic and sat on the sofa and waited.

Soon the floorboards directly above began to creak, as if by force of will he were summoning her into his darkness. Then came the sound of soft footsteps on the stairs.

And now there she was, in bare feet and a black silk robe. Out the side door she seemed to glide with only an unsmiling glance his way. Though she hadn't invited him, he stepped out onto the terrace after her.

Where was she? The only movement was of moths fluttering against the glass-encased porch lights. He entered the terrace but she was nowhere to be seen, and yet there came to him the pungent smell of marijuana smoke.

"Looking for someone?" She was sitting on a cushioned bench away from the table.

"You couldn't sleep?"

"I guess not."

"I couldn't either. I was sitting up reading Moby-Dick."

"That sounds like a lot of fun." She laughed.

"There's much I feel I don't know. I sit in the living room surrounded by so many books I haven't read. Of course, some of them are old and uninteresting. And then I am surrounded by nature and I know nothing about that either, neither the flora or the fauna."

"You're a real fount of knowledge, aren't you?" Laughing as she passed him the joint.

The booze, the pill, and now several tokes on the joint.

"I feel the eyes of the house on me like one giant eye."

"The grass making you a little paranoid?" Again that not unkind laugh.

By the pool she shed her robe and eased down the steps in her tanned nakedness. She swam a lap, face down before moving gracefully onto her back. He followed after.

The water felt cold on his bare body, though it was now mid-summer, and a haze of insects hovered just above. He showed none of her confidence or skill. His breathing became difficult when he tried the crawl. Panicked, he lifted his head free of the water and gasped for air. After one lap he relied on the less fatiguing sidestroke and came up after her out of the water before having to resort to the doggie paddle.

From behind he placed his hands on her thin shoulders.

“Aha. Criminal intentions.” She pivoted, her upturned face showing a half smile and glittering eyes. The kiss that followed was not like those with Sarah. There was no vague sense, as he had with Sarah, that such intimacy was unwelcome. Rather, she opened to him. A hungry kiss it was, and led quickly to other things.

“We can only do this once, you understand,” she said, holding him off with her hands on his chest as he lay atop her. Only now she was not laughing.

“I do,” he said, and entered her.

Of the many things about that night, the thing he remembered most was how wild she was beneath him, how with him she was, seeking his mouth, his ear, his neck, and how she raised her legs so they rested on his shoulders. A girl who held nothing back.

She touched his cheek to see if he was real before running from her remorse off across the lawn and back into the house. There was nothing to keep them together. No love, no connection. But the house was not his to enter. Not in his condition. It wouldn't do to sleep in the same bed with Sarah with the smell of her sister's silkiness on him. It wouldn't do at all.

Alone with the cricket chorus, he followed the downward slope of the property to the guest house, pulled open the big sliding door, and turned on the light. The room was large, with three single beds and a pool table and a high, peaked ceiling with cross beams. The small mullioned windows along one side of the room afforded a view, through the trees, of the main house. He lay on one of the beds, holding his head and pondering his filth.

In the morning she shook him awake. He had fallen off to sleep as daylight broke and now fearfully read her face for signs of anger.

“I looked all over for you. What happened?”

“I felt sick. I didn’t want to come to bed and disturb you.”

“Sick? What kind of sick? You were fine last night.”

“It is strange,” he said.

“You’re strange. That’s what strange. I don’t like this.”

“What? I’ve done something? What have I done?”

“Something. I don’t know.”

“Sick. I got sick. That’s what I did.” Not an outright lie but within the outer bounds of the truth, he told himself.

Sweat had formed on his face and body from the sunlight pouring through the windows. From the lawn came the sound of Peter speaking in a modulated tone with the caretaker, Everett. Voices of innocence.

“Well, now, you look like a car dragged you fifty yards along bad road,” Everett said, when Luther emerged with Sarah. “You’re too young to be looking old.”

Luther nodded and kept moving toward the main house. “Good morning, Luther,” Lydia called, from her flowerbed. There were just people everywhere, Claire and Brian and Jeffrey on the front porch, with their eyes on him, seeing what they saw. But no Lenore.

“You have a good night?” He heard a sardonic note in Jeffrey’s question.

“An OK night,” Luther said, and went on his way through the spring door.

He locked himself in the bathroom, clean and spacious, with subtle, light gray tiling, and a frosted window that looked out on the mountain. The most modernized part of the old house, along with the kitchen. The cleanliness, the beauty of the bathroom, helped. No stained tub, no cracked sink basin. His own dirtiness wasn’t being reflected back to him. “Filth. Filth.” He whispered the word with his head pressed against the tiles and water pouring down on him. If he could just get through the day. If he could just do that.

“Let’s stay out here. Is that all right?” he asked, later that day, about the new barn.

“I guess. But why?” Sarah asked.

“I can’t breathe in that house. There are too many bodies, one on top of the other.”

“No there aren’t. The house is big enough for all of us. We have separate rooms.

We’re not all together.”

“It’s not enough. Believe me,” Luther said. “We need some distance, some separation. You don’t know what a family can do.”

“I don’t?”

“I just mean...”

“I know what you mean. It’s OK.”

Peter drove them down to Sal's Restaurant that evening, at the bottom of the turnoff from Route 28, in Phoenicia. Sal himself came to their table in his loose-fitting flowery shirt and leaned down with his big, open face, what remained of his hair slicked back over his shiny scalp. "How are you all? How's everything going?" Sal said.

Just go, Sal, just go, Luther thought. Go before the trouble starts. Because trouble would always start when people who didn't belong together got together. From a different world Sal was, with his restaurant. Not a man for books. Amazing that Peter and Lydia had talked to Sal as if there were no differences and Sal didn't hate them. It was something for Luther to see. Not that he could ever do that himself. Best to run from the Sals of the world. Just run. That time, in the long ago, standing in the grocery store checkout line, waiting to pay for the quart of milk his mother had sent him out for. The man at the register talking with another man. The two of them talking, talking. Doing their laughing, pleasant thing while the fear grew and grew in Luther, causing him to leave the milk on the counter and run out of the store before the smiling stopped and the men drew knives with which to hack and stab each other.

More amazing was Lenore. He put his eyes on her but she was looking elsewhere, and when he came back to her, she was still looking elsewhere. She was looking at him by not looking at him. He had come to the place of wanting her again, and she was saying no.

But Lydia had no trouble putting her eyes on him. "Tell us a little about your family, Luther. Are they all in New York?"

Now all eyes seemed to be on him, witnessing his discomfort and self-consciousness.

“I guess they are. Yes. Sort of. One of my sisters is missing...”

“Missing?”

“Not exactly missing. She comes and goes, but we think we know where she is.”

“What does this sister do?” Lydia asked.

“She drinks. She smirks. She commits her hair to an orange blaze with henna. She disappears. She is good at that. She wounds me with her absence and her presence. I don’t know. Maybe. Maybe not.”

“And there are others, you say?”

“Of sisters I have four. Of brothers I have one. And my one mother and one father. I am in full flight from all of them, all except my mother. No, that’s not true. Actually, I really can’t say.”

“What can’t you say, Luther?” Lydia quietly asked.

“The horrible smell of failure. I don’t feel well.”

“You sound unwell,” Jeffrey said, with a laugh.

“Stop it, Jeffrey. Luther is trying to communicate with us.”

Luther liked Lydia. He could imagine talking with her for a long, long time.

In the car, as they headed back to Camp, these lines came to him: “White lines, continue,” and “Sarah liked to pee in an open field.” They were not lines he could expand upon. He had to take them just as they were. But they gave him hope that more might follow.

It is with a heavy heart that I tell you Jeanne has run away. She has called me twice from somewhere downtown to say that she will not be coming back and is staying with good friends. She is in my prayers, as are all my children and grandchildren. You must understand that the world means nothing, nothing at all, and that Jesus is everything, as he has always been everything. Be with the Lord, my son, so that you may not go where sin is to be found. Love, Mother.”

A miniature booklet with a white cover and the words “Jesus saves” was enclosed with the letter. Inside was printed in red ink the full verse of John 3:16. Poor sullen-faced Jeanne. She had left behind her Episcopal school jumper and run off into the world that his mother disowned. Had that song about a girl leaving home in the Sergeant Pepper album prompted her to take off? For the rest of the day and for days thereafter she occupied his consciousness in a way that she hadn’t. He missed her. She was a part of him. And yet who wouldn’t flee from the circumstances she had been born into? He tried to imagine her safe among the flower children around St. Mark’s Place and thought briefly about trying to find her, but couldn’t summon the will. He couldn’t say why.

Sarah drove him in the jeep to the other side of the mountain, where he said something important awaited him.

“What is it?” she said.

“Your father has his history and I have mine. The fact is that I was here seven years ago, when a batter threw a haymaker and broke the pitcher’s jaw.”

“What are you talking about?”

“Bible camp. Occasionally we would get tidings of the world beyond, like the edition of the Daily News in which I read that Billy Martin rushed the mound after a close pitch and decked Jim Brewer.”

“I like to hear about your childhood,” Sarah said. “I like to hear that you had one.”

They took a left in Phoenicia past the general store, following the Esopus along a two-lane road. Within five miles they came to a wisp of a town with a gas station and its own general store. An American flag flew above the tiny post office.

He saw that she took driving seriously, like her father, but without his fixed expression and the elevated, complicated status he gave to what was essentially a point A to point B exercise.

“That’s where he baptized the kids,” he said, pointing down to the dried-up creek, now a bed of gray rocks. They had turned off the road and stopped after crossing a small bridge.

“Who?”

“Pastor Chernenko. He owned the property. Maybe he still does. My mother had this thing about fresh air and getting out into the country. An arrangement was made at the tabernacle down in the city for some of the kids to come up here for a couple of weeks each summer. Actually, Vera and I were here for several summers for four or five weeks before the other kids joined us. There was just Pastor Chernenko and these old Ukrainian women and Vera and myself. Every night he would deliver a sermon in the tabernacle. He was on fire all the time.”

“What would you do all day?”

“Worry. Moan. Be homesick as hell. He baptized the children in the creek.”

“Were you baptized?”

“No. I couldn’t let him touch me. I couldn’t give him that power. He wanted to take something away from me by lowering me in that cold, cold water. He wanted to make me his. All the Christ Jesus people were like that. I screamed at Luke and Vera not to let Pastor Cohn at the tabernacle in the city lower them into the water but they didn’t listen. They just went ahead anyway, Pastor Cohn leaning them backward in the baptismal font. Dangerous rituals inflicted by the Christ Jesus people on perfection-driven children is the way I see it. They want to make you like those automatons in The Manchurian Candidate.”

“Your brother and your sister don’t seem like automatons.”

“That’s because I warned them with my scream, even if they did go ahead.”

“Why do you say ‘Christ Jesus’ instead of ‘Jesus Christ.’”

“Because that’s the way they speak. Christ Jesus has more power, more passion, than the other way around. They can stretch it more and hang out longer in it than Jesus Christ, and in the end that’s all they have is their words.”

Things were closer together than he remembered. And smaller, too. The big white house at the top of the hill certainly was. It had the look of death upon it. The wraparound porch was in disrepair and, peering in through a broken window pane, Luther could see a glass chandelier in the dining hall dangling from exposed electrical wiring.

“They were trying to take our childhood from us with their old rugged cross. But they didn’t have to go away just like this, did they? Just vacate the premises with no forwarding address?”

“Maybe they died,” Sarah said.

The canteen with the conical roof facing the house, where the children had gone to purchase candy, was gone, and the roof had fallen in on the aluminum-sided tabernacle where Pastor Chernenko had offered his blazing sermons long into the cool nights. And the rutted, rocky dirt road had been paved over, spreading blackness where nature had been.

“It started there,” Luther said, pointing to the overgrown field down from the house and the tabernacle.

“What started where?”

“That’s where the children ran after ignoring Pastor Chernenko’s call at the end of his sermon that they come to the prayer rail and kneel on the dirt floor and be washed in the Blood of the Lamb, the way he called to us every night so we could weep and wail and beg God for forgiveness of our filthy ways. Because Pastor Chernenko said we were filth, and only the Blood of the Lamb could cleanse us. But that night we all bolted out the door and into the night and down to the field, where we fell on each other, boys on girls, as if we had all heard the same silent signal. Pastor Chernenko and his Christ Jesus counselors beat the grass looking for us, but we were beyond his summoning words by now. We had our bodies to live in and our senses to enjoy. He wanted us to find God but we found each other instead. Filth to filth.”

“I wish I could have been there,” Sarah said.

Her words made him uncomfortable. His childhood was his own, his pride and joy. It was all he had and not to be shared beyond what he had just given. He would have to die if it was dissipated.

The site was like the corpse of a loved one. You wanted more from it than it could give. A sense of relief came to him as Sarah drove them away.

Framed photos hung in the new barn. The Van Dines had a history of their own, an organized one: Lydia with her dowager grandmother and alcoholic uncle; a wedding photo of Lydia and Peter, bride and groom emerging from a Cambridge church to a shower of rice; Peter’s father in a top hat and tuxedo at the wedding ceremony; the houses in Vermont and Minnesota where they had lived before coming to New York City; photos of the children. The wedding photo summoned fear, showing as it did the Van Dines throwing open doors and allowing people to share in the bigness of their life. He saw that he could never marry, not in that way. He had no community. Who would come?

The photo that most drew him was of Sarah out on the lawn in a white party dress with a big bow. Four or five and gazing up at a cake on an outdoor table. The gaiety and freedom of the Van Dines’ lives on display. There had been no hellfire and brimstone for the Van Dine children; there had been rich green lawns and birthday parties and adults who enjoyed laughter and cocktails and Broadway shows and, yes, sex. There had been no place for the gnashing of teeth. He wondered that Sarah could have wished she had been with him there at that Bible camp of pain and renunciation. It would not be wise to tell her how all his early life he had longed for and sought the bounty of America seen in billboard advertisements for Chevrolet cars or heard in train whistles and the show tunes like “Hardhearted Hannah” his older sister Rachel would play on the upright in his parents’ bedroom while Naomi belted out the lyrics. It would not be wise to tell her what it meant to him that she had been on this side of the mountain in this world of light and, yes, worldliness, all those days and nights he had lain curled in a fetal position moaning for his mother to take him away from that camp of daily humiliation and punishment on the other side, or the anguish that came to him when he considered the paradise that might have been denied him if the feel-good speed Vera was on that night several months before had not led her to reluctantly offer him Sarah’s name.

Now he could have both sides of the mountain and he could have two histories as well and he could make them his own. One alone was America but the two of them together made for America even more. One was his past and the other his present that would someday be past and it would be for him to hold onto all of it so he could have the thread of his life in hand because a person needed something to hold onto.

Pastor Chernenko came to him that night, and the Ukrainian women with their baskets of laundry set out to dry in the rocky fields came to him, and the rough pine bench came to him, and Angel and Clementino and Peanuts and Eddie and Felipe and Alma and counselors for Christ Bob Pellalugra and his wife, June, came to him, and “Rescue the Perishing” came to him, as if to say that they would be with him forever in the sunshine and the darkness of his life, because if they weren't there then what would be to give him a story to tell?

And his mother, she came to him, too, calling to him, calling to him, in her sorrow.

And yet, a world of light it may have been, but he was a visitor to this world and someday soon would have to leave. But leave for where, Roberto's shabby apartment? How he longed for an apartment of his own to which only he had the key and in which he could exist alone. Of course, Sarah would come to visit. They wouldn't live together but she would stop by, every day, so they could keep their love alive.

Every day they said now, "I love you," he to her and she to him. And yet some feeling of soreness began to grow in him. He had left himself vulnerable by quitting his job to be among the rich with their easy days and endless resources. And though Sarah had been only too happy to move out to the new barn with him, he had begun to notice how she liked to linger in the house in the evening, playing one silly game of hearts after another, how a whole hour would pass and she would still be there chatting away and having a good time while he waited for her in the new barn.

And of course she would have to pay for such laughter, such happiness, apart from him, as in the long ago his mother had to pay for reciting a litany of names—"Hannah, I mean Naomi, I mean Rachel, I mean..." when his name was none of those. And make his mother pay he did by retreating to his room rather than sit at the dinner table, causing her to come and inquire why he was not eating. And of course he was waiting for her, living for those footsteps in the hallway to approach his room, and when she arrived he gave her just what she deserved. Nothing. He gave her nothing, as she had given him nothing or worse than nothing for slighting him.

“I have made your very favorite, creamed chicken and rice. Please come and eat before the food gets cold.”

He answered with his silence, just dispatched her, as if to say, I do not need you, I do not want you, now go away. And so she went away, asking what ailed him as she left, and now there was nothing to do but wait for her return, as her return was all that gave meaning to his life, and she did return, with more sorrow but not enough sorrow in her voice, and this time he did speak when she said,

“But Luther, what is the meaning of this that you do not eat?”

Luther saying, “I don’t want your food. I don’t ever want your food. Throw it away. Give it to the dogs.”

Causing her to say, “You treat me like dirt. All my children, every one of you treats me as if I were nothing but dirt beneath your shoes,” her words making her cry and cry, just cry so helplessly, and causing Luther to do the same, because his anger could not leave him until she had cried, until he had made her see what she had done and she had made him see, with her tears, what he had done.

And now it was Sarah taking him for granted and mocking him with her laughter and her happiness with each minute more that she stayed out there at the house. He pretended to read Moby-Dick while his whole being blazed with the need to inflict punishment, his ears straining for the sound of her footsteps on the flagstone steps outside. When the big wooden door slid open he allowed her to see his sickness, as his mother had seen it back in his childhood room. Because he had begun to forget where he was, how much fear he had started with of the Van Dines. The current of his anger was too strong to resist.

“Is something wrong?” Sarah said when he failed to greet her.

“Did I say anything was wrong?” he replied, his resentment such that he could not make eye contact.

“You sound angry or upset.”

“Get lost.”

“What?” “

“I said get lost.”

“Why?”

“I said get out.”

“But why?” she said, her voice breaking.

She would go to the house. If her parents were still up, they would see her in tears. They would ask her what was wrong. Lydia would have a heart to heart with her. Their opinion of him would darken.

It took a half hour, but she did return. He was waiting for her, and for her only, so he could chase her away again with the whip of vehemence.

He packed his knapsack and headed off down the hollow in the dark, with a flashlight to guide him. He would show them what a man of strength was, that not even their beautiful estate could hold him. Along the dirt road he walked, exhilarated by his angry resolve and anticipating the shock Sarah would experience when she and all of them realized he had vacated the premises. A porch light burned on the rundown house of the caretaker Everett, illuminating an old refrigerator to the side of the front door and a lawn littered with the remains of a tractor and a rusted thresher. The light he wanted to see was a different one, his ears straining for the sound of the jeep's engine. Several times he stopped, but in the silence heard only the constant of water flowing in the brook and farther on, the barking of a dog, probably from the trailers situated a short distance from the main road. Now he would have to finish what he started. He would actually have to leave. Oh my God, he thought. He had evicted himself from paradise.

But then he heard it, not the cricket chorus or the brook but the sound of an engine and the lights, he saw lights as he turned , and a prettier sound or sight he had never experienced. There she was, Sarah, at the wheel of the jeep with its top down. Not that he could show his happiness. He could not give Sarah that, having already given her too much.

"Mommy says we have a sadomasochistic relationship," Sarah said, as they lay in bed that night.

"That doesn't sound good," Luther said.

"Don't worry. She laughed. She thinks it's funny."

"Funny?"

"She likes you. She thinks you're serious. She had an Armenian boyfriend when she was in college. She said she met him in a drugstore."

"Always the best place to meet an Armenian," Luther said.

"You weren't really going to leave, were you?"

“I don’t know,” he said. And he didn’t.

The Van Dines had guests that summer. A homosexual advertising executive brought his own blender and plied the other guests with drinks, one strong daiquiri after another, as everyone sat around the pool: an acerbic office secretary and former actress, with a bitter tone in her voice, who was said to be writing a novel about the Van Dines with the working title “Beautiful Losers”; the Kleiners, Gerhard and Sandra; the Capicis, Maggio and Sally. They appeared to Luther as satellites orbiting around the Van Dine sun. Like children they were, seeking the approval of Peter and Lydia and in competition for their love. They arrived separately and left separately. While together on the property they could talk among each other, but had too little in common to engage on their own.

Gerhard Kleiner was a photojournalist for a German magazine, and traveled far and wide for stories. A boyish smile came easily to his round face, and he had reason to be happy. An Austrian émigré to America, he had done well, with a house just outside Phoenicia and an apartment in Riverdale, down in New York City. He also had an American wife. Sandra was a friend of Lydia’s going back to boarding school, a woman who possessed beauty but little confidence and extreme shyness. The marriage was a childless one, Gerhard not wishing to be a father. “Gerhard is the child in that family,” Luther heard Peter say.

Though Sandra, with her full figure, possessed the sexy beauty of a pinup girl, she was not enough for Gerhard. Luther could see the satyr’s gleam in Gerhard’s eyes when he looked at Claire and Sarah and imagined the same lust directed at others in the course of Gerhard's travels. Gerhard possessed a large appetite for life; there was little he desired that he would deny himself, Luther was sure.

"The rest of you is nothing to speak about, but I like the way your hair falls down the back of your neck. If I could have that, I would be happy," Gerhard said to Luther one evening, up at the lean-to, in his heavily accented English, while Peter tended to the steaks sizzling on the grill. Having disposed of Luther, he then turned to Sarah. "Have you finished with high school?"

"Not quite. But I'm not going back."

"What will you do?"

"There is an art school in Boston. Maybe I can get in. Maybe not," Sarah said.

"I go to Boston in my travels. You will be sure to give me your address and we will have dinner. Yes?"

"Sure," Sarah said.

Gerhard had managed to hurt and unsettle him, but it was a beautiful early evening in July, the sky cloudless and the air soft, and one he wanted to remember. The beam of lust in Gerhard's eye was the same beam Luther recognized in his own. What Luther discerned when he turned to Sandra was a sexual being who would be as sensitive to his touch as a tuning fork, even if he was, as Gerhard seemed to suggest, a piece of human garbage whose only value was the hair trailing down his neck.

Now, when making love with Sarah, an image would come to him of Sandra slowly removing her tight white blouse and skirt and sitting on the edge of a bed in only her black bra and panties and garter belt. At such times and others, he would feel so strongly that he knew this woman he had hardly said more than hello to. As when he reached out with his hand for Maura's leg in that room in the Morningside Arms in the long ago, the urge to explore continued. "Can I know you? Can you be known to me?" Why could that not be a question for posing wherever men and women chanced to meet?

If Gerhard Kleiner was prideful about his vocation, Maggio Capici was rather vague. "I do some work for the government," he said, without elaborating, and in so doing removed from anyone's mind the possibility that his brawn might be in the service of the Mob. About his past he was more precise: circus performer, Hollywood stunt man, and, briefly, a Wall Street broker.

"Look at the bulge toward the very bottom of his left pant leg. He carries a holstered gun strapped to his calf," Sarah said. "Mommy says she has heard that he works in the prison corrections system down in the city and that the weapon, which is licensed, is for protection from any released inmates who might want revenge. She says there is a degree of brutality behind that smile."

"She says that to you, about his brutality?"

"Mommy is very perceptive, but then, she is not the only one who can see things."

"See what?"

"I'm not sure, but Maggio may have been her lover for a brief while."

"Why do you say so?"

"Well, when he hugs her as a greeting, she shivers. She has to stifle a moan.

Mommy is love starved. It's not easy for her."

“Why is that?”

“Because she is married to a man who won’t make love to her or can’t make love to her.”

“How do you know that?”

“It’s no secret. Mommy is very, very physical, and Daddy isn’t interested anymore. So she has turned to other lovers.”

“Recently?”

“Probably not. But look at her sometime during dinner. She doesn’t just eat. She devours. Her mouth is a giant gash built for consumption.”

“How can you talk with such detachment about your mother and her sexuality? I could never get near to imagining my mother’s sex life. It would be violating a taboo.”

“There are a lot of taboos that get violated around here,” Sarah said.

“What do you mean?”

“Just what I said ,” Sarah said, and said no more.

They had walked up to the meadow, past the shale pile Peter and Everett drew on for their bridge project. By the gnarled trunk of an apple tree they made love. It had become their way to couple outdoors, either in the meadow or down behind the barn, when no one was around.

Malcolm and Lenore were by the pool as he and Sarah headed back down the path. Since Malcolm’s return from the city, he and Lenore kept to themselves. Those times Luther would encounter Malcolm alone the conversation was perfunctory, and Lenore continued her unwillingness to so much as look his way, let alone speak to him.

He was not welcome in their world, they made clear. Had Lenore told Malcolm about that one night by the pool? If so, would Malcolm not have felt obliged to confront him? Luther didn't know. It was hard for him to imagine how a mind like Malcolm's worked.

But Maggio. If there was opacity about his work life, his desire was easy to discern. There he was all nakedness.

"Hello, Princess," he said, ogling Claire, who lay in her bikini on a swinging sofa on the terrace. She was darker than Sarah, and her sunglasses gave her a starlet quality.

"Stop," Claire said, clearly pleased.

"Stop when I've only begun?" Maggio replied.

Sally, Maggio's own, also had a roving eye, and it roamed all over Malcolm. "He takes my breath away. What I would do to him if I only could," she said, giving voice to her lust.

The middle-aged were among the beautiful young. Luther could only feel wounded that he was not among them, not within the scope of Sally's ardor, as he did at being a less than worthy focus for Peter's camera lens.

He had been reintroduced to his ordinariness, his plainness. He was not among life's chosen. Try as he might, he would always be among the bottom-dwellers in terms not only of intellect but also beauty and physical prowess. If he was to live, it would have to be in some other place within himself, he saw, unless he wished to forfeit for all time a measure of peace and self-acceptance. But what a thing to digest.

That evening Lydia served dinner out on the terrace. Maggio and Sally had come bearing several bottles of red wine and a chocolate cake from what Maggio said was the finest bakery in all of Brooklyn. “Isn’t it something?” Maggio asked of the Beaujolais.

“Oh, it is, Maggio. It goes just perfect with the steak,” Lydia said.

“Very smooth taste,” Peter said.

And similar comments were they obliged to make about the rich dessert, so eager for their verdict was Maggio. The Van Dines meant something to Maggio, born of an Italian father and a Jewish mother and a lifelong resident of Bensonhurst, Brooklyn. It wasn’t every day that he and Sally got to enter a world such as the one the Van Dines had created at Camp.

As for Sally, a few glasses of wine gave her the confidence she needed to talk about her job. The law firm she worked for was first rate, she said. The partners all came from top Ivy League law schools. “They handle some very important clients, including big-name politicians,” Sally assured the Van Dines.

Children trying to impress, Luther thought. Children seeking the blessing of the king and queen. Needy children, like himself.

“You should go back to that boyfriend of yours, the one in the East Village,” he said one afternoon, as they sat on the lawn.

“Why should I do that?”

“Because I can tell you miss him.”

“Miss him? I don’t even think of him.”

“How can that be? You call out to him in your sleep.”

“No, I don’t.”

“You do. ‘Ned, I love you. I miss you.’ Twice last night you sat up and said just that.”

“No, I didn’t.”

“It’s OK. I understand. It’s taken a while for you to see that I am not quite what you were looking for. I could have told you that would happen.”

“I’m not listening to this anymore,” Sarah said, and walked off to be with Claire and Brian by the pool.

Someone would come along to claim her for his own. Why not make it happen sooner rather than later, even if it meant lying? Exaggeration was sometimes needed to get at the truth. What was the alternative? Was he supposed to live in dread of the inevitable day after day? The fact that she hadn’t agreed with him, not about Ned but the viability of their relationship, didn’t mean that she wouldn’t somewhere down the road, when he was even more dependent and helpless. No, no. Punishment was needed, and of the severe kind, if she was not to obliterate him.

That night he holed up in the new barn again, having declined to join the family for dinner down in Phoenicia. He would show her what such disloyalty meant, he thought, as he heard the Chrysler rattle the boards of the small bridge. Even more than when she hung back in the house with the family playing hearts on some evenings would he punish her. Laughing, eating, drinking, having a good time. She would see.

Of course, they took their sweet time coming back, and she would have to pay for that as well. When the car rumbled back over the bridge, when finally they had the decency to return, did she come running to say how much she missed him and how she wanted him to stay in her life forever and ever? No, she did some more of her dawdling, just as his mother would dawdle as a way of denying him as a child. And what kind of dawdling did Sarah do? The vicious kind. She hung back in the house and played that blasted game of hearts. Oh yes, did everything have to be paid for. Everything.

She had learned something of his ways by now, and so she did not come to him with a mind of innocence as to what she might find. Even so, she did not expect the intensity of his fury, which hunger had added to, a blast of anger that flung her back to the house and made her question his sanity.

But her father did not question Luther's sanity. He spent no time pondering the condition of Luther's mind. He had seen his long, sad face and his hostile action with the rifle. He had seen him be vile toward his daughter on his very own property and he would not have it anymore. He, too, slid open the door of the new barn, but it was not for Luther to expel the older man back to the main house with the force of his peeve. Peter held his ground and held it strong. In fact it was he who drove Luther back with the force of his own words, saying, "If there is one more instance of abuse of my daughter, I will personally evict you from this property. I will not have your darkness dulling her bright and shining light. Have I made myself clear? Well, have I?" and took a threatening step toward the speechless Luther, who could only say, "Yes, of course, I will see what I can do."

“Never mind with your seeing, young man. Do not mince words with me. You will not abuse my daughter. Is that clear?”

“Yes, of course,” Luther said. “Clear as the day and dark as the night.”

“I am warning you,” Peter said.

“I have heard. Believe me, I have heard,” Luther said.

And so Peter withdrew his force, and Luther could only marvel how he had turned a pacific man bellicose. And he could only wonder at the great peace that came to him following the talking-to. Yes, he was stung and humiliated, but those feelings quickly passed. This same father had come to his door at the Morningside Arms, and now he had come again, allowing for the fact that this door was not Luther’s very own but Peter’s.

And in the morning Lydia came to the door of the new barn and entered and held him by the wrists and said to him, wearing the look of an emissary of earnestness that she reserved for those who were dull and below her capacities, “You are a good young man. You must understand you are a good young man. But you must every day choose the light over darkness. You must choose life.”

He wondered at her earnestness and whether she was talking to herself more than him, even if she had come with trowel in hand to show her purposefulness and connection to the earth. He wondered too that her words did not carry more weight, given the power of profundity they were meant to have. The new barn was a large space, and yet she had filled it with an atmosphere of unbearable goodness. On the wall was a photo of her in a similar pose of entreaty, taken by Peter during a performance of The Crucible at the Phoenicia Playhouse, in which she had a starring role some years before, in her magical summer before the burden of family weighed her down.

“He said that to you?” Sarah asked, when she came to Luther that morning after her mother’s departure.

“Yes. He was quite angry.” Luther’s own anger was gone. Peter had somehow dissolved it with his visit the night before, almost miraculously so. Evidently, there were things a man could do that a woman couldn’t.

“He had no right to talk to you like that.”

“Well, it’s his place and his family, so I guess he does.”

“He was just on a power trip,” Sarah said.

“Just a little while ago your mother came to visit me, too.”

“What did she want?”

“She said I should choose life over darkness.”

“Don’t mind Mommy. She gets that way sometimes.”

“What way?”

“She likes to give advice. It eases her sense of sadness and helplessness about her own life.”

“Why should she feel sad and helpless about her life?”

“Mommy’s a coward.”

“That’s a strong word.”

“But it’s the truth. She had her actor’s equity card and could easily have moved on to have a big career in theater. Instead she became a baby factory and subordinated herself to Daddy.”

“Well, lucky for you.”

“I don’t think it’s a good idea to forfeit your calling. I think you pay a price when you do something like that.”

“Maybe she just preferred motherhood and family life.”

“Mommy’s unstable. She’s a nervous wreck whenever she has to get behind the wheel.”

“What do good driving skills have to do with stability?”

“All I mean is that Daddy is the stabilizing force in her life. When she was in college, she began to drift into the bar scene and led a kind of aimless life. Daddy jokes that he found her living with a shoe in the icebox in the refrigerator of the apartment she shared with another girl. Daddy is the only foundation on which she can build. Without him the world is one big swamp in which she slowly sinks.”

“My father used to say of my mother...” Luther stopped.

“Used to say what?”

“Never mind.”

“Tell me. What?”

“That she was his rock. That he couldn’t imagine where he would be without her.”

“Why was that so hard to tell me?”

“I didn’t say it was hard.”

“Yes, you did. By pausing.”

“OK. I did.”

“Are you afraid you’re your father?”

“Are you afraid you’re your mother?”

“I’ll never be my mother. I’ll never get married. I was born to live alone.”

“How do you know?”

“I just do. Some things you know.”

“And that can’t change?”

“Don’t you try to change me.”

“Why would I do that?”

“There are lots of things you try to do, and some of them you succeed at.”

“Like what?”

“Now it’s my turn to say never mind.”

Another car pulled into the driveway that weekend. Rodney and Doris Smith had arrived. Rodney was an advertising copywriter and aspiring actor. Any role in any off-off Broadway play he could get he was grateful for. Lydia said he had a prodigious memory and was able to recite entire scenes from Shakespeare’s plays verbatim. She said he also had a prodigious temper, and had beaten his former wife black and blue. “They were in competition with each other. He would fly into a rage at her successes on the stage. The situation was terrible.”

Luther’s perception of the Van Dine’s newest guest was colored by the information Lydia had imparted. It made Rodney’s amiable manner seem like a performance, a charade. Without difficulty Luther imagined a storm cloud dispelling the smile from that meaty face.

“Luther is a friend of Sarah’s,” Lydia said, by way of introduction.

“And she doesn’t need enemies with a friend like him,” Jeffrey added.

“Is that so?” Rodney replied.

“Daddy says he walks around with a long and disapproving face, as if there isn’t anyone or anything that is good enough for him,” Jeffrey continued.

“I think we’re all misunderstanding Luther. Let’s give him a chance to see what he can do,” Lydia said. “I see great potential in Luther. He just needs time to get untracked.”

That he should have to be spoken for. And yet untracked? Did she mean getting off the set of rails he was on so his route would not be so predictable and predestined? Or did she mean going through life without any rails altogether?

One thing was for sure. Rodney would not be doing to his new wife, Doris, what he had to done to his ex. She was a head taller than Rodney and wider than him as well.

“Rodney met me in Azuma. He came in looking for a watering can. At least that’s what he said. I sold him a red one and the next day he was back to exchange it for a purple one. The third day he came back and said green was his favorite color. So I said to him, ‘Sir, are you certain this is about the watering can? Might there be something else on your mind?’ He was too shy to acknowledge his ulterior motive and so I proposed that we discuss the matter that evening at nearby bar, and the rest is history.”

“What a lovely story of love at first sight,” Lydia said.

“And what color did you finally choose for your watering can?” Claire asked.

“Rodney was leaning toward black but I moved him in the direction of yellow,”

Doris said.

“A wonderful choice. Wonderful. Move toward the light. All of us,” Lydia exclaimed.

“Darkness doesn’t have its place?” Lenore asked, though it was more a statement than a question, given her smile.

“There must be rotations, cycles. But we can’t linger in the dark place. Nothing grows in the dark,” Lydia replied.

“Death grows in the dark, and in the light,” Lenore said. “It grows wherever we are. It’s an ever-present shadow. It’s the call of sleep.”

“Don’t speak that way, Poody. Don’t speak that way,” Lydia said.

“Why?” Lenore asked.

“Better to cultivate laughter than gloom,” Lydia said.

“Laughter hurts after a while, and then it ends,” Lenore said.

“Well yes, of course. But it also starts again.” Lydia puffed on her Tareyton.

That afternoon Malcolm took the wheel of the Sunbeam Alpine, with Lenore beside him, he so blond and she so dark. Luther and Sarah climbed in behind them. Malcolm had been eager to take the convertible for a spin, and there were art supplies Sarah needed down in Woodstock. He drove fast, even on the dirt road leading out of the hollow, and once past the road construction on Route 28 he began to burn rubber once again, one hand on the wheel, while the other dangled outside the door. He was showing off, a stupid grin on his handsome face as he took the turns on the winding stretch of road without any acknowledgment of the Reduce Speed signs. The fucker would get them all killed. “Stop it,” Luther shouted, his words blown about in the strong wind. “Slow down. Point A to Point B driving. Do you understand?” But Malcolm drove in defiance of Luther’s warning, the car descending between two large fields and zooming past a work crew and off the road. Around the thick trunk of an oak tree the car spun, in a full rotation, before coming to a dead stop. No one had been thrown. No one had been injured. They got out to see that, quite amazingly, the headlights had been sheared off.

A member of the work crew came over. Thick-bodied and slow of speech, he said, “You have no idea what mangled bodies look like. Don’t do that again.” He turned and walked off. He had no need of their reply. What could he hope for from people who drove like that? How simple he looked in his jeans and white T-shirt and work boots. How purposeful. A brief longing to know him, to be among that crew, to be on their humble, solid ground, came over Luther.

The imbecilic smile still lingered on Malcolm’s face. He appeared to be in a daze. Sarah took the wheel. That was just as well. Luther wasn’t getting in the car if she didn’t.

Lydia and Peter had words of caution about speeding and driving without a license, but made no great fuss about the expense of replacing two headlights.

But then there was Luther’s recklessness. Several days later he and Sarah went swimming in the nude in the Ashokan reservoir, not far from the town of Woodstock, in spite of the postings against such activity on the site. As they were reclaiming their clothes, Luther heard a cry and glimpsed, against a background of pine trees, men, a large number of them, running toward them. The men were perhaps an eighth of a mile away. “We’ve got to get out of here,” he said, trying to keep the rising sense of panic out of his voice. “Why? What?” Sarah replied, as she pulled on her bellbottoms. “There are men coming. They mean us no good,” he said, gathering her sneakers and bag. He took her hand and began running for the jeep. No time was lost fumbling for the key. She had left it in the ignition. Maybe it was that which saved them. As she pulled onto the road the men were only yards away. Boys, really. A pack of them. One flung a beer bottle, which flew wide of the jeep.

“What did they want?” Sarah asked.

“It was the kind of situation that could get out of control,” Luther said. He didn’t want to say the word rape. He didn’t want to give it a name, or give a name to any of the other things that could have happened.

When Peter got word of the incident, he didn’t scold Sarah and Luther for ignoring the prohibition against swimming in the reservoir. He cast the incident as but another instance of the ugliness of the American temperament. “You can safely assume that there are great numbers out there who, if given half a chance, would maraud over this property and destroy our way of life and us with it. The desecration of beauty is the sole purpose of these folks. ” His tone was emphatic as he stood in front of the dormant fireplace. The cocktail hour had come. Freshly showered, he presented a commanding figure, his hair combed straight back in a power sweep and his nautical white pants and shirt complementing his golden tan.

“Poody, must you express yourself in such an extreme fashion?” Lydia asked, as she handed him an old fashioned. Luther thought of the morning conversations between the two, Lydia a giant ear for Peter’s monologues on the shortcomings of the American empire and of those who founded it. Her gentle query seemed to mitigate a real displeasure with his vehemence and lack of balance, in contrast with her own natural inclination toward the center, not the poles. Was it possible that Peter had intellectualized his personal hurts and that many others did the same thing? And who would these barbarians be, to put a face on them? Would Sal, the restaurateur, be one of the barbarians at the gate? How about Everett, the caretaker? Would he someday show up with club in hand and lay them all low?

“Vision requires what some would call extremism. It comes from seeing what others are afraid to see.”

“Personally, I dig the idea of burning and pillaging. Might be kind of cathartic. What do you say we go down and lay waste to Phoenicia?” Brian laughed, infecting others with his mirth. With those tight black curls around his beautifully shaped head, Luther could see him as a dauphin at the Court of Versailles. How amazing the mocking detachment Brian’s intelligence gave him. Yeats’s poem, “1916,” came to mind, that line about the best lacking all conviction and the worst being full of passionate intensity. Not that Peter was the worst. No one should say a man who was trying to the best of his ability was the worst. Peter had raised a family and earned a Ph.D. and written a book and scholarly articles. He had survived the horror of war and created a refuge from the insanity of the world with the 900-acre estate on which they were now all gathered.

Already he had established a place in Luther's mind. He represented something, even if it was too soon to know what.

That evening Brian strummed on his guitar out on the terrace. The pungent smell of grass lingered from the joint he had smoked. No recognizable tune emerged in the short time he played. His effort seemed to be a series of false starts. And the voice he summoned to accompany his playing never rose above a mumble. After a few such trial runs, he put the guitar aside, as he had the few other times Luther had heard him play.

"Fall is coming. I can feel it in the air," Luther said.

"That worry you, man?"

"I guess. School. Where to live. Money. Stuff like that. How about you?"

"How about me, what?"

"Are you worried about the fall?"

"Not me. I'll take a few courses. Beat the draft. Work on my music."

"How will you work on your music?"

"Get my shit together with a band, like we were doing at the beginning of the summer."

My shit. My music. He made it sound as if music were some sort of possession. More a dreamer and an idler than a resident of the real world. How did anyone form a band with so little talent and a daily tendency toward lassitude?

"I've made a decision not to go back to Barnard in the fall," Claire said.

"Why would you do that?" Luther asked.

"I find the coursework overwhelming."

“But it’s such a great school. What would you do?”

“I’ll take a semester off and try to transfer to another college in the city.”

“What? Like NYU?”

“Maybe Hunter.”

“You would go from an elite college to a very ordinary school? Hunter is like City College, my school. They are both part of the City University.”

“The prestige factor doesn’t really mean anything to me.”

“I would have given anything to go to a great college. It really bothers me that I didn’t,” Luther said.

“You could have gone to Columbia,” Claire said.

“No. I’m cursed with looking smarter than I am. Trust me, I was lucky to get into college at all,” Luther said.

“I’m sure that’s not true,” Claire said.

“One of my sisters went to Barnard. She transferred there for her junior year,” Luther said. It made him feel proud, if only briefly, to mention this one academic accomplishment in his family.

“What is she doing now?” Claire asked.

“I don’t know. I’ve kind of lost touch with her. She’s a bit older. Like twelve years older.”

“That’s a lot,” Claire said.

“I have two other sisters who are even older.”

“The same mother and father?”

“Yes,” Luther said. The question threw him. He couldn’t picture either of his parents with anyone else, or at least his mother.

“So how many are you altogether? I think you talked about it the other week down at Sal’s, but you got embarrassed. I could tell. You shouldn’t be ashamed of your family.”

“You saw that?”

“We all did.”

“I have four sisters and a brother.”

“That’s a lot of sisters.”

“That’s what Quentin says.”

“Quentin?”

“Quentin Compson, in The Sound and the Fury. ‘Do you have a sister? Do you even know what a sister is?’ or something like that.”

“I don’t read much fiction, I’m afraid,” Claire said.

“It’s like eating dessert and forsaking the main meal, I guess.”

“I wasn’t suggesting that fiction is light and frivolous,” Claire replied.

He was glad he had said what he did about barely getting into college. It took some of the pressure off. Now he wouldn’t have to pretend to be smarter than he was, at least with Claire and Brian. And he had done so without confessing to his low board scores. Those scores. How they stayed in his mind as something he would have to live with forever and ever. Not a day went by that they didn’t find their way into his thoughts, reminding him of his station in life.

It troubled him that Claire would consider leaving a prestigious college like Barnard to attend a lesser school. People did have stations in life, and it caused unhappiness when those who belonged in the lower stations illegitimately claimed higher terrain and those above them abdicated their lofty spaces. It just didn't seem right.

Sarah had set up an easel in the horse stable below the new barn. There she would paint for long hours portraits which, had she not told him, he would never have regarded as of herself, so distorted were her features on the canvases. During those hours he would walk about or lounge by the pool with a book, as the Van Dines seemed to have no need of his services. "You're our guest. Just relax and enjoy yourself," Lydia said. And so he did. Neither Brian nor Malcolm were given tasks to perform either, so far as he could see. It really was a life of leisure, at least for him and the other guests.

When the clouds came, they came in earnest and to stay, though generally in the later part of the day. On one such day, as rain began to fall, he headed for shelter. The sliding door of the new barn was open, and through the screen door he saw Jeffrey on the bed. His shirt was on but his pants were down around his ankles and his butt was exposed. Under him someone lay. Who that person was Luther couldn't tell. Unseen by either party, he withdrew to the terrace. The rain having eased, he stood under the long green leaves of the rhododendron covering the latticework on the terrace. He couldn't call what he was experiencing pain. It felt more like the excitement that comes in anticipation of a moment of great revelation. Here and there he saw others—Malcolm and Lenore walking across the lawn heedless of the rain still lightly falling and Brian and Claire on the front porch—and as he did, his fear grew. That lyric from the Dylan song came loudly into his mind, the one about something happening and Mr. Jones not knowing what it was.

But then he did know. He waited long enough for Jeffrey to come down those steps and toward the house, his khaki trousers pulled up and fastened, and for Jeffrey to look his way. His eyes said everything. But Sarah. If her eyes said something, it was nothing he could see.

There was rioting in New York City that summer, and then Newark went up in flames. Trouble spread up the river as well, violence breaking out in Poughkeepsie. Luther saw the discord through the lens of childhood, those summers in the long ago when bicycle caravans of Negro boys from Harlem would migrate to the welfare hotels on his street and visit their unending anger on the neighborhood white boys, beating them to the pavement with their fists and then beating them some more. Then as now, the violence left him afraid that it would find him personally. He thought of Sandra Leventhal, his political science instructor, and how she would have mocked and taunted him for his fear.

But the city was calling to him and so he said his goodbyes. Lydia had him sign the guest book, which presented a challenge, as he had invested much energy in projecting an image of intelligence, applying a crazy intensity to mundane reading matter such as Time magazine while the others pursued their frivolous card games. Altogether Camp had reintroduced him to his ignorance about nature, about history, about so many things, and he was desperate to catch up, to provide the cover of facts for his nakedness, a kind of armor that would make him impervious to the laughing thing that people could put on each other. “We know you will provide le mot juste,” Lydia said, as all eyes turned to him in the living room. He glanced at some of the other entries, so witty, so clever. “The wind/a sigh/Claire and I,” Brian had written. Even Malcolm’s entry shone brightly on the page: “Where keyed-up executives unwind.”

“Well, that’s very sweet, Luther. So sincere. So gentle,” Lydia said, reading the words he had penned, but Luther saw the disappointment on her face. All he had been able to come up with was “It’s been nice, so nice. Thank you so much.” An atmosphere of depression settled over the room as others saw what he had inscribed.

“A wordsmith, if ever I saw one,” Brian mocked.

“Stop it.” Claire’s rebuke of her boyfriend only worsened things, as she must have known it would.

“Enchanté,” Lydia said, escorting Luther out to the waiting jeep. He waved his goodbyes as Sarah drove him off to the bus stop, where he hadn’t long to wait, his goodbye to her coming faster than he had wanted it to.

“I’ll be down next week. I promise,” she said.

As the bus drew nearer to the city, greenery gave way to strip malls and clogged traffic arteries and the indigent and depraved hanging about the Port Authority Bus Terminal. The filth and the seediness of the surrounding streets under the scorching sun brought back end-of-the-world thoughts and only increased his longing to be back in the Shangri-La he had found up at Camp.

But he had things to do. Roberto frightened him. Something was off with him. He wasn't quite right in the head. Like Fred, the troubadour, and Brian, the mumbling man, he had taken to playing the guitar. All that yapping about his music and his jam sessions with Jimi Hendrix when all Luther heard were the same false starts as Brian. He feared that Roberto might have taken one too many acid trips. Some smoldering menace lurked behind that fake smile. Some serious lunacy was gestating in his roommate's mind.

Besides, Luther needed a place of his own, where he could be alone with Sarah and with a clean kitchen he could happily set foot in. And he found such a place. Gorgeous, simply gorgeous. A fourth-floor walkup in an old building just off Eightieth Street and Riverside Drive. A southern exposure and a modern kitchen and bath and a cantilevered table he could use for a desk. And fully furnished. What more could he ask? Twenty-four dollars a week was steep, but maybe he could get back his part-time job at the post office. Besides, he wouldn't have to worry about money. Not right away with the big student loan he had received.

"You'll be back. Don't think you won't," Roberto said. He had taken to wearing sunglasses, even indoors.

Luther visited with his mother to tell her the good news. Mr. Fitzpatrick was waiting for him in the lobby. "Have I not told you that your mother is in need of a few good men? Have I not told you?"

And now here came Melvin, having stepped from the elevator into the lobby. "I am on my mission today to spread the word of God, Luther. I will be in Times Square. I must do good. I must be good. I must be whiter than snow. Do I look whiter than snow, Luther? Do I?"

"You look fine," Luther said, although torment clearly showed on Melvin's face, some howling loneliness not even God could vanquish.

"Satan tells me to jump out the window, and I say to Satan, Get thee behind me. I don't like to be short with anyone, Luther, even the devil, but sometimes we must take a stand."

"You mustn't listen to that voice, Melvin." Melvin's head like that of an animal on a human body. A giant rabbit. A hedgehog. Or Vincent Van Gogh with a bandaged ear in a tortured self-portrait.

"Thank you, Luther. That means something to me, what you just said."

Luther went on his way, relieved to be free of the burden of Melvin. Luther had been afraid of screaming if he stayed another minute in the unfortunate man's company. Poor Melvin. He wasn't a hedgehog or a rabbit but a bewildered deer that had strayed onto the mean streets of Manhattan.

"Have you been looking for me, my son?" His mother spoke above the racket of the giant washer, in whose steel belly the dirty linens of the tenants were rendered clean, and the whirring extractor and the more gentle drier, which left the sheets and towels and pillowcases warm and soft. The big fan only blew the hot basement air around. How could his mother stand it down here, he wondered, watching her feed a sheet into the canvas-covered rollers of the enormous mangle? Slowly, the machine pulled the sheet through. How satisfying to see it fall pressed and in folds onto a board. But why did she do such menial work, and at her age? It had to be fear. She was afraid of more complex tasks, and derived the same comfort from tending to the building's laundry as he had from boxing mail for the United States government. Everyone needed a task he or she could do well, menial or not. And yet it was work to avoid work that she was doing, in some way, work that reinforced some image of herself. "I'm not afraid of a little dirt, not like some of these ladies in the building." Isn't that what she would say, showing her farm girl scorn of gentility.

"I just wanted to say hello." And it was true. The time came when he had to see her. It was just there, within him, to do that. The inner clock.

"So you have been in the fresh air?" She had turned off the mangle.

"I was."

"It must have been very beautiful."

"It is."

"They are very educated people?"

"Her father is a historian. He just wrote a book," Luther said.

"Such a fine mind he must have. Your father has a fine mind as well, you know.

He speaks five languages."

"I know. I do."

"He hasn't had an easy time, and now he is preparing to be with the Lord."

"I know that."

"They must have means."

"I guess they do."

“And they are happy?”

“I guess so. I don’t really know.”

“Do they have problems?”

“I don’t see any.”

“And their children. How many are there?”

“Four.”

“And they’re all doing well?”

“They’re doing fine.” He felt the weight of his mother pressing him to give her something, some element of pain in others, that she could grab onto. She wanted him to tell her that the world was a suffering place and that she was not alone with family pain and disappointment.

“That is all I want for all my children, that we be together in Heaven.”

“Right. Heaven,” Luther said. “What about Jeanne? Have you heard from her?”

“The girl calls me and tells me she is all right, but I worry.”

“She is thirteen. How all right can she be?” Luther asked.

“It is in the Lord’s hands.”

“What about the police? Have they been notified?”

“Naomi and Chuck have done so. But nowadays, there are so many runaways. It is not normal. We must turn to the power of prayer, Luther.”

He kissed her goodbye, but not without embarrassment at the somehow unbearable intimacy of it.

She called him back as he was leaving. “Some young man has asked for you on the telephone. His name is Luis. He says he knows you from the neighborhood and that he must speak with you.” She handed him the number on a piece of brown paper torn from a grocery bag.

Luis Fontanez, from high school days. The boy who had bragged endlessly about the baseball exploits of Juan Marichal and Orlando Cepeda and the Alou brothers, Felipe and Matty, all of them with the San Francisco Giants, and of the takeout power he possessed in both his fists sufficient to cave in your chest with a hard punch? The same Luis who had mocked Luther for being ashamed to take off his shirt?

“Hey, Luther, how you doing? Look, I’ve got some fucked up news. Sean is dead. He got shipped back from Vietnam in a sealed box. Got his head blown off. Everyone in the troop truck killed when it rolled over a land mine. The fucking VC are a bad scene but I’m up there in a fighter jet bombing the shit out of them.”

Bombing the shit out of them. His words hard and factual. His manner assertive. And no ironical distance between him and the military. He had always been hard and assertive. A boy solidly built, with wiry black hair and brown skin, he threw an exploding fastball in the speed pitching games of stickball they would play. And yet a boy who got on his knees and pleaded with Father Murphy at Bishop DuBois high school not to tell his father of the fight he had been in at the school. Right there in front of Scully’s stoop on Amsterdam Avenue dropping to his knees, his hands together in prayer and looking up, demonstrating how he had implored Father Murphy, saying “Puh-leese, Father Murphy, Puh-leese. Puh-leese.” Because Luis’s own father had no play in him when it came to school, no play whatsoever, and if Luis had takeout power in his fists, it was as nothing next to the pulverizing power of his father. Because Luis loved his father, respected his father, obeyed his father, was proud of his father. His father a baker who came home with flour in his hair. His father someone who busted his tail for Luis. Luis a boy deferential to his father's authority, as he was now obedient to military authority.

Only two years had passed since Luther's time with the boys from Scully's stoop, and yet he could not shake the feeling that Luis was a voice from the long ago, the passage of time accelerating the differences that had always existed between them. A sense of urgency set in to get off the line before Luis saw that the only thing in common they shared was the death of a friend and that they were otherwise strangers to each other. Before Luis could say, "What about you, Luther? How come you are not in the war?"

That night, in his studio apartment, he dreamt that he was on an island staring out at the vast sea. A speck appeared on the horizon and as it approached grew larger. It was a vessel, a rowboat, and Sean was pulling the oars. An atmosphere of tranquility prevailed, and yet the methodical nature of Sean's rowing and the absence of a smile on his face suggested dark intent. "What is it that you want?" Luther called to Sean, who felt no obligation to respond or even acknowledge the question.

The next afternoon he went to pay his respects. Such a word, respects, that it should be plural, not singular, he thought, hurrying east along the rowdy side street to the funeral home on the corner of Amsterdam Avenue. Tenements and hard-nosed Irish and Puerto Ricans, beaten into their toughness by the brothers and nuns at the school of the Ascension and Holy Name, farther south. The kids who would arrive en masse at the Loews Theater down on Broadway and within a minute be throwing things and punching each other out and giving the ushers all they could handle. The Catholic church a cold, alien domain of endless ritual and ornately clad clergy and incense and Latin carried to the farthest reaches of vast cathedrals by powerful choral voices.

“I’m so sorry,” Luther said, to Sean’s diminutive, white-gloved mother, with her beauty parlor gray hair. Hard to believe Sean had once broken her jaw.

“Thank you for coming,” she said, and placed her hand on his. But then, glancing uncomfortably at the wild mass on his head, she went on, “Is this really you, Luther?”

“I believe so,” Luther said. It was not for him to tell her his hair was necessary to conceal the absence of roundness. Nor could he tell her the same solution had been unavailable to Sean, given that more hair on a head of that gargantuan size would only have added to the oddity problem he had been born with. And if it was not his place to share these inappropriate meditations on the tragic dimensions of one Sir Blockhead and one Sir Hammerhead, it was also not her place to directly approach the matter of his hair, but merely to come to the brink of that discussion with her question, Is this really you? But if she could not come forward directly, she had a hubby who could.

“We have barbers in New York City,” Sean’s father said, striking Luther with his bluntness.

“Yes, I have been to them,” Luther said.

“When? Five years ago? Your hair weighs more than you do.”

“Well now, it has been good seeing you, Luther. You take care of yourself,” Sean’s mother said, taking her husband with her to meet with other mourners.

Perhaps it was his dream of the night before that prevented him from embracing the finality of death. And how did you mourn the dead when they had already, in a sense, become dead to you, assigned to a chapter in your life which you might return to in your thoughts but where you couldn’t stay.

“Fucking Luther. Dag, man, is that you?”

Luis stood before him, a head shorter, showing that same pugnacious demeanor, as if he lived for putting holes in people’s chests. And yet he was also different. His black, wiry hair was neatly trimmed and the baby fat was gone. The military had toned and matured him, removed him from One Hundred Ninth Street and dropped him into a larger theater. You went into the military a boy and came out a man. Wasn’t that the saying?

“Hello, Luis.”

“What the fuck happened to you, man? You got all that shit on your head.”

“Yes, shit on my head,” Luther said, resigned to another conversation about his hair.

“That’s fucked up, Sean gone like that. Didn’t even have time to know where he was at before they got him. It happens that way. The first month and the last month are fucking dangerous. That’s why I stay in the fucking air, man. Ain’t putting me on the ground so’s I can be gook meat.”

“That sounds like a good plan,” Luther said. It had all been a waste, coming to show his respects—that word again—but no one respecting him. Not that they should. Oh, it wasn’t for him to figure out but to just get through.

“What kind of plan you got, Luther? What you doing with your life?”

“Credits. I’m getting credits. Or trying to.”

“Credits? What is that?”

“College credits.”

“You best stay there. The service wouldn’t want you. You’re all skinny and strange-looking. You take care of yourself. Dag, man. Dag.” Luis laughed.

Luther didn’t dally at the funeral home. He had no need of a reunion with the boys from Fatso Scully’s stoop. He would contemplate the deceased Sean alone; Sean taking out the bully Frenchie the Algerian, who had dropped shavings of dry ice onto Sean’s head from atop the batting cage down in Riverside Park in the long ago; Sean bellowing “A Foggy Day in London Town.” He would remember the antimacassars with which Sean’s mother covered the sofa and the upholstered chair in their living room and the sliver of a room off the living room Sean called his own, and from which he could look out at the gloomy Cathedral of St. John, and Sean’s left-handed stance in the batter’s box and Anthony Newley singing “For Once in My Lifetime” in Stop the World! I Want to Get Off, for which Sean had gotten them tickets. And he would be stunned that Sean’s takeout power had met a bigger power.

The next day he bought a soft yellow spread for his bed, which added to the room’s cheery brightness, and a throw rug, on which he sat weeping while Donovan sang “Seasons of the Witch.’ And he had a place in his heart for some of Joan Baez’s sad and soulful songs as well, though neither her songs nor Donovan’s had the razor blades found in Dylan’s songs. He could only be sad that his life was not worthy of being set to their music; he had no more sadness left, at least on that day, for Sean.

Sarah came to his studio apartment on her return to the city the next week. Now, when they made love, a faceless man was present, standing by the side of the bed, his big, thick penis erect and swollen. The man was a comforting and eroticizing figure, and in no way intrusive or unwelcome. This development was nothing to share with Sarah. Such a disclosure could only do harm. As for himself, he accepted that sex was a complex arena, in which diverse elements might appear to move the action forward.

Luther wondered if that faceless man might be Sarah’s father, and sought to dispel such a notion from his mind. Jeffrey too was in his thoughts, and more problematically, given the activity Sarah and her brother had engaged in. How often was this activity occurring, and what did it mean? Luther didn’t consider Jeffrey a rival, as how could his girlfriend’s younger brother be such a thing. And yet. And yet.

“Is your brother, Jeffrey, OK?”

“What do you mean?” Sarah replied.

“I just sometimes...”

“Sometimes what?”

“Nothing.”

“He comes to me for sex sometimes, and I let him have his way. He has a huge penis, just like my father.”

“What?”

“It happens less and less. Don’t worry.”

“Did I say I was worried?”

“My family is a house of incest. We do things other families don’t do.”

Sarah’s revelation left her brother’s anatomical attribute lingering in his mind, but in that long month before September and the resumption of classes, the future was of greater concern. He would be in school, but where would Sarah be? And where would they be in relation to each other?

“Mommy has planned a trip with me and Claire, since I’m not going back to Music and Art and Claire is dropping out of Barnard.”

“A trip?”

“We’ll be visiting the capitals of Europe.”

“For how long?”

“Five weeks.”

“Five weeks?” She might as well have said five months. Once again he was no match for her family’s wealth. First she had gone off to their nine hundred acre estate and now she would be going across the pond, where men with sophisticated ways would be waiting for her.

On the Broadway bus the next afternoon he picked up a discarded copy of the Daily News. On page 3 was an article about the murder of an American girl traveling through Europe. While in Paris, the girl had met a young man, with whom she had fallen in love, and wrote to her boyfriend back in Philadelphia to tell him of this development and that she would be traveling with this new friend to other parts of Europe. The hometown boyfriend was from a far less affluent family than the girl, but poor or not, he managed to raise the airfare and flew to Paris, where he tried to win her back. Surprised by his unexpected arrival, the girl nevertheless held her ground, and appealed for his understanding. The article suggested that his working class background made change more difficult for him than it was for a girl with her means. The boy continued with his angry persistence, and when the girl asked him to leave, he lost his head and pulled out a knife and stabbed her to death.

The girl's grieving father, who arrived several days later to claim the body, was quoted as saying that he bore no ill will toward the boy. "He will have to live with the consequences of his act for the rest of his days," the father said.

Luther devoured the article, which he then passed on to Sarah, pushing past his qualms about doing so. She read the article without comment and put the paper down on the empty seat next to her.

"I identify with the boy," Luther said, as they prepared to step off the bus.

"Do you?" she asked, fixing him with her gaze.

"Well, sort of," he said. Dismayed by his lack of judgment in making such a disclosure, he could only hope that she would forget, and her seeming lack of interest in continuing the conversation offered him hope that she would.

Time away from Sarah became hard to bear. Fear would grip him that he had become ordinary in her eyes and that she would leave him behind. He remembered her statement from their first night together at the Morningside Arms. "I'm going to be around for a very long time.” How comforting and reassuring those words had been. But now he was hearing them differently. How long was a “very long time”? Was it one year, two years, five years? It certainly wasn’t forever. Forever meant forever. There was only one thing to do. He must ask Sarah what precisely she had meant, or if that was asking too much, then for a timeframe she had in mind when she made that declaration. Of course, he was taking a risk in bringing up the subject, but sometimes risks of this kind were necessary if peace of mind was to be achieved. And so, on her next visit, in the aftermath of lovemaking, he heard himself say, “Do you see us together a year from now?”

Sarah searched his eyes. “I do.”

“And two years from now?”

“Sure. Why not? Though who can know?”

“Who can know? Right,” Luther said, pondering her response. “But a while ago you said a very long time. A very long time.”

“I said that?”

“I believe so,” he said, aware that he now sounded like a prosecutor taking courtroom testimony.

“Well, I probably meant just that. A long time.”

“But you had said a very long time.”

“What’s the difference? What’s going on here?”

“Nothing. Nothing is going on here.”

“Something is going on. What is it?”

“Never mind.”

“What I probably meant is that we will have something like what Claire and Van had.”

“Van? Van is your father. At least that’s what Pam Becker calls him.”

“Not him. Van Heusel.”

“Oh, yes, of course. Van Heusel, from the famous, even legendary, Van Heusel family. Forgive me for not knowing who he is.”

“He was Claire’s boyfriend through all four years of high school, before she met Brian. That’s how I see us. And you don’t have to be sarcastic.”

He had pegged his life to an utterance she had made in a moment of exuberance after their first night together. The example she offered of Claire and this Van Heusel wasn’t reassuring, and wouldn’t have been if her sister had been with him for twice that number of years. Four years. Eight years. What difference did it make if the relationship ended?

And now there was something else as well. Money. Twenty-four dollars a week was a lot to pay, even for a beautiful furnished apartment. The student loan would not cover his expenses for a full year, and he could not count on the post office taking him back before December.

One afternoon, in the park, he saw Miss Winkles, the elderly landlady, who had shown him the apartment. There she was, sitting on a bench, drawing pigeons to her with bread crumbs.

“Where’s that pretty girlfriend of yours? Has she left you already?”

“Oh, no, we’re doing fine,” Luther said, wondering that the old woman should take such a liberty.

“When you’re old, you get to say whatever comes into your head. Don’t be fooled. We don’t like the young very much.”

“That’s unfortunate,” Luther said.

“What can I do for you? Can’t you see I am very busy?”

Luther couldn’t tell if Miss Winkles was being serious or funny. “I am very busy myself,” Luther said.

“You look very busy, walking around the park with nothing to do. That’s all any of you young people do anymore is walk around in the park. Back in my day, we had a purpose to our lives.”

“What purpose was that, Miss Winkles?”

“Never mind what purpose. And don’t think I didn’t hear freshness in your voice just now. What do you want, anyway? You’re scaring away the pigeons.” In fact the filthy things had scattered in their rickety way only to return.

“I was wondering if you have any other vacancies in the building,” Luther said.

“What’s wrong with what you’ve got?”

“I can’t say anything is wrong.”

“We have a full house.”

“And are all the rents comparable to mine?”

“Some are. A few are higher and one is lower. Mr. Chu, right next door to you, pays ten dollars. But it’s a tiny space. Don’t be making any trouble for me, like trying to skip out on the rent. I’ll track you down if you do.”

There was something he had wanted to say to Miss Winkles but had sensed he mustn’t. It was only this. How very much, at that moment, he wanted to be Miss Winkles, to be old and free to sit on a bench in Riverside Park under a hot summer sun. Because he was very afraid, just so very afraid. The future had become a crushing weight and with his thin bones and thin mind, how was he to deal with it? Back in his junior and senior years of high school, he would stare at the brown-uniformed UPS drivers unloading parcels from their trucks and would wonder why he too couldn’t have a future of quiet, stress-free days driving about the city making such deliveries?

Mr. Chu was an old man with an unsmiling face and a solitary life. Perhaps he was an émigré and would soon rejoin his family in China. Well, Luther would speak with the man, who was sure to be reasonable and understanding of the anxieties of the young about money and why his tiny, ten dollar room might be more appropriate to a student than a man of the world, as Mr. Chu surely was. Mr. Chu would quickly see he deserved and could afford the more ample space that Luther was now living in. A swap. That’s what he would propose to Mr. Chu.

All Luther had ever wanted was a room of his own, just like the title of that Virginia Woolf novel, which he hadn’t read but was meaning to. A room of his own where he could go and feel safe and not face the threat of eviction. A room in line with his needs and his means. Ten dollars. What a perfect amount. And all that stood between him and his happiness was Mr. Chu.

And there Mr. Chu was, that very evening, coming up the stairs with a bag of groceries as Luther was leaving his room.

“I am so happy to see you,” Luther said.

“What you want?”

“I wanted to talk about the possibility of swapping...”

“What is that, swapping?”

“Exchanging.”

“Exchange what?” Mr. Chu pushed past.

“Places. Rooms. You could move into my place and I could take yours.” This was more difficult than he had anticipated. There had been no meaningful communication with Mr. Chu before, and so it was understandable that his neighbor should be resistant. But did Mr. Chu have to lock him in his sights with a look of complete hostility?

“No swapping. No nothing. Leave alone. Call police you don’t.” Mr. Chu closed his door firmly and turned the lock.

With that rebuff, Luther’s anxiety increased. He responded to ads for roommates in the classifieds, but the leaseholders on the apartments all struck him as homosexual and looking for someone more part of their world than he could be. Night after night he would sit out on the steps of the old Baptist church on the corner of Seventy-Ninth Street and Broadway, waiting for the big green Times truck to pull up by the newsstand. The Times was nothing but quality and would have nothing but quality ads, but each new edition of the paper failed to lead him to the accommodation he had been hoping for. He felt friendless and alone on those steps. A train was bearing down on him, and he had no ability to get off the tracks.

On one such night, Melvin happened by. He carried with him, as a soldier might a rifle, a sign mounted on a long pole. On one side was written, "Repent," and on the other, "Jesus time is coming." As Luther looked away, hoping to remain unnoticed, Melvin caught his eye.

"I must say, God does work in mysterious ways, his wonders to perform. I was just praying for you, Luther. Are you all right? You aren't lost to the night, are you?"

"No, no, Melvin. Not at all. Just thought I would pick up the evening paper and try to catch a cool breeze."

"The summer is God's gift to us, Luther. He gives it to us so we may be reminded what awaits if we are not righteous in the Lord. Are you being righteous in the Lord, if I may ask? Do you scrub your soul as well as your face?"

"Not sure how to perform that task, Melvin," Luther said.

"By their works ye shall know them, it is written. Are you doing good works, Luther? Are you being a fisher of men?"

"I don't fish, I'm afraid. But you do, Melvin. I can see you have your fishing pole."

"Oh, yes I do, Luther, and the only bait on the hook is truth. 'I am the way, the truth, and the light,' the master sayeth."

"Sayeth indeed," Luther said. "And where will you do this fishing tonight?"

“In this world, Luther, what you must know is that where the lights blaze brightest is where the darkness is most entrenched. I am headed for the Great White Way, where worldliness, and its foremost fruit, licentiousness, abound.”

“How you speak,” Luther said.

“Not my words, but His. The master is speaking through me.”

“Yes, of course. The master.”

“You must not mock, Luther. The master does not like that. The tongues of the blasphemous shall be set on fire.”

“Shall be. Of course.”

“I will keep you in my prayers, Luther. Forever.”

Luther headed north for some beers at the End Bar.

“Do you come here often?” the young man on the next stool asked.

“Sometimes. Not a lot,” Luther said.

“I dropped out of divinity school. A crisis of faith, I suppose. I believe in alcohol more than I believe in God. Peter De Vries is a lot more entertaining than Kierkegaard. Have you read Let Me Count the Ways?” A paperback copy of the book rested on the bar.

“No. I’m afraid I haven’t.”

“Don’t be afraid. Reading is overrated. By the way, my name is Charles.” Charles had a round face and thinning hair and eyes that confessed his sexual hunger.

“The reading that has most interested me these days is the classifieds in the New York Times. I’m looking for a place to stay.”

“You’re without a place to stay tonight?”

“No. Not exactly. I have a very nice place, only it may be more than I can afford.”

Charles lived not far from Luther and had some fine Acapulco Gold, he said.

Luther accepted his invitation to come over and smoked a joint with his newfound friend.

Charles’s apartment was on West End Avenue, only a block from where Sarah lived, and Luther’s whole being filled with longing for her as the powerful grass took effect. All along he had understood where Charles was coming from, and was willing to go along to a point, or had thought he was, but even stoned, he found he could not go forward. In Luther’s altered state, Charles had been rendered repulsive, having taken on the appearance of a large cat. And if Charles was a feline with big whiskers, then Luther was the mouse he wished to devour. Aggression, if not sheer hatred, seemed to be driving

Charles to try to wrestle him out of his pants. He was nothing to this Charles but someone to conquer; all the prior chatter had been a subterfuge. A scowl now dominated Charles’s face, and Luther saw, as if for the first time, that vengeance could be a driving force in sex.

Luther lay on the hard wood floor, kept in place by the fear that Charles would spring on him in the dark. He waited for first light before stealing away. Groggy and depressed, he imagined Sarah still in the purity of sleep, lying on her canopied bed with her head on a soft pillow. But reality gave him something different. Coming toward him along Broadway, with a triumphant stride, was his good friend Melvin, his sign over his shoulder as was fitting for the soldier for the Lord that he was.

“Have you been in the land of sin, Luther? Have you been bathing in the sea of iniquity? Are you a slave to the sodomite kingdom of the flesh?”

“Not now, Melvin. Not now,” Luther said, and fled down the block.

“The spirit is willing, even if the flesh is weak, Luther. You can outrun my call, but you can’t outrun the call of God.”

“Pam broke up with him. She said he was in too high a league for her, and so I began to see him. It was fun while it lasted,” Vera said.

“Why didn’t it last?” Luther asked. He and his sister sat at a booth in a coffee shop near the family building. Vera was speaking about Colin Westland, the handsome Columbia student who was friends with Roddy.

“He’s hard to hold onto. He’s got those looks. He’s got a lot of things. Did you know he published a novel last year and was just picked by Time magazine as one of the five most promising young authors in America?”

“No. I didn’t know,” Luther said. Some people made your life seem like not worth living, at least as you were living it. Dylan had that effect on him, hearing his blistering songs. And now Colin Westland did as well. Luther had recognized that Colin was a cut above, intellectually and physically, but now to be told he had this extraordinary creative talent.

“Don’t look so crushed. You have your own special talents.”

A talent for mediocrity. A talent for failure. His sister struck him once again as strangely resilient, like one of those cartoon creatures that pops up again after being flattened. “I’d give anything to have the abilities he has,” Luther said.

“Would you? You’re not beautiful and perfect as you are?”

“Beautiful? Perfect?” The things she could say, in defiance of reality. And yet she was in the embrace of reality, having taken a job with New York Telephone up in Inwood, at the north end of Manhattan, after graduating from high school. He marveled that she wasn’t crushed not to be attending any college, let alone a good one. Unless she hid it well, she possessed equanimity about her life.

“He has an older sister. She is a graduate student here at Columbia. He told me that he slept with her more than a few times,” Vera said.

“He just told you that?”

“He did. He said the sex was great, too.”

“Well, that’s news, I guess,” Luther said, thinking of Sarah and Jeffrey, but also of himself and Vera with some discomfort.

“Did I tell you that I moved out? I have a nice room in this big apartment on One Hundred Eleventh Street. There are three other women, all of them graduate students at Columbia.”

“That’s great,” he said. It couldn’t be easy for her, having three older sisters with the difficulties they had. And yet she was learning.

“You’ve heard about Jeanne?”

“Right.” You didn’t run off from something good but from something bad. And what you were running toward had to at least appear better, even if it turned out not to be. And if it was worse, wouldn’t she have come back? He frowned considering the possibility that she couldn’t, for some reason.

“Thirteen is pretty young to be on your own. And for a girl?”

“What are we supposed to do? Clean up after the messes our older siblings have made?” Vera had introduced guilt with the question she left hanging out there.

“She is family,” Vera said.

“Family.” Luther pronounced the word with some distaste.

Suddenly Vera was crying, her face an agony of tears. “You don’t care about anyone but yourself,” she sobbed.

“Maybe you are right,” he said.

“She is your niece.”

“Yes, of course. I am her uncle, and have been since age five when she was brought home from the hospital and laid out on the sofa and I thought, ‘Oh, God, Things have just gotten worse. She won’t be taken care of. We will have a bigger mess than we already have.’ Anyway, what am I supposed to do? Go all about the city and country trying to find her?”

“You should care. That’s all.”

Care. Schmare. What was all this caring but an expression of caring? Neither she nor anyone else was doing anything to locate Jeanne.

“OK. I care.”

“It’s not funny. She could be dead.”

“And she could be alive as well.”

“I’m not talking to you anymore.” With that Vera got up and left. She had one message for him, that it was his fault, and it had always been his fault.

He rang the bell on the thick metal door and waited, holding the oversize pass issued to him by the security guard downstairs. As he peered through the chicken wire window in the door a heavy-set attendant approached and filled the small square frame.

“What is it you want?” she said, after opening the door.

“I am here to see my sister Naomi,” Luther said, showing the attendant his plastic pass. His mother had called to say that once again Naomi had abused her medication, mixing it with alcohol and lapsing into a coma. Would he visit her? She needed support. She was going through a difficult time. And those psychiatrists. What good were they? All they ever did was give poor Naomi pills.

Along the long, linoleum-tiled thoroughfare patients shuffled in their robes. The dullness in their eyes and their sluggish gait suggested the potency of the medications they were receiving. In the many-windowed solarium some yards away, sat Naomi in a molded plastic chair, indifferent to the evening news being broadcast on the cantilevered TV.

“The doctors tell me I don’t have much longer to live if I keep going the way I am,” Naomi said. “What do you say, Luther? Am I knocking on death’s door?”

“I brought you some smokes,” Luther said, handing her a couple of packs of Newports.

“I asked you a question, brother of mine. Could you dignify it with an answer?”

“I think the doctors are trying to tell you something,” Luther said.

“And what would that be?”

“That you need to take better care of yourself.”

“Are you saying that I am fat? Is that it? Well, if there is too much of me, there is too little of you. Maybe you are going to die too, and maybe today is the day.”

“Thank you.” His sister was as easy to get next to as a porcupine.

Naomi motioned to a gray-haired man with a curved spine and spindly calves. The man tottered toward them.

“Luther, I want you to be a gentleman and stand and greet my good friend Franklin Valporino. Do as I say now, Luther, and do not be contrary. Mr. Valporino has distinguished himself in the world in a way you can only dream of.”

Luther complied reluctantly, rising and extending his hand to Mr. Valporino, who like his sister and the other inmates was clad in a blue and white seersucker robe. How fragile the older man’s hand felt in his own.

“Nice to meet you,” Luther said, and received a slight nod in reply.

“Mr. Valporino is a talent agent for some of the biggest stars in the country, and is going to put my name right up there among theirs. I have auditioned for him and he has given me the thumbs up. Luther, you meet people of Mr. Valporino’s character only rarely in this lifetime.”

Luther suspected that Mr. Valporino’s amiable smile was the poor man’s only defense against Naomi’s narcissistic lunacy. He sat docilely, his liver-spotted hands resting on his cane.

“How are you feeling, Naomi?” Luther asked.

“Not well, Luther. Not well, if you must know. It is hard being me, but I can’t resist my own impulses. You don’t think life can get away from you, but then it does, and you can't stop it. Ten, fifteen years go by and you're fat and living with a drunken husband in a crummy room and one day is as relentlessly gray as the next. You know the problem with us, Luther? We were all born stupid and ugly, and as we grow older and realize the extent of our less than mediocrity, we can't handle it. Do you know why Mother had so many children? When she saw the dismal quality of one offspring, she had another, in the hope that the next would be an improvement, but the truth was that each was more disappointing than the previous one. We are an intense disappointment to her. That is why she is always speaking of heaven. Because she can't stand what she has here on earth. You think I am trying to hurt you with this information, but at some point in our lives we are compelled to tell the truth, that trash is trash. That's all we are."

"Thanks for the information."

"You think you can escape by finding a pretty girlfriend and attaching everything to her. But you can't. She will leave you. You aren't man enough to keep any girl, Luther. You're stunted, deformed, a freak. Look at you. You should be here in slippers and a robe, and someday you will be."

"Of course."

"Am I making you cry, Luther? Am I bringing you to the edge? Welcome to that fucking edge, my brother. Welcome."

She hadn't mentioned Jeanne. She hadn't needed to. She had mentioned her by her omission.

His mother. She had put food on the table. Every evening hamburgers or chicken a la king or roasted chicken and a roast of lamb on Sunday. Birds-Eye frozen vegetables.

Baked Idaho potatoes. The apple pies with cinnamon she would bake and the ginger snaps. She had sent them to private schools. With each new school year she would buy him a navy blue blazer and charcoal gray pants. And then to see her cry and cry that her children should be so disappointing, that they should treat her like dirt beneath her shoes. He could flee the hospital but he couldn't flee these thoughts.

London, Paris, Zurich, Rome, Florence, Venice. The itinerary was a torment, but the apartment he had rented was even worse. One minute he should stay, the next he should go. Around and around in circles his thinking went. Everything else was blocked out. And the anxiety, so crippling.

But help was on the way. In fact it was right there. His sister Vera and he made up, and when he told her of his painful financial circumstance, she said her room was plenty big for the two of them. How warm and welcoming she seemed. How much he needed that when the world showed him a wintry coldness. What a good sister. What a wonderful sister. They would be close, as he had wanted them to be when they were children.

He showed up at her door the first night and a woman, one of Vera's roommates, let him in. Vera was in the shower. She would be right out, the woman said. Vera appeared, robed, a few minutes later, her hair in a towel shaped like a towering turban. How good she smelled from the soap and the shampoo and whatever ointments girls used.

They went out that night, to the Greek diner around the corner owned by Greeks. Vera ordered a full dinner, while all Luther could go for was a Coke and rye toast. The pain had found him again. Now it wasn't about where to live but about Sarah's impending trip. He stared with envy at the waiter in his tight red jacket and black pants, imagining the simplicity of a life handing out menus and taking orders and bringing food to the table.

"Are you OK? You're not eating."

"I'm fine," he said, stifling an urge to get up right then and there and call Sarah. Moving in with Vera wasn't bringing the relief he had thought it would. Being with Vera was like returning to his past and losing his future. But he had to be careful. Vera would turn mean very quickly if she saw any doubt in him about the move.

"You don't look OK."

"No, really, I am. It's just..."

"Just what?"

"It's just that Sarah and her sister and mother will be going off to Europe tomorrow."

"So? They're coming back. Right?"

"Sure they are."

"Then what's the problem? It might be good for the two of you to be away from each other. Absence makes the heart grow fonder and all of that."

"Yes, of course."

"It reminds me of those summer camps. Do you remember how homesick you would get, crying all the time and a nervous wreck?"

"How could I forget?"

She was right. He was just being weak and needy, something far less than a real man would be. What was the crazy pain that he had suffered at those camps and then over Jane Thayer when she would leave him, and now with Sarah? Why was it that he could not just tear it out of himself?

As they approached the entrance to Vera's building, Luther balked.

"What is it?" Vera asked.

"Nothing. I just..."

"You just what?"

"I need to make a phone call."

"So make it from upstairs. I have a phone in my room."

"No. You don't understand. I..."

"I don't understand? What don't I understand?" The crossness was growing in her now. Once she got angry, she couldn't stop. She had to go all the way down with it. She had the same emotional sickness as him and as their father, which made it easy to spot. Oh, the stupid, ugly, vindictive, horrible Garatdjians.

He ran off around the corner and down Broadway, as if fleeing the Furies. After several blocks he stopped at a phone booth.

Peter took the call. "What is it you want now?"

"I need to speak with Sarah," Luther said, trying to ignore Peter's contemptuous tone and the import of his question. He hadn't long to wait. When Sarah came on the line, he said he had to see her, if only for five minutes. "But we just saw each other earlier today, and it's late."

“Just a half hour. Please,” Luther said.

They met in Riverside Park, on the bridge spanning the Ninety-sixth Street entrance to the West Side Highway, where Luther began to cry, uncontrollably. “Don’t be sad, Luther. It will all be all right,” Sarah said. He could tell she was impatient and uncomfortable. What girl wanted to see her boyfriend cry?

“Right. It will,” Luther said, staring at the base of the lamp under which Luke had inserted two pennies, one for him and the other for Nancy Becker, in the long ago.

He talked to himself all the way back to Vera’s building, uttering nonsense words into the cool September night to expel his shame and dreading the retaliation he could expect from Sarah for his display of weakness.

The doorman at Vera’s building intercepted him. “You no go up. I have something for you,” he said, in a heavy Spanish accent. “This for you.” He pointed to a big cardboard box, into which Vera had thrown his clothes and his books. A note was scotch-taped to the side of the box. “GET LOST!”

“Wow,” Luther said.

“You no love your woman good, that what happen. You need to love your woman real good,” the doorman said, a smile lighting his face.

“I will be back in ten minutes,” Luther said.

Luther borrowed a dolly from the basement of the family’s building, and slowly made his way up Broadway with the box balanced on the dolly, pausing to rest every half block. It came as no surprise that Chuck was plopped in an armchair with his pint of cheap red wine in the lobby.

“Well, well, the prodigal son returns. Too tough for you out there? Couldn’t make it on your own? It’s a man’s world, sonny.”

“Shut up.”

“I’ll shut up when no more truth needs to be told, you skinny nothing. And the truth is did any of you even try to help find my daughter? Well, did you? You’re the reason Naomi wound up back in the hospital.”

Luther took the elevator to the basement and slept the night in the laundry room on a bed of freshly washed sheets.

He was woken by his bladder to the smell of baking. The cheap Timex on his wrist said 3:25 am. Still in his clothes, he wandered through the maze of rooms. A light was burning in the old upholstery shop, where Luigi the Sicilian years before had restored Auntie Eve’s stuffed chairs and other valued furniture. And there Auntie Eve was, a ghostly, spindly figure, her back to him. The big black pizza oven was going. She was making pies and cakes, as she sometimes would, withdrawing them on a giant spatula and then sliding them back into the oven when she saw they were not done. She sang “The Old Rugged Cross” as she baked, slowly, the way it was sung by the congregation and the only way you could sing that mournful song. A beacon she had been. He thought of her with a fox fur wrapped around her neck, stepping out on a Sunday night, if only to the Swedish church on the East Side. She represented freedom—Stockholm on a cold, starry night, for some reason.

“Who are you?”

“It’s me, Luther.”

“Who do you say you are?”

“Luther. Your nephew.”

“Stop your foolishness and get back to work, you lazybones.”

Luigi had referred to her as “the old pussy.” A violation, saddening and degrading, the words felt to Luther. Some anger the solitary men of the building felt toward her for bossing them around. Like Tall Tommy, who would roll his own cigarettes and play “Home on the Range” on his harmonica . He swore Luther to secrecy after confiding to him that he was here in New York City on a secret government mission. On its completion he would return to his avocado farm in California and take Luther with him. In the meantime he took orders from Auntie Eve. There was the time she had him lug a mattress from one room on the eleventh floor to another two floors below only to ask him to return it to the first room. When he had done so, she changed her mind and asked Tall Tommy if he wouldn’t take it back to the room two floors below again. When Tall Tommy protested, sputtering and fuming, the laughing thing got going in Auntie Eve. So strong was it that she had to lean against the wall for support and even then slid to the floor, completely helpless, because nothing got the laughing thing going in Auntie Eve like seeing men in her employ in torment.

“OK” Luther said.

Auntie Eve continued to fix him crossly in her eyes. “Lesbian filth,” she said, turning back to the oven.

In the morning he woke from a dream of a giant airplane slowly descending from the skies and breaking apart in a ball of fire as it crash-landed on the roof of the building.

He found his mother in the lobby, unlocking the door to the renting office. “You are not looking well, my son.”

“I need a room.”

“But what has happened? You had a place to live.”

“The rent was more than I could afford.”

“It is not normal here.”

“Not normal? What does that mean?”

“Do not become absent from your life.”

“Absent from my life?”

“You heard what I said, my son.”

The cold air is rushing through me. It has taken up permanent residence in my bones. I am back here at home. I had no choice but to vacate the premises of the beautiful studio, so hellishly tormenting were my fears about money. It does make the world go round, just like the song says, and I have none. For one night I tried to stay with Vera, but the experiment didn't last. I am writing you now so you will know where I am. I need to hear from you. Can you do that for me? I feel that I have been laid to rest in the family's burial plot, but I will revive.

One letter after another he wrote on looseleaf paper, the need for communication a constant. The quantity of his letters became the measure of his love.

A woman, Miss Schnell, came by. Tall and elderly, she kept ten cats in her room down the hall. She herself had the glittering eyes and lithe movements of the creatures in her care. “I have seen you coming and going, young man, and it is my impression you need tethering to this world. When we nurture others, we nurture ourselves. This is information sadly lacking from your mind, I can see, but I would like to fill you out so you may have the dimensions of something more than a hanging string.” Miss Schnell stepped past Luther. “I am looking for a home for little Dieter, but are you worthy of such a friend?” she asked, surveying the room.

“Dieter?”

“Frieda has had a litter of little ones, for whom I must now find a home. But I must be sure Dieter is in the hands of a responsible human being. Are you that young man?”

“I don’t really know,” Luther said. “I’ve never owned a cat.”

“You must take Dieter deep into your heart. You must talk and sing to him and allow him onto your bed at night. If you do, he will teach you things that you cannot otherwise know.”

He fell back on the bed, overwhelmed by Miss Schnell’s presence. In his unsettled state he had no room for her. His mind resisted all distractions from Sarah, as if to stop thinking of her for an instant was to display unfaithfulness.

“Of course,” Luther said, hardly knowing what he was saying.

“I will be back tomorrow with little Dieter. I must first prepare him for his new home,” Miss Schnell said, before leaving.

On every floor there were old women such as Miss Schnell. The building was a home for them as well as the many students from abroad. Elderly women who called out in their aloneness to him with pocket change and candy and other offerings. Little Dorothy Ickles, in 4D3, with her jam jars full of pennies, and Melinda Spriggs, in 7A1, who gave him jelly beans, and Amanda Sykes, in 10B4, who made him gifts of coloring books and crayons. He had taken comfort in the sweet peace of their existence. But now there was no sweet peace. There was only turbulence, a wound for which there was no balm.

As she had promised, Miss Schnell returned the next morning with the kitty, and left it in Luther's care, but not before saying, "I will be checking on the progress of my little Dieter. He is my baby, and a mother who does not love her young is not a mother."

It wouldn't do to reply to Miss Schnell that a mother who gave away her young might be a questionable mother, or that perhaps Dieter's mother was the cat who produced the litter and not Miss Schnell herself. But Luther suspected that the line between the cat world and the human world was a very fine line indeed for Miss Schnell, if it existed at all, and that his questions would only perplex or anger or dishearten her, and that he couldn't do. As superior as she came across in her dealings with him, he deferred to her age and feline persona.

And maybe she was right to be so cautionary. Oh, he liked little Dieter, and was sure that the food and water bowls he set out on the floor on a bed of newspaper were full, but it was hard to keep his mind on the little creature.

That night he took an over-the-counter sleeping pill, as he did every night now, and lay still, as his mother would instruct him to do back when he was in high school after giving him a barbiturate from her locked cabinet. The pills would magically dissolve the emotional distress over Jane Thayer's periodic abandonment of him, and now the same peace—call it joy—was spreading through him. His thoughts, which had only minutes before been a match with the darkness of the room, were now bursting with light.

In this blessed respite of bliss, his focus shifted from Sarah to her sister Lenore. He relived their wild night at Camp, the abandon with which she had given herself to him, the bold hungry thrust of her tongue in his mouth and the way she moved beneath him when he entered her, responsive in a way that Sarah wouldn't, or couldn't, be. That one little pill had stilled the roar of anxiety and revealed the desire beneath it. And the thing was she was within reach. His reverie was as much about the future as the past.

Malcolm, Lenore's boyfriend, had refused to return to the boarding school in Vermont that fall, preferring instead to stay with his brother down in the East Village. And so Lenore had followed his lead. She simply wouldn't go back without Malcolm. As an alternative, she had enrolled at the local public high school, but being in the same city hadn't brought her any closer to him. He had done more than drop out of boarding school. He had also dropped out of Lenore's life, succumbing to the lure of the girls lining up to be with him. According to Sarah before her departure for Europe, Lenore was morose. Lydia was sufficiently concerned that she had arranged for Lenore to see a psychiatrist.

A plan bloomed as Luther waited for sleep. He would “accidentally” bump into Lenore as she was returning home from school. They would have a friendly chat, perhaps over coffee, and then he would invite her over to his place, where they would make love as they had that one time, and their afternoons would be filled with pleasure. But then morning came, and he was appalled at the lunacy of his fantasy. He could only imagine the scorn and mockery with which Lenore would greet their supposedly chance encounter. Stalker, pervert, liar, cheat—names such as these she would hurl at him. Passersby would be brought to a stop by her raised voice and inquire if Luther was bothering her and would she like them to call the police. And even if he did manage to win her for the day, how could he possibly think of bringing her to his room, where now roaches had been drawn by the cat food he had laid out for Dieter?

No, there was only the painful day ahead. He walked north to the IRT local at 116th Street and Broadway, which took him two stops from the excellence of Columbia. The train emerged at One Hundred Twenty-Second Street onto the el, leaving behind the Jewish Theological Seminary and the gothic buildings of the Union Theological Seminary and the tenements and public housing beyond these institutions. High above One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street at the summit of the rickety el, it came to a stop. Already he had lived two lives, he thought, divorced from the child who had climbed out a window onto the roof of the escalator enclosure rising at a forty–five degree angle from the street and from there pulled himself up between the wooden track ties and onto the platform, only a minute before the train roared into the station. Gone was the child who had wandered from one station to the next through the dark tunnels, wanting to experience the onrushing train's breath upon him as he backed up into the recess of the scalloped walls. Now his landscape was not joyful but dreary, like those he imagined of the impoverished souls in the rundown buildings as he emerged from the One Hundred Thirty-Seventh Street station.

That morning he stared at the pale blond masonry and towers of the High School of Music and Art building and felt none of the happiness he normally associated with this institution of excellence, as all it did was remind him of Sarah, and the chapter of their life that had ended with her departure from the school and now the city.

"Why does happiness have to flee?" he asked Amanda Givourney that same day, after their class in Roman Law had let out.

"My happiness never flees," Amanda Givourney replied.

"Your happiness never flees?" Her emphatic declaration was jarring.

"Never."

"How can that be?"

"Easy. I take Dexedrine every morning, and have been since I was age thirteen."

Luther would often stare at Amanda during class. She had a remarkable figure and a pretty face, in spite of a serious acne problem, and he would daydream of being in bed with her. But the thought of asking her out only increased his anxiety. What would it mean for his relationship with Sarah? If he wasn't good, then maybe she wouldn't be either. Besides, he could sense some incompatibility between them. There was a hard, stone-like quality to Amanda, and those jeans she continually wore with a blue work shirt, as if it were some sort of uniform. And the way she talked about her father, with whom she lived, and never about her mother. No, it was better to just treat Amanda as a friend, or an acquaintance.

How hard it is to live with myself as I am, he thought that day, sitting alone at the counter of a greasy spoon on Amsterdam Avenue, where he had gone for lunch. How punishing the mounting evidence of his inadequacy. Gone that wild child, whose joy had been dependent on ignorance. The world was stratified. You were assigned a ranking, which became a basis for comparison with others. What sense of unity could there be when you lived with the consciousness that you were either above or generally below others?

And yet the Greek counterman with the bushy mustache who served him his BLT and malted milk seemed happy and more than happy. He was ebullient, full of loud, friendly chatter amid the clatter of dishes. If high intelligence was a prerequisite for happiness, why was it so many ordinary souls went through their days full of joy, or at least contentment? Of course, the counterman might have been a genius operating far below his potential, but there were many dull-minded people who manifested similarly high spirits.

Professor Dintenfass looked happy, that was for sure, Luther thought, sitting in a Theories of Personality class in Wingate Hall that afternoon. Surely he possessed an IQ off the continuum to have earned his PhD from Yale University by the age of twenty-four and to already have become an associate professor three years later. And if anyone in the class had any doubt about the mental prowess of the diminutive man in the Harris Tweed jacket and horn-rimmed glasses too big for his narrow face, Professor Dintenfass set them straight by identifying each of the thirty-five students with their first and last names without reliance on a list in only their second meeting.

Clearly there had to be a restless tumult in Professor Dintenfass's soul that he should be so driven to excel. What a thing, to be standing in the presence of such excellence. Luther didn't begrudge the little man his accomplishment. It was well earned. What made him blue was Maury Felton, seated at the desk chair next to him, who leaned over to say, "An IQ of 118? That's low. That's incredibly low."

Professor Dintenfass had assigned them three case studies, one of them that of Benson Benefisto, who expressed a desire to go on to law school and become a practicing attorney. He was, to all outward appearances, quite the normal young man. But unlike the other two in the study, Benson Benefisto had difficulty on the performance part of the Stanford-Binet intelligence test. Whereas Carolyn Carruthers and Fortley Brimbast easily and creatively organized the blocks to replicate the patterns on the cards, Benson Benefisto grew frustrated and turned his peeve on the psychologist administering the test, going so far as to accuse her of trying to stymie him. Because of his lackluster performance on this segment of the test, his overall score was the number cited by Maury Felton.

"Do you think so?" Luther said.

"What do you mean, 'Do I think so?' You can't do anything with an IQ like that except maybe drive a bus or be a porter or a sales clerk."

"Yes, I suppose so," Luther said.

“I mean, you’re smarter than that, aren’t you?” Maury Felton went on, perhaps sensing Luther’s discomfort with the conversation.

“Maybe,” Luther said.

“Maybe? Just maybe?”

Maury Felton was a pre-dental student. His transcript was loaded with chemistry and biology courses. An acquaintance Maury was, as so many on this campus were. No basis for a friendship existed with someone who had become doubtful of Luther’s basic worth.

As Luther imagined the reassessment going on in Maury’s quick mind, his thoughts turned to the speed he had been taking that spring and into the early part of the summer. The pills had helped him before; maybe they could so again. But it didn’t feel right to be on drugs when he was living in a room in his family’s building, as two of his sisters and his brother Luke were doing. It didn’t feel right at all. If he took those drugs while living there, would he not be just the same as Naomi, and would his fate not be sealed to go on existing in that drafty room? No, he must behave. He must. He was in the danger zone. His survival was at stake.

But he had those over-the-counter sleeping pills. And after his talk with Maury Felton, it was all he thought about, how come nightfall, he could once again be in its embrace as it sweetly ushered him into unconsciousness. The truth was that he thought of that pill every day as the thing he could come home to for relief from a world that had too many sharp edges.

As he was about to take the pill that night, there came a knock at his door. It was Miss Schnell. "I have come for an inspection of my darling Dieter," she said, in her slow but emphatic manner of speaking, giving each word her full power of enunciation. And as was also her way, she stepped inside without asking Luther's permission. "My heavens," she exclaimed. "This is an atrocity. An atrocity. The health authorities, the United Nations, someone should be informed of this situation. There are roaches everywhere. Do you not see them? Do you know what it means for my Dieter if he eats this vermin? He could come down with a case of rickets. Do you even know what such a malady is? No, I see from the ignorance leaking from your eyes that you don't."

"But—"

"I will tell you, because I have been watching. Your only offering to the world is the excuses that you make. Now I will take my Dieter and remove him from the terror of your awful neglect."

In fact Miss Schnell had already scooped up the little creature and held him tight to her chest as she left the room. Luther sat on the side of the bed, feeling the crushing weight of the moral judgment she had laid on him. Unfit to care for her little Dieter. The Indian giver. She never had any intention of letting him keep the kitty. What more proof did he need than the Hun name the dotty old woman had imposed on the little one to establish forever her proprietary hold? Dieter? Dieter? He would have named him Huguenot. Albigenian Crusade. Spud. Any number of names had been possibilities.

But she was right. He stared at the roaches swarming over the food and into the milk bowl. He hadn't done a great job. He had fed Dieter every day, but the roaches had defeated him. They were like the Vietcong. They had a will that seemed to surpass his own.

In the morning there came another knock at his door. “Who is it?” he called, grateful that he was already up and presentable.

“It is I,” his mother said, in her precise English, as he opened the door. “Your father and I wanted to remember you on your birthday.”

He removed the wrapping on the gift she had handed him, the King James Bible in a leather-bound edition, with an inscription from his father, in blue ballpoint ink: “We dedicate this Bible to our beloved son. Love, Father and Mother.” He thanked his mother, not mentioning his sadness that his father should use the word “dedicate,” as if he and Luther’s mother were the authors. It wouldn’t have been appropriate to call attention to such an error, not when a feeling of love had accompanied the penning of the words. Well, his father would have called it love at any rate, the little burst of sentiment that passed briefly through him. Unless, of course, his father did imagine himself to be the author. But no, such a thing could not be. It was just typical Garatdjian sloppiness. You found it wherever you looked.

“I will read it,” Luther said, holding the gilt-edged volume in his hands.

“I am worried about you, my son. These are not normal times,” his mother said.

“Not normal?”

“You need the strength of Jesus, my son.”

“Yes,” he said.

“You are searching.”

Again he said yes, not knowing what else to say.

“But in the end you will have to find Him, as will Jeanne and Rachel and Naomi and Luke and all my children. It is only there that the answer can be found.”

“Has anyone heard from Jeanne or Rachel?” Luther asked.

“Jeanne called me collect. She is in California. Can you imagine?”

“Who is she with?”

“She would only tell me that she is with friends and that she is all right,” his mother said.

“And Rachel?”

“She came by the other night. She had been drinking.”

“What is she doing with herself?”

“She takes temporary jobs, she says. She has such a fine mind.”

“Of course.”

He sat alone with his parents' gift after his mother left. Above the sink was a mirror. He went to it and stared at himself. How strange it was that his face seemed to show nothing of the roar of anxiety he was experiencing.

We arrived yesterday in Florence from Rome, where I had to fight off these urchins who tried to steal my bag. Mommy would have us believe she is a sophisticated world traveler. At every opportunity, she recalls love affairs she had while living abroad, usually in the evening when she has had a drink or two and settled her nerves. During the day she is quite insecure. Her money has insulated both her and Daddy from the world. These two Italian sailors asked Claire and me out, and Mommy encouraged us to go with them. But their English was poor and both my sister and I are reliant on our phrase books for the simplest communications. The language barrier alone would have made for a disappointing evening, but we were also exhausted from wandering through the Uffizi for most of the day...

Luther reacted quickly, as if delay could mean losing her. It wouldn't do to tell her about Maury Felton's verdict, as that might increase her own doubts about him, but he could tell her not to incite him to fear and jealousy with mention of sailors from the Italian navy or from any navy, for that matter. He couldn't allow her to walk all over him.

Luke was alone now. Maureen had departed with their son and his romance with Nora came to an end a couple of months later. He accused her of having a wandering eye.

"I mean, we're out shopping in Mama's Delicatessen across the street and Nora's just about throwing herself at this goateed black guy wearing a dashiki. That's not right. And she was making skin flicks. How can you live with someone like that? You get what I'm saying?" Luke seemed to relive his outrage in telling the tale.

"Sure. I get it," Luther said.

"Hey, look, you're not still sore I took her off your hands are you?"

“No,” Luther said.

“I mean, I could have gone off with Sarah instead.”

“Stop it.”

“Oh, come on. I was just joking around.”

Luther couldn't stay angry. Luke looked too sad and troubled, however cheerful he tried to sound.

As if his brother could read his thoughts, he said, “Look at this great Rolleiflex. I bought it real cheap through an ad in Buy-Lines” The camera was one of those boxy, 2 ¼” kind with a view finder you looked down into. There weren't many of them around anymore. Most people carried those more compact 35 mm single lens reflex cameras.

“Nice. Real nice,” Luther said. “What are you going to do with it?”

“I'm going to take pictures. That's what I'm going to do. And I'll set up a darkroom so I can develop the film and make prints. I'll get an enlarger and the whole works.”

“Where are you going to take these pictures?”

“I don't know. Somewhere. Why?”

“I'm just asking. A while ago you said you were thinking of buying a 16 mm Bolex and taking a film course.”

“I just want to take pictures. That's all. I want to do something creative.”

“I do understand. I'm just asking where you're going to take these pictures. Will you go out on Broadway with your camera?”

“I told you I don't know. What the fuck is the matter with you, anyway?”

“Are you afraid to go outside with the camera?”

“Did I say that? Did I?”

“No. You didn’t.”

“Sometimes I just don’t want people looking at me. That’s all. I don’t want them looking at my face. You understand?”

“I do. I do understand.”

“Yeah, right. Fuck you, you understand.”

“I’m sorry I brought it up.”

“Fuck you with your sorry shit. Just leave me the fuck alone.”

“OK.”

“You want some wine?”

“No. No thanks.” Wine or drugs, he didn’t want either, not while he was living in the building.

“Have some fucking wine. It’s good. It’s chianti.” Luke handed him a mug.

Luther drank the bitter-tasting wine. “By the way, this big demonstration against the war will be held down in Washington, DC, next week. I’m thinking of going. You want to come? You could bring your camera.”

“How will we get down there?”

“I’m seeing all kinds of notices on bulletin boards for rides.”

“Maybe we could meet some girls,” Luke said.

“Right. Maybe.”

The war was not one Luke gave much thought to or spoke about, except in personal terms. It wasn't right what had happened to Johnny Andrews, the Negro boy from across the street, Luke said. It wasn't right at all. Johnny had joined the army and gone over to Vietnam after high school, where he died in a helicopter crash before the big escalation of American troops began. Johnny Andrews was handsome and smart, Bronx High School of Science smart. Luke and Johnny had shared an interest in shortwave radios. Johnny would come over and play with Luke's Halicrafters set back when they were in grade school. Neither Luke nor Luther got to visit Johnny Andrews in the apartment where he lived with his mother and his grandfather, though Johnny frequently told them about the great model railroad layout he had built. After Johnny Andrew's death, Johnny's mother and grandfather—Johnny Andrews did not have a father, at least one he would talk about--would walk on by on the street as if Luke didn't exist. They did the same with Luther, too. White boys who had been spared what their Johnny hadn't been spared because they were white. Both Luke and Luther could hear that thought loud in the heads of Johnny's mother and grandfather.

It didn't seem right to Luther either that Johnny Andrews should be gone, remembering those khaki pants he would wear with his penny loafers and how he would move his lips to one side of his mouth, the way that some kids were doing back then, and how he would say "Let's not and say we did," something a lot of the kids were saying. And he remembered how Johnny Andrews was in with the boys from Claremont Avenue, not Claremont Avenue as it was down toward LaSalle Street and Tiemann Place,

With Serge and Bosco and the other Catholic boys from Corpus Christi who had takeout power in their fists. Not those boys who hung out on the street corner and harmonized, their oiled hair in pompadours, but the boys who also wore the khaki pants and penny loafers, white boys from good homes who had accepted Johnny Andrews because he was not angry the way that many of the Negro boys were and because they saw his intelligence. By then Johnny Andrews had moved on from Luke and Luther to the Claremont Avenue boys. There was no denying this had happened. But he remembered Luke and Luther. Luther could say that was so, because while Luther was still in high school and hanging out with the boys from Scully's stoop, Johnny Andrews came over to him right there on One Hundred Fourteenth Street west of Amsterdam Avenue, right where hot air rich with the smell of food blew out through the vents from the cafeteria in John Jay Hall of Columbia University into the warm spring air. Johnny called him by his name, saying "Hey, Luther, how are you?" He was in uniform, a soldier boy. Said he was in a helicopter unit flying reconnaissance. "I'm OK," Luther had said, fear separating him from Johnny Andrews on that night, some sense of embarrassment. Johnny Andrews had moved out into the world while Luther was hanging out with the neighborhood Irish on some stoop on Amsterdam Avenue. Johnny Andrews was looking at Luther from a different place, and Luther was rendered speechless, or almost, and wanted only to get away. That look of perplexity on Johnny Andrews's face, that look that said the meeting was terminated too abruptly. That is what Luther remembered about Johnny Andrews, having given him short shrift, having run from him.

But that was then. The world was big, bigger than he could have imagined, and it was calling to him now, calling him to be part of something more than himself and his lonely life. It was calling him to Washington, DC, where he had never been, to confront power. The National Mobilization Against the War Day was a challenge to him, an event Sarah would surely have been a part of were she stateside. And he could tell her that he had gone, that he had been part of this thing, that on a cool, sunny day he had stood in front of the Lincoln Memorial, where Luke photographed him with his Rolleiflex, the tall obelisk of the Washington Monument in the background, and that he had seen girls place flowers in the rifles of soldiers cordoning off the crowds from government buildings and seen as well young men burning their draft cards and even the American flag and heard their chants as they tried to levitate the Pentagon. But he couldn't say he was a part of it, with his whole heart. He could not, like others, burn his draft card, nor could he participate in the burning of the American flag. They had something he lacked, some commitment, some idealism. He had sensed the difference in the car ride down Interstate 95 with several students from Columbia University. How joyful and unselfconscious those two girls and that boy had sounded, tightly bonded with each other in the fraternity of intelligence. Luke, on the other hand, had looked stricken, as out of place as a ghoul wandering about in daylight.

“So are you two in school?” the boy had asked, in an attempt at cordiality.

“I am,” Luther had said.

“Where?”

“The City College of New York.”

“Oh yeah, I’ve heard of it, I think,” the boy said, conveying from his tone that what he had heard wasn’t good. “How about you? Are you in school, too?” he asked Luke.

“No, not me.”

“What do you do?”

“I work for a family business.”

“What kind of business?”

“Just a family business. That’s all.”

“Yeah, but what kind of business?” The boy laughed. He wouldn’t let go. He thought everybody should be forthright and out in the open just like him.

“A rooming house.”

“So where is this rooming house?”

“It’s on Broadway.”

“Broadway where?”

“Broadway none of your fucking business.”

“Sorry. I didn’t mean to intrude.”

“Stop looking at my face.”

“What?”

“I said stop looking at my face.”

“Bill, just do as he says. OK? Let’s have some peace here,” the girl in the front passenger seat said.

“OK, but…”

“No. Just peace,” the girl said.

It was that kind of ride. Luther longed to be away from all of them, and especially his poorly behaved brother. How ugly and unfit they were for the world that they couldn't be in company without a problem arising. But then Luke surprised him by apologizing and giving the boy the exact location of the rooming house.

“Say, I know that building. I lived there. Jesus, that's the building with all the roaches. They were everywhere. They would run right over your face as you slept. The place was unbelievable. What do you do there, anyway?”

“I help to manage the place.”

“Must be some unique style of management.”

“Yeah, I guess so.”

“So if you don't have a deferment, how come you haven't been drafted?”

“I got in some trouble.”

“What kind of trouble?”

“I shot someone.”

“Wait. You shot someone?”

“Just joking. But I scared you, didn't I?”

“Yeah, a little bit, I guess. You're a funny guy.”

“A real funny guy,” Luke said.

Some days later Luke made a print of the photograph he had taken of Luther on the national mall. “You see. I can take pictures,” Luke said.

“It’s nice,” Luther said. It would not do to tell Luke that he should have come closer with the lens.

“I think those girls in the car liked me.”

“You do?”

“Yeah. I could tell. They weren’t looking at me the same way that jerk was.”

“Maybe he was a jerk, but he was a Columbia jerk.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“I mean, he was just being open and intelligent, the way that Columbia students are supposed to be.”

“What are you talking about?” Luke asked.

“I don’t know. It was just a thought.”

“Well, keep those thoughts to yourself, will you?”

They had drifted all that day among the crowds but never really a part of them. By late afternoon Luke was ravenous for a hamburger, or any food at all. They had separated from the two girls and the boy on arrival, and now they had no ride home. Wandering about the sprawling open space on the mall grew tiresome and the collective jollity appeared to be fading with the sunlight.

“Burning the American flag. What kind of shit is that?” Luke said, before lifting his forearm to his nose and going into his trance on the Greyhound bus they had managed to catch back home. He didn’t seem to be asking for an answer and so Luther didn’t try to give him one.

But perhaps the world was not great events. Perhaps he did not have to go looking for America in the helicopter gunship flying low over the Mekong Delta or the many thousands thronging to the nation's capital. Maybe America was whoever came to his door. Like Miss Schnell.

“It was you. All along it was you.”

“What have I done now, Miss Schnell?” Luther asked. He had opened the door only partially, so as to prevent her from entering, but she pushed past him anyway.

“To your face I will tell you. You are a murderer. That is who you are. Little Dieter is no more with us. He has fallen from my window sill to the street below. No other cat of mine has taken such a plunge, and so what can I conclude but that the cruel conditions of his stay in your abominable room drained from his young soul any desire to live. You are one who tarnishes and sullies rather than uplifts, and though I suspect you have no friends, should I find that you do, I will inform them of the lethal price your friendship brings.”

“Thank you,” Luther could only think to say.

“You deserve to be thanked in just such a way, you may very well believe.”

As Luther followed Miss Schnell to the door, he heard himself cry out, “Where is my father in all this? Where is he?” He could hardly accept that the words were his, and yet they had come from his mouth. It must be the Bible my mother gave me, Luther thought, and that wretched inscription by my father.

Claire wasn't feeling well yesterday, so Mommy and I went out together to a café in Paris, where we will be staying for a few days. Mommy was at it again, telling me that every girl should have the experience she had of a French lover while we sat in some café in Le Marais. I really don't mind when she goes on and on about herself. She is frustrated and lonely within the marriage she has made with my father, and so, though she is relatively young, she has already begun to live in the past, which you can be sure is full of exaggeration, as if fishing there for the love she feels is missing in her life. But she did something last night that really shocked me. I mean, it is one thing for her to present her youth in this inflated way, but it is another for her to call for the check and tell me to sit alone in the café so some Frenchman can make himself available to me for the night, which is exactly what she did. She paid the bill and walked out. The sad thing was that she actually thought she was doing me a favor and gave no thought to what kind of predatory creatures might be floating around just such cafes. Mommy is OK, but she can have some strange ideas...

Sarah's mother had betrayed not only Sarah, but also him. Procurer, madam, pimp. Words such as these were called to his mind. She had tried to corrupt, debase, the love he and Sarah felt for each other. Could there be any doubt? At the same time, Sarah could have thwarted her mother's plan by leaving the café with her. She didn't have to just sit there waiting for some boulevardier to make a move. The letter not only aroused his anger but fantasies of Sarah being ravaged by the more well endowed men of Paris.

You have shown me what I am up against with your letter. The word perfidy was written by Shakespeare on English soil but applies to votre mere. I see now what I didn't see previously, that the sole purpose of this European journey was to remove me from your life. Well, that makes me sad, as I am currently in the bulrushes of my life, abandoned by everything and everyone. But my day is coming. See me as China rising...

Melvin came to him in the night with a fever that brought his pale face to fuller life. "I have been sick but I am not dying," Melvin said, trembling and sweating as he stood in the hallway outside Luther's room. "All day all I hear as I lie in bed is 'Leaning, leaning, leaning on the everlasting arms.' Do you want me to sing it for you, Luther?"

"No, please don't," Luther said, not wanting to sound cruel but also wishing to be spared Melvin's solo.

"Luther, I have been good. I have been a fisher of men for some years now, ever since the Christ Jesus called me to his ministry. But sometimes I feel my words mean nothing, nothing. That is a horrible thing to say, I know."

"Why did you come to me tonight, Melvin?"

"Sometimes I see men and women talking with each other on the street or sitting with each other in coffee shops and I say to myself, 'How do they do that, Melvin? How do they do that?’ And I ask myself why the message of the Christ Jesus from ministers such as me so often sounds not like the message of love but of anger and retribution directed at those who enjoy this worldly love.”

“Is that what you have come to me for, Melvin? For worldly love?”

“No. I cannot say...”

“Go back to your bed, Melvin, and stay warm through the night,” Luther said.

“I will do that, Luther. I will do that.”

Sarah was not home the afternoon he called. Her father answered the phone and said he was about to drive to the airport to meet their flight. “She will be fatigued from the trip, as will her mother and Claire,” Peter went on. The scenario was different, more disappointing, than the one Luther had envisioned. He had been hoping he could let her come to him. Instead, he rushed for the public phone down the hallway from his room and dialed her number, and feared, in so doing that he had showed his abject dependency.

Something wasn’t right. Some colossal sense of dread had taken hold. He was setting himself up for rejection. Sarah had decided, in the course of her travels, like that professor’s daughter, that he was not right for her.

Having dialed her number once and gotten her father, he was powerless not to do so again that same day, all hope of her taking the initiative having fled. “I’m pretty exhausted. Can’t it wait until tomorrow?” she asked, hearing the neediness in his voice. It was the sort of response he had expected but was unable to stop himself from eliciting.

“Just an hour?” he asked, having no idea how tiring an international flight could be.

She came to his room in a black skirt and black tights and black pumps and a white blouse, her brilliant blond hair set off by a black cape, as if she had stepped from a fashion magazine. Her black bag had a long gold chain. The outfit only added to his fear that a transformation had occurred and now he was being left behind. “This place is insane. Don’t you see all the roaches? It’s worse than that room you had across the street,” she said, brushing one of the creatures off her arm after they had made love.

“They are a pestilence,” he said.

“Luther?”

“What?”

“That story about the knife you showed me.”

“What story?”

“Don’t pretend you don’t know when you know exactly what I mean. Would you really be prepared to kill me if I left you?”

“No. I don’t know. What are you talking about?”

“I don’t know if I can see you anymore.”

“Why is that?”

“Because I’ll probably be going away to art school in Boston sometime in January.”

“Why Boston?”

“The Boston Museum School.”

“There aren’t any art schools for you here?”

“No. Not for me. Boston is where I need to go. But my question is this: Will you kill me if I leave you? I need to know.”

“Who have I ever killed? Why would I kill you?”

“You showed me that article for a reason.”

“It was an interesting article. That’s why I showed it to you.”

“Luther, you’re not right for me. That’s what I came to see. You’re ordinary. Your mind is dull. You write poorly and your penmanship is terrible.”

“Yes, that is true. I try to discipline my hand to shape the letters well, but it all turns quickly to crap.”

“Please don’t come with me downstairs. I’ll say goodbye here,” Sarah said, on the landing, and entered the elevator after Melvin had stepped out. The door closed quickly and with authority.

“Luther, have you entered into sin with this young woman? Have you been leading her down the road to perdition?” Melvin asked. His fever had evidently broken. His pale face was free of beads of sweat.

“Melvin, please. Swim in the waters of your own life and leave me be,” Luther said.

“Are you in pain, Luther? Is that it? Are you in need of the comfort of the Christ Jesus?”

“Melvin, this must stop. Please.”

“I will now begin a round-the-clock prayer vigil to ease your crisis,” Melvin said, as Luther ran to his room and locked the door shut against him.

Sarah’s words stayed with him all through the night and promised, like his SAT scores, to be with him forever. She had only confirmed what he himself believed to be true. The question wasn’t whether he would kill her but whether she had killed him. Had she not stabbed him with her words in his face and chest and all the parts of his body?

I have killed no one and will kill no one. Is that not clear? What must I do to prove my worthiness in the eyes of the few, let alone the many? Where does she get off taking such a liberty, running a mile when her information should permit her but an inch? Yes, I am talking about the newspaper article. What else could I be talking about when it has caused me to be tarnished with such a filthy brush? Fuck all those who would have me die and die and die. Fuck them, I say. Just fuck them.

In such a way did he write on that night when Sarah had left him, some semblance of peace coming to him as his pen continued to move. And then he wrote some more.

She has come to me in her costume, her things of blackness, as an impostor who would terrify me free from the face of the earth. And then she marshals all her financial and cultural power, her individual and family assets, to announce that she will be relocating to Boston with no other purpose than to bury me deeper in my pain, and to this I say fuck all those who would intimidate me from this life. I say fuck them, just fuck them.

That night Luther took his snooze pill, but sleep did not come as quickly as he had hoped, and so he took another and then another. Only loud and insistent knocking on his door woke him the next morning. Still groggy, he turned the lock, prepared to see the terrible faces of either Miss Schnell or Melvin. Instead, Sarah stood before him, in plainer garb than she had worn the night before.

“Have you come to see if I am still alive, and if so, to finish the job? Is that your plan? Are you here to kill me?”

“Stop it,” she said. “I was tired from the plane ride. I didn’t know what I was saying or doing.”

“You were wearing the face of arrogance and conceit. That is what you were doing,” Luther said. “You were trying to scare me into my grave, and that is a coward’s trick.”

“Please talk like a normal human being, or try to.”

“What do you want?”

“I want to be with you.”

“The world has nothing that I want. Do you know who said that?”

“I have no idea.”

“My mother said that.”

“I don’t know about your mother, but the world has plenty that you want.”

“Name one thing.”

Sarah began to cry. “I can’t leave you. I just can’t.”

He took note of her tears in silence. He received them as the assurance he had been seeking.

Within a month she had traveled by train with her mother to Boston for an interview at the Museum’s School of Fine Arts. Her portfolio of drawings included effete men in shirts with ruffled sleeves and high collars, drawings Luther associated with Aubrey Beardsley. The review committee saw her talent. Then and there she was admitted. She would begin classes in February as part of the class that had entered the previous September. The fact that she had not received her high school diploma was no barrier.

The Van Dines had an artist among them, a girl with the recognizable talent to open doors. Claire declared that her younger sister was on track to become one of the most formidable young artists in America, and in so saying spoke for all of them. Luther was present at the family’s apartment to hear their song of praise, but the smile on his face was less than genuine and a mask for the anger and jealousy that overwhelmed his being and which he was afraid everyone could surely see. His emotional reaction shocked and shamed him, and caused him to ask what sort of person he might be to feel so upset by his girlfriend’s success. The news was just another in a series of mountains he must somehow climb, as Sarah’s departure for the country and then for Europe had been. She had started by coming to him, and ever since it had been he who was going to her. If her life was about change, his was about routine, the drab patterns the world had no interest in calling him from.

In the month since Sarah had returned from Europe, he had become a familiar face at the family's dinner table. He was even permitted to sleep over, and in Sarah's bed, as Brian slept in Claire's bed. The atmosphere was relaxed, permissive, the family's largesse overwhelming.

"Are you happy for her, Luther? Are you really, really happy?" Lydia asked, from across the dinner table.

"Oh yes," Luther said. If he had escaped the notice of the others, he had not escaped hers.

"Even though she will be far, far away?"

"I guess I don't like to think about that," Luther said.

"Do you have the tools for coping with it? That is the question.

"I guess I will find out," Luther answered. He felt the blush come to his face.

"It's hard, Luther. It's really, really hard to lose," Lenore said.

"Luther hasn't lost, dear," Lydia said, after a forkful of delicious lamb. "The world is big, and there will be new opportunities not only for Sarah but for you and Luther as well. We must see life as a continuation, a journey, an exploration. We must choose life, as I was telling Luther this summer when he walked about as if he had a rain cloud over his head. Do you remember, Luther?"

"Oh yes, I do," Luther said. He turned his attention to Lenore. How beautiful she remained to him, with that bowl-cut black hair and those full lips and eyes that pulled you deep into them. How could Malcolm give up a treasure such as her? “Are you enjoying your new school?” he asked. Lenore threw back her head and from that lovely mouth came peals of laughter, as if that were the only response she could make to a question so absurd. “Well, I guess not,” he said, abashed once again.

In her canopied bed Sarah said that night, “Don’t pay any attention to Mommy. ‘Life is a journey, an exploration.’ God, the way she talks. She’s the one who needs to go on an exploration, if you ask me, and I don’t mean to Europe with two of her daughters.”

“I guess,” Luther said. The world outside her bedroom window was dark and cold. He pulled the comforter over him and lay for a long while with a feeling of dread before falling off to sleep. Once again he woke in the morning with his arm thrown over Sarah, as if to keep her from slipping away in the night.

There were no tears the January day that Peter Van Dine loaded the black Chrysler with Sarah’s possessions and drove her to Boston. Luther did not plead to meet with her the night before and helplessly emote, as he had prior to her European trip. The legacy of her departure was simply a high and constant state of anxiety, the only pocket of peace being that induced by the over-the-counter sleeping pills he continued to take. He had attached himself to someone formidable, after promising himself he would never get so involved again. It was a wonder to him that he could function at all, given the pain he was in.

Sarah found a room on Westland Avenue, within walking distance of the school, just down from the Museum of Fine Arts, on Huntington Avenue. An account was opened for her at the Shawmut National Bank, near Symphony Hall, where she could access the money from the trust fund her parents had established for her, and for all the children. A financial cushion had been prepared so she might love the new life she had entered and give herself to it unfettered by financial anxiety.

She had promised to call, her first night in Boston, and it took three sleeping pills for him to fall asleep when she didn't. The morning and afternoon of the next day he drank coffee and smoked cigarettes and stared with dismay at the slow-moving hands of the clock in Finley Cafeteria. His day at the college finally done, he forced himself to stay on the subway to Penn Station, rather than rush home and set up a vigil by the pay phone down the hall from his room. The post office had rehired him. She knew he was back at work, and what his hours were. He had to hope that she would call him that night. If she didn't, he would have to take the train or bus to Boston. He could not go through another day of uncertainty.

But an Indian tenant monopolized the public phone, as a reminder that Luther was not the only tenant in the apartment. Every few minutes he would buy more time by dropping another coin in the slot and he would continue in his excitable and voluble manner. As midnight approached, Luther sat on the edge of his bed, holding his head in his hands, when from down the hall came the beautiful ring of the telephone. He tore from the room in his T-shirt and jeans and bare feet to see Melvin approaching the phone.

"No," Luther screamed, tearing the receiver from Melvin and holding it to his ear as he backed Melvin off with a primal glare.

From the other end came Sarah's angel voice. "What was that? It sounded like someone was being murdered."

“Just some confusion,” Luther said, as Melvin retreated to his room.

“I knew you would be worried, and so I called,” Sarah said.

“I was worried.”

The operator came on the line and requested additional payment.

“This pay phone isn’t very convenient. I will have to get my own phone,” Sarah said, after depositing some coins. The room was small but fine, she went on. She had a hotplate and the landlady was nice and the tenants seemed OK, although they were mostly older. There was one young man, a hockey player with the Boston Bruins. He was missing his front teeth, which didn’t stop him from asking her out.

“No, I didn’t go out with him,” she said, hearing the anxiety in Luther’s voice.

A hockey player. A young man with brute strength and professional recognition and a paycheck. The threats were coming from everywhere, like that crazy Tet offensive taking place in Vietnam. He was angry. She had made him fall in love with her only to go away. She had to know that. She couldn’t just throw him away like a piece of trash.

A weekend passed without her, but the following one she came by train. Five hours from South Station, in Boston, to Grand Central. She complained about the time and the expense, shaming him, making him feel weak and needy not only in her eyes but in those of her family, as if he could hear them saying what they had too much restraint to say. Why don’t you let her go, Luther? Why don’t you just do that? It was that he heard in their eyes and expressions.

“I’m so happy for you, Sarah. You and Jeffrey are the only ones who will get free of our family. Claire and I can’t,” Lenore said, as the three of them sat in the living room.

Luther received her words as a revelation. Someone else saw the family as a deathtrap. Never mind that it was a nicely appointed deathtrap. It was still that every bit as much as the building Luther's family operated and in which his siblings, some of them, were slowly perishing.

And later, that same day, there was Brian saying, "Do you two know each other? You act like complete strangers," as Luther and Sarah sat together on the sofa in the living room. Brian punctuated his remark with his mirthless heh heh, as if he could invest no more energy in his laughter than in his life. And yet so fully alive in his perceptive power. When Brian left the room, Sarah said, "Luther, I was thinking, on the train, this just isn't going to work. I have a new life. You have to accept that and let me go. Can you do that without killing me? Can you?"

He had been waiting for those words. All his thoughts about what she owed him had dissolved as soon as he arrived at her family's apartment. There could be no disputing that she was speaking the truth. Brian was right and all those who spoke with their eyes and not their mouths--her mother, all of them— were right and now it was for him to clear himself away so she could grow as she needed to, without the deforming weight of him upon her.

He didn't tarry. There was no dawdle dance. He tore up Riverside Drive, the bitter February cold temperate in comparison with the frigidity he had experienced in that beautiful apartment, where he had been stripped naked for inspection and found wanting. The blow that she had wanted to deliver she had finally been able to. The confidence she had lacked following her European trip she now had gained after two weeks at art college.

And it was all right. It really was. A clean break had been achieved, as if with the force of a meat cleaver. Did he really need to hear that he was a potential murderer? Whom had he ever murdered? Jane Thayer? Dahlia? Maura? Who was Sarah to speak to him in such a way, to murder him, in fact, with such an image?

There came a knock on his door the following night, just as he was preparing to take his sleeping pills.

“Open up, Luther. I know you’re in there. I can see the light under the door.” His sister Vera showed no respect for the barrier against intrusion a door should be.

“I was just getting ready for bed,” Luther said, having let her in.

“Jesus, Luther, this room is roach heaven. Let’s get out of here and go get a Danish.”

“Yes, well all right,” Luther said.

“By the way, I give resentments. I don’t get them. Just so you know.”

Was she referring to her eviction of him from her room before he could spend his first night there. If so, he had no desire to draw more of her flame throwing by engaging with her about the episode. He had long since come to understand that it was the right of his female siblings to bury hatchets deep in his head. Anyway, he had only himself to blame for allowing her to convince him such a lunatic arrangement could work. If they had stopped sharing a room as children after a certain age, how could either of them imagine they could do so as young adults?

And yet, sometimes he imagined just such a thing, the two of them not in a room together but an apartment, as once, in the long ago, he had envisioned living with Luke in an apartment of their own. He placed such emphasis on separation from his family, and yet the bonds of underlying closeness remained, extending even to his absent sister Rachel, as if he had to recover her, make her more real to him than she currently was. Oh, he didn't know and he didn't care. He was just in such pain. All he wanted to do was swallow his pills so he could be ushered into the safety of sleep.

Instead he was seated at a booth across from his volatile younger sister in the coffee shop of the Turk. Luther reached up and placed a quarter in the jukebox and punched his selection.

“Why do you go and play that awful song, Luther?” He had punched E3, “Wives and Lovers,” as sung by Jack Jones.

“It is pretty stupid,” Luther said. “Or maybe not stupid. Maybe it's just sad. Or stupid and sad. All songs about love are stupid and sad. It's like no one knows what they're talking about. They just sing any old crazy thing that comes into their heads. Like this idiot Jack Jones, with his wives can be lovers too.”

Uncomfortable, depressing memories of high school, of sitting in this same coffee shop with Jane Thayer came to him. How drab compared to the world Sarah had opened up to him. Like another century those years seemed with Sean and all the kids from Scully's stoop. And the music. That too had changed. Jack Jones. Tom Jones. Strange creatures from the long ago, with their hideous and glib emoting.

"Are you OK, Luther?"

"Sure. I'm OK. I'm fine."

"You don't sound fine. How's Sarah?"

"Sarah's doing OK."

"Are you still seeing her?"

"Sort of. I don't know. No."

"What happened?"

"Nothing happened."

"Something had to happen. What is she doing, anyway?"

"She's in college. Art college."

"Where?"

"Boston."

"That must be hard for her. It was for Nancy Becker when she went off to Vassar. She couldn't be with Luke anymore. Her world expanded and she didn't need him."

"Maybe he didn't need her either." She sounded just like Lydia, Sarah's mother, as if he were a piece of garbage requiring disposal.

"Maybe. Anyway, I thought you two were a good match."

"I guess not."

"You'll find somebody else. You found Sarah after Jane left you."

"Right."

“Did I tell you? I’m going to college, too. I already started.”

“What college is that?”

“Queens College, where you went for a year. I’m in something called the SEEK Program.”

“What is that?”

“I’ll be taking remedial courses and at the same time earning college credits. Don’t look now, but I just might be gaining on you.”

Once again he was struck by her resilience. Pride was not the barrier in her life that it was in his. She had been OK with going to public school, and she was OK with entering college through a remedial program. It made things easy in a way, having nowhere to go but up.

He needed to get away. She unsettled and frightened him in ways he sensed it was best not to discuss with her, as she had to know from the confident grin she was showing him. Had she dragged him to the coffee shop only to awaken some old and painful fear? Clearly she knew the nature of it. She had taken their father with her manipulative ways and now she would outstrip him with this college thing, which she had turned into a competition. The future was hers, she was saying.

There, as if it had occurred only the previous day instead of three years before, were her school books resting on a window ledge on the stairway between the first and second floors of the building. The blue loose-leaf binder with her name written in large, looping letters. Somehow she had forgotten these materials and it was only for him to return them to her. Instead he nudged them off the sill and down into the alleyway. In so doing he had delayed her inevitable ascent. Now it was for him to realize that he would someday pay for his immorality.

The three sleep aids he took that night did their job, but the morning came and as he sat up in the cold room he didn't see how he could live. But she was not done with him. She had not thrown him into the garbage, or if she had, it was now time to retrieve him. And so, there she was back at his door.

"I can't go back to Boston unless things are right between us. I just can't," Sarah cried.

"Why can't you? I am just the dog of all dogs for you to kick."

"Don't talk like that."

"I don't know. This back and forth. You all band together with this idea that you are better than me. I see it. I feel it."

"Mommy likes you. She really does."

"That's why she tries to pimp you off in some Paris café."

"That's just Mommy trying to convince me and herself that she's a woman of the world."

She brought him to the place of peace, proving once again that if she was the cause of his pain, she was also the answer.

He took seventeen credits that semester, five courses in all, in history and political science and philosophy and English. Dutifully he came to class with a tabbed notebook, seeking to capture the essence of the professors' lectures or remarks, but they always felt sketchy, and his poor penmanship made reviewing them an unpleasant experience. The texts, even those that absorbed him, did not seem to lead to a point of view or insight or questions. A critical faculty seemed to be lacking. He felt tentative, on the outside, only half there, and it showed in his grades. He was a B student who received the occasional A. from a generous professor. Restlessness and sexual torment would afflict him in Cohen Library, at the northern end of South Campus, and after only a short time he would flee the confines of the stacks.

He would look at girls on the campus with interest, but they seemed to be an inaccessible sorority. In Central Park he could assume the cloak of anonymity. He was not a part of the college or the neighborhood boy at the neighborhood bar. He was a stranger in a wintry urban nature setting. By the band shell or on the promenade or by the Bethesda Fountain he might meet girls who, like him, were at loose ends. Or he would visit MoMA or the Metropolitan Museum of Art or head down to the West Village, hoping to find a girl along Eighth Street, maybe in E S. Wilentz's bookstore. And there was the enforced intimacy of the subway, where he could make soulful eye contact with a girl also riding the rapid transit. He had his love, and she was in Boston, but he also had his freedom. She had given him that when she left. What was he to do but have a leg up against the day when she went off with someone else?

Even in Boston, on those weekends when he visited, the impulse would come over him to wander the city. As to what he would do should he find a willing girl, that he couldn't say. All he knew was that something would draw him away from Sarah's room and the book he had been reading and onto the cold streets in search of that sexual adventure he would find if only he kept looking., though there was actually the question in his mind what he would do should he actually meet a girl.

Beyond the vast and generally desolate parking lot of the Sears building ran the trolley. It thrilled him that the city would keep the poky old cars in service rather than pave the tracks so buses could rampage over them. The Park Street station served as a transfer point to a modern subway into Harvard Square. Just beyond the giant Harvard Coop, the Brattle Theater featured old Marx Brothers films. There they would sit while all around them the brilliant Harvard students would roar with laughter at the antics of Groucho and Chico and Harpo. It moved Luther, stimulated soft feelings in him, that such gifted young people could enjoy entertainment such as this. Throughout the film he remained conscious of their presence, his focus more on their enjoyment than his own. The darkness of the theater was something to be grateful for. It obscured any differences and allowed him the sense of oneness with his betters. The lights, when they came on at the end, returned him to the pain of the real world, and he edged his way out carefully with Sarah to the street, on guard against saying anything foolish about the film that might be overheard and trigger that same strong laughter he had heard in the dark, because nothing was like the laughter of the intelligent to wound and even destroy a soul.

“Hi, Sarah.”

A young man with a penetrating gaze and hair richly black had called to her outside the theater. Even in winter, his skin was kissed with darkness. He was with a girl, whose hand he held.

“Oh, hi, Lane,” Sarah said.

Luther couldn't be sure the young man had even heard her response, so fast was he moving, but he had seen the young man's face, that look of smiling confidence, and something more, of boldness . "Who was that?" he asked.

"That is Lane Halderman. He's the reigning genius at the Boston Museum School. Even the teachers are intimidated by him."

"Because he can intimidate people makes him a genius?"

"Oh, come on, Luther. Genius is genius. It communicates itself. He has power, gifts they can only dream of possessing. And he's rich as well. His father owns half of Boston."

He heard the annoyance in her voice, calling on him to stop pretending he hadn't seen what she and all of the Boston Museum School had seen. Luther held the young man in his mind. He didn't feel so much a wave of fear at a potential rival as envy and admiration and longing to be what he was not, the place of gross pain that the likes of Bob Dylan could bring him to. That was a lot for one look to generate, but Sarah's words only supported the sense that specialness had shown itself.

"Wherever you go you must be sure to be with only yourself. You will always be in the wrong place if you try to be with others. Have I made myself clear?" Miss Schnell had intercepted Luther on the landing in moving mode, his possessions loaded into an industrial strength soap barrel on a dolly.

"Of course, Miss Schnell," Luther said.

“You are a murderer, but that does not mean I do not have your best interests at heart.”

“What is my best interest, Miss Schnell?”

“That you do no harm. But you are at that stage of your life when harm is all you do.”

The wrong place. He thought about Miss Schnell’s words as he rolled his improvised luggage up Broadway and across the Columbia mall.

“Didn’t I tell you you would be back?” Roberto said, as Luther entered the apartment he had left only some months ago.

Luther could have Roddy Blakely’s room, behind the French doors, as there was someone else in Luther’s old room. Roddy Blakely had lost it, according to Vera. He had run naked around the reservoir in Central Park before the police apprehended him. After twenty-eight days in the Bellevue psych ward, he was transferred to a facility near his parents’ home in Massachusetts.

“He is broken. He will have to be on medications for the rest of his life.”

The rest of his life. Such finality, as if she were writing Roddy off and even wanted him to fall. It wasn’t anything Luther could prove. It was just something that he felt.

That afternoon Luther fell asleep, and an hour later woke to find a young man standing between the French doors. The sight of the visitor caused his stomach to flip. Short and moon-faced, he had a head completely shorn of hair, which might have been odd in someone so young but no great cause for revulsion. The jagged, angry red scar that wrapped around the side and back of his head was another matter. It seemed more than anyone should have to look at, liked the liver-colored stub shown him by his father following his leg amputation several years before.

“I’m Marty Branigan. How you doing? You OK? I see you brought your shit.” Marty rocked back and forth on the balls of his feet, and the intensity generated by his trauma caused his body to vibrate and his words to be expelled more than spoken.

“Yes, I have.”

“You looking at my head? You looking at my motherfucking head? Look all you motherfucking want, Motherfucker.”

“Yes. I mean no.”

Marty Branigan had been a medic in IV Corps. The assignment had not been a promising one. All seven of his predecessors had been killed in the field. The Vietcong slipped away, but the NVA were another matter. They stood and fought. The wound had come not from ground fire but from friendly fire delivered from above, a fragment from a bomb dropped from an American warplane. He now had a steel plate in his head. He was not afraid of blood and gore, his own or that of others. He had tucked the intestines of the wounded back within a slit abdominal wall and stanching the flow of blood of those with blown off limbs.

Marty’s words flew from his mouth with pressurized force, as a spray from an aerosol can.

“You digging my outfit? You motherfucking digging it?” Marty continued.

“I am,” Luther said. Marty stood in a loose-fitting black pajama top and bottom.

“I took it off a motherfucking VC. We were out on patrol. I said, ‘This one’s mine, motherfuckers.’ I have his motherfucking ear, too, but threw away his motherfucking dick. What are you going to do with a motherfucking dick? You know what I’m saying?”

Sean’s takeout power with both fists had acted as a magnetic force on Luther, and there had been others of his brawling ilk who had that same effect. Marty Branigan was not brawler, but he was equally magnetic. He had secured that place long before he stood before Luther in his VC garb with his battered skull. He remembered Marty from lower Claremont Avenue, down toward Tiemann Place and One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street, a ways from the buildings that housed the prep school boys in their argyle socks and penny loafers and khaki slacks. The strip was just west of the el that bisected Broadway and served as a divide between the working class Irish and the blacks and Hispanics in the housing project to the east. Marty’s older brother, Terry, had achieved legendary street fighter status. A memory remained of Terry sitting on a stoop with his back against the wall of the building. He had been singing a song, something about a girl named Carol, only there was a real Carol in that same building he wanted to come down from her family’s apartment. So wiry, almost skinny, and yet so tough. And the name —Terry. A girl’s name as well as a boy’s. And the names of his buddies, Serge and Bosco. Strange, beautiful names of reckless boys who street-corner harmonized and rumbled as part of a gang called the Freight Kings. Boys cast out into the night into a world Luther could only be on the fringes of, with his brother Luke, a world which terrified Luther when he heard of the baseball bats they sometimes fought with.

Nor would Luther let on that Marty had been with the two boys, Fredo and Wilson, the night they robbed Luther at knifepoint outside the Columbia University gym, Marty saying by standing back that he could be with those boys but criminality was not part of his life. Or that some years later Luther had seen him in that same gym driving with daring brilliance toward the hoop and displaying amazing hang time. That would have been the night in his junior year Luther had snuck into the gym with Tom Smits, Marty and his crew arriving a short time later, and the same night the man child Poppy arrived and struck fear into Luther. Poppy was all “I’m not playing with you” in his manner and known to routinely stick people with his stiletto, and on that night challenged Tom Smits to a game of on-on-one, warning that he would have to hurt him if he let Poppy win.

And there were other connections, as the day only the year before Luther had overheard Marty saying to the counterman at the Ta-Kome Deli on One Hundred Fifteenth Street and Broadway that he had received his draft notice. On that day Marty had looked at Luther as if he recognized him but couldn’t recall from where and Luther did not offer to help him, though he had wanted to acknowledge the legendary status he had conferred on his brother and him and that they existed in his pantheon of heroes.

Of such wisps and strands did his life appear to be made, fragments and impressions that brought a rush of inner excitement but which did not amount to a compelling narrative. He was trying to make much of a little, he suspected, and yet was powerless to stop, as that would be to admit that his life was inconsequential when in his heart he held to the conviction that his life was terribly, terribly important. Things had happened to him and others that the world must know.

Luther resisted now the impulse to share these points of contact with Marty. It would not do to bring him any closer than he already was. Over the next couple of weeks he lived with his injured roommate as if with a wild but ultimately benign animal. Screams, shouts, profanities, unintelligible eruptions could be heard coming from Marty's room. His jarring physical presence exposed the undeserved softness of Luther's life, that he, a lightweight, mediocre student reading paperback novels should be spared the battlefield while someone like Marty was having his head brutalized by a bomb.

And then there was Marty's tendency to sit on the toilet with the bathroom door wide open, as if the war had rendered meaningless the idea of privacy.

A month of decompression passed for Marty. He began to settle down. The outbursts were fewer, and he was easier to look at as his hair grew in. And yet Luther remained uneasy and awkward around him. It was the sense that Marty had something, the war experience, on him. His questions to Luther as to what he was studying and about other aspects of his life had an undercurrent of mockery and contempt, masked and made all the more unnerving by Marty's smile and superficially congenial manner.

One afternoon Luther came home to find Marty in only his VC pajama bottom.

"What's your take on the war? I'd be interested to know. Seriously," Marty asked, when he saw Luther pause. He had seen Luther carrying a copy of an Isaac Deutscher biography of Trotsky for his World Communism class.

Luther's inhibition fell away. He started slowly, but one word led to another. His monologue veered between moral outrage that the United States would invade a small country and insert itself in what amounted to a civil war and an acknowledgment of the manifest evils of Communism as practiced in some parts of the world.

"That's good. That's really good. I like that," Marty said. Already Luther had begun to cringe with shame at his "on one hand but on the other" diatribe and the fervor with which it had been delivered.

"What's good?" Roberto asked, having just come in.

"Luther here has been talking some good shit about the war and Communism," Marty said.

"Yeah, Luther can get going sometimes," Roberto said.

"Tell me something, Luther," Marty went on. "I mean, you don't mind if I ask you a personal question, do you?"

"No. Sure. It's OK," Luther said, even though he didn't have a good feeling about where Marty was going.

"You see me with my shirt off?" Marty asked.

"Yes."

"And do you sometimes see Roberto with his shirt off?"

"I do."

"Then how come we never see you with your shirt off?"

"I don't know," Luther said, too ashamed to give anything but a reflexive answer.

“Come on, Marty. Leave Luther alone. He’s a gargoyle, but he’s our gargoyle,” Roberto said.

“I’m just asking him a question. That’s all. You don’t mind that I ask you a question, do you, man? Well, do you?”

“No, I don’t mind,” Luther said.

“I just want you to think about this. I showed you my chest and Roberto showed me his, but you haven’t shown us yours. Can you think about this? Can you promise me you’ll think about this?”

“I will,” Luther said. “I promise.”

It had only been a matter of time. Marty was carrying a lot of anger, and sooner or later he would have to direct it at someone and not simply the universe. Marty’s focus on his chest had cast Luther deeper into the lake of shame, the truth being he was unwilling to show Marty his bare chest on demand, as the sight of it could only invite ridicule.

“He’s just jealous,” Sarah said, when Luther told her of his encounter with Marty. Now that she had her own phone, he could reach her directly, and Roberto had supplied him with stolen charge numbers, which he would give to the telephone operator from the phone booths around the city from which he would make his long distance calls.

Her words buoyed him. He could feel her love coming through the line. But it wasn’t as if he wasn’t good to her in his own way, too, giving her the support she needed as she tried to find her way at the school.

There was mention of her painting instructor, a man named Simon Allbury. He had an MFA from Yale, Sarah said, and was a painter himself. Hearing his name set off no alarm bells in Luther. Perhaps it was the fact that Simon Allbury was forty years old and married and had a daughter close to Sarah in age.

“He showed me some of his work. It looked so dead. And I’m probably just as deluded that I have any ability,” she said.

“Just hang in. You have loads of talent. Tomorrow will look different,” he heard himself say. He was angry that she had left for Boston, but that didn’t mean he wanted her to quit school and return home. He might be afraid of her success, but he had more to fear from her failure. What would she do without school? What would they do? She would be thrown on top of him.

How quickly their life in different cities had become the norm, but while it was the norm, there was also a plan, a finish line. When she graduated in a few years, she would move back to New York City. Then he would be safe from the threat posed by the adoration societies he imagined up in Boston and all the terrible anxiety that he would lose her to another would disappear. In the meantime it was important that he and Sarah speak each and every day so no diminishment of their love could be allowed to occur. Every day is a day that brings her closer to me. Every day that I apply vigilance so others do not claim her for their own brings her closer to me. In such a way did Luther think of himself in relation to Sarah.

He bought tickets for a Doors concert down at the Fillmore East, on Second Avenue, for a weekend when Sarah was planning to come in. But then Sarah canceled. She was behind on a project and would need the weekend to catch up. She had made a friend and emphasized he was only that to reassure Luther. His name was Tom Castenberry. They would be going to a movie Saturday night. Friend or not, an alarm bell was sounding yet instantly stopped when she added, “Why don’t you take Lenore? Mommy says she’s been really down.”

Sarah’s gift offering astonished him into temporary silence. It was everything for him to hide his joy.

But no moral sense, no memory of the pain he had caused in sleeping with Lenore the year before, could serve as a buffer against his desire, and the speed he dropped before calling on the Van Dines only fed his arousal. He felt, as he stood among them in their living room, that they inhabited one world and he another, and that they had a clear window through which to see his carnality. Not Lydia, who responded to him favorably, saying, in fact, “It is so good of you to take Lenore. She has been feeling pretty low,” but Peter appraised him dubiously, as did Claire and Jeffrey. It seemed an eternity before Lenore appeared from her room in a dress of black velour. By the time they left, his ears had turned red, so exposed did he feel as to his true purpose.

That evening, as Jim Morrison did his bellowing thing on the stage, Luther wondered, not for the first time, whether he might not be a pretty boy psychopath in those black leather pants and open white shirt and with his freshly shampooed brown hair. He was as caught up as anyone in the thunder noise, but he was also outside the performance. Removed from the studio, in the raw, they weren’t as good. Jim Morrison was something of a holler head.

He saw the concert as merely a prelude to the real show. The evening would be a failure if he could not find time to be alone with Lenore and capitalize on this once-in-a-lifetime moment. In the dark, musty theater he had begun to feel a sense of connection with Lenore. It had been missing on the subway ride down to the East Village; his chatter had been met with an indulgent smile or monosyllabic response. Though she was no more communicative after the performance, she did agree to call home to ask permission to stay out a bit later. A Yippee demonstration was planned for that evening up by Grand Central Station. "Daddy says absolutely not, so I guess you're out of luck," Lenore said, after hanging up the phone outside the all-night candy shop on the corner of Eighth and Second Avenue.

"I have two tabs of acid. I was hoping you would trip with me," he said.

"Back to your criminal intentions," she laughed, for the moment back to the lightness of being he remembered her possessing the summer before.

"Do you think so?"

St. Mark's Place was jumping, kids streaming into the Electric Circus and the bookstore and the boutiques still open. It crossed Luther's mind that Malcolm might appear, and he had to wonder if Lenore might not be thinking the same thing, that life had delivered her into Luther's drab company and not the one her heart burned for.

"Lenore," a girl gasped. She gave her a crushing hug, and then held Lenore by her arms, in the physical way girls could be with each other. A pretty girl, though not as pretty as Lenore, with long silver earrings and a pile of frizzy black hair. They had been classmates at that boarding school in Vermont, but the girl hadn't gone back either.

"How is crazy Malcolm?" the girl asked, as she shot a quick and dismissive glance at Luther.

“I don’t really know,” Lenore said.

“What? You’re not seeing him? You two were great together.”

“I thought so too.”

“Oh, Lenore. I’m so sorry.”

The long subway ride home was awkward. The encounter with her friend had surely plunged Lenore deeper into the past. At the entrance to her family’s building he said, sensing her desire to be free of him, “I guess I should leave you here. I’m sorry for what I said tonight.”

“You don’t have to go. We can do the acid.”

“But your parents.”

“Everyone will be asleep. It will be better than sitting around depressed.”

Tripping had become common at her boarding school, but for him dropping acid was a first. Strange and wonderful how the pale green carpet began to glow and how the honking of a car horn far below seemed to vibrate right through him. And Lenore’s face—it was, for a while, as seen from under a strobe light.

“I’m dead, you know,” she said, when he placed his hand on her thigh.

“Dead?”

“Dead but not gone.”

“I don’t understand.”

“Don’t you?”

“Why do you talk like this? You have your whole life ahead of you.” Even on acid he could recognize the cliché, the kind of utterance the old made to the young, but her mention of death had angered him.

“You’re so boring and serious.”

“You’re not being serious? Talking about death? What’s more serious than that?”

But lust resumed its call; the acid did not allow for lingering in morbidity. She made no effort to stop him when he ran his hand up her leg, and yet her apathy proved to be the brake she would not apply physically.

“What’s the matter, Luther? You’ve never fucked a corpse.”

“Don’t talk like that,” he said.

His body turned cold with fright. He was suddenly certain that Lydia lurked in the darkened vestibule in her dressing gown, her face expressing not amiability but stony rage and in her hand, held at her side, a giant carving knife.

“Oh my God,” he gasped.

“What’s the matter? See a ghost?” Lenore laughed.

He began to crawl on the carpet toward the front door. If he stayed low to the ground, Lydia might not see him. He stood and turned the lock and raced into the hallway, where he walked backward to the elevator so he could not be taken by surprise.

As he waited for the Broadway bus, a police siren wailed some blocks away and fast approached on an insane, zigzag path, its red light rotating atop the hood, He hurried back from the curb into the doorway of a photo shop where, fearful of being run down, he huddled. But as it drew near, the squad car ceased its vicious lunacy, abruptly braking in the bus stop. Two officers sat inside, pretending to pay him no mind. He had done wrong and now he would have to pay and pay. He walked slowly over, bringing his guilt with him.

“Did you want me?” Luther asked.

The officer in the passenger seat looked up from his newspaper. “What’s your problem, pal?” His voice had iron in it.

“Nothing. I just thought...”

“Get lost, freak,” the officer said.

Luther did just that, boarding the bus that had just arrived and moving to the rear, where he sat directly opposite an elderly couple. Whether it was relief at being spared the stabbing knife of Lydia or the police taking ownership of him, the laughing thing had now come to him, not the dinky laughter of Brian, Claire’s boyfriend, but the uncontrollable kind that fed on itself. The couple held their place, not taking the display personally. But others were out there in the night, the “I’m not playing with you kind,” for whom such laughter would be cause for death sentence justice. And so Luther tried to bring the laughter back within himself, where it could not be seen.

A vision for a new life bloomed in his consciousness as he lay in bed that night, triggered by the ongoing acid-induced joy. One, Lenore, not Sarah, was his true love. Two, he was not made for academia, given the deficiencies of mind he would never be able to compensate for. The acid had liberated him to pursue an exciting life in the theater and in movies, where IQ was not everything and other facets of his being could come into play.

Sleepless, he rushed out in the morning to a pay phone to share his findings with Lenore. And she, not someone else in the household, answered his call; clearly, she had been waiting for word from him. Before she could say more than hello, he poured out how much the night had meant to him and his sorrow for any transgressions he had committed. As he tried to convey how bright the future was for both of them, she interrupted, her voice taking on a tone of coldness he did not associate with her.

“This is Claire you’re speaking with. Lenore is fast asleep.” The line then went dead.

He returned home and lay, curled up, with his head in his hands. As the hours passed, his mortification began to ease. He had spoken in generalities and made no explicit mention of acid or sex. Maybe he had not incriminated himself and so could try again. If there was even the slightest chance that Lenore’s heart had opened to him, he must know. Better to risk a crushing rejection than to miss finding out that she really did want him. After all, he had been wrong before, hadn’t he? What about that night he first met Sarah at that party, and she had seemed utterly cold?

Again he flew from the apartment to the pay phone down the block so as not to expose the delicate and profound conversation he was planning with Lenore to their mockery.

“Van Dine residence,” Peter declared, in a voice of iron firmness, causing Luther to wonder if the head of the household had been placed on high alert by Claire, that he, Luther, might call again. Yes, Luther was sure that was it. A posse of the righteous was forming.

“It’s me, Luther.”

“What can I do for you today, Luther?”

“I thought maybe...nothing.”

“You thought maybe nothing? You called for nothing? Surely you called for something. And what would that something be?”

“I thought maybe I could speak with Lenore?” He grimaced, as would a man who expected any moment to receive a blow.

“Would that be my daughter Lenore, my daughter Sarah’s younger sister?”

“Yes, I believe so,” Luther said, his eyes squeezed shut as he braced for the explosion of fury from Peter that would blow him out of the phone booth and onto Amsterdam Avenue. But all he heard was the receiver placed on the small table in the vestibule, and shortly there on the line was Lenore with a tentative hello.

“I forgot everything I wanted to say. Your father frightened me so. But I know. I wanted to say thank you for putting up with me last night and...”

“Luther?”

“What?”

“You must leave me alone.”

“Why?”

“Because you’re boring and idiotic and...”

“Don’t say those things.”

“I have to go.”

As darkness came, he lay in bed with a fat Signet edition of Dombey and Son. As when he was a child, he thought, "I am reading. I am actually reading, and moving myself forward in my life." For twenty minutes he was able to continue without distraction. How little it took for his life to feel on track once again. Then drowsiness overcame him and he fell asleep in his oversize T-shirt on the mattress which served as a bed.

Some hours later his bladder brought him awake. The smell of weed was strong. Beyond the closed French doors he heard voices talking softly.

"The bitch says to me she loves horses and so I say what part of a horse you like because I got something a horse would be proud of to show you and her eyes go wide and I can tell her pussy's getting wet. I think I'm onto something with that chick. I truly do." And then someone else, Marty, was speaking. "That girl, Leslie. She practically choked me with her tongue."

Their talk struck Luther as lewd and lacking in kindness. The girls they described were pieces of wanton meat they could simply degrade. His thoughts turned to Sarah. She must never come into their clutches. Never. And then he thought of his own activity with Lenore. What had been driving him but a desire to sleep with her? He just wanted Marty and his friend to disappear so he didn't have to be reminded of his own attitudes and behavior. But they weren't disappearing, and neither was the urgency of his need to pee.

"Hey, Luther, how you doing? I'm just out here shooting the shit with my buddy Leroy. Leroy's from around here. We served together in the Nam," Marty said, as Luther emerged from his room.

Luther turned to see a small, thin black man with a narrow face and big, fogged eyes slumped in an armchair with his legs spread.

“Always glad to meet a friend of Marty’s,” Leroy said.

Luther flinched as Leroy brought his right arm up from the side of the chair and extended it.

“Sheet, don’t be afraid to shake a brother’s hand. You ain’t never shaken a black man’s hand before?”

“Of course I have,” Luther said.

“Then be shaking this black man’s hand. I mean, it ain’t even black. Can you fucking dig it?”

Leroy was right. His hand wasn’t black and it wasn’t white either. In place of his right hand and forearm was a metal prosthesis, attached to which was a moveable claw, which Luther touched gingerly.

“Now that wasn’t so bad, was it, touching a black man’s thing? Sheet.” Leroy threw back his head and laughed as if Luther were the funniest white boy he had ever seen.

“It’s nice to meet you, Leroy.” At the least Luther could take comfort from having the sense not to express sorrow for Leroy’s injury.

“Is it nice to meet me, motherfucking white boy? Or am I a worse nightmare than you probably just woke up from?”

“Actually, I was in a dreamless sleep, which is rare for me,” Luther said, as he headed off to the bathroom. A fraternity of the maimed, Marty and Leroy were. But would it last? All relationship was tenuous, and those between blacks and whites had a particularly treacherous fault line.

In the morning Leroy was gone, and with him the mirror reflecting back to Luther the tawdriness of his own soul. I am one with you, Sarah, he shouted, in the privacy of his mind, vowing to reassert the primacy of his relationship with her over all others, including Lenore, even if it only came after her firm rebuff of him.

The following weekend would be high stakes. Sarah would be coming to the city. At the same time her parents and Claire and Jeffrey would be up at Camp. Luther would be alone in the apartment with both Sarah and Lenore.

That week, in Finley Cafeteria on the City College campus, Luther did a deal with Scale Master Zach Zeckler for three more tabs of acid, aware that he was potentially undoing his vow of unity with Sarah and heading down the path of mischief.

“Unscrew the locks from the doors/Unscrew the doors themselves from their jambs,” Efram Ellsberg said.

“What?” Luther replied.

“You’re in college and you don’t even recognize Walt Whitman?” Scale Master Zach was all astonishment.

“Whoever degrades another degrades me,” Efram continued.

“I’m not degrading Luther. I’m asking Luther,” Scale Master Zach said. He had been in the company of Efram when Luther arrived.

“Let freedom reign,” said Efram, to mark the completion of the transaction. He was far in advance of Luther on the tripping scene, and Luther could only wonder if his emulation of Walt Whitman with his free verse ramblings was owing to the expanded consciousness the drug had given him. And yet those words, "Let freedom reign," seemed addressed to the air and to signify Efram's supreme detachment from all about him, life warranting little more than mirthful utterance. Efram struck Luther in that moment as drawing on some secret treasure whose source might someday run dry. The time might come when Efram had to dig deeper than to this point he had shown a willingness to do. He had the sudden image of Efram as a bearded and gigantic babe.

"I'm afraid," Sarah said, that weekend, before dropping the Scale Master's acid. And for a while it did take her to a dark and worrisome place. She sat sobbing on the living room floor with her head in her hands and crawled away under the dining room table.

"I admire you so much," Lenore said, joining her sister under the table. Lenore had shown no such fear before swallowing the tab Luther offered her.

"What are you saying?" Sarah asked.

"You have gotten away, something Claire and I will never do."

"Sure you will," Sarah said.

"No. We have been buried alive by Mommy and Daddy, but you are free and so is Jeffrey."

For Luther Lenore had harsher words, out of earshot of Sarah. "Thief. Liar. Cheat." A hysterical laugh followed. "You should see yourself. You look so deranged."

"You shouldn't say those things," he said, having followed her into the master bedroom.

“Worse. I should say worse,” she said, no longer laughing. “Why don’t you go to her? What is wrong with you?”

Sarah arrived, barefoot. “Is something going on that I should know about?”

“We were just talking,” Luther said.

“Talking?” Sarah asked.

“Talking. That’s all,” Luther said.

“Why don’t I just listen while you talk?” Sarah went around Peter’s big desk and sat in his chair with her feet up. She struck a thoughtful pose, leaning her cheek against her hand.

“Does anybody want to go out? Suppose we go to the park?” Luther asked.

“Luther has one idea after another,” Lenore remarked, and fell back laughing. Sarah began to laugh too, and joined her sister on the bed.

“I thought it was a good idea.” Luther backed away, and took the seat Sarah had just vacated.

“Did you hear that, Sarah? Luther just had a good idea,” Lenore said, and they were off on more laughter.

“I will call the police on you if you don’t both behave,” Luther said, having some absurdity of his own to express.

“Watch out we don’t have you arrested,” Lenore said, and both she and Sarah had themselves another laughing jag.

The park called to them. Down the hill they ran to the playground, where Lenore and Sarah pumped themselves high and higher on the swings. On the backward arc they were almost flying over the wire fence. Such reckless abandon summoned the gruesome image of their skulls broken like pottery vases on the harsh cement floor. Now they were not only swinging but they were standing up, shouting their gaiety into the spring air. Luther was driven to his knees and closed his eyes, afraid to witness the disaster they were inviting with their heedless laughter and physical display. Their return to earth did not ease the danger, as killing time had come, with the park now desolate, the footpaths and benches abandoned. They had been left to the hidden few whose only purpose was to inflict harm, those with knives and guns and no capacity for remorse. The careless chatter of Sarah and Lenore as they walked back up the hill showed their innocence as to what level of violence they were facing. Could they not understand that laughter brought death, not only on the swings but elsewhere, that it was an incitement to those whose only laughter came from the harm they inflicted on others? He restrained his urge to scream at these sheltered sisters, oblivious of the Cape Man or Poppy or others of their kind, acting as if the city was still theirs when it hadn't been for years. You did not show careless laughter in this city anymore, not in the parks or on the subway or on the street, not unless you wanted to be hurt. You had always to keep your voice low and your eyes averted in deference to the aggrieved among you, those who had no play in them, as in "Are you playing with me?"

How scared he was. How scared he had been since childhood, and those beatings inflicted on Luke by the boys in the welfare hotel down the block, the city an extension of the apartment he had grown up in, where an explosion could happen any moment.

Though he wanted nothing more than to linger between Lenore's legs once more and feel the wonder of her lips and tongue and the silky smoothness of her hair, the night passed without any such occurrence. Not that he didn't try, when Sarah fell off to sleep, but Lenore begged him, tearfully, to go back to her sister's bed, saying of her own body that it was no place for the living.

"I love you," he said to Sarah, the next morning.

"Don't talk a bunch of shit to me, Luther. You were after my sister last night," Sarah said.

"I said I love you."

"Yeah, yeah, yeah," she said, mocking him with the Beatles' refrain.

But he did love her, if love meant that he was answerable to her and wanted to die when he didn't hear from her. His mind went to the dark place the following week, after her return to Boston. He called and called, but she did not respond. When the hour grew late and he still hadn't spoken with her, murder offered itself to him as the only possibility and so he phoned the Boston Police Department. A desk sergeant greeted Luther's concern with weary apathy and the suggestion that Luther wait for morning before hitting the panic button. The desk sergeant, to Luther's mind, was not alive in love that he should offer such advice.

Well after midnight, she came on the line. She had been with her friends Maggie Palmer and Sally DeShay. She was coming from the place of good food and good wine and good companionship and he from a place of high anxiety.

“You worry too much, Luther. I feel like you’re watching every move I make,” Sarah said.

“I get anxious. That’s all.” He didn’t dare to say she was all he had. She would hurt him badly if he did.

“I know, but you have to calm down. Everything is all right.”

She was letting him off easy, just giving him a warning.

On his next visit she took him to meet Maggie Palmer and Sally DeShay. Some paralyzing shame came over him, leaving him hardly able to speak. Maybe it was hearing Sarah brag about him, saying to them that he was taking seventeen credits that semester. She was saying that he was learned or on his way to being learned, not knowing that her innocent buildup had defected him, causing a paralysis of the tongue. Maggie Palmer and Sally DeShay were seeing what Sarah had previously seen but now chose to ignore, that he was ordinary and slow and unable to hold his own in intellectual company. Maggie was the daughter of a chemistry professor at McGill University, in Montreal, and Sally had for a father the chief financial officer of a Fortune 500 Company. Surely their mothers were equally brilliant, so how could they not be as well? He sensed from the way they directed the conversation away from him that they recognized his deficiency and that they felt sorry for him. Afterward, Sarah pretended that the dinner had been great, but they both knew otherwise.

And then she stopped pretending. Don’t Look Back, a documentary about Bob Dylan on tour in England. See Bob Dylan sing. See him take apart Donovan and young university students with their stupid talk of science. See him put down the press. See him phasing Joan Baez out of his life. See him composing on the piano or feeling tired in a car. See him with big Albert Grossman. Just see him. Luther and Sarah did, at the New Yorker Theater, on Broadway and Eighty-ninth Street during one of her weekend visits, and she blazed with hatred that she was not The One, as Bob Dylan so clearly was The One.

“You are nobody. You are nothing. He’s a genius, a genius, and you haven’t expressed an original thought since the day I met you. Do you know how embarrassed I was by you in front of my friends? Do you know what they said to me? ‘Well, he has nice hair, even if he has a little too much of it.’ That’s all they could say about you.”

Luther heard her fury and gave it a home where it could live inside him. Not that her news was really news. Bob Dylan had a function on the planet that had gone unacknowledged, to make others wish they were Bob Dylan. He could write lyrics that made no sense and say things that made no sense and that made no difference in how he would be viewed, as he had his force of will to impose on you and make himself happen in your life.

But if Sarah could tell him where he was at in relation to the great Bob Dylan, Luther could apply that same critical focus to others. This man Eugene McCarthy, who had triumphed over Lyndon Baines Johnson in the New Hampshire primary. There was something wrong with him. He was a dawdle dancer, the kind who would do some elaborate and self-defeating steps on the one-yard line rather than run the ball into the end zone for the winning touchdown. The man was also cold, like the state of Minnesota he came from, and no one could honestly say his true dwelling place wasn’t the land of pomposity and vanity. As for RFK, what was with a grown man hanging on to the diminutive? Little Bobby Kennedy, not Robert Kennedy. His shaggy locks falling over his forehead. His boyish grin. Adorable little Bobby Kennedy Jr., who could not pass over into adulthood the way his brothers Jack and Ted could do. Never mind his wife and all those kids. He was just a little boy. But he was a ferociously competitive little boy with a will to win, unlike Eugene McCarthy, lost in the vapors of his pseudo-poetic mind. Better little Bobby than the one who sucked, in his vanity, on the bitter weed of failure and was likely to play ponderous Hamlet on the field of battle.

In preparation, little Bobby was reading books recommended by those with bigger minds than he possessed, books written by the greats of history, like The Peloponnesian War, by none other than Thucydides, so he could be better than he was.

Luther was not condescending to Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. He was just seeing him in the light of his own understanding. That was all. He could not put this in his Poli Sci papers or exams, but he was feeling it.

Then came the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., that first week in April. Luther saw the footage on TV, the hotel balcony on which King fell dead, over and over. There was no mockery in Luther for the Jr. after MLK's name. MLK had spoken through him, not to him. The killing brought shock and sadness but also fear. Would the blacks of New York City seek revenge and kill him as the blacks of Cincinnati had killed a college student after dragging him from his car? Would they shake the buildings of the city so hard that they would crumble? Would they display the unending anger that he had witnessed on the summer streets of the city when he was a boy? In slaying Martin Luther King, Jr. with bullets fired from his high-powered rifle, James Earl Ray had placed Luther's life in danger. But neither Harlem nor the city erupted in flames, as other cities did. There were no stabbings unto death of white men and boys for the crime of another.

Luther believed in order, federalism, the rule of law. He distrusted those who advocated destruction of "the system," whatever that was, the ranting radicals whom he saw and heard speechifying on the CCNY campus with their bullhorns. They struck him as unpleasant, unkind types without a genuine regard for people, regardless of the causes they were espousing. They couldn't organize their own lives, and yet they would somehow reorganize society? It was hard to understand what they really wanted, unless it was anarchy and howling mobs with long knives.

He had read those lines of Yeats, "The best lack all conviction/while the worst are filled with passionate intensity." But did that insight apply as well to the Columbia SDS members? They seemed a cut above what he saw on the CCNY campus. Mark Rudd and Lewis Cole, the two leaders, had a celebrity aura about them. Their Ivy League credentials added to their luster.

Mark Rudd, born Rudnitsky. He had grown up in a small township in New Jersey, where he had been a Boy Scout and a straight A student with a ticket to a number of elite colleges. His parents came to visit him at Columbia, and brought sandwiches that they ate with him in the family car. He had a girlfriend; their relationship had its ups and downs. So Luther read in Newsweek, or maybe Time, going soft inside at this portrait of the fiery young revolutionary as human.

The Friday night in late April Luther completed his post office shift and returned to the Upper West Side, he headed home to begin studying for exams the following week. The course on Charles Dickens worried him. His mind had a tendency to wander for long stretches of those big, fat novels—David Copperfield and Bleak House and Dombey and Son and Great Expectations. He needed to go back, fill in the gaps, grab hold of knowledge so it could be his.

But the thought came to first stop off at the West End Bar, and as he walked along Broadway, he encountered a commotion. Demonstrators had thronged One Hundred Fourteenth Street from Broadway down toward Riverside Drive. There they were in the middle of the street, encircled by helmeted police officers under the supervision of the top brass, in their tailored uniforms with gold braid.

One of the sitters, a girl he knew from CCNY, waved to him. “Are you staying?” she called out. Some degree of compatibility had drawn him to her, but he soon learned that she had mental horsepower, having graduated from the Bronx High School of Science, and this was a good reason to keep his distance. She was simply someone too strong for his frail dimensions.

“What about it, man? Are you part of the problem or part of the solution?” a voice in the crowd called out.

From the fire escape of a third-floor apartment of a small residential building near the top of the hill leading down to Riverside Drive hung a bed sheet. “End Columbia Oppression,” the message read, the words written in angry red paint. Everyone knew that Columbia bought up buildings pretty much as it pleased, and then turned the screws on non-Columbia tenants to drive them out. But many also knew that Columbia was a source of stability, a kind of guarantor against the neighborhood going into decline. Or maybe most people didn't know these things, but Luther did, and so, staring at the sign he felt conflicted.

As a child he had visited this very block and developed an instant crush on a blond girl, Inga, whom he first saw outside that very building, and in that moment saw from her receiving smile that his feeling for her was reciprocated. Paralyzing shyness had prevented him from ever really talking with her, as everything would have been downhill from that exquisite moment of recognition. A Norwegian girl she was. Her brother Eddie had been the checker down at the Gristede's on One Hundred Eleventh Street. Oh, the energy of America made manifest in the determined expression on Eddie's pale face as he bagged those groceries, an expression that said, "I am making it. I am paying my own way. Nobody gives me nothing."

But the world was not interested in his private musings about Inga and Eddie. It did not want to hear that for the following year he had an abiding fantasy of going with Inga to the tunnel that ran under Riverside Park and lying in a little nook above the tracks where the New York Central freight trains roared past, and what the psychological significance of such a fantasy might be. Or that he had played loadsies on that same street that the Columbias were now occupying. The world did not care that loadsies was a game played with bottle caps and that you scooped out the cork lining and poured melted crayons into the caps to give them weight. The world didn't want to know about the numbered boxes they drew on the street with chalk or the rules or goals of their little game. And it didn't really need to hear that malevolent Stinky from the welfare hotel down the block had crumpled Johnny, the super's son, to the pavement with knuckled jabs to his spine or that Johnny's older brother had called out the Negroes from the welfare hotel into the street after this violation of his kid brother and that he had broken Negro faces and they had broken his as well before the police could come, that many, many were the faces that had been broken that day.

The musty old Presbyterian church where he had briefly attended vacation bible school, the giant mica schist boulder between two buildings, the bookstore on the corner where he had worked for Mr. Lewicki his last two years of high school. These too had meaning more than he could express or more than these Columbias, who were only passing through on their way to the wider world, would want to hear.

Their laughter and their scorn. His whole life he had feared them. The ridiculing, icy laughter of those whose intelligence was in the highest percentile. And now it was ready to explode on him should he take one more step away from the protestors. He thought of his mother and her own deference to those, as she put it, with fine minds.

A police captain stood with a bullhorn, his tailored uniform ablaze in medals and his shirt as white as a Ford model's teeth. "You have one minute to clear the street. If you don't, you will be arrested for disorderly conduct. Again, if you wish to avoid arrest, you must clear this street." As he delivered his forceful, amplified message, several paddy wagons appeared. Now Luther couldn't walk away. All eyes would really be on him. He would be seen as kowtowing to an edict. And so he sat among the Columbias and minutes later was one of many crammed into the back of a paddy wagon for a rocky ride to a midtown police precinct for booking. From there, the journey continued down to Centre Street, where he was deposited in a cell in the Tombs with bright-eyed Ivy leaguers he feared as much as any criminals in the grimy old detention facility.

“Yadda yadda yadda, warden,” a burly Columbia shouted, more than once, rattling the bars and pressing his face against them. Luther sensed the young man was aping a hardened criminal, such as William Bendix or George Raft, in some vintage film. Even in the squalid cell he was maintaining his sense of humor with his tone of mock defiance. And then there was another who quoted Yeats. “Everywhere the ceremony of innocence is drowned.” He too speaking in a tone of amusement.

The darker, quieter part of the night came, and with it the chill that a wafer-thin blanket was no answer for. And in the morning, the hunger that could not be appeased by a pale slice of meat said to be bologna between two stale pieces of white bread or the tepid cup of weak coffee served in a stained metal cup.

The Columbias drew on reserves of strength that came with their more robust constitutions while daylight found Luther recoiling deeper within himself. As their conversation grew loud and animated, he longed to be a tiny fly on the wall unworthy of notice or inspection.

Picking up on Luther’s fear, the yadda yadda young man said, “Hey, have we met before? You look sort of familiar.”

“No, I don’t think so.”

“You’re not from Columbia?”

“No.”

“Where do you go to school?”

“CCNY,” Luther said, as if a shameful confession had been extracted from him.

“Gee, that’s too bad,” Yadda Yadda said. Seeing Luther flinch, he added, “Just kidding, man.”

“Hey, my father went to CCNY. They called it the Harvard of the proletariat back then,” another Columbia said.

They sensed that he was different, and spoke in his company as they wouldn’t among each other. He hated the accommodation they made to him and the pity that motivated it, even as he recognized his vulnerability left them no choice.

That morning they were let out of their cells and led to a large room where they were held before being brought before the judge. Several police officers stood among them, including one, Officer Harry Carpenter, who was in no way afraid of the Columbias but got right into it with them.

“What are you studying at that school of your, Slick?” he said to the Yadda Yadda young man, going nose to nose with him.

“Theater arts,” Yadda Yadda said.

“What’s that? Theater arts?”

“I would like to become an actor.”

“Why didn’t you just say so?”

“I thought…”

“You thought what?” Officer Carpenter challenged, though with a smile. Luther wondered if Yadda Yadda and the other Columbias knew the rage behind that smile, and how hard Officer Carpenter could hit.

“I was just trying to explain.”

“You were just trying to explain. Is that what they teach you at that school? To explain? Hey, you, what are you laughing about? Yeah, you, Goldfarb. That’s your name, right? Solomon Goldfarb? Some shit like that?” Officer Carpenter had turned his attention to the young man whose father had attended CCNY.

“My name is Arnold Weisberg,” the young man said.

“Were you laughing at something, Arnie? You don’t mind if I call you Arnie, do you, Arnold?”

“No, not at all.”

“So was you laughing at me? Was that it?”

“I wasn’t laughing.”

“That wasn’t laughter I saw on your face?”

“No, it really wasn’t.”

“So you’re calling me a liar. Is that it, Arnie?”

“No, I’m really not.”

“Was you the one that hurt my buddies at that school the other week?” There had been a takeover of some buildings on the campus. Some officers and students had gotten hurt in the melee that followed.

“No. I would never hurt anyone,” Arnold said.

“You’re sure about that? A mug like that and you’re not a killer?” Officer Carpenter was nose to nose with Arnold Weisberg, and every few seconds his head would twitch, some impulse for physical action flowing through his thick neck to his brain.

Luther was next in line for Officer Carpenter’s menacing inquiry. “What’s your name, Handsome?”

“Luther. Luther Garatdjian.”

“What kind of name is that? You some kind of foreigner?”

“It’s Armenian.”

“What’s that, Armenian?”

“It’s just something I am.”

“It’s just something you are? That’s how they teach you to talk at this Columbia? How much your father paying for you to talk like that?”

“My father doesn’t pay anything. I don’t go to Columbia.”

“You know, you don’t look like you goes to Columbia. You ever been here before? Don’t he look like he’s been here before, guys?”

Officer Harry Carpenter had broken the Columbias’ dismissive laughter and and demonstrated his skill in using the group against Luther, who could only imagine the numbers of men in the maw of the law Harry Carpenter had pummeled into senselessness, because there was a point with types like Harry Carpenter when the words stopped and their fists did all the talking. Harry Carpenter came from the world of the parochial school, where the brothers and nuns hit and hit and hit, a world in which his father got a load on and then he hit and hit and hit, giving his son Harry a beating so as to make a man of him. Because you could not know the truth of life until and unless you received a beating and then gave a beating in return. All those books with all those fancy words the Columbias read, as if they could provide a defense against the world of beatings.

But the court was calling, putting an end, at least for then, to the Harry Carpenter show. A skinny old judge lost in his black robes presided over the large courtroom where the arraignment took place. Within fifteen minutes, Luther was a free man, released, as were the others, on his own recognizance, following a persuasive petition to the judge by a smooth talking silver-haired lawyer.

Luther felt the might and chaos of America witnessing the big rigs going to and fro on Canal Street. A memory came to him of Jerry Jones-Nobleonian and him running down this way with tough Italian kids in full pursuit. Only minutes before, on Mulberry Street, they had given over their money for firecrackers, cherry bombs, roman candles, ash cans. It occurred to him now, as it hadn't before, that the neighborhood kids had been put up to scaring them off without the goods they had paid for.

The sidewalks bustled with shoppers inspecting fish on beds of ice and produce. As Luke wandered, the bright sun burned away the chill stored in his body from lying on the concrete floor.

“You won't believe what happened,” he said, having stopped at a phone booth to call Sarah,

“What happened?”

He could hear the sound of turpentine being splashed about as she spoke. Her early morning enterprise diminished his enthusiasm for the report he was about to give.

“Nothing,” he said.

“What do you mean, nothing?”

“I got arrested. That’s all.”

“Arrested for what? What are you talking about?”

“I wandered into a demonstration I really didn’t need to be a part of,” he said, and gave her the rest of the story, leaving out the belittling remarks of the Yadda Yadda young man and Officer Harry Carpenter.

“Luther, can we talk later. I’m busy.”

Her tone of annoyance shamed him. He had been like a child running to his mother with big news only to receive a slap. Once again the meager foolishness of his life presented itself. Though the day was just beginning, he felt tired. All he wanted to do was get home and lie down. Unshaven and dirty, he entrusted himself to the subway to take him there.

As a child riding the subway, men would sit directly opposite him on the rattan seats with their legs spread, offering a view of the outline of their hard penises pressing against the fabric of their pants. When, startled, he would look up, they would lock his eyes into theirs before he could break away. Such intimacy and confidence their half-smiles conveyed, as they sought to penetrate his every defense and claim full possession of his being. And yet nothing more would happen; they seemed content to display themselves in this way.

Now, at age twenty, Luther too was sexualized on the subways of New York City. He did not turn a penetrating gaze on young children, but the sight of attractive teenage girls was electrifying, and if they showed any sign of welcoming his glances, he would, if they were alone, summon the courage to approach and introduce himself.

In such a way did he meet a high school girl on her way back to Great Neck, Long Island, from her ballet class in the city. The following day she came to his apartment, where their time in bed went fast, too fast, from her standpoint, he could sense, and the failure robbed him of his confidence. She was a slight girl, with a ballerina's figure, a girl of quality and depth and discipline venturing out beyond the narrowness of her community. The anonymity that their encounter ensured had attracted her, but she had been hoping for something more.

He got her out of the apartment and down to the West End Bar. Several tall, thin Ethiopian men occupied the next booth. He recognized them as tenants in his family's building.

"Look. Landlady's son. Landlady's son with pretty girl. Hello, Mr. Landlady's son," Said one of them. There was mischief on his smiling face. Was he the same tenant who the year before had flung his suitcase and radio and books and clothing out the window and onto Broadway, eleven floors below?

"Do you know them?" the girl asked.

“Enough to recognize them,” Luther said, as the excited Ethiopian’s friends quieted him down.

“Is your mother a landlady?”

“I guess so,” Luther said.

“It’s nothing to be ashamed of,” the girl said.

As he walked with her to the subway, he felt she was seeing more and more, and that what she was seeing did not align with the image she originally had. He said a pained goodbye and tried to comfort himself with the understanding that she had been using him, as he had been using her, and yet it was a while before his depression could lift. People took liberties, whether it was Officer Harry Carpenter or Yadda Yadda or the Ethiopian. They walked right in on him, like those men with the erections on the subway in the long ago would do.

In the waiting room of the Long Island Railroad in Penn Station he met another, a blond girl waiting by the gate for the 5:15 to Babylon. “Meet me here tomorrow. Can you do that? I have to see you,” Luther said, with unforced sincerity.

“Who are you?” she asked.

“My name is Luther Garatdjian. I am a student at the City College of New York. I work evenings for the post office and before I go there I will sit in the Horn and Hardart Automat at Thirty-Third and Eighth, where I will have a cup of coffee and a piece of apple pie.”

The girl laughed. It was a friendly laugh. “OK. Three o’clock tomorrow,” she said.

And the next afternoon she was there. "Let's go to your Automat," she said, and they did.

Her name was Angelina and she had her cross to bear. She had a boyfriend in a nearby drug rehabilitation center

"What kind of drugs does he do?" Luther asked.

"Heroin is his lover," Angelina said.

"Heroin frightens me," Luther said.

"It should."

"I don't like needles and I don't like what it does to people. Junkies going into a nod out on the street. I guess I shouldn't say that. He is your boyfriend."

"You can say it," Angelina said.

"When does he get out?"

"Not for another three weeks."

"Three weeks. That's a long time."

"It's not the first time."

"I feel sad just hearing it."

"It's not so bad. It's not like he's so great when he gets out."

"I don't ever want to do heroin. I hear it just takes you over."

"That's pretty much it," Angelina said.

"So will you come home with me? We could smoke some grass. That's not heroin."

"Sure. Sure I will," Angelina said.

On the subway ride uptown, Luther thought of Angelina's boyfriend. Suppose he was violent? Suppose he broke bones?

They made love that afternoon, Angelina giving herself to Luther with abandon. Afterward, under the influence of the grass they had smoked, they lay on his mattress.

"I guess that wasn't too good," he said. He had come too fast, as usual.

"It was fine," she said, as she rested her head on his shoulder.

"Are you angry at your boyfriend?"

"Do you have to ask?"

"No. I guess not. I was wondering."

"Wondering what?"

"Could I see you again?"

"Maybe. We'll see."

"That doesn't sound too good."

"Do you have someone, Luther?"

He liked the way she said his name. "Sort of," he said.

"What does sort of mean?"

"It means I do, but she lives in another city."

"What city?"

"Boston. Boston has Carl Yazstremski and it has Sarah Van Dine. Do you know who Carl Yazstremski is?"

"Everyone knows who Carl Yazstremski is. At least everyone who lives on Long Island."

“She’s going to be a home run hitter too someday.”

“Your girlfriend plays baseball?”

“Not exactly. She’s an artist, or studying to be one.”

“What are you studying to be?” Angelina asked.

“I read Charles Dickens. I study poli sci.”

“What is poli sci?”

“Political science. I think it’s something about government, but I don’t really know.” He laughed, and she laughed, too.

Sleeping with Angelina and the ballerina had made him happy, really happy. Sex was the most wonderful thing, and he wanted more and more. He wanted to know every pretty girl he saw. It was just that way.

“You do well with the ladies,” Marty Branigan said. His hair had grown out, making him easier to look at, and the volatile eruptions were fewer. Ladies. A word from another time, and with the sound of false elegance, like Sean with his talk of class.

“Not really,” Luther said.

“You have a different one over here every week. Where do you meet them?”

“I don’t know. If I have a feeling about a girl, I just talk to her.”

“Gargoyle love. There’s nothing like it,” Roberto said, having joined them.

“Am I right, Roberto? Isn’t he with a different girl every week?” Marty asked.

“And he’s got a girlfriend in Boston, too. She’s really something,” Roberto said.

“So how do you do that, man? You got a girlfriend but then you see other girls?”

Marty asked.

“Gargoyle does whatever he wants to do,” Roberto said.

“Why do you call him Gargoyle? That isn’t nice,” Marty said.

“Look at his face,” Roberto said.

Roberto’s jealousy made the name calling less painful than hearing Sarah discussed by his roommates. She was the treasure they must not touch.

On one of Sarah’s weekend visits to New York City, Luther found a letter sticking out of her bag. The return address on the envelope had Lenore’s name on it. The letter was not a long one. He read it there in Sarah’s room.

Luther is as dull and depressing as anyone I have ever met. I know he is your boyfriend, but he is a moron of mediocrity, if you ask me. All his talk about law school and fighting injustice. He should fight his own injustice and disappear. Again I know I shouldn’t say this, but you are my sister and you have such a bright future. You really should consider finding someone more worthy of you. Mommy and Daddy love Brian, but they think Luther may have emotional problems after his behavior last summer up at Camp. Anyway, I got through the Doors concert OK. I tried to pretend I was alone, which was hard to do with him commenting on the show every other minute.

Luther placed the letter back in the envelope. OK, he thought. Just OK. He stared out the open window as the screams of children playing in the park across the street rose in the soft spring air and lingered there for the longest while.

“I was just saying to Sarah how much she has blossomed. And how are you doing in your life, Luther?” Lydia asked, as Luther entered the living room.

“I am blossoming, too.”

“What are you studying this semester, Luther.”

“Literature. Poli Sci. A bit of philosophy.”

“Could you tell us a little more about your philosophy course?”

“What to think. How to think. The metaphysical reality of Charles Dickens.”

“How extraordinary. I didn’t think of Charles Dickens as philosophically inclined.”

“He was stuck in his childhood. It made him that way. Moral outrage and all that. All philosophers are liars. Essentially, they want to get their own way.”

“I see. And who are these philosophers you are reading?”

“Immanuel Kant. Descartes. Schopenhauer. I forget. Essentially, I sit in the back of the class and hide.”

“Why would you do that, Luther?”

“Because they speak of syllogisms, and I keep forgetting what a syllogism is.”

“That’s nothing to be ashamed of. I have only a rough idea and couldn’t give you a precise example. That’s why we have reference books, so we can look things up.”

“You choose to look on the bright side,” Luther said.

“We must. We must,” Lydia said.

He had heard the same from her before. She had a need to rescue and inspire and be an angel of light in people’s lives. But were her children worthy of her? The same question applied to him and his siblings in relation to their mother. It was all right to be of woman born as long as you knew it and recognized the matriarchal power that sustained a family enterprise. It's when you didn't that you got in trouble, something those philosophers maybe didn't understand.

Then the semester was over. He filled out the blue examination booklets and handed in term papers and took off for Boston, having given his professors postcards with Sarah's address so he could receive his grades quickly. One by one, the cards arrived at the rooming house, and he had to bear the public shame of one B after another, the one exception being the Shakespeare class he had taken with weary Professor Gitlow, who frequently would remind his students that they were not worthy of the bard. What law school would take him with grades such as these? he could only wonder, as he tore up the cards so Sarah would not see for herself what she already knew, that he was forever rooted to the plane of mediocrity.

He wandered down to the corner luncheonette after receiving the last of the cards. In jumbo type the headline of the Boston Globe shouted, "Robert F. Kennedy Assassinated in Los Angeles Hotel Ballroom." There it was, a photo of the senator laid out on the stage face up and glassy-eyed in a blood-soaked white shirt. A suspect was in custody. Sirhan Sirhan. A name to remember.

Peter arrived with the Black Chrysler to move Sarah back home. Luther and Sarah carried her boxes down to the car. From there Peter took over, arranging the contents in the rear of the station wagon. He had a mind for organization and said as much. Peter applied himself to the task with vigor.

The assassination had cast a pall over the day, at least for Luther and Sarah.

“Yes, it is a terrible, but in another sense it means nothing,” Peter said.

They had left behind the Massachusetts Turnpike for Interstate 95 and menacing trailer trucks.

“How can it mean nothing?” Sarah asked.

“Because politicians are puppets controlled by behind the scene manipulators, the moneyed interests who secretly rule this country. Kennedy, Humphrey, Nixon. They are all interchangeable.”

“Then why do we vote Democratic in every election if it doesn’t matter?” Sarah asked.

“Simply to delude ourselves that there is hope for a change for the better.”

“My mother says that if anyone doesn’t like it here, then he or she should just go to Russia and see how they like it there,” Luther said.

“Your mother said that?” Peter asked, allowing himself to smile.

“Oh yes, to Russia with all of them, my mother said.”

“Not an uncommon viewpoint when you think about it,” Peter said.

“I would like to go to Russia,” Luther said. “I would like to go to a lot of places. I really haven’t been anywhere.”

“Well, maybe you will, Luther. Maybe you will.”

“I want to go to Sweden. I want to stand on a Stockholm street corner looking up at the starry Scandinavian sky on a cool, clear Sunday night.”

“Why a Sunday night?” Sarah asked.

“I don’t know. I think Sunday night represents freedom. Sunday was always a long church day in my family, and when we got home Hannah was hogging the TV so I could never get to watch Walt Disney.”

“So you’re going to watch Walt Disney in Stockholm?” Sarah laughed.

“No. Just the stars, I guess. Something like that,” Luther said.

Peter was too disdainful, Luther thought. The leading Democratic candidate for the presidential nomination had been shot to death and Peter could just dismiss the assassination as nothing. Ideas really were powerful. They had the ability to remove you from the reality of people’s lives. Or maybe Peter saw more deeply and was guided by a higher truth that freed him from the attachments the average person developed for this politician or that. Whatever, Luther was stunned and stayed stunned for days that Robert Kennedy was gone and in a frazzle as to what that could mean for the Democratic Party come the fall.

He was counting on Sarah staying in the city and taking a job. He was working. Why shouldn’t she? Isn’t that what college students did? And didn’t she owe it to him that they stay together for a couple of months after making him fall in love with her and then leaving for another city? Lydia too saw the value of her daughter being out there in the real world. She didn't want Sarah to take the course of withdrawal that Peter had chosen for himself.

A family friend owned a graphic design firm down in Greenwich Village and hired Sarah to do paste-ups and mechanicals. Her first day on the job Luther found himself anxious. Maybe he had gone too far in encouraging her to forsake Camp for a summer in the hot city. Maybe it wasn't his place to tell her how to live her life.

An uneasy sense passed through him of a coming storm as he stood on the tree-lined West Village street waiting for her to emerge from the walkup building where the design firm was located. Some minutes later she came down the steps and blew right past him at such a pace that he had to jog to catch up. At the corner he placed his hand on her shoulder but she brushed it off and turned. "I'm not doing some crappy work eight hours a day with a bunch of creeps making passes at me. Is that clear? I am an artist, not some cunt for them to play with. I'm going up to Camp tomorrow morning."

He could only watch with silent passivity as she headed off up the avenue and descended into the subway before beginning his walk uptown to the post office at Thirty-Third and Eighth Avenue.

He had a half hour to sit in the Automat before reporting for his shift. The cup of coffee and the slice of apple pie helped to settle him. The Automat had a way of rooting him in his history, his mother in her polka dot dress and Luke and Vera and him in their Sunday best after hours in the tabernacle.

The numbness wore off and anger found him. You'll get yours. You'll all get yours, sitting up there in the country pampering yourselves and totally divorced from the real world. Hearing his mother say, I work. Why shouldn't they? of those living in the SRO down the block who received welfare checks.

Walking over that little bridge and into the big gray post office building was hard. She had crapped on his life. She hadn't meant to but she had, saying she didn't have to do the things he did or anything she didn't want to do, that all she had to do was be an artist because everything else was unimportant. She had made his life unimportant, worthless, as Bob Dylan had done in Don't Look Back.

That summer he took a course in post-World War II American literature with Professor Earl Lovit. There were no classes. It was something called a tutorial. He met with Professor Lovit one to one in his office and talked about the novels he had read while the professor smoked his pipe. The professor was a kind man who had himself written seven novels, none of which Luther had read. Luther read Norman Mailer's The Naked and the Dead and The Deer Park. He read both novels with great admiration but also fear. He would never be able to put words on paper as Norman Mailer had. Norman Mailer had a powerful mind that had elevated him from Boys High in Brooklyn to Harvard University. His sentences were dense and tooled and flowed within a complicated, formidable structure. He could not beat Norman Mailer, but maybe, just maybe, he could beat Professor Earl Lovit, whose seven novels were all out of print. Professor Lovit had gotten his PhD from Boston University, not having been good enough for Harvard or Yale or Columbia or any of the Ivy League doctoral programs in English literature. And Professor Lovit had not gone to a college or university of any renown as an undergraduate either.

Professor Lovit had gone to Chico State University. Hah. What was that, Chico State? And it had taken Professor Lovit twenty years to earn his PhD after graduating from world-famous Chico State. This information Luther found in the City College catalog. Not that Luther even wanted a PhD. What was that, reading a bunch of novels and then writing some words about them sufficient to get your degree so you could complete the cycle by endlessly discussing literature with your own students? No, a PhD wasn't right. It wasn't hard enough. Better to get a JD. A JD was the only possibility for becoming a man for those without an aptitude for science.

He liked Professor Lovit. He liked him a whole lot. It was more that he didn't respect him. What was that, a man who smoked a pipe and offered him a genial smile? No, no, Professor Lovit was just a weightless fool like him, a speck of insignificance floating through the universe.

Surely he could beat Professor Lovit. And maybe, just maybe, he could beat Mr. Norman Mailer, too.

His other summer school course was in modern drama. The course met in Mott Hall, at the south end of the CCNY campus, right on Convent Avenue. The building made him happy, though he couldn't say why. It had a columned entranceway, and beyond it, there was a pleasant stretch of lawn on which to sit.

Ibsen and Strindberg were on the reading list, as the fathers of modern drama. Playwrights were different from novelists; they could produce a world with so few strokes. He remained silent, not participating in classroom discussions, which were dominated by a young, rugged-looking man who offered subtle insights in German-accented English. How smart the world is, Luther could only think, feeling once again temporarily defeated.

There was, in the class, an older student with a somber, bearded face covered with sweat who stood out as well, though not for his intellect. In his open attaché case Luther glimpsed, among his books and legal pads, a pint of vodka. The sight of the bottle set off alarm bells such as Luther didn't know he possessed; it marked the man as a virtual alien and at the same time stripped him naked.

Sarah reached out to Luther from the safety of Camp. She had set up her studio and enrolled in a drawing class down in Woodstock, and her life was once again in working order. She did not have to be seen as a piece of ass for horny office men or allow pedestrian work to interfere with her dream of greatness. Like her father, she was not made for this world, not as it was constituted.

“Mommy and Daddy asked about you. I told them you were going to summer school and working hard. They were really impressed. Mommy said you should come up when you can.”

With that one phone call she had returned him to the circle of her love, and not only hers but that of her parents. If he remembered Sarah's rage on that day in June, he did not dwell on it.

He felt strong and happy on the warm and sunny Saturday afternoon he boarded the Pine Hill Trailways bus to Shandaken. He was going to Camp as part of the earth, not uprooted from it, as had been the case the previous summer when he left his post office job to be with Sarah and her family for a month. And there she was, waiting for him in the jeep as the bus pulled to the side of the road in front of the Log Cabin Inn. The presence of her mother seated alongside Sarah was a bit strange, but maybe she simply wanted to welcome him.

As he approached the jeep along the shoulder of Route 28, Lydia stepped out and held him, unsmiling, by both arms and locked him in with her eyes. He could feel the quiver in her hands and see it in her face, the same intensity that Peter's camera had captured in those black and white photos that hung on the wall of the guest house of her on stage during summer stock performances.

"I have some difficult news, Luther. Lenore is dead. My baby is dead."

As she spoke a hearse appeared on the hollow road. The curtains in the side window were pulled closed. How quietly the hearse passed the jeep and turned onto Route 28, raising dust as it went.

Lenore is in that hearse, Luther thought.

Several hours before Peter had noticed next to the bathroom sink his bottle of prescription sleeping pills lying open and empty. He alerted Claire, who rushed to Lenore's room and found, on her made up bed, a terse note, written on a single piece of loose-leaf paper. "I'm sorry. I couldn't stay. No one is to blame."

Maggio Capici had arrived with his wife, Sally, that morning. He had seen Lenore walk past as he sat by the pool some hours earlier. Following her path, he found her lying unconscious in the meadow beyond the shale pile, under an apple tree. She was dead, having choked on her own vomit.

Family friends called, word having somehow spread. Lydia took all of them. She was good on the phone. “Lydia is handling this with such grace,” Sally Capici said, overhearing Lydia a short distance away in the dining room receiving the callers’ condolences. Grace. Luther remembered that word applied to Jacqueline Kennedy after her husband’s assassination. It was a confining word. It assigned you a role. It had white gloves on it. It meant be proper. Don’t cry, don’t wail, don’t emote. Whoever assigned you the word could take it away.

Some kind of unfolding was going on, people possibly brought closer to each other by the loss than they really were. The Kennedy assassinations, both of them, though the first more than the second, had been that way. Luther didn’t feel grief. He felt anger. She had disappeared on them. He had disappeared on people too, but not that. What she had done was so violent, so final, so wasteful.

A pastor arrived the following day to say a few words, right there, in the living room. An old and spindly man, he read the twenty-third psalm. During the reading, Luther excused himself and went to the bathroom to relieve himself. Anxiety took him there. Evidently, the sound of the toilet could be heard by the gathered. Well, the indiscretion was just one of many he would have to live with.

After the service, the gathered headed up to the meadow for the burial of Lenore’s ashes. Flowers were laid on the site where the urn was buried and the pastor offered final words, saying Lenore’s soul was now in the care of God. The day was brutally hot. Luther was glad when they could get out of the sun.

More was revealed in the following days. Lenore had gone down to the city in the hope of reconciling with Malcolm, though it had been over a year since they were together. According to Claire, when Malcolm visited with Lenore at the family's apartment, he noticed that the door of the medicine chest was open when he went into the bathroom. Possibly Lenore had been trying to signal her desperation, but though she looked sad and depressed, she hadn't overtly threatened to hurt herself and he couldn't imagine her doing any such thing. Claire said he wept when she gave him the news of Lenore's death.

Lenore has maimed him for life, Luther thought. She couldn't have done more to disfigure Malcolm than if she had thrown acid in his pretty face.

Maggio Capici had access to people who could take care of Malcolm. They could make him disappear, too. In fact, they could do it so no one would ever find him unless they wanted to dredge the ocean floor. Maggio approached Peter with his proposal. He was just trying to be helpful in the family's time of need. But it was not Peter's way to hurt anyone, especially to the point of finality, and not a boy with Malcolm's physical gift. Peter had been young and beautiful, too. He knew the power that came with such beauty.

"No one should love like that. That is terrible love," Peter said quietly, of Lenore, suggesting, with those few words, that her death was not Malcolm's doing.

Luther sat the next morning with Lydia in the kitchen. The house was old, but the bathroom and the kitchen had been modernized. Something, her power, had led him to her. He had need of her now, the warmth she could provide. She was still too stunned, too bereft, to feel anger. The day was gray, the sky overcast, a match for Luther's mood. He had Cuba on his mind.

“The revolution has gone bad. Everything goes bad eventually. This country has gone bad. Lunatics have been given guns for the purpose of hurting people.”

“You must live on the bright side. Visit the other, but learn to live in the light. Do you have plants, Luther? A cat?”

“I had a cat, but Miss Schnell took him away from me.”

“Miss Schnell?”

“The Cat Lady. She must have twenty cats and looks like a cat herself. In fact, she has the same light, cautious movements as a cat.”

“Why did she take him away from you?”

“She said I was neglectful. You see, the room was overrun with roaches. They would get into Dieter's food and then Dieter would eat the roaches too. Miss Schnell didn't like that. She said he would get rickets.”

“Do you have roaches where you live now?”

“Oh, no. My mother's building, where I had this room, is famous for its roaches.”

A slight humming noise came from Lydia's throat, and there was a tremble in her hands as well. She was a woman holding herself together. He saw the pain in her face. But he was certain that pain was not in his own face. He did not deserve to have the pain of grief in his face. Lenore had rebuffed and reviled him. She had come to see him as odious. But she was in his mind. She had put herself there with what she had done. She had buried herself in the minds of all of them.

“Luther, I know you have had some difficulties in your life. I don’t want you to be offended, but I wonder if you wouldn’t benefit from seeing a therapist. There is one I have in mind. I will provide you with the necessary information sometime soon.”

“What will he do for me?”

“You will have the opportunity to work through problems that hinder you from living your life as fully as you could.”

“But I do live my life.”

“You live in a place of darkness, Luther. You don’t mean to, but there it is.”

“A place of darkness?”

“As I said to you once before, I want you to choose life.”

She exhaled a stream of smoke from the cigarette she had lit, directing it away from him even as she held him with her gaze. Her expression had grown hard; she relied on it to communicate what she had only partially expressed in words.

“Well, OK,” he said, sensing the conversation was over.

For the new school year he had received a work-study grant. During the day he was paid to wander about the west twenties and thirties tallying up the number of residential dwellings and commercial establishments as part of a study commissioned by the New York City government.

“I want us to undertake this survey with energy and vigor,” a young man named Hiram Pell instructed Luther and the other students in the summer program at the start of the day. On the wall Hiram had attached a map of the area. The map had little pins with red heads in it, as you might find in a war room. Hiram was a student at Brown University, and so Luther could only assume he was the manager in recognition of his high intelligence.

The energy and vigor Hiram exuded and espoused in his war room was not infectious. Luther lived for air-conditioned breaks from the relentless August sun. A slacker he might be, but all in all the survey seemed like an exercise in pointlessness and destined for burial in some municipal vault. And yet, as he sluggishly canvassed the vibrant commercial stretches west of Fifth Avenue as well as the residential dwellings where the lonely refuse of the city dwelt, he recognized that old familiar feeling that he had met his superior in Hiram Pell and equally familiar pang of envy and sadness that Hiram should have access to a world forever denied him by virtue of the high board score numbers Luther had been unable to attain. The world will belong to Hiram Pell and not to me, he thought, outside of Macy's, in Herald Square, on a scorching afternoon.

Hiram wore his hair short and parted on the side. He did not have the bush that had sprouted from Luther's head. And so the differences between them were of appearance as well as disposition. But Luther had returned to the city with a crying need to be heard. Something terrible had happened to the sister of his girlfriend and his girlfriend's family. Death had come and it was not going away. The memory of it, of her, had to be preserved. It could not be allowed to float invisible in the air. He needed a receipt for the pain he was experiencing.

And so, at the end of the day, he approached Hiram, who was sticking more pins in the area map to show his team's progress. Like Bobby Kennedy himself, Hiram had the sleeves of his white shirt rolled up and the obligatory tie hanging loose around his neck.

“Hiram, something bad, something beyond bad, has happened.”

“Who are you again? Refresh my memory,” Hiram said, turning to face Luther.

“I am Luther Garatdjian, and I have something to say.”

“OK, Luther. Shoot,” Hiram said.

“It’s only this. Someone has died.”

“Hey, wait, are you getting personal? Is this something I need to hear?”

“No. Not if you don’t want to.”

“Because I don’t want things going negative. You understand what I’m saying?”

“Yes, of course.”

“So go ahead, speak your mind, because I always want you to feel you can come to me, but frame what you have to say positively. You understand?”

“Yes, of course. Positive. The day was sunny and pleasant on which my girlfriend’s younger sister killed herself.”

“Whoa. OK. Stop there. You were doing fine with the first part of your sentence, and then things went off the cliff. Now can you reconstruct your message for me?”

“No, I can’t,” Luther said.

“I need you to try. You see, much as I don’t look like it, I am a student of the human mind and I can tell at a glance that you hold onto sorrow like a dog holds onto a bone. Now open your jaws and let that stinky old bone go so we can move forward. You hear what I am saying?”

Luther took no deep offense at Hiram's blockage of him from the sorrow gulch. He understood Hiram's mentality, his can-do spirit. Hiram was an American type Luther had encountered before, an unencumbered sort who planned his every move. And yet, he could not live in the space that Hiram inhabited. It was too cold and meaningless and forsaking of all feeling.

"I'll see what I can do," Luther said, and left Hiram to his big board.

The Soviets invaded Czechoslovakia that August. Luther shuddered at the implacable Soviet urge for domination and at the same time fell in love with the sight of Soviet tanks on the Old World streets of Prague, remembering the model Soviet tanks of his childhood with the red star on their turrets. How glorious that adorning star.

And now there were signs of disturbance in the once placid and orderly lives of Peter and Lydia Van Dine, who had left Camp after Lenore's death and returned to New York City.

"Could Sarah perhaps stay with you until she goes back to school? I have asked as well that Claire stay with Brian. Lydia needs to be alone. She is going through a difficult time, such as she has experienced before. It is best that she have as much peace and quiet as possible." There was fear and anxiety in Peter's voice.

"I have two male roommates. Sarah would have very little privacy. And it's not the nicest apartment, to be honest," Luther said. He wasn't ready for Sarah to stay with him, not with Roberto and Marty hovering. And he would be out all day working, leaving her at their mercy. Luther came to Sarah every night after work at the post office, but always now they met at her family's apartment. He had long since surrendered to the amenities available to him there.

From the kitchen came the voice of Lydia, in tone and content as Luther had not heard her before. "Are the parasites, the bloodsuckers, the leeches, still here? Is the morose moron Luther still here? Well, is he?"

A family friend, a white-haired woman named Molly, was with her. She cared for Lydia, took her out for walks in Riverside Park. In this time of pain there were no more family dinners carefully prepared by Lydia. They were all on their own.

Chicago came at the end of the month. Luther had thought of going, but anticipated the violence of the police, the leaded billy clubs to knees and head and back. He had been afraid. Once again he had been guided by the need for personal comfort and safety.

"Those fucking pigs," Sarah screamed, witnessing scenes on the TV screen of riot police beating demonstrators on the streets outside the Convention Center, where Hubert Horatio Humphrey was chosen as the Democratic Party nominee for president. Sarah would have fought with those police, had she been there. She would not have run from them. Of this Luther was certain.

In early September, Luther opened his mailbox and was surprised to find a personal letter, as he seldom received such mail. The return label had Lydia's name and address, and there inside, along with a note, was a check in the sizable amount of two hundred dollars. The note was in Lydia's big and forward-sloping script.

The unexamined life is not worth living. So said Socrates. We must all face our demons. All of us. I have called Dr. Gerhard Slaff and given him your name and a brief description of what I believe is your condition. Now it is for you to follow through and make an appointment. Love, Lydia.

How strange that Lydia could put aside her vitriol sufficient to pen this note. Slaff. Such a funny, ingenious name. Such a soft landing, as in a pillow, after the uncompromising given name. And merry, too. Slaff, as in laugh. Luther was only too happy to make an appointment and come calling on the doctor the following week, his survey job having ended. And what a happy location, that the doctor should have his office on Madison Avenue, within a block of the glorious Metropolitan Museum of Art.

The doctor was a small man with a big head. A pair of horn rimmed glasses dominated his round face, on which played an amused and knowing expression. The strong grip in which he took Luther's hand conveyed that he was long on vigor if short in size, and the expensive suit tailored to his compact body and the glowing yellow silk tie only added to his aura of power. This is a man who kills with an air of benignity, Luther could only think, as the doctor led him from the waiting room into his office.

"What has brought you here?" the doctor asked.

"My girlfriend, Sarah Van Dine. You see, I am a student at CCNY purporting to major in English literature, but I do believe she is my true major. I live in fear that she will leave me because if she does, then how can I exist? Her younger sister, Lenore, took her life, as you may know. She couldn't handle rejection by her boyfriend, and I suppose I feel a lot like Lenore in that way. It doesn't feel like a good way to live, going about the day with all this anxiety."

"You suffer from morbid dependency, a personality disorder that is amenable to treatment."

"A personality disorder, you say?"

"Yes, that is exactly what I said."

"How long would this treatment take?" Luther asked.

"I would estimate two years," Dr. Slaff said.

"Two years?"

"Yes, as I said."

As I said. That locution sent a chill through Luther. There had been impatience, if not meanness, in Dr. Slaff's tone as he spoke those words.

"And your fee. How much would that be?"

"I operate on a sliding scale. Given that you are a student, you would come in at the low end. Thirty-five dollars per session."

He had gone where he didn't belong. He was not right for Dr. Slaff and Dr. Slaff wasn't right for him with his barely contained rage. Not that he could say as much while sitting in the doctor's office. That was too fearful an admission to even contemplate, lest the doctor remove his mask and reveal his true face.

“My mother has kicked him out while she decides what further action she needs to take. What further action. Can you believe such pompous language?”

On her return to Boston that September, Sarah had found an apartment on Park Row, just across the Fenway from the school. Luther was beginning to grow comfortable with the move, which he had initially feared, worried as he was about the consequences of any change for their relationship.

“Kicked him out where?” Luther asked.

“He’s staying up at Camp. She wanted him to move out altogether and get his own apartment, but he refused.”

“Why did she kick him out?”

“She’s angry and she needs someone to blame. Why not him? The problem is that Daddy is more helpless than I am. You saw what happened to me. I’m young and I couldn’t last a day in that graphics job. Daddy is in his late forties and has never worked a day in his life following his service in the Air Force. Does she really think he’s going to start teaching now?”

How cold the autumn wind felt. Wasn’t it always the same, women with their clobber power no matter how dominated they might appear to be? Though he understood the assessment was neither fair nor accurate, it felt that way emotionally. Hadn’t his own father said of Luther’s mother, in Luther’s growing-up years, how lost he had been until he found her. What was he to think but that men were feeble and entirely reliant on women? Luther had never had money. How much harder would it be for Peter to live without the financial resources of the marriage he had been drawing on through Lydia’s inheritance? It didn't seem right that Lydia should be punishing him in this way. It didn't seem right at all. And that language she used. Luther was with Sarah on that. Further action. As if Lydia were a power to reckon with and cloaked in the vestments of pomposity.

“What do you think is going to happen?” Luther asked.

“I think Mommy is going to try to push him on me. That's what I think is going to happen,” Sarah said.

“Push him on you?”

“Try to bury me beneath his dead weight.”

Luther spent time in Central Park that fall. He needed the breathing space that the trees and grass and footpaths gave him and the happiness that walking could provide. He also needed the anonymity and the promise of adventure the park offered. And there he met a girl. She wasn't any girl but one whose beauty and whose brains should have drawn the proprietary powerful who would preclude her from wandering solitary in the park by virtue of the more meaningful engagements that were part of their robust world. There she was, on the promenade leading to the band shell and Bethesda Fountain, coming toward him. He smiled. She smiled. They sat on a bench and talked.

Beverly her name was. In her restlessness she had cut loose from Oberlin College, in Ohio, one of the finest colleges in the country, and was back living with her parents, in Brooklyn, while figuring out her next move. So she told Luther, establishing in his mind a fear of her high board score power he now had to try to mask.

“Why don’t you come with me to hear Cream down at Madison Square Garden? I’ll get us tickets.”

“I would love to,” Beverly said. She had no sooner handed him her phone number than she was waving to a girl rapidly approaching.

“Sorry I’m late. I got held up,” the girl said to Beverly.

“Gwen, this is my friend Luther. We just met. Luther is getting us tickets to see Cream at Madison Square Garden.”

“You work fast, mister, don’t you?” Gwen said, her real name being Trouble in Luther’s mind. That a woman as lovely as Beverly, with her auburn hair and soft features, should have such a bulldog friend. But then, maybe her beauty required it.

“Work fast?” Luther could only repeat her words.

“You heard me.” A chunky girl, she had gone red in her square face. Her words like missiles.

“Well, I will be going,” Luther said.

“Call me,” Beverly said.

“Are you insane?” Luther could hear Gwen say as he left them. “He could be or a rapist or a murderer or both.”

But Gwen did not have the influence that Luther feared she might. Beverly needed a lifeline to pull her free from the swamp of family. And so Gwen’s Suzy Safety alert had no staying power. It was just something for Beverly to silently disregard.

Meager Luther was the freedom that Beverly must have, at least for a night.

The only tickets he could afford were in the rafters of the new Madison Square Garden, on Thirty-third Street, above Penn Station, with a view down, beyond the rows of pastel-colored seats, to the stage where speed freak Ginger Baker did his frenetic drum thing and Jack Bruce and Eric Clapton did their coarse singing thing. The band was nothing and less than nothing in that arena, unable to overpower its vast reaches with their holler sound.

Something was ending. He couldn't say what. Drug dealers hung out around the arena, the kind who wore dark sunglasses even in the night, subliminally penetrating the consciousness of passersby with the whispered recitation of their goods. And they were in Central Park, too, all about the Bethesda Fountain. They were wherever the young were known to go. Not gentle hippies with dippy flower power but the kind with hardness manifesting and prepared to put a hole in your chest should the impulse arise.

As with Lenore at the Doors concert down at the Fillmore East, he would try to talk to Beverly over the noise, compelled to assure himself she was having a good time and that the concert was not the disappointment for her that it was for him. After months of abstaining, he had gone to scale master Zach Zeckler for a new supply of speed pills. And he needed one be with a girl of her kind on this evening. Not a girl at all really, but already a woman.

Afterward they went uptown to his place, where he holed up with her in his room so as to avoid Roberto and Marty. She had come with a big shoulder bag, which could only mean she expected to stay the night. But the speed proved no defense against his insecurity. How could he ask a poised woman like her to share his single bed? How could he expect her tanned, voluptuous body to accommodate his emaciated frame? How could he turn off those assailing thoughts that compared his low board scores with her scintillating Oberlin –worthy SAT numbers? How could he dare to even touch her with his hands so cold from the pill? She would immediately grasp that he was high and look at him with contempt and distrust. Or he would do something in the night to provoke her anger.

“I overheard your friend in the park as I was leaving. She was right,” he said.

“What do you mean?” Was that alarm he saw in her big eyes?

“No, no, not that I am dangerous or anything like that. It is only that I don’t belong with you.”

“You don’t belong with me? But you are with me.”

“I am feeling sick.”

“Sick? How are you sick?”

His confession had not elicited the understanding, let alone warmth, he had hoped for but had no reason to expect.

“I have brought you a long way for nothing,” he said.

“This is not nothing,” she said.

“It is. You deserve and need more. I will pay for your cab fare home.”

“That could be almost thirty dollars. Can you afford to do that?”

“Sure I can,” he said.

At the street corner he hailed a cab.

“Don’t be so afraid,” she said, clutching the money he had given her.

Sleep was denied him by the drug. He lay until daylight with his tormented thoughts and at daylight straggled down to the corner drugstore. From the phone booth he watched as people full of morning cheer sat at the counter having breakfast. The drugstore was one of those happy places. His mood brightened just to see it. Why that should be so was a mystery. It brought to mind the tropics, though all there was above it was an apartment building and across the street the new engineering building at the north end of the Columbia campus. Possibly, he thought, he associated it with freedom and Hawaiian shirts and the wild swaying of palm trees bending under the force of a tropical storm. He had no explanation. The mind had pockets of strangeness that he would hold such a locale dear.

But now he wasn't thinking of Florida and of palm trees. He was thinking of Beverly, and of the opportunity he had allowed to slip away and whether she might give him a second chance even as he did not want her to give him a second chance. A man answered the phone. An older man. That could only be her father. "Bev?" he called, when Luther asked to speak with her. And there she was on the line, not a minute later.

"No, I have plans for this week and the week after that, I'm afraid. In fact, I'm pretty tied up for the next couple of months."

"Yes, I see," Luther said, feeling as if he had been shot.

"You take care of yourself," Beverly said.

"OK. I will," Luther said.

He had needed her to close the door on him, as he was unable to do it himself. But then his mind turned to what she had said about the next couple of months. Did that mean she might be available thereafter? No and no again. He tore the scrap of paper on which she had written her number into small pieces and dropped them through the grate of a street drain. He did not have to go down that road another time. And yet how it hurt, how it hurt so much. Oh Jesus, it hurt.

He could succumb to unbearable sadness if he began to feel that seeing another girl might take him away from her. But girls were a mystery requiring a solution. How could he know them unless he knocked on their door. He did not tell her that the olive drab coat felt tight around the shoulders and heavy on his frame. She is dressing me in the image of her father as he was, he thought but didn't say. She is putting me in a time not our own.

“Dr. Greene says I am like Ariadne leading Theseus away from the minotaur and out of the labyrinth,” she said.

“And I am Theseus?” he asked, recalling the name from a book on Greek mythology he had read in ninth grade English.

“Of course you are.”

He had no basis on which to dispute the doctor's claim. It did seem right to him, in its way. He had been in the dark and she was bringing him into the light.

“Your body is perfectly proportioned,” she said, too, full of newfound buoyancy that he could only attribute to Dr. Greene. Her kind words gave him an inner glow. They offset what he had read of himself in Lydia's journal. Her words made Lydia's and Claire's burn not so hot and bright in his mind.

She had him sit for a portrait over several weekends in her one-bedroom apartment. The painting showed him with a book in hand. The scholarly, sensitive figure on the large canvas summoned discomfort. She was seeing someone he was not, a man cursed to look more intelligent than he was and thus to disappoint the expectations others had of him.

He could not draw Sarah, but he could take a photograph of her, having borrowed his brother's Rolleiflex 2 ¼ camera, and the need arose to do just that, to seize time and hold it on the film if he couldn't hold it in his hands. Because her beauty was unspeakable one overcast fall day as they walked, she with her long, curly blond hair spilling over the green parka with the toggle buttons that she wore. They were across the street from her building, alongside a playing field with concrete stands and a light tower, and beyond that a cambered bridge over a duck-filled brook and, on the other side, the Museum of Fine Arts and the Boston Museum school itself. People needed to know who this Sarah Van Dine was, that he was a part of her and she was a part of him. History needed to know.

And yet there was too much to capture and not enough time, and with this feeling came pain and the fear that photography was dangerous.

But the weight of Sarah's intelligent gaze on him as he sought to frame the shot told a different story, one of affront that he would seek to capture her with the click of a shutter while she labored for weeks to capture his true likeness on canvas. He saw that her thought stream had molded her face into an expression of subtle disdain, riotous and mocking laughter building behind the barricade of her gravitas as she paired him with Helja, the family's Estonian maid, in her mind.

She would play Bach's Brandenburg Concerto during his sittings for her. The fugal patterns were mesmerizing but also soothing. They allowed him to sit not only for Sarah but to settle within himself, whereas the holler heads seemed to summon a narcissistic, aggrandizing impulse. He expressed his appreciation of the music and so she made him a gift of the three-album recording that he might enjoy it down in New York City. Once again he was struck by the disparity of the worlds from which they came, and could only be grateful for the dimensions she was adding to his life.

He had thought to take the train or the bus, but driven as much by economy as a spirit of adventure, he stuck out his thumb at an entrance to the Massachusetts Turnpike and hitched a ride. The man he rode with made him nervous. He was fully bald and a big gold cross dangled from his neck.

"We have to be willing to kill for Jesus," the man said.

"Yes," Luther replied, his hand on the door handle.

"We have to do a lot of things most people don't understand."

"This is true," Luther said.

As they approached New Haven, the man said, "This is the end of the line for you."

"I'm sorry?" Luther said.

"Got to let you go, son. I have business to take care of." "Business." He pronounced the word as if it had some Z's in it.

The man left him on the shoulder of Interstate 95. The night was cold and the roadway rain-slicked. The cars and trucks that passed made the heartless sounds that motor vehicles do when the control of stoplights is lifted. Up ahead an oil truck was pulled over. Two flares were burning behind it. A state trooper had left his cruiser to speak with the driver.

Luther remembered that he had seen a roach in the case for the Brandenburg Concerto LPs. It might be prudent to dispose of it in the event the trooper approached, but fear paralyzed him. Would the trooper not get suspicious if Luther reached into his bag? And would the trooper not be harder on him if he caught Luther trying to get rid of the roach? Luther decided that niceness, not cunning, would be his weapon in dealing with the trooper, if it came to that, just as the trooper threw the cruiser into reverse and quickly closed the distance between them.

“Get in,” the trooper said.

Luther complied and waited as the trooper filled out a form and handed it to him.

“What is this?” Luther asked.

“Hitchhiking is illegal on the interstate. You have to pay a fine. Now what’s in your bag?”

“Just weekend things. I was visiting my girlfriend in Boston,” Luther said.

The trooper emptied the contents, one by one: books, clothes. He opened the album case Sarah had given Luther and removed the vinyl records.

“And this?” the trooper asked. Inside the emptied-out case was a roach.

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“You don’t know, or you’re pretending not to know?”

“I don’t know.”

The officer ordered him out of the cruiser. He was young, a block of muscled flesh, with a baby face under the big campaign hat.

“Put your hands on the roof and spread your legs. What is this? What is this?” He was barking now as he held the roach between his thumb and index finger an inch from Luther’s nose for closer inspection.

“I told you I don’t know,” Luther said.

“You don’t know? You don’t know?” the officer screamed, the blood rushing to his face. “It’s marijuana. You have transported an illegal substance over a state line. Do you know the trouble you are in, you long-haired faggot in your army coat when you have never even seen the inside of a barracks? Put your hands behind your back,” he said, before removing the handcuffs from his belt and applying them to Luther’s wrists. He had never been handcuffed before. The metal restraints felt like they were cutting into his wrists.

The officer drove him to the state trooper’s office in Guilford, where the laces from his sneakers and his belt were confiscated and then led to a small cell. Within an hour he was let out for fingerprinting. An officer, not the arresting one, rolled Luther’s fingers and thumb over an inked pad, first one hand and then the other, before impressions were made on forms that were then filed.

In the morning he was driven by another trooper down to New Haven for arraignment. “That’s a serious charge, trafficking in narcotics. You don’t look evil. Are you evil?”

“I don’t think so,” Luther said. “And there were no narcotics. There was just a roach, if that’s what it in fact is.”

“That’s where it starts, with the marijuana. But it doesn’t stay there. It progresses to heroin.” The trooper, in his tight uniform, spoke with calm certitude. Luther realized that the trooper wasn’t seeing him. None of them were. He was just a thing that had gotten snared in their apparatus and cause for their pontification.

The gray-haired judge had a thing for scolding the prosecution and the defense alike. “You are charged with felony possession of narcotics. How do you plead?” he asked, staring down at Luther like a merciless crow from his bench on high.

“Not guilty, your honor. I had no narcotics.”

“Young man, I am not interested in what you had or didn’t have at this point. Bail is set at five hundred dollars.”

“Five hundred dollars?” Luther cried out. “I don’t have five hundred dollars.”

“Well, I guess then you’d better get it. Next,” the judge said, coming down hard with his gavel.

Luther was taken directly to the New Haven correctional facility. His cellmate, Riley, talked incessantly as a way of handling his anxiety. Luther lay in the top bunk grateful at least for a modicum of separation from babbling Riley.

As day passed into night the ceiling light just above his head continued to burn. He could no more turn off the light than he could his mind, his whole being wild with fear, as it had been since he was brought to Guilford and the heavy door clanged shut, separating him from his freedom and Sarah having no idea where he was. Worse was the news that the phones at the facility were down and no definite date could be given for their return to service.

The next afternoon Luther sat reading at a table outside his cell. For portions of the day inmates were allowed out into the general population for meals and exercise.

“What that you be reading?” a moon-faced black man in prison denim asked.

“It’s something called Modern Man in Search of a Soul, by Carl Jung.” The authorities had not confiscated the small paperback. Luther had been trying to access the wisdom and insight of the master without tackling the complete works in hardcover, which Lydia had acquired.

“What you say his name was?”

“Jung. Carl Jung.”

“I like that. How you spell that name, that last name?”

“J-u-n-g.”

“J, you say? That Jung, like Jungle. You playing with me, white boy?”

“No, I’m just trying to answer.”

“Yo, Carlton. Get on over here. White boy doing some answering.”

“What kind of motherfucking answering he got for me, LeRoy?”

“This white boy here be reading the work of some deep thinker. What you think about that?”

“I don’t be thinking shit about what some white boy be reading or not reading.

Why I should care what some motherfucking white boy be doing?”

“Now come on, Carlton. Don’t be talking shit like that. Least you could do is listen to what the white boy has to say instead of talking that nasty shit. Not every day we got some answering from a white boy.”

“This better be good. Don’t need some sorry-assed bullshit. Know what I’m saying, white boy?”

“I believe so,” Luther said.

“You just go ahead with your answering,” LeRoy said to Luther.

“Well, I don’t know where to begin.”

“You just begin at the beginning. Now come on, white boy.”

“It has something to do with transformation. The need for some people to change more than they can on their own. Jung says the psyche is crowded with stuff that we have to sort out. Something like that.”

“Damn. That’s all motherfucking white boy got for me? Some psyche shit? White boy in trouble now, taking up a black man’s time with his white boy bullshit.” Carlton said, continuing with his aggrieved stance.

“Give white boy a chance. He make it up to you for your disappointment. Ain’t that right, white boy? You be making it up to Ben for the disappointment you caused him? You don’t want to be playing my man Carlton wrong now, do you?”

“No, no. Of course not,” Luther said.

The announcement was made over the public address system to clear the area and return to their cells. The heightened presence of the corrections officers was a relief.

Now he could get away, at least temporarily, from Carlton and LeRoy. Better the nonstop chatter of his cellmate Riley than the implacable force of those two as they slowly claimed ownership of him.

That evening, through a partition, he got to speak with his legal defense attorney.

“I really haven’t done anything to deserve being here, and I can’t even make a phone call to raise bail money for my release,” Luther said.

“I understand your frustration. I’m told the phones should be working again by tomorrow evening.”

“I have to get out of here,” Luther said.

“The court date is several weeks from now. Just hold on. I’ll be back to check on you in a couple of days, if you haven’t been released by then.” Ray Abruzzio he had given his name as. Counselor Abruzzio’s haggard face and the folders crammed into his bulging briefcase testified to his workload. He was young, and his extreme thinness and cheap suit did not inspire confidence. Nor did his words.

Luther regretted the desperation he had voiced, as now his anxiety turned to terror. He would be buried alive in this heartless complex of concrete and iron bars and locked, steel-reinforced doors. He saw that he was indistinguishable from the other inmates to the authorities. The symbols of differentiation, other than his white skin, had been stripped from him.

Riley offered no comfort. “You have to go with the flow, man. Don’t be giving power to nobody with your face. You don’t do no trembling here. I’ve been here eight months waiting for trial. They’re giving me my sentence before even trying me, and I’m an innocent man. Look at my face and tell me that isn’t the face of innocence. You see, my face doesn't hold the mentality of a criminal. You can see that just looking at me. Just because I passed a gas station doesn't mean I robbed it. That's just a bunch of insinuation, a lot of hearsay, after-the-fact bullshit. That's why they don't want to go to trial. They have no case."

The next afternoon, as he was leaving the door-less restroom in the general population area, LeRoy and Carlton blocked his way.

"My friend Carlton here needs you to carry him off. Can you do that for him, white boy, after all he did for you?"

"Carry him off?" Luther repeated.

"How about suck my big black dick, white boy," Carlton himself said.

"No, I can't..."

Carlton gave him hard slap across the face. "White boy needs some fucking manners."

"You be best to carry my friend off," LeRoy said. "Don't think I'll be able to restrain him unless you do."

Several inmates entered, and behind them a corrections officer. Luther seized the opportunity to slip away.

Later that day Luther made a collect call to Sarah, phone service having been restored. Beyond shock and disappointment, there was no guarantee that his mother or anyone in his family would or could arrange for his release. He remembered how his brother had languished in that Albany jail some years before and the fulminating pastor the family had dispatched that Luke might get right with the Lord.

Sarah's response was everything he could have hoped for. She cared. She really, really cared. The next afternoon her parents, though separated, showed up together and posted bail for his release. His left side of the face swollen and bruised, he emerged from the facility in a pair of worn jeans the size of clown pants, his own having disappeared, and climbed into the back seat of the Chrysler.

How expertly Peter negotiated the streets of New Haven, as if he had an unerring instinct for the interstate. Luther equated a good sense of direction with intelligence, and could only wonder if he had not been underestimating Peter's brain power. How self-possessed and in command Peter looked behind the wheel in his brown turtleneck and tweed jacket. How important clothes were. That his skinny legs should be lost in such ballooning denim duds.

And yet the overriding emotion was of exhilaration that he was free of LeRoy and Carlton and Riley and back in his life.

"This girl I used to know, her name is Dahlia and she is from Darien, Connecticut, was in a cell in the same facility. The police are throwing everyone in jail for no reason."

"Is that right, Luther? Men and women socializing behind bars. What a progressive facility," Lydia said.

"Well, I didn't exactly see her. It's just that I received word as to what had happened to her," Luther said.

"Of course," Lydia said, bringing that line of conversation to a close.

Back in his apartment a wave of shame drove him face downward on his pillow murmuring nonsense to keep the memory of the Van Dines' contempt at bay. What else could their long periods of silence in the car have been conveying? And that preposterous story about Dahlia. What had he been trying to say? That even pretty blond girls from a famously wealthy community in Connecticut got thrown in jail and that he had extensive social connections?

Twice a week, from 2 pm to 5 pm, he showed up at a community center near the college to fulfill the requirements for a work-study grant he had received. From there he went on to the post office. He was supposed to tutor young children from the neighborhood. Often they were very young, and so he would read picture books with them.

“What’s a yawl?” a pretty teenage black girl asked him.

She was preparing to take the SAT and was puzzling over an analogy in which the word was used.

“Oh, you don’t know anything, do you?” she laughed, when he paused, and he had to agree.

During his shift a tall young blond kid in a dark blue Columbia sweatshirt arrived and gathered the kids together, winning them over with his intelligence and his energy. There had been a third tutor, Benito, a pretty fierce guy if his scowl meant anything, but he was only there a short while before blowing himself up in his East Village apartment while making a bomb.

The following afternoon, Luther paused as he was approaching the entrance to the center. You must return home and claim your patrimony. The women of your family must not do to you what they have done to your father. Such was the idea that seized him and brought him to a halt. Astonished by the force of conviction and certitude that accompanied the thought, he found himself walking west away from the center. He heard his name called and turned to see two of the black girls he had worked with at the center, but he merely waved and moved on, staring down at the bald patch of lawn that bordered the massive public housing project towering over the community center. Like Saul blinded by the light on the road to Damascus this revelation has come. It was not in him to understand how a light that blinded could make him see. He just accepted that it was so and that a doorway exiting him from the daily struggle he had known had opened.

With a great sense of urgency Luther entered the lobby of his family's building a short while later just as Mr. Fitzpatrick was coming out of his prayer session.

"I have been praying for your mother and your aunt, Luther. That I have been doing. Are you going to be one of her two good men? Do you have it in you?"

Luther shrugged off Mr. Fitzpatrick and took the elevator to the top floor. From there he walked down the stairs until he came to a landing where he found his mother bending into the big white wooden box on castors for an armload of towels and sheets and pillowcases for the tenants.

"Have you come for me, my son?"

"I have," he said.

"Are things normal for you? You are not ailing, are you?"

He shook his head.

"Are you sure? You are looking meager in your substance, my son."

"I am fine. Really," he said.

“I will be making chicken this evening. Will you not come and have some?”

“No, I can’t,” he said, without telling her that he had to be at the post office. It wouldn’t do to tell her that, not with what he had in mind. “But there was something I wanted to ask you.”

“Are you having difficulty? Is that it, my son?”

“It is nothing like that,” Luther said. “I was just wondering if maybe I could keep the office open several nights a week after Mrs. Greene leaves. In that way tenants coming home from work could pay their rent and get their mail.”

His mother paused to give him a studying look. “When would you like to start?” she finally said.

“I will be here tomorrow at 6 pm,” Luther said.

“Very good, my son. Very good,” his mother said.

Years had passed since she had locked the bathroom door behind them and coaxed open his small hand, that the quarter in the palm of it might be revealed, and made him promise to never again take money from her purse. And it was years since she had taken him down to the tabernacle for another instance of thievery so members of the congregation might place their hands on his head and pray that he be released from the devils within him.

No, his mother had not gone that far back in time in trying to fathom why he might now be volunteering his services.

He had not come to her unprepared for any such contingency, and would have said, had she turned on him her full power to enter his mind, that he was not there to thieve but to ride to her rescue, as he had so longed to do when he was a child. He would say that if there was villainy afoot it wasn't his but Simon Weill's. Had she not told him that the building owner was the thief of Baghdad come to New York City, taking store rents that weren't his and whatever else he pleased as well? Hadn't she said as much, and hadn't Simon Weill gone on about his trickery of poor Auntie Eve and herself and held over them the threat of eviction if they didn't do exactly as he said? He would have told her that Simon Weill may have defeated them, but he hadn't defeated him, and where was the wrong in taking a bit of money that would otherwise go to a man who wasn't owed the money by terms of the lease Auntie Eve had signed with him to manage the property in the first place?

He was tired of being poor and struggling. He wanted to be able to pay for a decent lawyer, not some ill-prepared soul in a cheap suit from Legal Aid. He would never be able to afford such counsel with the little jobs he held. The renting office would be temporary. A month or two at most. It would get him back on his feet.

How afraid he was that this new opportunity in his life would be taken away from him before he could even begin. Suppose in his mother's dream that night his base intention was revealed to her?

But the next evening came and there was Mrs. Greene—no relation to Sarah's therapist, so far as Luther knew—closing the office window, a small wooden panel that closed over the grille through which the tenants could pay their rents and receive their mail and lodge complaints. Mrs. Greene a woman possessed of New England reserve who lived with her equally petite husband in a childless marriage in what Luther still thought of as the House of Order right across the street, a building with a recessed entranceway and marble lobby and a doorman and spacious, roach-free apartments in which he imagined model American families to live. They summered in Vermont, and would return with jams in wax-sealed bottles for Mrs. Garatdjian and Auntie Eve. A woman of great competence. Her husband a doctor. What was a woman of her quality doing across the street in the House of Disorder? Her carefully observant eyes behind the pince-nez glasses were unsettling. Perhaps, behind that veneer of civility and acceptance, lurked some judgment of his family for how they lived. His whole being would recoil at the sight of her on the premises. At such times he could only see through her eyes, that is, as he imagined she was seeing him and his brother and his sisters.

“Is that you, Luther?” she now asked.

“Yes. How are you, Mrs. Greene?”

“Very well, thank you. Your mother tells me you are in college. I have forgotten. Are you studying at Columbia?”

“CCNY.”

“Excuse me?”

“CCNY. That’s a college, too.”

“I see,” she said. She was not insensitive. She felt his reticence. It was just that in her circle, the children went off to Princeton, Harvard, Yale, or maybe Columbia. He allowed the disappointment to pass through him that he could not be more for Mrs. Greene than he was. “Well, your mother says that you will be assisting her. I do hope you find everything in order.”

She showed him the wooden box on the office wall where the tenants' mail was kept, with a cubbyhole for each floor, and the money tray in the first drawer of the old and massive roll-top desk, and the envelopes in which she had placed the rent proceeds for the day, and the ledger book in which she recorded them. She showed him the order she could make out of the disorder all around her.

Many times through the years he had seen women behind the grille—his mother, his aunt, Hannah—and now here he was. And as he anticipated, the tenants came—the Patels and the Guptas, the Singhs and the Shahs, the Woos and the Selassies and Mbutos. Bearded and turbaned Sikhs, sari-clad Indian women with those dots in the center of their dusk-colored foreheads. The cat lady, Miss Schnell, came by, and told him she had not forgotten the crime of neglect Luther had inflicted on poor Dieter. And he served them, he did, to the best of his ability, flipping through their “post,” as the Indians and Pakistanis called the mail, and recording their complaints: broken bedsprings, fridges that did not cool, leaking pipes, blown fuses, armies of roaches. His face expressed concern, sympathy, attentiveness to their needs. He was on their side, he sought to say. It wouldn't do to tell them they were on a sinking ship.

The hard part was dropping off the money with his mother, but even that was less than he feared. True, Hannah was there in the apartment, now filled with the smell of the food his mother had cooked. “Nobody deprives me and my son. No one,” she did say sharply, as Luther handed the bag to his mother. And Naomi was there to say, “What does Flathead have in his pockets? Do you remember, Ma, when I tricked him into confessing that he had been in your pocketbook?”

“Ushtah, Naomi. Would you care for a pork chop and baked potato and lima beans, my son?”

“Come on, Luther. Pull up a chair. Or are you too good for us?” Hannah challenged.

“He does have his nose in the air, Ma. You’ve seen it yourself. Always looking down on us,” Naomi said.

“You leave my Luther alone. He is still my Svenska pojka,” his mother said.

“I have to get going,” he said.

“He’s always rushing, Ma. What he doesn’t know is that he has no place to go. You’ll be back here, too, Flathead Svenska pojka, before you know it, forever and ever. No one can get away from Ma. No one. She is too powerful.”

“Ushtah, Naomi. How you speak,” his mother said.

“I mean no disrespect, Ma. None whatsoever,” Naomi said. “But he wasn’t much of an uncle to Jeanne when she was just a little girl and I don’t forget that. She told me many times that he acted like he didn’t even know her. I’m not saying it’s why she ran away, but it could be. Luther doesn’t know how to show love.”

“It’s for sure he better respect my son, Moses, if he knows what’s good for him,” Hannah said. “Nobody deprives my son and nobody disrespects my son. Nobody.”

Hannah’s son. Luther didn’t ask where the boy was. Probably in their room, grateful for the time he could have away from her. It was difficult enough having her for an older sister. What she must be like as a mother he didn’t wish to imagine.

On the stairs leading down to the lobby he paused and pulled from his pocket the five-dollar bill and the five singles he had taken from the money tray. How right Naomi had been she would never know. Now he would see how careful his mother was in reviewing the accounts. Not very careful at all, he was sure. Record-keeping was not her strong suit. And since they had not discussed compensation for his time in the renting office, he could say he paid himself if she noted the ten dollars was missing. Still, he needed a better means of compensating himself. There had to be a way. He didn't ask himself why an hourly pay rate hadn't been established. Money was not talked about in his family, not openly.

The sidewalk in front of the building was blocked off with those wooden parade barricades. Bits of masonry had once more broken loose from some of the cornices. It had happened before. It would happen again. Something would be done about it in the morning. By whom he didn't know.

He stopped at the bookstore on One Hundred Fifteenth Street and Broadway and bought a thick volume of poems by Kenneth Rexroth, a poet he had heard of but had never read. Zach Zeckler, the Scale Master, said he could only read contemporary literature. The nineteenth century and all the preceding centuries were not for him. Luther had thought to prepare himself for the twentieth century by reading Beowulf and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, but really, maybe Zach Zeckler had the better way. Someday he would have a wall-to-wall understanding of literature, of all the books that had been written. Kenneth Rexroth was a good place to start to try to fathom this poetry thing. A New Directions book. They were classy, those handsome paperback editions with black and white covers.

At the Ta-Kome deli, on the corner, he bought himself a meatball hero and three cans of beer, and headed down the hill. It was one of those Indian summer nights, and he had a yen for something different. Along the bridle path on the top level of Riverside Park he walked till he came to the limestone water fountain at One Hundred Sixteenth Street, where he descended the steps. Strollers were out, reassuring him that he would not be killed in the night. To the very bottom of the park he went, past Dead Man's Hill where he and Jane Thayer had lain in the grass for day after day that summer following ninth grade. He was not that boy anymore. Now there was complexity in his life. That boy. Who had he been, with his amiable face and crew-cut hair?

A wild feeling was in him now. The trains were calling. He couldn't say why. They just were. He kept heading north, into the more desolate reaches of the park, crossing the exit road from the West Side Highway and down an embankment thick with growth and through a tear in the fence to the tracks themselves on a bed of rock ballast.

Oh Jesus it felt good to be down there eating his meatball sandwich and drinking his beer while sitting on a gleaming rail. Just to the south was the tunnel through which the tracks ran all the way to the sprawling freight yard down below Seventy-second Street.

As he ate and drank he thought of his mother and the pork chop he had refused. With a fastidious eye he had regarded the apartment. The feeling of revulsion had been uncontrollable within him. That old and greasy stove on which she cooked, the blackened basin of the sink where the enamel had been eroded, the legions of roaches, the old checkered oilskin tablecloth, the mismatched dinnerware, the unsightliness of Hannah and Naomi and their unpleasant manner. The very fact that grown women were sitting about waiting to be fed instead of assisting or serving her. They had left him no room to sit. Well, he was not there for a pork chop. He was there for money, for his life, for his freedom. Besides, if he got too close to his sisters, he might catch what they had.

A northbound train appeared in the distance, the warmth of its beam dispelling the uncompromising gloom of the tunnel. Now it was upon him, the throbbing diesel with white war paint on its high gray cheekbones. He stood his ground despite the low and penetrating whistle sounded by the engineer, and felt its power as it flew past, the might of America on display that night. He took away with him the red lights of the caboose growing smaller in the distance. Those tracks. They ran under the George Washington Bridge. They ran to places he had not been.

In his second week in the renting office he hit upon a way to pocket larger sums. The rent receipts were written on tear-away forms with a ballpoint pen and issued to the tenants for their records. The yellow carbon underneath each receipt served as a record of payment along with a notation of payment in the daily ledger book. A third record was in a big loose-leaf binder, which contained a page for rents received for each room in the building. But suppose he were to use a different rent receipt book than Mrs. Greene? Say a tenant paid him rent for two weeks. Luther could issue the tenant a receipt from his own rent receipt book and then record the rent as paid in the big loose-leaf binder. After all, it was the room card in the loose-leaf that Mrs. Greene or anyone else would check when the tenant returned in another two weeks to pay additional rent. It was on the basis of the dates on that card that she would take his money and write out a new receipt, and because the dates were accurate, the tenant would have no reason to complain. No tenant was likely to proffer to Mrs. Greene the rent receipt that Luther had issued, and even if a tenant did produce a receipt from Luther's personal receipt book, it wasn't likely that Mrs. Greene would notice that the receipt number, printed in red ink, was out of sequence with the receipt numbers in her receipt book. Nor was it likely that Mrs. Greene, or Luther's mother, or anyone, would cross-check the loose-leaf entries against the daily accounts in the ledger book or check the loose-leaf entries against the carbons in the building's receipt book and notice that the entries weren't there. Mrs. Greene would only go to such lengths if she grew suspicious, and she wouldn't grow suspicious because there was no personal dishonesty in her and so she would be less than likely to project such a trait onto someone else. Because it took a thief to catch a thief, or so he had heard.

At the top of each receipt was written:

M.E. Hedberg, Inc.

699 West 113th Street

New York, NY 10025

UN 4-5755

The receipt was a reminder his aunt was somebody. You couldn't be a nobody and incorporate yourself. It was proof of her substance and that his mother was right to be proud of her. It was proof too that something had gone wrong and that something was Simon Weill.

Luther would call Boston from the renting office, after the first-hour rush had passed. He needed to touch base with Sarah and be reassured that everything was right in their world. On nights when he called and she did not answer, he would grow anxious. It occurred to him at such times that he was only in the office because of Sarah, that is, without her he would not be able to be there at all. She served as his lifeline; without her there was only the snare of his family's depressing present and past and the bleakness of its future.

Luke had taken a shine to port. He drank half a bottle with breakfast and the other half afterward to dispel the dark clouds and fortify himself for the day. He could mop the landings, do small plumbing jobs, fix broken electrical outlets. He could do the things his mother needed him to do.

Lenny Cerone was living with Luke now. He had the small room across the landing where Luther had stayed. Lenny was into the wine, too, but heroin was his true love. His skin had turned sallow, his expression had grown dull, and the greasy hair and body odor suggested a falloff in his personal hygiene.

“That wife of mine Brenda. She's got some sick shit going on,” Lenny said. “Nagging me all the time. Like she can't shut up for one minute. Something wrong with that broad.”

“A man can’t afford to be pussy-whipped. That ain’t righteous,” Jerry Jones-Nobleonian said.

Brenda. Luther knew the girl, or had seen her. She lived with her family two blocks south. A tall, attractive girl with sandy blond hair. She had a son by Lenny to raise now.

“Lenny and me, we’ll be going upstate when the weather gets warmer. Maybe get a car so we don’t have to take the bike. Bring some camping gear so we can sleep in the woods,” Luke said.

Always the same it was with Luke. Some assertion he would make, as if waiting for or daring Luther to refute him. An older brother looking for his younger brother’s approval.

“That sounds nice, I guess,” Luther said.

“‘I guess’? What kind of shit is ‘I guess’?”

“It sounds nice. That’s all I mean,” Luther said.

“I’ve been to fucking Europe. You been to fucking Europe?”

“No. I’ve never been to Europe,” Luther said.

“I’ve been farther away from this building than you’ll ever get,” Luke said.

“Maybe so.”

“Fuck you with your maybe so,” Luke said. “You know it’s so.”

“Why are you so angry?” Luther asked.

“Because I hear that attitude in your voice and see it in your face. But I’ll tell you what else I see. I see you in the renting office down in the lobby and you know what that means? It means you’ll be back living in this building before you know it.”

“And would that make you happy?”

“You see? There you go again with your sarcastic tone.”

“He’s not respecting your worth. He’s not seeing you as the man you are. He’s got all that CCNY college shit going on in his head,” Jerry said.

It was time to leave. He had his love to keep him warm, as the song said. He had Sarah and now he was beginning to have some money, and so he had a future, whatever Luke might care to say. And yet how it saddened more than angered him to hear Luke talk as he did.

Orchestration from above was occurring, the kind of mental realignment that had its origins in history. The president of the United States was calling on him to be part of a new national zeitgeist. No matter that Richard Milhous Nixon was that president, having narrowly defeated Hubert Horatio Humphrey (he with the strapped on the chastity belt for the campaign) and in so doing ensured the return of Luther’s childhood., as RMN had been as much a part of those early years as Dwight David Eisenhower. Never mind that Luther was no longer a Republican living in great fear of the Democratic horde and was in fact a member of that horde. He really couldn’t say what it meant that the past was being overlaid on the present, but it did mean something, and that something, whatever it was, excited him, because he had some connection with it.

The president communicated by proxy. In dreamland his personal assistants, John Ehrlichman and Bob Haldeman, met with Luther in Riverside Park at one Hundred Sixteenth Street. There, on the bridle path, the two of them stood, in expensive Aquascutum raincoats that compromised the darkness with their glow. "Good work," they said, following their succinct message with a thumbs up. Surprised by the presence of these two powerful men, Luther could only offer a weak smile, but their terse, affirmative message and gesture suggested he was fully in sync at the very bottom of the grid with the thieving aspect of their brand of Republicanism at the very top.

Now Luther would have the means to hire a lawyer to replace his harried and slow-moving public defender and elevate above the horde of indigents it fell to his mouthpiece to represent. Luther found J. Robertson Thruster, who met the charge of the state, felony possession of narcotics, with all the vigor his surname suggested.

Wearing a blue pinstriped suit and a radiant yellow tie, his powerful head adorned with neatly cut gray hair such as men of power often possess, attorney Thruster moved for dismissal on the grounds of illegal search and seizure. Luther sought to join forces with his defender, crying out to Judge Hopping Mad, the same gavel banger who had dispatched him to the New Haven jail, "What he is saying, your honor, is that the state trooper invaded my privacy for no good reason, and I swear to you that is the complete truth," leading attorney Thruster to turn his power on Luther and silence him with a formidable stare that simply said, "Do not muck up my well cultivated garden with any of your crazy shit. Do you understand?" Luther could only sit himself down, though the impulse to jump up once again was there. The state, with all its giant apparatus, could cow him no longer. Now he had a voice, the voice of attorney Thruster. He thought of the trooper who had driven him to the arraignment, the one with the unctuous drivel, so smugly confident within the bosom of the state. Well, OK, Luther was now having his day in court and what he was hearing was good. His case was being dismissed on the grounds of illegal search and seizure. And, attorney Thruster assured him, the arrest would be expunged from his record.

“Then I have the green light to go on to law school and be a lawyer, too?” Luther asked, outside the courtroom.

“Your arrest, as I said, will be no barrier to your entering law school,” attorney Thruster said, speaking in the careful way that Luther assumed lawyers did.

As he headed for the train station, Luther was driven by a sense of unease to review attorney Thruster’s words. Somehow they were serving to dissipate the joy he had been feeling at his courtroom victory. How clever of attorney Thruster. True, Luther’s arrest record would prove not to be a barrier, as the record wouldn’t exist. But what attorney Thruster had left unsaid was that there might be other barriers, such as the barrier of Luther’s mind. Formidable were the barriers between Luther and the law, attorney Thruster had been conveying in his careful, subtle manner. Luther saw that he was not of the kind that attorney Thruster could care for.

Remembering his withdrawal from tenth grade biology, he had sought to atone for that defeat by taking up the challenge of science once again. But as with calculus, the impenetrable introduction to biology textbook text, his queasiness at the dissection of a frog, and the abysmal feeling of being lost in the lab while others calmly bent to their tasks were too much for him. Once again, he found himself being put in his place. He was free to read all the paperback novels that he chose to, but as for being a man who could perform slide rule magic or explore the workings of living organisms, that would have to fall to stronger types.

But if scientific knowledge did not come to him in the brief time he hung on in the basic biology course, he did come to another sort of understanding. If there were men who were real men and men who weren't, there were also women who were real men. Furthermore, some of these women were gifted with feminine beauty while retaining the steel-like capacities associated with the other sex.

One such woman was Helen Hubert. She was not a woman but still a girl with the full fire of ambition in her slender frame. From Brooklyn she was, by way of Pratt University, where she had taken up the study of art before transferring to CCNY to pursue an academic degree. One morning he saw her sitting alone in the spacious cafeteria in Wingate Hall. He was at his feeblest that morning, a young man already fully defeated by the demands of the course, his thoughts dark as they often were at the start of the day. And there she was, one table over, her head nodding, her face almost falling into her coffee and Danish. The sight of her in a stupor stirred a feeling of hope in him, and so he approached.

“Excuse me, but we're in the same biology class. My name is Luther. I saw you nodding and wondered if you might be on heroin.”

“What?” the girl had come to full attention, his words like smelling salts under the nose.

“I only asked because I saw you nodding, and heroin users are famous for the nods they go into. Some of them are pretty spectacular. You’ve seen them corkscrewing on the street, I’m sure.”

“No, I am not on heroin,” Helen Hubert said. “Are you on heroin?”

“I could never do heroin,” Luther said. “That is one blissful state I can never experience because the thought of injecting myself with a needle is too much. I have a good deal of squeamishness about things related to the body, which may, along with a poor scientific aptitude, explain why I am on the ropes with this course. It has defeated me again.”

“Again?”

“In my sophomore year of high school I dropped out of biology for the same reason. I could not face up to the intellectual challenge. There was an additional factor. The biology teacher, Mr. Sadowski, also served as the basketball coach and had asked me to join the team. You could say he became a father figure to me, and maybe it is for that reason I could not bear to be in proximity to him in a classroom or lab setting. I had this great fear that he would fall short intellectually and that some of the students would make fun of him for the poverty of his mind. I suppose my own bad feelings about my father I projected onto poor Mr. Sadowski.”

“Are you all right?” Helen Hubert asked.

“Sure I am. Why do you ask?”

“You sound like you have a lot going on. Have you thought of seeing a therapist?”

“Morbid dependency,” Luther said.

“What?”

“Just something a therapist said during a consultation.”

“I’ve got to go.” Helen Hubert gulped her coffee and tossed her half-eaten Danish.

Luther didn’t follow Helen Hubert into the 8 am lab. In fact, he did not see her again, but all his life he would remember her as she was that morning in that cafeteria where the stench of grease was strong, a girl in the full radiance of her youth taxed with the demands of life and responding by showing up, not doing the dawdle dance that Luther was performing. He hadn’t wanted her to be a heroin addict but he had wanted her to be weaker than she was, needier than she was. What he saw was that her strength precluded any room in her heart for the likes of him.

“They are working overtime. Even in my sleep they are coming at me with their signal,” Roberto said.

“Who is they?” Luther asked.

“Who do you want they to be, Gargoyle?”

“It’s not what I want. It’s what you say.”

“Tell me this, Gargoyle. Do you feel that vibration on your skin?”

“I’m not feeling anything,” Luther said.

“Tell me this, too, Gargoyle. On your way home do you ever walk on the same side of the street where that new engineering building is?”

“Sure.”

Roberto chuckled. “You’re something, Gargoyle. You really are. First you kill my cat. Now you are trying to kill me by following the instructions of the computers in that building.”

“How so?”

“You just said that you walk on the same side of the street as the engineering building.”

“What about it?”

“The computers have you under their command. They’ve got you where they want,” Roberto said, his face lighted by a smile with more than a trace of menace.

The acid trips. Roberto hadn’t been this crazy the year before, unless he had been keeping his craziness to himself.

It didn’t end with the machinations of the computers in the engineering building. The next day he insisted Luther place his ears to the wall in the hallway. “Do you hear? Janis is next door singing, and just for me.”

“No, I don’t hear,” Luther managed to say, hoping to initiate a conversation by not simply indulging Roberto in his delusional state.

“Gargoyle doesn’t hear Janis singing ‘Ball and Chain’?”

“No, I don’t,” Luther said, “and my name is not Gargoyle.”

“Your name will always be Gargoyle, Gargoyle. That’s just the way it is,” Roberto said.

“Have you thought of seeing a therapist, Roberto?”

“Why would you tell me to do that?”

“It’s good to talk about stuff that is bothering us. If we don’t, it can lead to trouble.”

“What kind of trouble, Gargoyle?”

“Just trouble. Unhappiness.”

“Are you unhappy, Gargoyle? Is that it? You want to talk to me?”

“I am talking to you, or trying to.”

“Cat killer Gargoyle is talking to me?”

“This isn’t good, Roberto.”

“What isn’t good, Gargoyle?”

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“That’s right. You don’t know,” Roberto said.

A thought came to Luther. Suppose Roberto was missing the words that would describe his feelings? Without the safety valve that such communication could bring, Roberto would be trapped within himself with his demons. He would be as much behind bars as Luther had been up in Connecticut, and with no way of getting out. Suppose Roberto’s interest in symbolic logic had been an attempt to invent a language, a language that could only take him further from himself? If Roberto was truly sealed away in his own mad realm, then he could only get worse.

That fall Luther met a girl at a party hosted by a Columbia at his Claremont Avenue apartment. Both Luther and the girl were out of place at the party, and so they left together and he slept with her with that same night. Her name was Susan Plecik and she lived on Sullivan Street. She was a tall, skinny girl studying art history at New York University who didn't ask anything of him. He could come and go from her place as he pleased. She knew things he didn't know, like the meaning of the word intaglio. He was apologetic about how quickly he came after entering her, but she never complained or refused to see him, which was often on impulse after a few beers at Gosees, just one block north from her walkup flat. Susan was Catholic, from somewhere on Long Island, but she didn't act Catholic, not like the girls from Amsterdam Avenue, Mary Marie and Kathy Kathleen, back in high school. Susan was free, or trying to be. Because of her thinness and her undemanding way, he could feel powerful with her in a way he couldn't with Sarah.

“Are you friends with Bob Dylan? You look like you could be friends with him,” Susan asked, during one grass-smoking visit.

“No, I don't know him,” Luther said, feeling sad that he had disappointed her and frightened that she could be so off the mark. For the rest of the day he lied with the sadness that he was not the go away from my window, leave at your own chosen speed man with the great haired great everything.

There was a girl named Rosa Bloom. She was tight with Efram Ellsberg and Zach Zeckler, the Scale Master, from high school days in Brooklyn, and possessed a beauty that rendered Luther awkward the few times he had had encountered her on the campus, as she had eyes that saw right through to his desire. Rosa went her own way, dropping in and out of CCNY, her intelligence elevating her above any sense of urgency for a degree.

Rosa lived in a ground-floor apartment on Fifty-Fifth Street just west of Tenth Avenue. The five-story walkup building was set back behind an identical building that faced the street. To get to the rear building, you walked through a long corridor and down a few steps into a courtyard. There were actually two rear buildings, Rosa's being to the right. If you looked up, you could see the windowless New York Telephone Building one block down on Tenth Avenue towering over the older, smaller buildings, the new threatening the old.

Rosa told Luther he could have the apartment if she paid him two hundred fifty dollars for the right to rent it. She called it key money. She said a man named Mickey had fallen in love with her and needed to see her more and more. She said this man Mickey wanted her to move upstate and join the commune he was part of, where the members grew their own vegetables and lived off the land. Luther liked the name Mickey. He wondered if he would be a different person with a name like that. Luther wanted to tell Rosa that he had fallen in love with her, too, and how much he wanted to touch her.

"Do you have that kind of money? I would need it all up front," Rosa said.

"I have plenty of dough," Luther said.

"Plenty of dough? Dough?" The word got a laugh out of Rosa.

"I've got plenty of money," Luther said, embarrassed by her laughter.

"It's just that you don't look like someone who would use the word dough."

"Hell's Kitchen must be doing something to me."

Luther was glad, some hours later when he returned with the money, that he hadn't reached out his hand to Rosa. He did not go back to her place but one block north to the apartment of Scale Master Zach. Zach himself had a good deal going, living in a one-bedroom apartment for seventy dollars a month. Rosa was hanging ivory-colored curtains she had sewn for him to cover the big window looking down on the street. Luther saw the easy way Rosa and Zach had with each other. They had a shared history, in more ways than one. He, Luther, could only be an outsider among them, a guest.

"Did you clean your ass this morning?" Zach said, as Luther was lowering himself into an armchair.

"What?" Luther asked, pausing in his descent.

"Rosa reupholstered that chair for me. I don't want any fecal matter on it."

"Your chair is safe," Luther said, and sank down on the soft cushion. Luther took no offense. Zach was afflicted with a terrible need for honesty. He simply had to speak the truth of what he was thinking.

"Rosa makes curtains for me but she won't sleep with me. What does Mickey have that I don't have?" Zach asked.

"Manners, for one thing," Rosa said.

"Manners are for the goys. Jews can't afford them. Right, Luther?"

"I wouldn't know," Luther said.

"What do you mean, you wouldn't know? You're not a Jewboy?" Zach asked.

"I don't know any Jews named Luther," Luther said.

"So what are you?" Zach asked.

“I’m not anything. I’m an American, I guess.”

“Right. An American,” Zach said.

Always with the thrust, the jeer, Zach was. But he had wounds. That absent mother.

It was spring now. The air had softened, and the days had grown longer. There had been progress. He had bought his way to freedom, first from jail and now from Roberto. And all the while his supply of cash continued to accumulate under the dresser in his room, where he also stashed his personal receipt book. More and more, his presence in the renting office had come to be accepted and even counted on, at least by his mother. She was getting on in years. She was tired. She wanted her family around her, even if some of them were a torment. And he, Luther, wanted to be around, so long as he didn’t have to stay. That was the thing about the renting office. He had to keep returning so he could leave. There was no way he could leave without it. So it had come to seem to him in the few short months he had been there.

Finally, someone in the family was standing up to Simon Weill. The thought came to Luther: Suppose his mother knew? Suppose Luther was her weapon against the man of darkness?

As he was packing his knapsack and preparing to leave the renting office one evening, the phone rang on the cluttered desk, and he was presented with an opportunity to understand his own craziness in imagining himself as any sort of weapon against

Simon Weill. Because there was Simon Weill on the line, saying, "I need to speak to Mrs. Garatdjian."

"Yes, of course," Luther said, placing the receiver down and frantically ringing the house phone. Every five seconds would he give three short rings, seeking to summon his mother. Never did it occur to him that he could pick up the receiver and simply tell Simon Weill that his mother was unreachable and that she would have to get back to him. His rage grew with her failure to respond to his all points bulletin. Once again she was up to her old and savage trick of stalling him. He pictured her hiding out in some room and indulging in a monstrous chuckle, as she would when he was a child and expressed frustration. His mother playing with him, leaving him at the mercy of a man he was unequipped to deal with.

He pressed down on the two retractable tips in the cradle of the phone and replaced the receiver and was about to pull the phone line from the wall when his mother appeared.

"Where were you?" Luther asked.

"Is something the matter, my son?"

"Mr. Weill just called. I rang and rang for you on the house phone."

"Is he on the line now?"

"We got disconnected."

"I will call him back from Auntie Eve's apartment," she said, but even as she spoke the outside phone began ringing again.

"Please answer the phone. I'm sure it's him," Luther said.

“But what ails you, my son, that you can’t simply tell him...”

“Please,” Luther said, vacating the office space so his mother could sit down and talk with Simon Weill.

Luther went out into the lobby and wasn’t there ten seconds before he realized his knapsack, with the personal receipt book in it, was back in the office. If his mother looked through it, he was dead, dead, and so he rushed back.

“In this world you must learn to speak with the devil, my son,” his mother said. Apparently she hadn’t reached into the kneehole for his bag. She had probably not even seen it.

“What devil are you speaking about?” Luther asked.

“You know the devil of which I speak, my son.”

To hear Mr. Weill described in such an extreme way was disturbing. It did not seem fair to assign such blackness on another human being, though he had done the same.

Sarah came with him to see his new place on a warm April day, and the stricken look on her face made it clear that she was intimidated by Rosa.

“I’ve heard so much about you,” Rosa said. They were words from which Sarah could not seem to recover, as they brought to her mind the distinction between image and reality.

“I’ve heard about you, too,” Sarah said, seeking to reciprocate, or perhaps just defending herself with words reflexively spoken. Her voice had a tremble in it.

“Really. I wonder where, and from whom,” Rosa said, applying her level gaze.

“From Luther, I suppose,” Sarah said.

Rosa turned to Luther. “Is that so?” she said, as she handed him the keys, and now it was for Luther to be uncomfortable, not merely for Sarah but for himself. The idea of someone completely tangential to her life commenting on her to his girlfriend surely had made Rosa recoil. What sort of freak was she dealing with? So he could imagine her thinking.

Sarah’s insecurity during her encounter with Rosa was nothing Luther hadn’t seen before. Had her deceased sister, Lenore, not intimidated her, and a girl named Ellen Finkel had done the same at the High School of Music and Art. More socially adept than Sarah and on the party circuit, Ellen Finkel had stolen Sarah’s friend, Pam Becker, away from her. And now, at the Museum School, she had a new nemesis, Debbie Vogel, who had the same social attributes as Ellen Finkel and was competing with her for the affection of Sarah’s teacher and friend, Mr. Atworthy. Didn’t Sarah frequently complain to him of Debbie Vogel’s aggrandizing tendencies?

Still, the episode was enlightening. If he, Luther, perceived her as possessing supreme gifts, that didn’t mean she regarded herself in the same way. She was telling him, with her manifest fear, that there were other girls of value. She was not the only one.

“It’s the least I can do for my gargoyle,” Roberto said, as he sat at the wheel of his stepfather’s van. “We will drive with the windows down so the stink of him doesn’t kill us,” Roberto said, waving a hand in front of his nose. “We will see what kind of rat hole you have found.”

Roberto had insisted on helping Luther with his move. Well, what did it matter? He asked himself. He was out of Roberto’s apartment and none too soon, as Roberto’s psychosis was not going away. Before leaving the apartment, Roberto had pushed Luther to cup his ear against the hallway wall so he could hear a Jimi Hendrix jam session being performed live for Roberto’s personal listening pleasure. And that damn smile. It was too creepy. Some monstrous rage was going to crash right through it, like a bull through a paper hoop.

A couple of boxes of books. Some clothes. A desk lamp. They were done moving in fifteen minutes into his new place, bare except for a bed, a dining table, a lamp, and a chair.

“How much are you paying for this dump?” Roberto sat on the floor, his back against the wall, contentedly smoking a cigarette.

“Forty-nine bucks a month, if you can believe such a thing,” Luther said.

“You’ll be back. You’ll see. Just like the last time. The next time I’ll make you beg. One day I’ll turn the apartment into a big recording studio to help pay my way through Columbia Business School. Then you won’t be able to come back.”

Luther felt sad but also frightened, hearing Roberto’s poor grasp on reality . He had not cared for Roberto enough. He had not known how to care for Roberto.

“Why don’t we go get some pizza?” Luther said. “It will be on me.”

“Trying to get rid of me, Gargoyle? Afraid I won’t take the hint and leave? Afraid you can’t dispose of me like my cat?”

“No, it’s nothing like that,” Luther said. “It’s just that I’m tired and need to start dealing with this new situation.”

“New situation. You crack me up, Gargoyle,” Roberto said, as he stood up and stretched and headed for the door.

“I’ll come out to the van with you,” Luther said.

“No. Don’t you do that. Rat stays in his rat hole.”

He had never before lived in a ground-floor apartment. In the courtyard that night, as he lay in bed, he would hear footsteps and follow them as first the outer door to the building and then the inner door banged open. Up the stairs he would hear the tenants or visitors go, before the silence of the night returned. In the morning he woke to the sound of birds chirping in the tree outside the window next to his bed. It was a happy sound, a really happy sound.

To make the apartment his own, he applied two coatings of off-white latex paint to the walls and ceilings. As he was finishing, the phone rang. Sarah was on the line, calling from Key West, Florida, where she had gone with her father, to say that she loved him so much and couldn’t wait to see him. She said her father had come into her motel room the previous day. His presence had disturbed her. He had talked of the sun provoking the flow of his erotic juices. He had lifted up her skirt. More she wouldn’t say.

Light more brilliant than any sun shone within him. Sarah’s father had tried to claim her for his own, but once again she had chosen him, Luther. Oh, happy day, when Luther could see, more clearly than ever, his value to Sarah was her value to him: they were leading each other from the death trap of family. The intensity of such love he had to be alone to savor.

Now these were the neighbors of Luther Garatdjian, and there were not many, in the four-story walkup building. There was Tom Terrell, who could be heard through the pressed tin ceiling practicing “Down on the Boondocks” over and over and accompanying himself on his acoustic guitar. Tom Terrell was in his late thirties and lived alone and waited tables to support his career as a singer/actor and between gigs on cruise ships, on which he sang “Down on the Boondocks” until the tourists could take it no more. Then he gave them “Country Road,” which he also sang with great feeling but less gusto. Tom Terrell had legs too short for his body and pale skin and thinning brown hair and was, like Efram Ellsberg, a denim duds man in his choice of pants and shirts.

Above Tom Terrell lived Nadia Ridenscu, a ballerina/waitress who wore her black hair in a severe bun. She was someone Luther wanted to know and would come to know.

On the top floor lived Sandra Storm, a blond actress/waitress who, though well into her thirties, still had the ability to turn heads. A zaftig woman, Sandra had needs that one such as Luther could never satisfy, though there would come a time when, in the grip of delusion, he would extend himself to her and receive a powerful rebuff—that a worm such as he should even think of making an approach.

Celeste, I have gone as far as I can with the narrative in this vein. The pressure of time is exerting itself. There is not only the need to accelerate but to broaden the discussion, if I am ever able. As we grow older, walls must come down and the opportunity taken to express love directly.

What I am saying is that I had to get back to you before I am called away.

In this period the past was beginning to exert its pull. The large Irish families crammed into the tenement apartments in this rundown part of the city were dwindling, replaced by the ands, as has been mentioned.

The sidewalks heading west toward Tenth Avenue and beyond were cracked and uneven. They led to a small concrete bridge under which ran two pairs of rusted railroad tracks littered with the detritus of contemporary life: soda cans and Styrofoam cups and even an upholstered chair and old stove, a kind of desecration you would never see on the runways and interstates of America. I saw, staring down at this urban dumping ground, the heartlessness of America toward its past, to which it had consigned our railroads.

As for the piers along the Hudson, they were rotting and crumbling. The dockworkers gone, the bars along Twelfth Avenue in which they drank gone, the families they supported gone.

The superintendent of the two buildings was a woman named Moira Finn. On warm, sunny days, she would sit outside on a metal garbage can. She was old and heavy, with a square, pockmarked face, as if smallpox had paid a visit. Her thin, straw-colored hair was cut severely short, giving her a mannish appearance. I thought of her as a woman who saw without seeming to see, and credited her, perhaps mistakenly, with knowing the business of everyone. In some way, greeting her as I came and went, I felt that I was being inspected by the eyes of God. Having given her the power of judgment, I had to be good for her lest I incur her wrath and be destroyed. In some way I was seeing a harsher, less feeling, version of my mother, I suppose.

Celeste, many, many are the times that I have sought to assure those with eyes upon me that I am innocent and above suspicion: police officers, store clerks, token booth operators. A basic need to avoid the punishing blows that might otherwise be dealt.

Just down from the corner of Tenth Avenue was a body shop, owned by a man with a powerful build that he doubtless worked on as much as he did the cars in his care. His face was in line with his body, monstrously hard, any trace of gentleness having long ago fled, if ever it had been there. Ben's Body Shop, the sign said. There he was, day after day, kneeling on a tarpaulin with the whirring blade of the sander that he applied to afflicted parts of the vehicles. I would feel the toxic rays of his stare penetrating my back as I passed him by. He was no one I could even try to win over. He belonged to a world of manly pain I had no interest in entering.

If I tell you these things in some detail, it is that I was bound to the world I knew, and things different, when they presented themselves, became momentous in my mind, taking on an importance beyond their genuine value, the past but a graveyard for the misremembering to wander lost in.

A police horse stable occupied the opposite corner. During the day uniformed officers in riding boots and shiny helmets could be seen on their big brown mounts amid the traffic on the avenue, either beginning or returning from their shifts in Central Park, and the bracing smell of horse manure was a constant. The avenue, you should know, was not a dainty thoroughfare—not a single one in New York City really is—but a pathway for interstate buses and trailer trucks flowing north in a show of remorseless, ruthless power; and so, for the police to be able to negotiate their way and maintain the equilibrium of their steeds in the face of such terrorizing giants was no small feat. But the question that arose in witnessing this equestrian spectacle was simply this: Did these big, strong men, with their aptitude for physical force, really love these animals on whose backs they rode? Did they really, really love them, that is? In these moments was I recognizing that love is the paramount emotion in this universe and that tenderness must have its place amid so much pain. Quite simply, I wanted to believe that these hard, tough men could melt into softness.

And it was the same in other venues, Celeste, such as the deli on the northwest corner of Fifty-seventh Street and Tenth Avenue, where, some afternoons I would go for my all-time favorite, a ham and Swiss cheese hero, with lettuce, tomato, and a generous slathering of mustard, or sometimes cole slaw to go with the ham in place of the lettuce and tomato and cheese. (Sean, you may recall, introduced me to this option some years before, way back in the days of Funelli's grocery.) The owner, Mike, was not someone you wished to fool with. A man who spoke with his fists, as it used to be said, only now he was in middle age and perhaps saddled with responsibility for a wife and child. The man, I suspected, was homegrown, a product of the neighborhood that he served. In his employ he had younger men, also from these same streets, who had grown up not with kindness but hard blows. Though no incidents occurred to spark their rage and cause them to beat me senseless, for the owner and his employees I felt myself to be in a performance of innocuousness, my primary purpose being to secure sustenance and my second to get out unharmed.

This approach to living is no way to leave an imprint on the world but simply to pass through it as a ghost.

There was another new development, Celeste. I entered psychoanalysis. Perhaps it was the strangeness of the secret life I had developed with my activity in the renting office or the strain of maintaining a relationship with Sarah while living in a different and faraway city, or maybe it was the way I could behave in that relationship, or maybe I was simply following through on the aborted attempt I made the previous year, with Lydia's encouragement, but I applied to and was accepted by the Karen Horney Clinic, on East Sixty-Second Street.

During the interview, I professed to be more of a student rebel than I truly was. I was hardly rebellious at all. SDS continued to be suspect in my mind. I sensed nothing democratic in their approach to society; rather, they seemed elitists even as they advanced the proletarian cause; Mark Rudd and Lewis Cole and a few other intellectually gifted radicals would hold the levers of power should the movement grow. This anti-establishment pose is what got me in, I have to believe.

The clinic occupied a small building between First and Second Avenues, near an alternate entrance to the Fifty-ninth Street Bridge. I was to commit myself to three fifty-minute sessions a week. My profile was such that a female analyst was assigned to me. Her name was Marlene Dressler and she had come to this country from Germany sometime after World War II. She had recently earned a medical degree from Columbia University and was now doing her residency at the clinic in order to complete her psychoanalytic training. Perhaps because she was a novice and I was still a student, my fee on the sliding scale was three dollars per session.

Her office was a narrow room with a window from which you could look down at the bridge traffic. A woman probably in her mid-forties, she sat in a leather-bound chair in the far corner and I sat the far edge of the narrow leather couch. There was no second chair. The idea was for me to lie down, but I could not bring myself to comply with her request, as I needed my eyes to be on her at all times. What I saw was a congenial smile that communicated insecurity and an excess of amiability but also German ruthlessness and strength. Fear may have played a part in my lack of cooperation. I couldn't be sure what might happen if I did lie down. The smacking might begin.

Though thinner than my sister Hannah, she reminded me of her physically. The sleeveless dresses she sometimes wore revealed a thickness in her arms and that same thickness was apparent in her legs and torso. And she had Hannah's richly black hair. The impression quickly formed that darkness might reign behind that cheerful pose. And yet she did nothing to show that she was not on my side.

Gratitude was evident on her smiling face. She had changed direction—gone on to medical school—later in life than most, and now was reaping the benefit.

I was not fit to be at the institute. That was my essential theme, in those first couple of months. I told her about the sums of money I continued to extract from the renting office and my failure on the SAT and the perversity of God that he would have me face life with such meager physical and intellectual assets. I told her about the names that had attached to me—Flathead and Blockhead and Squarehead, and more recently, Gargoyle.

“I am not fit to live on this planet. Do you understand?” I screamed at Dr. Dressler.

“It is astonishing to me that you have gotten as far as you have, given your feelings about yourself,” Dr. Dressler said, after one such rant. Because I was incapable of pure psychoanalysis, our sessions required more interaction than she probably had with her other patients.

Dr. Dressler referred me to a psychologist down near Gramercy Park for an intelligence test. The psychologist was favorably impressed with my verbal skills, according to the report she sent to Dr. Dressler.

“You can go right to the very top,” Dr. Dressler said, discounting the fact that I had received a less impressive score on the performance part. She also dismissed as unimportant the fact that I had taken an intelligence test only a year or so before and so remembered some of the questions I might be asked.

“I knew right away, at our first session, that you were intelligent,” Dr. Dressler went on.

But her attempts to boost my self-image were of no real avail. Once you have failed, such as on the SAT, it is forever. The record is simply indelible. You know where you stand in relation to your fellows, and a person should have the decency to accept his standing in life with the humble awareness that there are some who are above him in brainpower but also some below him in mental gifts.

But acceptance is not an easy state to achieve. We can feign indifference to the world, but when it assigns us a low number, then there will be pain and dejection and lasting damage.

During those early months at the institute, I bought a copy of Karen Horney's book, The Neurotic Personality of Our Time, and could see myself on every page of this compelling text: my need to please and rely excessively on one person, as I did with Sarah, and the pain my idealized self was causing me. With the symptoms of neurosis that she laid out, I could easily identify, but I found it depressing that the text seemed to offer no great hope for a solution.

That spring was a time of brutal comeuppance. There is that saying, What is good for the goose is good for the gander, and if we were to transpose the goose with the gander, then that little piece of folk wisdom would be applicable to Sarah and me. I have made clear earlier in this text that I was in full sexual pursuit of other girls in this time of my life. On the subway, in Central Park, in Pennsylvania Station, on the streets and shops of New York City, I was ready to make a move. If I had nothing else, I had my height and I had my hair and a nonthreatening manner to compensate for the absence of good looks and a good physique. I also had the fortune, good or bad, of being part of a generation that accepted impulsive action. A number of girls came with me to that Hell's Kitchen apartment. But they were not the defense I had hoped they might be against the pain I experienced when Sarah had her own adventure.

This business of the telephone had become a problem, though not from a legal standpoint, as I was no longer using stolen corporate charge numbers for my long-distance calls. I now had the means, thanks to my renting office activity, to make such calls from my home phone and pay the monthly bill. The problem was my inability to go so much as a day without speaking to Sarah. My fear, as I have said before, was that the increments of time between calls might grow longer and longer until we were strangers to each other if we were not in daily touch. Sarah had her difficulties, but she was centered in a way that I wasn't. She had her art and I had meaningless paperback books. The simple truth seemed to be that she needed me less than I needed her, and my frequent phone contact with her only underscored this reality. As much relief as they brought to me, they were also an expression of my need.

(Celeste, I hear you taking exception to the word "meaningless" as applied to literature, but the quality of my learning experience at CCNY was poor, and I fault myself that I couldn't participate more. My true major in those years was Sarah Van Dine.)

But this outreach to Sarah was taken to a new level when, for some reason, she was not home to receive my phone calls. At such times, the toxin of fear would be released and overwhelm my system. The only relief I could hope for from this torture was the sound of her voice. Sooner or later she would answer, and offer a plausible explanation. A girlfriend had asked her for dinner. She had decided to stay late in the school's print studio. There had been a lecture she went to hear. Sarah was popular, not simply because of her looks, but because her peers recognized her gift and her seriousness. They were drawn to her, as people weren't and still aren't to me.

Altogether, Sarah had a more naturally respectful attitude toward the rights of others than I possessed. As much as my overbearing manner lowered her regard for me, it possibly did even more damage to me. How far I had fallen from the kid who let her come to me and vowed never to call her or set foot in her family's apartment. Such an extreme vow in regard to Sarah could only have come from my sense that she was to me what the bottle is to an alcoholic.

Generally, she returned home from school to make dinner and work and read. But one night I called, and she did not answer. The second and third night it was the same. She had been spending time with her girlfriends, she later explained, easing my fear sufficient that I could sleep. But when I called her from the renting office the following evening and got no answer, the conviction seized me that I must race up to Boston and see for myself. I closed the office a half hour early and jumped in a cab to LaGuardia Airport, where I boarded an Eastern Airlines shuttle. Less than an hour later I was racing through Logan Airport and into another cab.

It may strike you as perverse, Celeste, but I was as afraid of catching her with someone else as I was afraid that I wouldn't. The idea of her stepping into sexual adventure excited me, as had my awareness of her experience with her brother, Jeffrey. What a world we are a part of so long as we are slaves to the body, and what a journey it is to gain our relative freedom.

When the cab pulled up outside her building, I was relieved to see that the window of her third-floor apartment, which looked out on Park Row, was dark. The time was 9:30 pm. A light burning in the window would have suggested she was home and eliminated my justification for the hurried trip. I would have had no choice but to return to the airport.

She had given me a key to her apartment. As a precaution, I called her from a corner phone. When I got no answer, I went upstairs and stood outside her door. Not a sound. I let myself in and relocked the door. With the lights still off, I went to the window, which had a full view of the entranceway, and set up a vigil, all the while experiencing a level of excitement that seemed unparalleled.

You may ask how it is, Celeste, that I could assume she wasn't lying in bed in the dark with her lover, if such she had, when I turned the key? To be honest, the thought hadn't occurred to me, possibly because she would have had to endure the incessant ringing of the phone and all the guilt that might induce were she in fact entertaining her lover.

An hour passed and then another. Except to relieve myself, I maintained my vigil. I also went through several cigarettes, risking exposure by blowing the smoke out the window, which I had partially opened. By now I had pulled up a chair so I could sit and wait in some comfort.

Shortly after midnight a red convertible sports car came to a stop by a van parked at the curb. The top was down on the convertible, and there was Sarah in the passenger seat, her hair a brilliant blond under the streetlight. At the wheel was a muscular young black man in a dashiki. He appeared to have a goatee. Sarah got out and the man followed her as far as the entrance. For a moment I worried that he would walk away from his double-parked car and follow her upstairs, but he quickly turned and drove away.

The justification for my suspicion was right there, below me, I thought, even as it occurred to me that I had no right to have entered Sarah's apartment, regardless of the apparent justification. None of my thoughts were anything against the shock that my worst fear had been confirmed, that she was with someone else. And there was something else, if I am to be honest, perverse excitement that I was a partial witness to her own carnality. The fact that the man she had chosen was black only added to the fever.

I was not free of racial attitudes, Celeste, as I have previously indicated. This would be a fair statement to make.

"What are you doing here?" she asked. Her tone was unwelcoming, annoyed.

"I was worried. Night after night I called, and you weren't home."

"I have a right to go out."

"I didn't say you didn't. I said I was worried."

"Well, stop worrying so much."

"Where were you?"

"I went out with my new friend Susan."

"Where did you go?"

"She lives over in Cambridge. We had dinner."

"Does Susan drive a red sports car?"

“What are you, some sort of prosecutor?” Sarah’s anger and her characterization of me were justified for forcing her down a pathway of lies with my questions.

“I saw you get out of the car just now.”

“Tell me everything you saw. Tell me everything you know, Mr. Prosecutor. Tell me what you are doing up here uninvited in my apartment.”

“I saw what I saw.”

“So tell me what you saw, I said.”

“I saw you getting out of a car with a black man.”

“Ooh, Sarah was with a black man. What are you going to do, Mr. Prosecutor, kill me? Is that what you’ve come here to do?”

“I’ve come here because I was worried.”

“Well, stop worrying. Nothing is going on.”

In this way did it continue, Celeste, until cornered and enraged by the lies she was being forced to tell, she screamed, her face distorted by defiant rage, “You want the truth? You want it? He fucked me. He fucked me tonight and last night and the night before, and he has been fucking me ever since I met him two weeks ago. That is what is going on.”

I fled her apartment for the open spaces. At some point I headed over the Charles River Bridge and entered Cambridge. Later, footsore and crazed, I found myself in an all-night Hayes Bickford, across the street from the Harvard dorms. I sat drinking coffee and smoking cigarettes. Several hours later, down by the subway, opposite the Harvard Coop,

I jumped in a cab. The Eastern Airlines shuttle wouldn't resume before morning, but maybe I could lie down in one of the airport lounges for the rest of the night.

Logan Airport was desolate except for a few travelers who perhaps, like me, lacked accommodations for the night, and the occasional airport worker. At some point I passed out in a molded chair. When I came to it was daylight and the airport was bustling. Passengers had gathered on ticket lines and uniformed airline personnel were heading for their planes. Within a few seconds the memory of the night before returned, and with it all the pain, causing me to wish for the solace of sleep once more.

Several hours later I was back in Manhattan. On Fifty-Seventh Street, halfway between Eighth and Ninth Avenues, a gold-plated nameplate caught my attention. I made a detour into the ground-floor office of Dr. Arnold Zimmer, where the receptionist asked for the reason for my visit.

"I'm feeling some pain," I said.

"Where is this pain?" she asked.

"It's inside, where you can't see it," I said.

She looked at me with some doubt. My wild hair and skinny frame made me strangeness personified, and my peculiar reply probably only added to her concern. Not wishing to probe any further, perhaps for fear of what she might find, she simply said, "Please have a seat. The doctor will be with you shortly."

Celeste, there are streets with specialness attaching to them. Fifty-seventh, between those two avenues, was one of them. An ice cream soda sort of street from my childhood sufficient to trigger a delirium of joy, why I cannot explain. Relief was on the way. There he was, Dr. Zimmer himself, standing in the doorway of his office in a white lab coat with stethoscope dangling from his neck. “Mr. Garatdji?” he called out.

“Here,” I said, and followed my gray-haired savior into his office.

“What can I do for you?” Dr. Zimmer said, now seated at his desk.

“It is only this, Doctor. I have been seeing a girl. I gave her my heart two years ago...”

“Stop there. I am a medical doctor. Do you have a medical problem?”

“Last night I found out she is seeing someone else, and since then I have been in terrible pain.”

“As I just said, I am a medical doctor. Now what can I do for you from a medical standpoint?”

“I was wondering if you could provide me with a prescription for tranquilizers. I just need something to...”

Celeste, we must apply understanding if we are not to live in the realm of the dinky-dimensioned, those who buttonhole passersby and pour out their tales of trespass and gross violation by others, thus setting themselves up as victims to be loved and universally adored. This doctor may have been a veteran of World War II. He may have been infused with great love of country and angered and dismayed by what he perceived as long-haired hordes indulging themselves in an orgy of sex and drugs and rock and roll and flag burning. He may himself have had a son or daughter who had fallen victim to hedonistic ways. Whatever the reason, the good doctor cut me off. “Get out!” he ordered, then rose from his chair and personally escorted me from his office through the waiting room and to the front door. "And don't come back," he shouted after me. We can only imagine the self-righteous anger that drove him to this action and that must have lingered in the aftermath.

I was not a manly man. Such had been the doctor's verdict. Manly men did not need drugs. They did not give women the power to destroy them. Manly men were men with minds calibrated to receive and absorb science so they could become physicians and wear those white lab coats. They were certainly not men such as me with scrambled eggs for brains. This was not a matter for argument.

My apartment was intact. I had my single bed on which to lie curled up and moaning, as often I did when suffering, imagining myself as a wounded animal. Some brutal amputation had taken place. That was the wound. I wasn't missing a limb. I was missing my life. But I could not cry. I was not pure, if neurotic, Strelnikov in Dr. Zhivago, weeping and completely undone when he learns that Lara, his true love, has been unfaithful. I had done the very thing that Sarah was now doing, and I had done it many times, and even with her now deceased sister, Lenore. And so there was no basis for tears.

Strangely, or perhaps not so strangely, as the hours passed my perspective on the situation changed. Was it possible Sarah hadn't severed our relationship with an ax? Was it possible we could survive this development? Who was this man she had given herself to, and why should I believe, just because he drove a sports car, that he had permanently replaced me?

Celeste, I dreaded returning to the renting office. Without Sarah as a buffer, the building would ultimately claim me as well, and I would be consigned to living out my life in one of those roach-infested rooms. I had missed all my classes that day, but now I was pulling myself together to show up for my shift when the phone rang. I had begun to feel that she would call. At the very least, my bolt out the door at that late hour would have caused her some concern about my safety. I had forced her to worry about me with my quick exit.

“Are you OK?” she asked.

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, where did you go last night?”

“Why would you care where I went?”

“I just wanted to know.”

“I went to the Hayes Bickford in Cambridge and then hung out in the airport until I could get a morning flight.”

“It’s not a serious thing,” she said.

“What’s not a serious thing?”

“This thing with Carlton.”

“It’s serious to me,” I said.

One afternoon, en route to her therapist, Carlton had approached her and suggested they go for coffee. He was a second-year student at Harvard Law School and had his own record company. Law school was a difficult experience for him as a black man, he said. Most of the students were white and square. Being with Carlton wasn’t great for her. The sex felt like a mechanical exercise and she had cried the first time they slept together. When Carlton asked about her tears, she told him that she had a boyfriend back in New York City. Carlton tried to console her with the assurance that it was only reality that she would see other men. "He said I should hang with him, and so I did," Sarah went on.

In a sexual frenzy, I approached a lingerie shop, waiting outside for some minutes while the woman behind the counter handled the lone customer, a female. Reflexively, I would cast a furtive glance inside and then look away. If a passerby on the street made eye contact with me, I felt he or she could see right inside my mind and glean the sexual deviant that I was. After all, what sort of man presents himself as a customer at a store whose only commodities are undergarments for women—brassieres, stockings, garter belts, nighties, etc.? A man who is putting his prurience on display and saying his lust is out of control. That is who.

"How may I help you?" the store woman asked.

"I don't know. I mean, a pair of panties. That is all."

"What size would that be?"

"Gee, I don't know."

"Is the recipient of your gift a small woman? Large?"

"Small. I would say small."

"And what color?"

"Red. Red would be fine," I said.

"We have these very fine lace panties," she said, placing a pair on the counter.

"Or we have these," she said, beginning to reach into the drawer again.

"These are fine. Perfect. Thank you."

“Will there be anything else?”

“No, thank you,” I said, unable to make eye contact as I clutched my little package and my change. At the door I slid past two women and bolted the scene.

The lingerie store was on Seventh Avenue and Fifty-second Street, at the northern end of the theater district and the blaze of neon lights that came on at night. My father, of course, had worked only several blocks away, at Jack Dempsey’s Restaurant, for many years. The Great White Way had always left me uncomfortable, by day or night, and I was relieved to walk west toward Eighth and then Ninth and then Tenth Avenue. The small residential buildings had a stillness to them. They were from a different, less developed time in the life of the city. They were where ordinary people lived, people like me.

On the corner of Eighth Avenue stood a Blimpie’s, where I ordered a ham and Swiss hero, which came stuffed with shredded lettuce and thin slices of tomato. I liked the oil and vinegar dressing they squirted on the hero, along with the heavy coating of mustard. That is the way I ate back then, Celeste, stuffing myself with hero sandwiches and hamburgers and hot dogs and French fries and eggs with ham and home fried potatoes, when I bothered to eat. And of course there were the gallons of Coke and coffee and cigarettes and the speed I relied on for brainpower.

“You look so sad. I wish I could help you,” a girl said to me that afternoon, there in Blimpie’s, on her way out. I didn’t attempt to engage her in conversation. I guess she saw something and felt a need to speak her mind. She wasn’t like those face police, you know, the self-appointed monitors of your expression who suddenly appear and zing you with admonitions like, "Try smiling. It won't crack your face," and then disappear as quickly as they came. People afraid of their own pain and threatened by the fact that yours is so visible.

Sheepishly I gave Sarah the panties that weekend and she wore them for me. I had hoped lovemaking with Sarah in her canopied bed would be my return home, the end of my exile. But the anxiety seemed to have a life of its own. Carlton was a constant presence in my mind. I felt the crushing weight of his Harvard pedigree. How could I compete with such a person?

The answer, of course, was that I couldn't compete with him and shouldn't even try, and so I tried to surrender, to accept that I had no power to determine what Sarah would or wouldn't do. I adopted an attitude of meekness. There was no berating her. What would have been the point? She had the upper hand.

Unable to sleep, I was up late the following night when the phone rang. A man was on the line asking for Sarah. He may have been calling from a club or a bar, given the sound of music in the background. "She is asleep," I said. "Tell her Carlton called," he said, and hung up. I didn't ask if Sarah had his number, and I didn't ask her either in the morning when I gave her the message.

Celeste, I must break here briefly from the ceaseless past that I may be with you in real time. This has not been a good day. A feeling of desperation has gripped me, that feeling where you say all hope is gone and you just can't take anymore. Take any more of what? You would say. And I would say this obscurity, this abysmal failure, this life without real achievement low intelligence has brought me. It may have started last night at dinner when you insisted on lauding the young playwright whose play we saw the other week for its structure. When I hear that word structure, I equate it with those who can assemble blocks in their proper configuration on those IQ tests or who can build a cabinet—those who have the ability to put things together. I did find myself trapped and at the place where often emotionally I wind up. Once again I had to write out my resentment against God for placing me in this world without adequate tools for finding my way. “Is that all you want for me, to be a nobody in the day and night forever and ever?” And then the profanities I never allow myself in everyday discourse flooded the page. “Go f-ing f---yourself, you f-ing sadist,” etc. And no day, even a good one, would be complete without writing, “This is the day I need to die and die and die.” Some might be alarmed by this record of pain, often vehemently expressed, when really, the log is but a receptacle for negative discharge so I can move more freely and in some semblance of emotional balance through the day. Feelings must be acknowledged. There must be a point in the day when we are free to say, “I feel X is vile and should be bashed in perpetuity by the Broadway M104 bus” or “I feel Y should die immediately and forthwith for being such a blemish on the earth.” Not even God should be spared our wrath, blasphemous as it may sound in the ears of some. Love must often have its origin or revival in such expression, because without such honesty how can we move beyond our distress? And so it was that kind of day, but for now peace has come.

My physical appearance was a source of amusement to Dr. Dressler, or maybe it was something more like scorn. She would suck in her cheeks to imitate how sunken were my own and laugh that one day soon I would vanish into thin air. And when I noted at one session that some construction guy shouted out, "How you doing, Mophead?" she replied, "Don't complain about the attention your hair draws when that is your intention in the first place."

"I want attention? That's why my hair is long?"

"Your whole generation seeks attention," she said, with a wave of dismissal.

She provided little information about her own life, but I had the impression that she had struggled—the dislocation the war had brought and perhaps her difficulty in establishing herself in a new country. She was, as I have said, in middle age, and her expression exuded deep and smiling satisfaction with her new life as a psychiatrist in training. If there was a choice to be made between deprivation and abundance, or at least material comfort, she would choose the latter.

"That's what we do? We seek attention?"

"Work and discipline are important. Otherwise you wind up selling shoelaces like those young, longhaired people I see out front of Bloomingdale's," she said.

So she had opinions, Celeste, and showed herself affronted by my generation. As for Sarah's involvement with Carlton, she simply said, "You young people. All you do is have sex," her words again accompanied by a wave of dismissal.

So far as I know, Carlton disappeared from the scene. I suspect he had other leads to follow, though how anyone could leave Sarah behind was not easy for me to understand.

Things returned to normal between Sarah and me that summer. At least I wanted to believe they had. She went from Boston to Camp. There was no discussion about her staying in New York City and taking a job. She was committed to her work, and that was that. Peter returned from his exile, but the reconciliation appeared tentative. I was happy to see him with Lydia. They belonged together. She would destroy herself without him and he would be out in the cold and lost. You never wanted to see people who were used to having money suddenly having to go without. At least I didn't. He seemed vulnerable, unsure of himself.

"Lydia wants me to teach at the college level," he said, one afternoon. We had been hiking a trail and now had come to a rock outcrop high above a valley.

"Does that interest you?" I asked. Somehow I couldn't imagine him standing in front of a class, preparing lessons, grading papers. He had chosen another kind of life for himself, and Lydia had been accommodating. But that life was owing to her money.

The day was quite beautiful, Celeste, with none of that scorching summer heat. It was more akin to a day in May, and above was the cloudless blue sky.

"I should never have married," he said, as if in answer to a different question.

I did not ask him what he meant. It was not my place to do so. I sensed the words had not been spoken so much to me as to the universe and had been summoned by the call to freedom sounded by the pristine natural environment where we found ourselves.

With Lydia I exercised no such restraint, at least in one instance. A person gets to see who he is in certain moments, and then has to live with his discovery. She had a hold on me, as was shown when I expressed my concern to her about Sarah in the aftermath of Lenore's suicide. As much as I truly was concerned for Sarah, it is also necessary to acknowledge once again that the prospect of basking in the approval of Lydia for being forthcoming with this information was a strong incentive as well. And though I was mortified following my call to Lydia about Sarah, now, months later, the desire for approval was compelling me to connect with her once again. Self-knowledge was not the answer, Celeste. Why? Because in the moment the idea seized me of going to Lydia, the memory of my shame back in the fall was unavailable to me. I sat there on the lawn by the swimming pool with no past to guide me on that afternoon. All I could hear was the urgency of my need to go to her as she sat in the shade under the trellis overgrown with rhododendron leaves on the terrace just outside the house. She was wearing her glasses and probably reading one of those Simenon mysteries that she favored.

Have you ever thought what it is to be a mother? An absurd question to pose, since you are a mother to one daughter. But what it is child-bearing women go through a man will never know, and so the antipathy such women must feel at times for those such as me who wander unencumbered through life, never truly giving back or engaging. Lydia brought commitment to everything she did, including devouring a Simenon novel.

Understand something, Celeste. Understand. Helicopter gunships filled the air over South Vietnam. Fighter jets tore through the sky. B-52s were unleashing hideous ordnance. And on the ground corn-fed infantry called out for their mothers as their intestines oozed into the soil of that Southeast Asian country. A theater of war had these boys entered. They had passed tests, could break down and reassemble their weaponry, had bodies hard as steel and minds finely honed for the purpose at hand. As for me, I had gone nowhere but to a nine hundred acre estate. I sat in a narrow room three afternoons a week talking about myself with a psychoanalyst. I read paperback novels (but what I really read was the sports section of the New York Post).

Understand something more, Celeste. Simply understand. There was no real need to go to Lydia for anything. Earlier on in this document, you will see a reference to her journal, in which she and Claire equate me with their Estonian, somewhat hysterical, maid, therein declaring that I am entirely lacking in their social pedigree and am but the son of lowly immigrants from insignificant countries. And so I ask you, is it wisdom—a phrase my mother was fond of—to come to Lydia now, on irresistible impulse, with my pressing concern, as if my very fate depends on her response?

As an aside, Celeste, but an important one, we must here declare that such impulses to run to others as if they are the oracle at Delphi must be regarded with extreme suspicion. At such times it is imperative that we go within and call on the Divine Power to rescue us from our looming folly. Nothing is more debilitating to one's progress than the craven need for another's approval. And it is as inevitable as rain that once this tendency is established in a person, it will surface time and time again, in one form or another.

We must have our failures on the journey, Celeste. Toward humility can such abject humiliations lead. Many things happened that summer, some of them spectacular, others abysmal. Neil Armstrong and Buzz Aldrin were lowered in the lunar module from their spacecraft for their moonwalk thing and made America proud (though to be honest, my mind my elsewhere than the conquest of outer space made possible by our technology), while Charles Manson and his crew shot fear into all of us with their murderous rampage. But none is larger in my consciousness than the question I posed to Lydia on that late July afternoon.

“Do you think I am good for Sarah?” There it was, naked, unadorned, the truth of who I was.

She had put down her novel and now lit a cigarette, as if stalling for time and wishing to get her words just right. “You were very good for Sarah. Very good. You shouldn’t doubt that for a second, but I suspect you do. Otherwise you wouldn’t be asking. You were a great asset in helping her transition to her new life.”

That word were, Celeste, which she used twice, as if I had been consigned to Sarah’s past.

“Her new life? Do you mean Boston?”

“Of course. And she has blossomed, absolutely blossomed.”

“She is doing well,” I said, unable to do anything more than endorse Lydia’s assessment.

“And this is only the beginning of her opening. More and more awaits her.”

By now I was frightened, Celeste. Her vision for Sarah, by her tone as much as her words, appeared to exclude me. “What do you see awaiting her?” I felt compelled to ask.

“When a girl is as beautiful and talented as Sarah, life will call to her from many directions.,” Lydia said.

“I don’t understand,” I said.

“Don't you? I believe you understand perfectly well. You are trying to stay on past your time, and you are free to do so, but that can be very painful.”

“Past my time?”

“She will be seeing other men. That is all I mean to say. There will be adoration councils in every city for my daughter.”

“Adoration councils?”

“Forgive me if I exaggerate, but my point is this. Sarah's dictate is to grow and grow and grow, and yours is merely to contain. Do you not see the fundamental incompatibility in the two approaches to life? Do you wish to spend your days trying to keep her down? Would it not be better for you as well as her to set her free?”

So there it was, Celeste. I was a reactionary force in Sarah's life.

It will not do for the mother of a young man's girlfriend to pass judgment on his relationship to her daughter. He will remember the verdict that has been passed and the humiliation he has been dealt. He will remember and he will say, You will see, lady. You will see who you are treating as if he is nothing more than a war-ravaged Estonian.

But is it not possible that Lydia was in a state of mind that called for the vanquishing of all men and spoke from a place of smiling fury? Does it bear mentioning that only the previous year, in that same season, she had lost a daughter? Does that not mean anything insofar as how a woman will see men? Lenore had been destroyed by her bondage to Malcolm, but Sarah would not be destroyed by an oppressive tie to any man. Let them have their adoration circles and bow down to her. Let them take a number and stand in the prospective suitors' line. And let Lydia burst her own bonds as well, with her expulsion of Peter, even if she had allowed him back.

Celeste, once more I must ask you to bear with me in real time.

At the end of the long underground walkway beyond the shuttle platform at Grand Central Terminal, buskers often perform. One evening, a young Japanese group will play mad rock music and offer their CDs for sale. The following evening will feature vigorously fit African American youths doing hand sprints and somersaults and back flips to accompany their rap fever, these displays causing me to fear for them. In the walkway itself are religious zealots handing out pamphlets that seek to pique the curiosity of passersby as to these proselytizers' brand of faith. One such man the other night was wearing a bright yellow T-shirt on the front of which was written, "Even your mother will forget you." Celeste, the message was a jarring one, as it surely intended to be. On the back was the following:, "Judgment Day, May 12. Are you ready?" All the man's chips were on Jesus. His face was a portrait of angry renunciation. Though relatively young and fit and attractive, he had turned away from the earthly forms of love. Or maybe he hadn't. Ten yards behind him was a young woman wearing the same T-shirt. She too was handing out pamphlets, but she possessed a softness and quality of vulnerability lacking in the man. One can only hope that if they were a couple, they would not deny themselves the pleasures life affords to the young.

Of course the question presses on me whether I may not have things in common with this angry, evangelizing man. But no, I don't have to go down that road.

Celeste, one other thing. Some weakness in me shuns literature or films in which evil inflicts grievous and even fatal harm on the good. I had trouble reading Hamlet for this reason, seeing how King Claudius sought the destruction of the prince after usurping the throne by having Hamlet's father poisoned. And recently I could only watch the last segment of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, having to skip that scene in which Nurse Ratchet achieves her final and lobotomizing victory over that free spirit played by Jack Nicholson. And now, today, watching Disgrace, based on the novel by the great writer John Coetzee, I had to skip the section in which the fallen professor is attacked and his daughter raped by three local black men, as it would have been too distressing. This aversion is not restricted to drama and films but includes some works of nonfiction. Each night now I read ten pages of Armenian Golgotha, a firsthand account by a priest in the Armenian Apostolic Church of the genocide of the Armenians in Turkey, which was carried out in the years 1915-1918. I do feel I owe it to my poor father to better understand that period, and the priest's account, more than any other I have read, bears witness to the carrying out of the plan for the extermination of the Armenian race within the borders of Turkey by a secret government council. My father was a boy of fourteen in Constantinople when the roundup of the professionals and intellectuals in the Armenian community began in that city in 1915. Among those taken away was the priest himself. It's hard to explain, Celeste, but a while back I experienced a great desire to visualize the streets of Constantinople in that time and an equally great longing to be there. A whole new dimension of existence seemed to be opening and calling me beyond the borders, the confines, of this America that is all I have ever known. The heritage I had turned from and even derided now had meaning for me. In any case, the book provides a glimmer of understanding of that lost world. Now and then, through the years, I have heard the term “anti-Semitic Jew.” In reality, can such a person truly exist? You might say so, Celeste, were Hitler himself a Jew, or others in the Nazi Party. Or if some Jew today wrote vile treatises on Jews in general that contained crude and vulgar generalizations about the physical and moral characteristics of Jews akin to that produced by the Nazi propagandists, you might say so. But I have never read or heard of such a treatise by a Jew. So let us say that such a person could exist in theory and leave doubt as to his actual existence. But can we also say the same holds true for Armenians, that is, seriously doubt the existence of such a creature as the anti-Armenian Armenian? No, we cannot, we must categorically say. And why do we suddenly adopt such a tone of certitude, you now ask, Celeste? Because you are talking to one. That is why. If the Turks couldn't complete the job, then I would, or at least continue the devilish work of messengers such as Ismail Enver Pasha and Mehmet Talaat Pasha of the Ittihadist Party. That is the reality I must live with. In word if not in deed I have been involved in the further butchering of my father's own people. And how have I done so? My personal extermination campaign began with the negation of my own father. At an early age I denied him out of my existence by deciding I was the child of one parent, and one parent only, that being my mother. This is old territory. Suffice it to say a characterization of Armenians as hairy rodents is not an incitement to racial pride. Even as we speak, however, awareness of my own exaggerating tendencies comes to me. The real injury has been less to the Armenian remnant than to me. After all, why should they care how some lost soul who is not even a full-blooded Armenian characterizes their race? Odar, they see me as. The outsider. To be Armenian on my father's side but not on my mother's means not to be an Armenian at all.

Celeste, I believe it is the ever longer shadow of eternity that compels these concerns about my father, things Armenian, and the past in general. It may be that we will meet again and that I will have to answer to him. Of course, you might say, he will have to answer to me as well, though I do wonder if I would have many questions for him. I imagine they would be of the historical kind. What happened in 1915 that he and his family were not taken away? Yes, I have heard the story that the Turkish authorities came to the family home and that a Turkish servant saved the family members' lives by asserting to these authorities that they were not home. But would the authorities not have returned at another time? I would want to know more about his father and mother. Was his father a businessman? How many brothers and sisters did he have, and what were their fates? About one such brother I have a vague understanding that he vanished during World War I, but was he one of those led away on a death march into the deserts of Der Zor? What school did my father attend in Constantinople?

Family photos are stored in the back of my walk-in closet, Celeste, including a number of my father after he married my mother. No photos of his earlier life are available. I don't often look at them, and the one time I hung a portrait of my mother and father, I soon had to take it down. Why? Because suddenly, I felt the weight of them upon me. They took away the present and left me with only the past and the crushing realization that I have not served them well with the life I have been leading. It is one thing to revisit the past in my mind and another to see a visual image of those who gave me life on the wall of my apartment; the effect was entirely overwhelming.

***

Though I had the necessary number of credits for graduation by the end of the spring semester, I had decided to return to school in the fall and take a full load of courses. My hope was to raise my grade point average to make myself a more attractive candidate for law school. That summer I purchased a Law School Admission Test preparation book. Perhaps if I familiarized myself with the exam beforehand, the LSAT wouldn't turn out to be the debacle the SAT had been.

“You must understand there is a voice in you that tells lies. It says you cannot succeed, but you must not listen to that voice,” Dr. Dressler said. “You must understand that voice is in all of us and tells us to turn our faces to the wall and die.”

I thought back to Mr. Arbuckle, my ninth grade algebra teacher, and the assertion he made to the class that the SAT was as important, or more important, than our entire high school transcript. He then added that we either had the ability to do well on the SAT or we didn't, and no amount of preparation would help us one iota. As I have already mentioned in My Path to Greatness, I thought he was speaking directly to me and took his message to heart.

The money I had accumulated gave me a sense of well-being and security I had been seeking my entire life. Since beginning my adventure at the renting office the previous fall, I had been amassing a cash reserve. Under my dresser were bulging envelopes stuffed with tens and twenties.

That summer I opened savings accounts at several midtown banks, depositing equal amounts in each of them. I had some naive idea that deposits of cash in different banks would be less noticeable to the IRS than one large amount in one bank. At this time I also opened a checking account at the Chase Manhattan Bank, right up the block, on Fifty-sixth Street and Tenth Avenue. While this sad and forlorn branch did not seem long for this world, nevertheless this was the Chase Manhattan Bank, well known as an industry leader. I can't tell you the time I spent just staring at the pale blue checks with my name on them.

Celeste, some quality of light entered my life when I moved into that little incense-scented apartment. Oh, that light had been there before, but now it seemed to burn brighter. But yes, there were a few rainstorms amid all this intense sunlight. The circumstance of joy was not entirely uninterrupted.

One thing to note is that I don't possess a psychopathic personality. Where I have done wrong I will experience the effect. There are no airtight chambers in my mind where I may freely and endlessly seal away the awareness of harms done. That said, in the matter of this renting office enterprise, I did generally take money without qualms. But then there were those occasions when, in the night, I would wake with the need to pee and see, there in the darkness, with utter clarity the lowness of this shady enterprise. In such instances would I be defenseless against the truth. Trembling, I would pray for the return of sleep.

"Suppose I were to be caught? Would I be sent to prison?" I asked Dr. Dressler.

"That could happen. But would it be such a bad thing?" she replied.

“What are you talking about?”

“Are you not in prison now?”

“Stop it,” I said.

“Many people find their freedom in prison. Malcolm X would be one such person.”

“What do you know about prison?” I challenged.

“I know a great deal. In fact, I even have the keys.”

“What do you mean, you have the keys?”

“I have done work in the prisons.”

“What kinds of work?”

“Psychiatric evaluations.”

Now at the time, Celeste, these were provoking words in my ears. They revealed Dr. Dressler to have a soul as black as her tinted hair and to be little more than an apparatchik of the state in full alignment with its power, like hideous Nurse Ratchet. And the slight smile of satisfaction that played on her face as she spoke simply confirmed her punitive, even sadistic disposition. My analyst was nothing more than an agent of repression.

In that moment was she my sister Vera, calling on the power of the state—my father—to demolish me.

Speaking of my sister, she appeared to be doing well in this time. She had graduated from the SEEK remedial program and was now enrolled in night school at CCNY. Her name could easily have been Vera Persevera, as perseverance was her long suit. She would have done Dr. Dressler proud by exemplifying the kind of person who does not let the voice of doubt and negativity stop her. Vera displayed peasant fortitude. Like my mother, she just kept marching forward, taking life's difficulties as they came. If she was merely a night school student at CCNY, she did not see it in this way. She made no comparison of herself with high-flying Barnard girls or the like. She was where she was and let's get on with it. No laughing thing in her, no self-loathing. What I am telling you is that the girl had a great hunger. And in truth she had shown this hunger at an early age, being early wedded to books such as Charlotte's Web, which she read perhaps twenty times.

But life was not entirely easy for her. After all, she was in her blood and bones a Garatdjian.

Because money was tight, she rented the room I had vacated in Roberto's apartment and for some months had she been living there under somewhat harrowing circumstances. Roberto's communications with the greats of rock were ever increasing, and there were many invitations to join him in these concerts just beyond the walls of the apartment. "He has taken to wearing dark sunglasses all the time. They give him the appearance of a giant bug. And always with that smile, as if he has no awareness of the pain he is sitting on," she said.

Celeste, to be honest it surprised me to hear Vera express concern for Roberto, as I had come to the notion that her agenda called for driving others down. A bit of schadenfreude was apparent in her, at least to my eye, as when she said of Roddy Blakely, "He will have to be on medications for the rest of his life. He's finished. Kaput." It is not attractive when we take delight, or at least comfort, in the misfortunes of others. This tendency, I should note, was sometimes seen in my mother as well, as when she would inquire anxiously about Sarah's family.

"Are they very educated people?" she would ask.

"Sarah's father holds a doctorate in history and her mother is a graduate of Radcliffe College, which is a sister college to Harvard," I said.

"I see. Then they must have very fine minds."

"They're OK," I said.

"How many of them are there?" she asked.

"Sarah has two sisters and a brother," I said.

"And you say they live on Riverside Drive?"

"Yes."

"And their apartment. Is it very nice?"

"It is pretty nice," I said. Love must have its place in this world, Celeste. We can't be barbarians with those we profess to love. By not saying, "Their apartment is fabulous, and Camp would put the Garden of Eden to shame," I was protecting my mother. Protecting her from what, you ask? From the world she said she did not want but was not of one mind about. Anyone who esteems "fine minds," as she did, cannot be of one mind about the world. What son wouldn't want to shield his mother from the reality that other parents had it better than her in this world and that their children had turned out better as well? My mother was never far from her sorrow or her tears. And so she was risking pain when she inquired about the lives of others and had to hear that the world had not turned away the Van Dines as it had turned us away. Not even God could protect her from the anguish she experienced on hearing that the Van Dines were doing just fine. I do not mean that she collapsed in despair or let out a loud groan. It is only that the anxiety evident in her face as she asked these questions was replaced with a frown when the answers were given. All reward was promised in the next life, not in this one, which was a vale of tears, and never more so than for those who lived without the Christ Jesus. And surely the Van Dines, with the fine minds they possessed, were not of the Christ Jesus kind.

My mother's disposition toward the success of others was entirely understandable, Celeste. No mother deserves bums such as her children turned out to be. Dirty, temperamental bums is what we were. Take the broom and sweep us all away. That was my mentality.

This is not monstrosity I am describing. We are talking about a human being, my mother, who was love herself. She did not do a victory dance when I gave her the news of Lenore's death. She was genuinely sad at the destruction of a young life. You must not think otherwise. You mustn't.

How to express one's love for his mother. Even when I try, I fail. And for this I suspect I may pay in eternity.

An incident occurred early in the summer of 1969, Celeste, during my shift at the renting office. Mr. Fitzpatrick had just paid his nightly visit in which, not for the first time, he expressed doubt about my fitness to be behind the grille, when who appeared but Vera. She offered no greeting, only a pained expression, as she fished in her big bag.

Finally she pulled from it a folded receipt book, which she shoved at me. "I found this behind the bookshelf in my room in Roberto's apartment, you creep," she said, and disappeared.

She had come to me with the element of surprise and riding a wave of moral superiority. As when we were children at that Bible camp in the Catskills and she said she was embarrassed to have me as a brother after I had been caught boosting loads of candy, so now was she again disassociating herself from me. The weight of her disapproval was hard enough to bear, but I was terror-struck that the scam itself was now in danger. Would she tell my mother, who then would come to me with her look of sorrow and unbearable sadness that she should have to add a thieving son to her list of misfortunes?

But the worst did not happen. Vera did not race up the stairs and into my mother's second-floor apartment and expose me to one and all in the family. She fled back out into the street. Later that evening I called Vera and she agreed to meet with me. Over coffee in a diner, I told her that I had been experiencing anxieties about money, going back to the previous fall and my arrest and the expense of hiring a lawyer. I told her the truth, or a truth, that I was tired of our family turning over wheelbarrows full of money to Simon Weill when the money didn't belong to him. I said I was only taking as much I needed to get by, which wasn't quite true.

I may have sold Vera short, Celeste. She may have had more loyalty to me than I was given to credit her as possessing. Her judgmental demeanor was gone, and for the hour we spent together we sat peaceably as brother and sister. In that brief time a glimmer of understanding came to me, as it would now and then, what it could be to have a sister.

But there may have been another reason for my sister's forbearance, and a subsequent development would seem to reveal that reason. Within a couple of weeks, the renting office had another mother's little helper on those evenings when I wasn't there, and it was none other than Vera herself. Evidently, I had shown her the path forward, and just as evidently, she saw that path not in the light of corruption but of liberation. Of course, how much she was appropriating for herself, if anything, is not for me to say.

At this point, Celeste, you may ask, why it was that Vera and I couldn't have gone to our mother and asked for a specific hourly rate? Well, we could have, perhaps, but this rooming house operation was not a normal business. My mother was in the employ of Hedberg, Inc., Auntie Eve's corporation. I believe she was on the books as earning a weekly salary of eighty dollars, or thereabouts, and had not received a raise in years. Clearly, she could not support herself and the family on such an income, and so she took what additional money she needed from the rents paid by the tenants, which is exactly what I was doing. But why do things in such a fashion, you may also ask? Why wouldn't my mother be on record as making a salary more in line with her actual needs? Here I will have to say I don't have the answer, but my guess is that she was afraid to ask for more. Afraid of what? Afraid that her enhanced salary would come to the attention of Simon Weill and he would find a way to remove her. Yes, I suspect the abysmally low salary was her way of appearing undemanding and cowed and served as well as an indicator of her low self-esteem.

My mother was ruled by the fear of wholesale displacement. Where would we Garatdjians go if we were expelled from the apartment and those rooms my siblings occupied? As I have previously reported, she would say, “Simon Weill can have us on the street like this. Like this,” snapping, or trying to snap, her fingers for emphasis.

And so she couldn't ask for what was hers; she had to take it by other means.

The Summer of Love had its share of tribulation for our family. Naomi, my second oldest sister, had grown big with child. The child she was carrying was not her husband Chuck's but that of a man with the improbable name Caswick Cheerio. Naomi was at pains to tell me, at every opportunity, that this Caswick fellow was a real man. Putting aside the predictable inference that I was not a real man—for every real man there must surely be a faux man—Naomi was simply asserting that a robust physique and a face set off by a square jaw compelled the perception of a manly sort. “I like a man with some meat on his bones,” Naomi said, words she used to describe her husband Chuck as well. With such testimony as to its importance, some might be fooled into concluding that the carnival of flesh we find here on this earth must be taken seriously, and must further note that women are in the market as keenly as men. This matter of female sexuality was not an easy one for me to embrace, given the virtual divinity that attached to my mother. All my life it had been a struggle for me to believe that women truly enjoy sex rather than endure it as their gift to men, and utterances such as my sister's were not the convincers that I needed.

Chuck was well into his fifties by this time, being twenty years older than Naomi, and all that boozing had sapped his sexual drive. Naomi had also taken to asserting that

Chuck had a liking for little boys. Impotence and pedophilia she cited as reasons for Chuck ignoring her amorously, and to give herself cause for a dalliance with this Chadwick, who lived just down the hall. He was close to Naomi in age. He may have been a drunk. Men in their mid-thirties living alone in roach-ridden rooms often are. In any case, Chadwick offered Naomi love of the kind that comes to a woman who sleeps into the early afternoon and has a runaway adolescent daughter, Jeanne having shed her Episcopal school blue jumper and heeded the call of the hippie horde. Whatever Chadwick lacked, his apparatus was in working order sufficient to make Naomi big with child, and by the summer of 1969, this infant, whom she had named Robert, was approaching the terrible twos, and mainly in the care of my mother, who soon made arrangements for his adoption by a Christian family living just across the Hudson River in New Jersey.

And what of Luke in this time? He had complexity of his own kind going on. The stillness of morning, well into which he slumbered, unless woken by the pounding of my importuning mother, would by early afternoon be broken by the loud sound of the Rolling Stones or some other addictive noisemakers. He was living with a woman named Brenda by now. She was the wife of Lenny Cerone, Luke's best friend. Lenny was looking increasingly dilapidated, as I have previously noted. He was no longer snorting heroin but mainlining it, and his rich tan had faded to prison pallor. Brenda was fed up with his unreliable ways. She needed a man who would provide security for her and their baby boy, not someone who was hustling to scrape together the bread for his daily fix. So she left him for Luke, who offered her and Benjy a rent-free accommodation in the penthouse.

Luke had had his eye on Brenda for some time and did not mind moving in on another man's territory. Qualms of conscience were for others. Even when Lenny raised up and denounced him in a confrontation on the street, calling him a backstabbing creep, Luke was able to dismiss the invective as the ranting of someone whose trouble was of his own making.

Brenda's hedonistic makeup, her "let's get it on" tendencies, made her a good match for Luke. She was younger than him by a few years and brought some baggage, including a reform school background and an alcoholic father who had shown less than parental restraint in her growing up years. Though she was clearly vain about her looks, she never wore a skirt or a dress. Always she appeared in jeans or slacks. Knock knees or thick ankles may have compelled her to cover up.

On the wall she would tape lingerie ads and ask me to critique the bras and panties sleek models appeared in. Such inquiries had a way of charging the atmosphere. Sex was the domain in which she could exert her power, and the amused smile on her face as I pondered my answer suggested she knew as much.

A pattern established itself. Luke would abuse Brenda and she would take off. The boy, Benjy, she would leave with her mother, who lived two blocks away. Several times that summer I visited Luke only to find him sitting alone in the dark drinking wine out of a mug. His pain at such times would be such that alcohol was his only solace. How depressing to see that we had the exact same emotional wiring. The girl left and we could neither eat nor sleep.

After each row, Luke would send me out to look for Brenda. I was unable to refuse him. At the same time, I had no faith that my search operation would be a success. The problem wasn't finding her. She hung out in a luncheonette up on One Hundred Twenty-Second Street and Broadway with a group of Irish guys she knew from her school days. Whether she was engaging sexually with one or the other of these young men or simply seeking the refuge of their company, I had no idea. She would sit with me at a booth while the guys stayed with themselves at the counter. They were rough types, quick to use their fists, but they saw no occasion for that with the likes of me, given my emaciation and crazy hair.

"Your brother is a pig. He doesn't deserve to live with anyone," Brenda said, for the few minutes we were alone.

"Yes," I said.

"I don't have to live with a pig. Do you understand?"

"I do," I said.

"He should be more like you. Nice."

"I'm not always so nice," I said.

"I can't imagine you not being nice."

"He's hurting. He misses you," I said.

"Let him hurt. Let him miss me. The big ape."

He hadn't paid enough, Brenda was saying. She would need to deal him some more pain by continuing her absence. It was all very understandable, very familiar, to me. On that same block had lived Jane Thayer, my high school girlfriend. How distraught

I would be when she would break off with me and take up with another boy. I was too young for such emotional involvement, much too young. I fell into a hole I couldn't get out of. And then I met Sarah Van Dine. And then I met you.

Celeste, if some would choose to see Luke as being caught in a vortex of moral turpitude, I do not. He had an appetite for life and made some impulsive choices, but he was simply trying to find his way. Yes, he appropriated the girlfriends or wives of others for his own needs, but he was only taking advantage of opportunities that life had presented him with. One thing he did not do was appropriate other people's money. Driven by lust he may have been, but he was not a thief. He did not question me as to why I was in the renting office or adopt an attitude of suspicion. Why? Because he couldn't see in me a character deficiency that wasn't in him. He had a conscience that would have prevented him from such underhanded activity as I was engaged with.

But there was another whose attitude was one of cynical knowingness in regard to my renting office service. That was Jerry Jones-Nobleonian, my closest childhood friend. He was on the fringes of my life by now, Celeste, and what little contact I had with him was awkward and unsettling. His appearance was unsightly owing to the pinkish blotches on his otherwise copper-cored skin. The blemish had been caused by an allergic reaction to penicillin, as he explained it, and was visible on his face and hands. In fact, it covered his whole body. The one seeming benefit of this disfigurement was a quick discharge from the United States Army when it was found that his fellow recruits were merciless with their hazing of him in boot camp.

Back in high school I had let myself into the renting office before bars were placed on the window, and had helped myself to fifty dollars. Jerry Jones-Nobleonian had served as a lookout on that day. From there we had gone to a bordello in Spanish Harlem. An eventful day, and one he remembered when he said to me that summer, "Is the fox looking after the chickens?" Lenny Cerone had long since replaced me as Jerry's best friend. Like Lenny, Jerry was developing a heroin habit, and I worried that one day Jerry would turn to the renting office for easy money, as he remembered me doing those years before.

Celeste, it did amaze me, in those days, that I could grow indifferent toward those I had once loved and been inseparable from. After only the most superficial conversation with Jerry I would move on.

The Woodstock Music Festival was held that August, and Sarah and I were there for the third day of the event. The sky was overcast, with rain falling on and off. By then the grass on Max Yasgur's farm had been worn away and the slopes a muddy mess on which strung-out kids, hungry and unwashed and wearing the wet clothes they had come in, milled about. Country Joe and the Fish, raspy-voiced Richie Havens, and Santana performed, placing themselves at risk of electrocution on a stage loaded with amps and speakers and other gear. A stupid and ugly day. The physical discomfort had us longing for the amenities of camp, and so we lasted a few hours before fleeing.

“You have a lot in you. You should do something with your life,” the girl said to me. Her name was Nadia. I had become friends with her through frequent contact coming in and out of the building where we both lived. She was a pretty, dark-haired girl with a troubled past. Put up for adoption at an early age, she lived with her foster parents for some years, but the abusive tendencies of her new father drove her away. She fled from the small town in Wisconsin where she had been raised to Milwaukee, where she found friends to look after her. Several of those years she lived in an attic, she said, hardly seeing anyone. At eighteen she came to New York to study ballet. She got by working as a waitress.

Her remark sounded like a judgment. What I heard her say was that I wasn't doing anything with my life and should try to change that sad state of affairs. I felt like a nonentity, a cipher, in her eyes. And yet, had I not given her the facts of my life, that I was a student at CCNY and headed for law school? Wasn't that doing something with my life?

What I couldn't see was that law school, for Nadia, wasn't really life. It did not impress her. She did not understand the law or its significance. And she may have recognized that I didn't either. She was a girl who lived for her art and had the tortured toes and feet of a dancer to show for it. We became intimate. To say we were lovers would be to exaggerate. In bed as in general, she negated me. When we lay together, it was as if she didn't feel me. She said as much. Her heart was with the pianist at her dance classes, an older man who elicited feelings she did not experience when thinking of other men. She had been dealt an injury. That is what I see now, remembering back to her sexual passivity. She had been talking about herself, I suspect. She was the one with a lot in her; a lot she couldn't look at.

I did not value Nadia, not in the way a human being should value another. I dismissed her. She had her roots in the poverty of a nation renowned for nothing but obscurity. Rumania. Men and women with metal teeth feeding on the toxic waste of their Soviet rulers. Such currents of thought were dangerous, I understood. They could not go unchecked. The attitude of Lydia and Claire that drove them to identify me with their Estonian maid was there in me as well. All my life I have wanted to be an American, which means that all my life I have been chasing an illusion.

I did not keep Sarah a secret from Nadia. There seemed no need, as Nadia had no more attachment to me than I did to her. It had already been established that her only love was the Rumanian piano teacher, about whom she had such intense fantasies. And yet an uneasy feeling could surface hearing myself mention Sarah's name. What was this investment I had in her? What in fact was our relationship? Had I made it all up?

Sarah had given me a painting, a nude self-portrait. It hung on my wall, unframed. The painting was bold, even shocking. It showed her with pale and doughy flesh. She stared out at the viewer in a pose of full-frontal nudity, her palms up and on her face an expression of defiance. Could she not have kept her clothes on? What was she saying?

Whatever its effect on me, the painting's impact on Nadia was visible and startling. She looked like a woman who had stepped on a live wire. When I asked for her reaction, she made no reply, but it was there in her face. The painting had visibly jolted her. Celeste, we have no need to conjecture what meaning the painting may have had for her even if, in some way, we are tempted to say that it brought her painful past to life in some way.

In this period, some aspiration for eternity had surfaced in me. Luke, as I have mentioned, had given me the Rolleiflex, but I began to long for a smaller, sleeker camera and now had the means to buy one. I purchased a new Nikon F with a standard 50 mm lens and, when that was not enough, added a 35mm lens, an 80 mm portrait lens, and a 105 mm lens.

Nadia allowed me to photograph her naked in her apartment. I was surprised, given her reaction to Sarah's painting. No great amount of persuasion was needed for her to disrobe. The photograph was taken with natural light only, and showed her reflection in a mirror as she sat in a chair leaning forward and looking beautiful but sad.

These cameras and accessories were not good for me, as I did not relate to them properly. I would become more obsessed with the object itself than the task it was designed to perform. Hours I would spend marveling at the exquisite manufacture of the lenses and the body rather than taking pictures. Before too long, the urge to purchase more equipment would come over me.

Possibly the idea had taken hold that art was a refuge from intelligence and drew on other qualities in one's being. How disturbing to learn that spatial relationships and all elements of composition were problems requiring intelligence for a solution, and that the rich blacks and whites and shades of gray in the prints of the masters were not by chance but by design. There was a science of photography Edward Weston had mastered with his zone system. He had even devised a light meter to take readings of the light. And of course I bought the light meter and quickly grew intimidated by the technical aspects of the photographic process and the same thoughts that defeated me in that calculus course now were beating me down.

Celeste, let's be honest. People like me should not attach themselves to cameras or stereo equipment. We should not own bicycles and certainly not gas-powered vehicles. We should, at most, be allowed a box of pencils and pads of paper and a library card. College should be out of the question, as all higher learning is lost on us. Such jobs as we hold should require simple tasks. Feats of engineering, the marvels of science, award-winning literature, excellence in any field of endeavor are beyond our capacity. We must, for our happiness, find a park bench to sit on in the warm sun and simply stare at the passersby.

If it wasn't enough that the camera gear gave me a sense of incompetence, I soon responded to an ad in Buy-Lines and bought an upright piano. My mother had paid for piano lessons for me as a child, but I was not diligent and soon lost interest. However, this was a different time in my life, one in which, now that I had some means, I sought to improve myself. Once a week I would come in the morning to the apartment of a man who was bleary-eyed from the excesses of the night before and in need of strong black coffee to bring him to a state of alertness. For an hour I would sit at his gleaming grand piano and simply "play," as he put it, with the keys. A graduate of Yale and the Juilliard School of Music, he was a gifted man who did not believe in imposing a formal structure of learning. Rather, through experimentation and improvisation, I would find my way into a relationship with the instrument. His manner was casual and cool, endlessly patient, even though from one lesson to the next I made no progress.

At home, sitting at my upright, I found myself imprisoned by intense self-consciousness, unable to press down on the keys for fear that my neighbors would hear me butchering one piece of music or another and erupt in riotous laughter. The paralysis shocked me, and yet I could do nothing to free myself of it. At one point I cried at the unshakeable power of this shame. It seemed to have a personality, a malignant one. This fear of ridicule, it can be a potent force.

The unexpected happened that fall. Sarah did not return to Boston. Instead, she chose to stay at Camp. She had the guest house winterized so she could use it as her studio when the cold weather came. She said she needed a break from the Boston Museum School but offered no further explanation. A second surprise followed. Her father would not be returning to New York City with Lydia. Instead, he too would stay at Camp for the winter. Sarah had already made her decision when he let his be known. Lydia had decided she still needed some time apart. He wasn't happy about the circumstance, but the alternative, which Lydia had pressed, was for him to get his own apartment, and that was a step he was unwilling to take. Peter was once again a frightened man, in middle age facing the prospect of stepping out into the world on his own and earning a living, when his only income as an adult had been the pay he received from the United States Air Force.

Peter's anxiety was in a sense my own. I too had a terrible fear I could not make it in the world. Along with greed, was that not why I had situated myself in the renting office? And I had concern for Sarah. What did it mean for her school life that she would be away from Boston for the semester?

But Sarah's only concern was her father. "This is my worst nightmare, that someday my mother would dump my father on me and make me take care of him. She has wanted to do this all along," Sarah said.

"Why do you say that?"

"Don't be fooled. My mother wants sex, and my father, even with his elephant trunk cock, can't or won't give it to her. She is hungry."

It brought me no happiness to see Sarah sequestering herself from life in the snowbound mountains. You should not think so, Celeste. I had seen enough hiding from life to recognize the peril that came with retreat. The building where my family lived was sufficiently compelling evidence against such an approach to existence. I needed for her to be strong, regardless what that strength might mean for our relationship. It would not do if she were to begin to tell herself the lies that my siblings Luke and Naomi were telling themselves.

"I'll go back to Boston in February. I just need a break," Sarah said, when I expressed my concern.

Her father's depression was a burden. No child likes to feel she has to carry a parent. At night, in the adjoining bedroom, she would hear him groan, the barbiturates he regularly took unable to induce a restful sleep. More than a few times he fell with a thud to the floor, and she would have to revive him and get him back to bed. Her father's fragile condition caused her to wonder if he might go under. The denuded trees and the heavy snows that came as fall passed to winter only added to the bleakness. The nightmare she had dreaded had come to be.

The photographs I took were of poor quality. Those of Sarah had too much foreground. It was not an uncommon mistake. Every day I would see some husband or boyfriend snap the shutter as he stood ten feet from his beloved. Some days later they would be staring at an image that showed the woman in only a small portion of the print. In trying to get too much in—the loved one's full body as well as the surroundings—they had gotten nothing. The answer was a simple one. Move closer. And yet I didn't.

Was it possible that the distance in the photos was also there in our relationship? Were we far away from each other even as I chose to believe we were close? What I can only say again is that Sarah had my heart even as I looked elsewhere for sexual experience.

One sunny but cool afternoon I found a girl with golden hair, a tall striking girl in jeans and a brown suede jacket walking north through the memorial arch away from Washington Square Park. She was fine with having coffee with me, she said, when I approached, and afterward I walked her home. Along the way I kissed her and she kissed me back. A state of blissful wonder that I could meet such a girl on the streets of New York City stayed with me for the rest of the evening.

All that fall and winter I saw the girl, whose name was Addy. She had come to the city from Morristown, New Jersey, to study at Cooper Union. Her enrollment at the school could only mean she had high intelligence and scintillating College Board scores, and so an inevitable line of thinking came to dominate my consciousness in relation to her. All my low numbers were there, in blazing neon, in my mind. How appalled she would have been if she had been made aware of those numbers. With a shudder of revulsion, how quickly dismissive of me she would have been. People need to stay with their own kind, Celeste. Their own kind. If they are stupid and lacking in talent, they need to go where the stupid ones go. And yet I couldn't, and so I had to endure the terrible beating my mind inflicted for those moments of pleasure I could have with her.

We kissed a lot that fall. Deep, long kisses they were, the kind that generally lead to something more. But there was no more, not with Addy. She would brake my hand if it began to wander. There was a boyfriend back in Morristown whom she had been going with since high school. She was supposed to come back to him when she finished her course of studies at Cooper Union. This boyfriend drove a Corvette. His father had built up a thriving real estate business, and now the son was a principal in the business. "You don't know Ed," she said. "He could stop by any minute. He likes making surprise visits." By now she was having me over to her apartment in a doorman building in Union Square.

Does this sound familiar, Celeste? Does it? I represented the freedom the poor girl could achieve. I was her walk on the wild side.

The day came in late January 1970 that Sarah packed her possessions and returned to Boston, as she had said she would, while her father maintained his winter exile. She took an apartment right around the corner from her school, and within a week some new difficulty began. For two consecutive evenings I could not reach her. Had she reconnected with Carlton? I had a series of dreams about him, all of them similar, in which I was on the landing directly outside his apartment. He never appeared in these dreams, as if, even in the sleep state, any image of him would prove too punishing. They were not unhappy dreams, the kind one awakes from with relief. A feeling of longing permeated them, as if there was something I was seeking on the other side of the door. Was it possible I was seeking not Sarah but Carlton himself, seeking, that is, the autonomy of his life and the status Harvard Law School had conferred on him?

Addy's Ed and I had the common bond of bondage to our family's businesses smothering the flame of life in us even as we held onto the blond goddesses in whom we had invested our dream of a new life.

At this point, Celeste, I once again swung into action. My heart in Sarah's hand, I had no choice but to board the Eastern Airlines shuttle one night. Several hours later I was in Boston, and saw a light burning in her window as I entered the building. This time I had no key, as she hadn't offered me one, and so I knocked. She was quick in answering.

"I was expecting you," she said. "Did you come to kill me, to rape me? What's your business tonight, mister?" Bullets were flying from her mouth. Altogether she was different. Her hair was shorter, bowl-cut, a blond version of black-haired Lenore. She had also lost weight. The package she presented, even with her defiance, was attractive. Sexy, androgynous.

“You didn’t answer the phone. I grew worried. I didn’t know what was happening.”

“Didn’t you?”

“What is happening?”

“My life is happening. That’s what is happening.”

“What is that supposed to mean?”

“It means I’m seeing someone.”

“That Harvard Law School man?” I asked, not wanting to say his name in front of her, as in my dreams I could not give him a face.

“No,” she said, with seeming disgust.

“Then who?”

“If you weren’t so stupid I would try to explain. You know that you are stupid, don’t you, standing there with your mouth hanging open?”

“Maybe. I don’t seem to know anything anymore.”

“Lane. I’m seeing Lane. The school genius. He comes up here and fucks me and then he leaves. He wants me as his little whore. I’m now on his list with all the other cunts at the school.”

“I don’t understand.”

“I held him off as long as I could.”

“Held him off?”

“He’s been pursuing me ever since I came to this school. He’s the reason I stayed at Camp in September. I was afraid I couldn’t keep resisting him.”

“You make him sound like he’s some inevitable force.”

“Once you’re exposed to genius, you’re not the same. You can’t just close your door against it and you can’t hide out in the country from it. It will find you again and again and again.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“You pretend not to but you do.”

She was right, Celeste. I did understand. All my life I have been bowing down to those above me, at least in my thoughts. You must remember my mother’s expressed regard for those with fine minds, a circle of exclusivity she did not place herself in. And this Lane was certainly one worthy of such a ranking. I had seen him only that one time, as Sarah and I were coming out of the Brattle Theatre, in Cambridge, but that was enough for me to sense his specialness.

I stayed with her that night. She did not ask me to leave, and I did not have the wherewithal to leave when morning came. We went over to Cambridge that evening, where my pain got the better of me and I insisted she stop seeing this genius boyfriend, as I came to refer to him, no more able to say his name than I could that of Carlton.

“Go home. Drop dead. Do whatever you need to do, but leave me alone,” she screamed.

I stood in the slushy snow by the newsstand across from the Harvard Coop. Celestas she streaked off in her green parka. Acute self-consciousness kept me in place.

“What’s the matter, buddy? You can’t take a hint? The girl don’t want a creep like you,” the vendor said, his hands blackened by the ink from the papers he had been handling all day. I heard the rough, brutal justice of the street in the man’s voice and crossed the street slowly. When I was a block away and reasonably sure I wasn’t being followed by the vendor and a posse of the righteous, I broke into a run and caught up with her a short distance away.

The sight of me threw her into a state of terror. “Are you here to kill me? Where’s your knife. Which pocket? Bring it out, motherfucker. Bring it out. Stab me in the heart with it, why don’t you? Help me. Someone help me. Please, please.” She snagged two Harvards coming from the dorms, the kind with short hair and the ability to live within their own dimensions. “Please, please. He wants to hurt me. He’s insane. Just hold him here so I can get away. Please. Please.”

“What’s going on?” said one, wearing a crimson-colored sweatshirt to designate that he had been chosen as he looked from her to me.

“He has a knife. He’s come to hurt me. Please hold him or get the police,” she said, and tore off across the street.

“Do you have a knife?” the young man asked, turning to me.

“No,” I said quietly, needing to win their trust.

They moved on, not being the kind to go where they did not belong or make unfounded assumptions as to who I was, unless it was that my world was not their and never would be.

I returned to the Hayes Bickford that night. I thought I would pass a few hours and then head out to the airport, as I had the previous spring when I made my first surprise visit to Boston and discovered Sarah with Carlton. Once again I was grateful for a public place where I could have shelter and sit and drink coffee and smoke cigarettes. Things were pretty haywire in my mind, Celeste. I had found refuge for my body but not from my mind. Oh, the humiliation. There was nothing to do but to live with it.

My thoughts turned to a high school classmate. Michael had come to the Claremont School in the middle of tenth grade. The principal, Mr. Horst-Lehman, had asked me to extend myself to Michael, who lived with his father several blocks away. Michael's mother had died the year before from cervical cancer. His father had sold the home in New Jersey and moved with Michael to the Upper West Side. But I was unable to follow through on Mr. Horst-Lehman's request. If Tom Smits, my one friend at the school, didn't know where I lived, how was I to extend myself to Michael or anyone else? Michael adapted quickly enough, finding his own circle of friends. I remember him remarking that the stellar students in our class wouldn't have stood out in the Bergen County public school he had attended. I remember him bursting into the assembly room one April day and shouting, over and over, "I got in. I got in. I got in to Harvard. I don't believe it. I got into Harvard." That kind of joy is something you get to live with for the rest of your life, that moment in time when doors fly open and a life of untold accomplishment and fulfillment is clearly promised. We remember those days, Celeste. We certainly do, the separation of the winners from the losers, the chosen from those not chosen.

Following the commencement ceremony that spring, I got a call from Michael. He and a few classmates were at his apartment having a beer. Michael wanted me to join them. I said I would be right over, but I didn't follow through. I knew where I belonged by then. I had always known where I belonged.

This kind of self-pity, this sense of separation, can only be addressed spiritually. There must be a full reconstruction. We are not talking about a car being brought into the body shop for a new fender. The hood must be popped and a master mechanic must revitalize the engine. A reconstruction is in order.

Celeste, the truth was that I was all right back then. I had gotten into some colleges: Colby, Gettysburg, Franklin and Marshall. But I hadn't gotten into Michael's college, Harvard, or any of the other top-tier colleges to which many of my classmates were headed. And the College Boards had exposed me as underweight. All my clothes had been stripped from me and in front of thousands, millions. I had been forced to stand naked in the poverty of my endowment. The proximity of Michael's building to my own and the fear, even with high school now about to be behind me, that he and the others would find out where I lived and put their laughing thing on me, as well as shame at my lowly academic status, compelled me to stay away. But there was one thing more, and that was to punish, to say a loud fuck you to all those who had hurt me by beating me in the game of life. The only tool I had at hand was to absent myself, to disappear at them.

What was the missing ingredient? Quite simply, it was humility, or the lack of it. Unable to accept who I was, I needed to be something more. At some point, we must come out and show ourselves as we are, Celeste. We must. We must adopt the motto of the comedian Flip Wilson's character, the great hot pants Georgette: What you see is what you get.

Now a great defeat had been imposed on me that night by my own self-will. I had gone where I didn't belong in flying up to Boston, and I would like to say it ended there, but it didn't. Over the next few months I was to make several surprise visits. Why? Because whether Sarah was a vision or a dream, I was bound to her. Her beauty, her artistic spirit, the refuge her family provided, Camp—all these things and more made her for me the symbol of America's bounty. And, in all fairness, she didn't let me go either. She would call and confide in me that the great Lane was destroying her with his greatness. The more she saw of him the less enthusiasm for her own work and for living she seemed to have. He was taking her strength and vitality, suctioning it from her body and soul, or so it seemed.

“He says you are a nobody and that you are not with me. I know you are a nobody but is it true that you are not with me as well?” she asked.

The truth may have been that she wanted to believe in me. Yes, she had it in her consciousness that I would bring her to a violent end, based on that newspaper article about the young man who stabbed to death his girlfriend when she told him she had found someone else. And yes, it was forevermore my job to prove that violence was not part of my makeup. But is it also possible that, in some degree, she wanted to believe that I couldn't live without her because on some level, she sensed that she couldn't live without me? After all, she did say, on more than one occasion, that someday I would have to take care of her, which I would have been inclined to give less credence to if she hadn't *shown antipathy toward the work world by walking out on the summer job that had been found for her after one day. She was saying that she was her father's daughter. Some things she could do and do well, but providing for herself was not one of them. Stopped here

"He sure knows a lot about me, never having met me, but I guess geniuses can do that," I said.

"He wants me to be a woman. I don't know if I can be that for him," Sarah said.

"He's got a rich daddy and is used to getting what he wants," I said.

"Don't talk that way," Sarah said.

"You talk any way you please, calling me a nobody."

"You're not a nobody."

It happened that I did meet him, on one of my unannounced visits. There he was, in the lobby of his building, in a pair of white painter's overalls, his shoulders exposed and beautifully tanned. Gone was the mod haircut that I remembered from seeing him a couple of years before. His black hair was now cut short, and parted on the side. He had no need of the fashions of the time. He was also taller, trimmer, more athletic than I had remembered him. In a state of complete passivity as he took me in with big, dark, omniscient eyes.

"I'll fight you for her," he said calmly Perhaps he remembered me from that one brief crossing of paths. Why shouldn't he have, since I so immediately identified him?

"That won't be necessary," I said, a statement more reflexive than reflective and driven more by fear than prudence. I simply sensed that he would destroy me in a fight, given his rippling muscles, and he wouldn't have made the proposal if he hadn't thought the same. In that one brief exchange did he add to my ignominy. Not only was he sleeping with my girlfriend but he had now exposed me as a coward.

Celeste, shoot-em-boy-run-runs abound on this earth, gun-toting and shirtless and muscle-flexing. With their big strong teeth and capacious mouths do they bite off people's heads. The words NO FEAR are tattooed on their brows and they are given medals for their courage. But is not courage as well living with an acceptance of our weakness, our cowardice, and going on in spite of it?

It could not have been easy for Sarah dealing with the likes of me. She had not experienced anyone with my neediness and persistence. All those phone calls. Every day, without exception, the phone ringing and ringing. The accusations, the close questioning, the oppressiveness of my fear. I had started off so generous and easy-going in those months that she had been pursuing me; thereafter a very different side emerged. Now, even two hundred forty miles away in Boston, she was aware of my shadow.

*One afternoon, during another surprise visit, I went to her school, where a girl told me she had gone to a movie in Cambridge. From the rear of the darkened theater I cast my eyes over the patrons, row by row. There she was, sitting toward the front, watching the last few minutes of that hideously depressing film Viridiana, in which the invited beggars murder their altruistic but naïve hosts. To be honest, I was disappointed that she was alone. Although the pain of her adventures inevitably overwhelmed me, there was a sexual thrill in imagining her with another man. When she emerged from the* theater and saw me standing in the sunlight, she began to cry. "I don't know what to do. You're so crazy. You're so sick. How do I get free of you?"

"This is what happens when you don't return my phone calls. Don't you understand? I get worried."

"It's you who doesn't understand. In spite of everything you're a decent person, but I don't want you anymore."

Next door to the theater was a submarine shop, a real hole in the wall. "Why can't they just call them heroes? Why do they have to be different up here in Boston? They call an oversized sandwich a submarine because it's supposed to look like a U-boat? Of course, why do they call them heroes? That makes even less sense. Just because they're big, that makes them a hero?"

"Goodbye, Luther," Sarah said, and ran off. This time I didn't chase after her. I was tired from racing here and there. All those frantic phone calls. All that horrendous anxiety. I went inside and had a ham and provolone sub, with lettuce and tomato and lots of mustard. Just the thing. Normal food, as my mother would call it. I ate half of it and headed for the airport. I didn't cry, Celeste. You don't do that when you get the punch in the face you deserve.

I took my law boards that February so I could be on schedule for my life. As I said, Celeste, I hadn't enrolled in a test prep course but I did buy a big book containing simulated exams so I had some understanding as to what to expect. As a further aid, the night before the LSAT I saw a hypnotist, who put me in a deep trance by waving a pendant in front of my eyes, just as we see in the movies. On my way home, feeling woozy, I stood back from the edge of the subway platform so I wouldn't fall on the tracks.

A second chance at life does not come often. Looking for redemption from my SAT debacle, I nevertheless set the bar fairly low. I had bought a small suitcase with a combination lock. The numbers I chose were 5-5-0. That was my goal, right there, a score of 550. Mediocre, perhaps, but acceptable to me.

Columbia had simply beaten me. I could never walk the streets of Morningside Heights without feeling that I had been cut from inferior cloth. It had been a mistake to take the SAT at Hamilton Hall, on the Columbia campus. Not wishing to repeat that same mistake with the LSAT, I traveled downtown to New York University that Saturday morning with my sharpened pencils.

Throughout the exam I was curiously calm. The SAT had been a rush to the finish line. A math problem would stymie me and I would in a panic go on to the next. If that one caused me difficulty, I also moved on. The result was that I did a lot of wild guessing. If the previous answers had been A and B, then the following one must be C. Such was the logic I had applied, unaware that it was preferable to leave a problem unanswered if I wasn't sure. Nowhere throughout the morning portion of the law school exam, which was supposed to measure verbal and quantitative aptitudes, did that same anxiety grip me, and the same held true for the achievement part of the exam in the afternoon.

*Afterward I suffered through a period of torment, realizing I had wrongly checked off "sarcasm" when the correct answer was "irony" to a question on the verbal segment. This seemed to be particularly unforgivable, as I had read Fitzgerald's *The Beautiful and the Damned, and so had full knowledge of Anthony Patch discovering irony at age twenty-three, the age I now was at as well.

The law schools I applied to were Harvard, Boston College, Boston University, New York University, St. John's, Brooklyn Law, and Rutgers. Though the chances were nil that Harvard would accept me, I completed the lengthy application, including an embarrassing, maybe even insane, essay, in which I claimed special powers of empathy with the poor and underprivileged on the basis of the unsheltered childhood I presented myself as having had. Not all of us believe we have a story worth telling. There are many who go on about their daily lives with little thought whatsoever along that line and who would be embarrassed, astonished, if someone were to suggest that they in fact "tell their story." "What story could you possibly be talking about?" they would likely say. "I'm an ordinary Joe. Now please, let me just get back to my job." These people are the salt of the earth, Celeste. They are to be revered, although such attention might corrupt even them. By not taking undue interest in themselves, they can turn their attention to things that matter—physics, chemistry, medicine, you name it. They are not invested in their own personal narratives, as "story" slaves are compelled to be. My little "essay" exposed my self-serving nature along with a great deal of self-pity and grandiosity.

As the weeks passed I began to approach my mailbox with greater anticipation, and of course the day finally came when an Educational Testing Service booklet was waiting for me. There is no need to go back to my junior year of high school, that lost year when I dropped out of Claremont because of emotional difficulties and spent the remainder of the school year at the Dwight School, over on First Avenue and Sixty-Fifth Street. There is no need at all, except to recall sitting in the playground across the street from the school with a similar booklet and the feeling I experienced of a gray mist rolling in and the future being taken away as I stared at the abominably low numbers. Forgive me, then, Celeste, if I allow myself to acknowledge the dread when, back to front, I read the score numbers one digit at a time, and the elation that followed on discovering that I had exceeded my modest goal, if only by a modest margin.

Now was I free to walk the earth not as a high board man might, but at least with a modicum of self-respect. I even sought to find out how a score such as mine on the law school exam would correlate with a score on the SAT and was told by a man at the Educational Testing Service in Princeton, New Jersey, that it would predict a score in the low 600s in both the verbal and math portions of the exam. Celeste, you must understand that spring had come to New York City by now, and that I was beginning to bloom in my own right, as it is no small thing to be shown that you have, if not a fine mind, a better one than you had imagined. It was akin to a ninety-nine pound weakling, as those such as me used to be called, waking up one morning to find himself with a body he could show on the beach at Coney Island or any beach in the world. I was now a young man of substance, finally shed of the dreadful image my past had earned me.

There was one thing, however, and the word honest cannot be applied if I do not confess it. I cheated. You heard me, Celeste. I cheated. Not wholesale cheating, but toward the very end I ran out of gas. With two questions remaining in the morning session, I stole a glance at the exam sheet of the young man to my left and saw the choices he had shaded with his pencil. He was not ruffraff if appearances mean anything, but had a well-shaped head and formidable brow that could only have housed a sizable intellect. I had full confidence in his answers to these two remaining questions, Celeste, and could not go against his choices when I went over those questions again. He was not a young man who made wrong moves, Celeste, but one who had earned his air of certitude.

What is a man to do with such self-knowledge, Celeste? As I have said before, I had no psychopathic tendencies, no stainless steel chamber in which to seal away wrongful deeds, unless you were to say that extracting sums of money from the renting office should be so classified. But in that instance I would have argued, in my benighted state, that I was righting an ancient wrong by engaging, if in an underhanded way, with he who had been tormenting my family through the years. And you cannot say that I was fully unvisited by sanity in those years. Recall, if you will, those nocturnal instances in which I would wake to the startling and terrifying reality that my renting office activity was a dreadful moral violation.

But here, in the matter of this cheating, the stain of wrong action was coming to me not in the black of night but during daylight hours, suddenly bringing clouds to a previously azure sky. The mind that would separate itself from God is not a holy place, Celeste, but a site of anxiety and even torment.

And then there was Dr. Dressler's reaction. She was less interested in my score than in my percentile ranking. The fact that I did better than little over seven in ten test-takers was not exactly cause for celebration in her judgment, I was left to conclude, from the grunt of disappointment she responded with when I gave her this information.

From Harvard I earned a thin envelope with a brief letter of rejection, and thicker ones signaling acceptance from Boston University and Brooklyn Law and St. John's University. Boston College and Rutgers placed me on their waiting lists. A person with torque in his engine can shift into high gear and zoom to the next level, but I was not constituted this way, at least in regard to law school. I had the tendencies of a dawdle dancer, like the ponderous faux poet Eugene McCarthy, with his heart as cold as the state he hailed from. (Yes, this is a mean thing to say. It most certainly is.)

Celeste, living just above me was the singer/songwriter/actor/playwright/cruise ship entertainer Jackson Holyoke, a pasty-skinned, moonfaced man with thinning hair for whom a blue work shirt and jeans were as much a staple of his dress as the olive drab garb of motor mouth Fidel. Through the pressed tin ceiling of my apartment would pour, every afternoon, the sound of Jackson Holyoke practicing "Country Road," a song of longing for West Virginia, which, I have learned, is a state of entrenched poverty but singular beauty, at least those portions that haven't been ravaged by strip mining. Jackson sang this song with great passion while accompanying himself on acoustic guitar in preparation for his next entertainment gig on a cruise ship. I could only imagine tourists with glasses in hand taking in Jackson's rendition of this nostalgia-drenched country western song on a moonlit night in the Caribbean, tears welling in their eyes. We all want to go home, Celeste, each and every one of us.

But more to the point, Jackson Holyoke was allowing himself to be who he was with the bellowing and strumming he did through his innumerable starts and stops. There he was, a man in his late thirties shrouded in his singleness, practicing this little tune with no apparent self-consciousness, while I could not so much as play a chord on my tiny upright. Nor, I discovered, could I step into the identity that awaited me at the invitation of any of the law schools that had accepted me. The laughing eyes of Peter Van Dine, as well as Lydia and Claire, were upon me when I imagined myself enrolled at one of these second tier, at best, institutions. Without the cover of a prestigious law school, they would see me as the mediocrity that I was. In this way did my mind serve as a prison, preventing me not only from playing the piano but from moving on with my life.

The necessary ingredient, a measure of humility, was lacking. Evidently, I was still bound by an exalted self-image some part of me clung to, in spite of all the evidence. I had made intelligence the end all and be all of existence. If I could not have the IQ of a Columbia or a Harvard or a Yale, then what was I? I did not understand the simple truth that it was all right to be ordinary.

Actually, Boston University might have been acceptable, but the idea of relocating to another city, even one somewhat familiar to me, created the same degree of anxiety as I had experienced when debating where to go to college. And I could not discount the effect of the renting office on me. Did I really want to give up the easy money I had come to rely on? Could I give it up?

"I'm not sure about law school anymore," I said to Vera, in this time.

"Oh, really?" she replied.

"I'm thinking maybe I'll wait a year or maybe I won't go at all."

She let the half smile my words had elicited speak for her. Was she showing satisfaction at my ambivalence? Was there some facet of my personality she gleaned from prior experience? The memory of those childhood Bible camps came to me, and of the same expression that had played on her face as homesickness, acute longing for my mother, caused me to cry uncontrollably in front of her. It is all very understandable with hindsight. Vera hadn't bonded as intensely as I had with our mother, and so did not experience the same degree of withdrawal when we were away. And now, was she once again seeing me as the momma's boy she had pegged me for? Little Luther afraid to go off to law school as he had been afraid to go off to Camp?

This exchange with my sister fueled my fear of her rising power. Clearly she was gaining momentum. The steady accumulation of As in all her courses made her night school college experience harder to dismiss. But why did her newfound success have to feel like it was at my expense? Why couldn't I be happy for the positive direction her life was taking, given the failure my older siblings were mired in?

Celeste, I came to another way of seeing my law school situation. Rutgers was the best choice. It had a higher rating than any of the other schools, was only a bus ride from New York City, and, being a state school, had a modest tuition. The only problem was that it had wait-listed me. And so I made a call on the dean of admissions, a man named Henry Fletcher, himself a graduate of the law school.

"In any other year you would easily be accepted to the school," Mr. Fletcher assured me. "For some inexplicable reason this year has seen a record number of applicants, but I can assure you that if you reapply you will be admitted next year."

Oh, what a happy day. In that one brief meeting did Mr. Fletcher return to me my future. The city may have been crumbling—burned out shops were still visible on the main streets and a sullen atmosphere hung like a dark cloud—but the law school building was modern, bright, and cheerful, a world unto itself.

In this time, Dr. Dressler pressed me to get a job. She said I needed to do something with my time. What exactly was I doing? Well, there was the renting office four evenings a week by now. My mornings and afternoons I would try to fill with reading the New York Post and more enduring literature. With Dr. Dressler's encouragement, I had begun to keep a journal. In one dream, I was walking along the circumference of a circle but had no ability to actually enter it. The dream established me as an outsider. I certainly felt that way.

The effect of the journal was transformative. How? It seemed to provide me with a center. The little entries I made were a means of going home. You must understand that words were all I had. What else was there? I did not understand music, showed no aptitude for numbers or science, did not possess a large and assertive personality I could project onto the world. I was an introverted ectomorph, a nobody in the day and night, primarily concerned that I give no one the incentive to beat me into the state of unconsciousness by lapsing from my generally polite manner. A prisoner of my own guilt, I wandered about here and there.

Maybe there is meaning in the Scriptures where it is written, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." But what meaning is it that equates the Word with God? What word is being spoken of here? Well, what does it matter, Celeste? Words on paper call us home, and what is home but the still point where God is found. Writing, then, is a spiritual act, a meditation, a form of prayer, an admission that we need some raising of our spirit. Words are a way of being comfortable in our apartness and at the same time making it go away.

I don't know anything about words, except that I have been writing them every day since Dr. Dressler encouraged me in this direction. "Sarah liked to pee in an open field, with only the crab apple tree and the lazy, solitary cloud in the sky as her witness. And in her father's car, she liked to whisper under her breath, 'White line, continue, just continue. Don't ever end.'" Entries such as these I would make, and go no further. I suddenly wanted a record of all my experience. I wanted nothing to escape my detection.

"I want to be a writer," I said to Dr. Dressler.

"What do you want to write?"

"I want to write stories and maybe a novel."

"Have you written anything?"

"I have been keeping a journal, as you suggested."

"Show me your journal."

"Why should I show you my journal?"

"I'm interested in your writing. That is why."

Her request for such a personal document seemed strange and even inappropriate, but she suggested that the journal might reveal things I wasn't able to present about myself during our sessions and enhance the effectiveness of the analysis. What embarrassed me most was not the ordinary content but my poor handwriting, a sure indicator of a feeble mind, I was inclined to believe. "I must have it back," I said, as I handed her the small, leather-bound loose-leaf.

Dr. Dressler returned my journal at our next session. "You have no talent, or maybe just a tiny bit. Now you must go out and get a job," she said. She had approved of my Rutgers decision, agreeing with me that it was the best of the schools that had accepted or wait-listed me, and since my enrollment had been postponed, she was advocating for a life for me beyond my little apartment and the renting office. Celeste, I will not lie to you. Her judgment of my writing I took as a smilingly delivered affront. At the same time her verdict had no staying power. The reason may have been that she was not herself a writer, so why should it matter what she thought. And perhaps she would not have been so dismissive if she realized that I had found the very thing I not only wanted but needed to do. Or perhaps she would have.

"Well, I'm going to continue. I may not have any choice," I said.

"Go ahead. Do what you want. Send out your work. It will come back to you, of that you can be sure."

"Why are you so cynical about pursuing a life as a writer?"

"Because most of them fail. A life of nothing they get. That goes for dancers and painters, too. Believe me, I know," she said with some vehemence. She was at an age when she was wedded to the practical. Life had bruised her. Perhaps, in a previous and thinner incarnation, she had been a performer of some kind that provided her with no more than a struggling existence.

I suspected that she had neither a husband nor children and that the colorful outfits she wore over her thickening body were a last desperate attempt to attract a man before old age claimed her. And yet the outcome seemed predetermined, in spite of her attire and her cheerful, positive manner. She was a woman consigned to aloneness.

Celeste, this new life I made for myself with my renting office activity was already corrupting me. What it provided, in addition to money, was time. I had grown up with the idea that work was important and had taken some pride in holding a job, whether delivering dry cleaned garments or groceries or being a bookstore assistant or sorting mail at the post office. But now I was struggling with Dr. Dressler's suggestion that I get a job, by which she meant a real job. When I told her I wanted time to try to write stories and even a novel, she gave me some of her German fire.

"I have your novel. It is right here. You have already written it," she said, holding up the notebook in which she recorded our sessions.

"That's not nice," I said.

"Nice I am not here to be. That you get from others maybe. Here it is for me to tell you the truth. You are not so interested in writing as you are in maintaining your distance from the world. Now go get a job and come out of hiding."

"Reading the screenplays of Ingmar Bergman is hiding?"

"Ingmar Bergman is a cinematic genius. You are ordinary young man. Go get a job."

Sickness is sickness, Celeste, and Dr. Dressler was trying to shout it out of me, but a life such as mine has been driven by trying to make a lot out of a little. I had a two inch vertical leap and yet saw myself as the second coming of Jerry "Zeke from Cabin Creek" West of the West Virginia Mountaineers. I could barely power a baseball beyond the infield with my 32-ounce bat and yet, in my mind's eye, I had the downtown swing of Mickey Mantle. And now, when that dream had met the test of reality through the passage of time, a new dream was emerging. I would be a writer. I had to be a writer. I read One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest and Sometimes a Great Notion in this period and was astonished by their scope and the vision of Ken Kesey, their author, but also depressed when I compared my skinny sentences with his vibrant prose. It was not for me to simply admire. The idea was taking hold that I had to do the same, and if I didn't, then I would have failed. And to meet this goal, I needed time, no matter how much of the laughing thing Dr. Dressler put on me.

Celeste, it didn't occur to me that I could get a job in an office, even if I had wanted one. I had no suitable training for the workplace. All I had done through four and a half years of college was read a few paperback novels. Beyond my lack of education, I didn't feel fit to be part of an office team. My co-workers would talk about me. If I were lucky enough to land a job, I would be quickly dismissed.

For several months I worked at the Metropolitan Museum of Art, not as a docent or in some other capacity that might require a college degree, but at the audiotapes booth for special exhibits. For three dollars, visitors interested in Cezanne's late period or early Mesopotamian art or whatever received a bulky audiotape that provided commentary on the individual pieces in the exhibit.

The job was part-time and paid an hourly wage for unchallenging work in a familiar, pleasant environment. For half a day, I had been given a place to go and a function to provide. Although at first it was difficult getting free of the apartment, I came to look forward to my morning walks across Fifty-seventh Street and up Fifth Avenue, especially when spring arrived and Central Park again turned bright green. It could seem at such times that my life was truly ahead of me.

A number of young people had been drawn to these part-time positions, some like myself in a sort of limbo status. I shared a booth with a guy named Ralphie, who told me right away that he was on leave from Princeton University, where he was studying for a PhD in art history. "By the time I was thirteen I had memorized every painting in this museum," Donnie asserted, that first day.

"That's pretty impressive."

"I snort cocaine and the fruit in one of those Cezannes explodes off the table. You have no idea."

"No, I don't."

"I've had to cool it with the coke. I took so much that it screwed up my tear ducts."

"That's not good," I said. In fact, his eyes were red-rimmed and bulging in their sockets, as if something unnatural, some violation, had occurred. To be honest, his eyes were hard to look into.

"I could be a curator here if I wanted to be. You understand that, don't you?"

His tone had turned challenging, sharp, as if the only point of our one-sided conversation was to establish his credentials. "Yes," I said.

His name was of interest. Ralphie. Little Ralphie. The diminutive once again, in line with his aging boyishness, the yellow Izod shirt worn outside his faded jeans and the high-top Converse black sneakers.

His wife, Louise, worked in the gift shop. She would come by on breaks. A young woman with a worried look, perhaps wondering about this man she had tied herself to.

I do not like to see promise unfulfilled, Celeste. It pains me. I was sad, but also relieved, when, a week later, they were both gone. The rumor was that Ralphie had been caught putting museum visitors' money in his pocket. It may be, as my mother would say, that God's mercy is ultimately all we have to turn to.

There was another at the museum who got the sad thing going in me. Her name was Eunice, a young woman who moved with what appeared to be meditative slowness and turned out to be the result of the severe diminishment of her motor skills and cognitive powers owing to the use and abuse of methamphetamine.

"I had perfect College Board scores and graduated with high honors from the University of Chicago, but my IQ has tumbled drastically, according to the psychologist who tested me at the hospital, where I was admitted for long-term care. Essentially, the methamphetamine has eaten away at my brain."

She fixed me with a dull stare as she spoke, her words coming slowly, in a droning monotone. An image came to me of her head, her entire being, having eggshell fragility. What on earth would happen to her? How would she survive? It was too painful to contemplate her fate. She too was there a week or two and then gone.

But then there were those who summoned quite a different emotion. Tall, striking Cynthia, with a model's looks and thinness, was the daughter of a psychiatrist who, she claimed, was the discoverer of electroshock therapy.

"I was the apple of his eye. There was nothing he wouldn't do for me. Nothing." Her mouth, observed in isolation, was shaped for cruelty. As she spoke, her teeth flashed white and showed a knifelike sharpness. She was not as young as Eunice.

"I ruined my life. Crashed several Corvettes my father gave me, got expelled from Yale, but now am rebuilding."

At age thirty, she was finishing her undergraduate degree at New York University.

"I have a thirst for knowledge, a thirst. My professors rave about me. They see who I am."

In my own way I too saw who Cynthia was. I saw the expensive outfits she wore, and the student life she supported with only a flimsy part-time job. She was a daughter of privilege, seeking to tether herself to reality. She was a woman as insecure as she was boastful. She had the manner of a woman who had been given a second chance at life.

I also saw my own lust. Behind the booth I would graze against her, taking liberties that wouldn't have been mine to take with others. How I could have sensed she would not protest with a bark or a slap is beyond my ability to explain. That same night I met with her at the Cedar Tavern, down on University Place. In addition to her academic studies, she was taking a drawing class.

“My instructor, Mr. Flinty, is pinning all his hopes on me. He says I am the best,” she asserted, as she pulled from her oversize bag a pencil sketch that looked like a child’s stick figure rendering.

At that moment I thought of Sarah, the content of her mind, her depth. Cynthia and I had several drinks and returned to her place on a gritty East Village street and made love in her loft bed after smoking a joint. But we didn’t kiss. Her age had gathered in her face and so I didn’t go there. She called attention to this lack, and I heard it as a warning sign.

The next time our lovemaking was more one-sided. She took me in her mouth and that was that. The third time I called to meet with her she was with a friend from college.

“I told him you go out fucking every night,” she said, laughing. “Isn’t that right, Greg?” she asked. An unflattering portrait had been presented that showed me alone and apart, a wild creature of the lowest realm operating in the dark, with only sex to offer. That someone was in her company as an audience added to my sense of shame.

The following week I visited with her at her apartment. She greeted me in an old bathrobe and wore a towel in her wet hair like a turban. Her face was slathered with cold cream and in her hand she held a carton of cottage cheese.

“Come in and give us a kiss,” she said, between the table spoonfuls she fed herself. In this way did she exact her revenge not only on me but on men in general. Her performing days were over.

“I’ll come back another time,” I said, and headed for the door.

“There won’t be another time, Mr. Skinny Dick. Do you know that I don’t even feel you when you are inside me?” As she spoke, I saw that her tongue had been coated white with cottage cheese.

What I heard her to be saying was that I should take it on the lam and so I did.

Celeste, the obstacles to her growth were difficult to clear away, but she was trying. And perhaps I represented one of those obstacles. She needed to find a way to be herself while living with the crushing weight of an imagined ideal. Even in her depleted state, however, she was above me. She had gone to Yale. I was a graduate of the City College of New York. Most women need a man to have a mind commensurate with their own, or even bigger, for an enduring connection to be made.

There was another at the museum, a beautiful black-haired girl. She worked the information booth in the center of the great hall. But she was someone to approach only with my gaze. I saw her as reserved for young men with a loftier status than I possessed. The forbidding aspect of the girl was not simply physical but what I perceived as her propriety.

And yet delusion began to have its way with me, and one afternoon, after several false starts, I pushed through the force field keeping me at bay and asked if she would be free after work. Two hours later we were sitting in a nearby coffee shop on Madison Avenue.

“What do you do when you’re not here?” Zoe asked. The name surprised me, as once again life had that I should knock on a door and it should open.

“Well, I’m headed for law school, but I decided to postpone it for a year.”

“Law school? Why?”

“I’m not sure. I guess I need to have something to do, and maybe the law is a field I could do well in.”

“But it’s so crushingly boring. How disappointing.”

“Why would you be disappointed?”

“I thought you would be working on developing a cosmic consciousness, not pursuing something so ordinary.” Her aggrieved expression suggested she wasn’t joking.

“To be honest, I don’t even know what a cosmic consciousness would truly look like.”

“No. I’m beginning to see that you wouldn’t. So what else are you doing while waiting for this fascinating new chapter of your life to begin.”

“I am trying to write.”

“What are you trying to write?”

“Stories. A novel. Maybe I’m not doing anything but wasting paper, but it gives me a sense of purpose.”

“Elliot wanted to be a writer.”

“Elliot?”

“My boyfriend. He’s out at Stony Brook now studying for a PhD.”

“Do you get to see him often?”

“I don’t see him at all, except when he stops by to pick up some things he left behind. Me, he left me behind,” she suddenly screamed, causing the patrons at the next booth to turn and stare.

We got together again the next evening at a bar on Ninth Avenue, a dark place with a loud jukebox and young Irish toughs sitting in the back.

“Sex is at the top and bottom of everything,” she said, running her hand up and down the neck of bottle of red wine we had ordered.

“Why do you say that?” I asked.

She laughed, uncontrollably, for a while, drawing the attention of the young men. It was not the place for us, me with my skinny neck and the shrub on my head sharing a bottle of wine with a beautiful girl with a pack of Westies looking on.

“My father is a slumlord. He owns more rat-infested buildings in Harlem than anyone,” Zoe said, as we headed down the long side street, a forlorn stretch between Ninth and Tenth Avenue.

“My family used to own a couple of buildings,” I said. “We lost them both. Now we manage one of them, though it’s more like it manages us.”

“Is that right?”

“Sort of,” I said, wondering if I had said too much.

It being a warm evening, the superintendent, Moira Finn, was seated on her garbage can. As I walked on by with Zoe, my mind turned to my mother and the building she managed farther north. Moira might think we came from different worlds, but I too knew what it was to sit on a garbage can and watch the world go by. Only right now I wasn’t watching the world go by. I was with sensational, if caustic, Zoe.

“Slow. Slow. I want this to be a long night. I’m a sex addict. I belong on Forty-second Street.” So she said as we lay in bed. She had an appetite for sex I hadn’t experienced before, not even with Asta, the girl from Norway who later took up with Luke. Zoe was aggressive, exploratory. I was startled when she inched her finger up my butt and darted her tongue into my nose. Celeste, there is real meaning in the word know, when used in the Biblical sense. I had not known Zoe. I had no idea. I had thought she might be on the decorous side. And now, in knowing her, I still did not know her, for who can fathom a creature such as she was showing herself to be?

“No, no. I said slow, slow,” she screamed in protest, when I came ten seconds after entering her.

I stayed for a while with my face down on the pillow. When the feeling of shame had sufficiently passed, I suggested that we get dressed and go out again.

“Go out where?”

“We’ll find a bar. A nicer bar,” I said.

“But we just got here.”

“I feel restless.” What I felt was uncomfortable. I was afraid of what she would see. It was not an unfounded fear.

“Play something for me on the piano,” she said.

“I can’t, I’m afraid.”

“Why can’t you?”

“Well, I bought the piano hoping to learn, but I so far I haven’t.”

“You look intelligent, but you’re not. You look like you would have an evolved consciousness, but you’re ordinary. You’re nothing, aren’t you?”

“I’m doing OK.”

“You’re doing OK? You have a part-time job working for the museum that is hardly enough to pay for weekly bus fare.”

“I’m building on it,” I said. For some reason, Melvin, poor, plain, and pale Melvin, with his missionary mindset and his meekness, came to mind as Zoe tore me down.

“You’re building on a job handing out audiocassettes four hours a day?”

“I’m really, really good at rewinding. That’s a skill worth having.”

Zoe had to brace herself against the piano to keep from falling on the floor with laughter. When she recovered, she said, “Well, could you at least show me a sample of your writing?”

“I’d better not do that,” I said.

“Why is that?”

“Dr. Dressler said I have no talent when I showed her my journal, and I am afraid that you would only concur. I am trying to get better. That is all I can do.”

“Who is Dr. Dressler?”

“She is my psychoanalyst. I am on the road of progress so long as I see her. That is how I see it, anyway.”

“You are retarded.”

I had been thinking about my journal, and whether there wasn’t anything I could show her. Then it occurred to me. Why not show her my first creative impulse? “Here. Read this, I said,” giving her one page from my journal.

“White line, continue. Sarah liked to pee in an open field, with the crab apple tree looking on”? This is your literary output?”

“I think I’m on to something. I just haven’t seen deeply enough into it as yet, but that could come with time.”

“You can’t fuck. You can’t play the piano. You can’t write. What am I doing with you?”

Though the report card she issued sounded harsh, I couldn’t dispute it. Strangely, her verdict had a liberating effect. She had discovered the worst about me, and yet I hadn’t died. Now there was no need to run out into the night. “Let’s find out,” I said.

We have these opportunities for intimacy, Celeste, for penetrating the circle and ending or interrupting our stay on the circumference. At some point we have to enter. We have to.

The bed could be converted to a double by pulling out the mattress underneath, which I did. We lay together, a small candle burning in the dark and the sound of trucks rumbling up Tenth Avenue coming to our ears.

“Elliott used to piss and shit on me. We did this all the time,” she said, offering a reminder once again that she lived in a world beyond my initial comprehension, and that if I had her so wrong, what else was I misunderstanding?

Cynthia paused at my table in the employees’ cafeteria the following week, a tray with one item, a tuna fish sandwich, in her hands. “Be careful, Luther, you don’t catch something from Zoe. She told me over lunch yesterday that she hasn’t cleaned her diaphragm in over a year.” She then moved on to a table some distance away where Zoe was seated with several others. I hadn’t anticipated that Zoe would express admiration for Cynthia, citing her intelligence, or that they would become friends. The possibility that they would discuss me was not comforting, but if Zoe brought up her diaphragm, why wouldn’t she have more to say on the subject of sex?

My connection with Zoe began to go sideways rather than deepen. We saw each other a couple of more times, but my ineptness in bed continued to be a source of complaint. She was simply not used to such incompetence and could not easily tolerate it. “The only thing I like about you is your lips. I couldn’t wait to kiss them. They were all I could see. Did you know that?”

“No. I didn’t know that,” I said.

“This man has stopped by the information booth several times. He wants me to come work for him,” she said, as if she hadn’t heard my response.

“What kind of work?”

“He makes pornographic films.”

“What would you do?”

“What do you think?”

“And you’re seriously considering his proposal?”

“Why wouldn’t I?”

Celeste, a man of greater capacity would have followed with more questions, seeking to fathom Zoe’s mind on this matter. But the truth was she had once again revealed a side of herself beyond my ability to imagine in relation to her. This may speak to the larger issue of women in general and sex, that is, my difficulty imagining that they truly enjoy making love. All evidence to the contrary notwithstanding, the idea still lingers that sex is an activity that women endure rather than relish. And pornography has not entirely eliminated this doubt, regardless of the seeming sexual voraciousness of some of the female actors. They are actors, after all, in a male-run industry. Of course, there may be an element of self-protection here. How easily could I live with the belief that all women had the same sexual proclivities as Zoe? Would it not be uncomfortable to ascribe voraciousness to all of them? Who are we exactly? Tell me, Celeste, does the question not impact you. Does it not summon the desire to vacate the premises of this body we are housed in, that we may move entirely to the spirit realm? How much of urination and defecation, of our own smells, and of our own unbridled appetite in all areas of life, do we need before we say goodbye?

Often, in the years that passed, I would say that I let Zoe get away, that I should have tried to claim her for my own or at least argued the case against Mr. Pornography Man, but remember something, Celeste, please remember, one of the first things Zoe said to me was that she was a sex addict who belonged on Forty-second Street. Possibly I understood that it was not for me to get in the way of her destiny. Besides, I had come too close to her fire to wish to be burned anymore.

But I had her last name—Bergen—and on lonely nights for some years thereafter, when I had come from a bar alone and full of longing, I would call directory assistance and try to find her, believing, in my drunkenness, that alcohol could dissolve all barriers and bring me close again with those I had once liked if not loved. But directory assistance had no listing for a Zoe Bergen, or if it did, the party had requested that the number be unlisted. And so I would be grateful and relieved at the same time. Then came the night when directory assistance did have a listing for someone with that name, and so I called. A woman with a French accent answered. When I asked for Zoe, a tone of hostility and suspicion entered her voice. "Who is this calling?" she asked. Shortly Zoe herself came on the line.

"How are you, Zoe?" I asked.

"How am I? How am I? I'm fine. How are you? Are you drunk? You sound drunk. You sound like a speed freak alcoholic. Get some help." Just like that did she speak to me before the line went dead, leaving me alone and shattered on West Broadway, between Spring and Prince, from where I had placed the call. These voices that come not soft and murmuring but like a sharp-edged knife or with the bludgeoning authority of a sledgehammer. She was all business, all about prescience and the heart of the matter, having drawn from the universe mystical, intuitive powers. In the care of. This phrase came to me as I backed away from the phone booth. And then it came more fully. She has placed herself in the care of this woman. She has placed herself in the care of many women. She has placed herself where she has to be now that Mr. Pornography Man has done his work with her.

Celeste, there is one thing I have omitted, if you will bear with me. It is only this. Zoe's father, the slumlord, was also a joy killer. Zoe told me so. There she was, on a sunny spring day, singing a Beatles' song, "Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds," when her father brought the hammer down, ordering her, without explanation, to stop. In telling this story,

Zoe was reliving it. Resentment filled her face and set her eyes ablaze. A resentment as black as her lustrous hair. And who can say what other trespasses he committed to further stoke the flames of her ire. What we can safely say is that resentment is the lens through which she saw the world, including me, as when she screamed, "You're so controlling. Do you think you could stop, if only for one second?" And what was the cause of this outburst, you may well ask? While on a walk with Zoe in the park near the museum, I had retrieved a ball that had gotten away from a little boy. Harshness undeserved, except in the light of her family experience. We must strive for understanding, Celeste. We must.

How was it for me with Sarah in this time? She didn't go as far away as you might have imagined, and my excursions with Cynthia and Zoe were not exactly flight paths from her. Suppose I were to tell you that this fellow Lane, Sarah's genius lover, drank her blood and ate her soul, leaving her lifeless out there on the Fenway? Sarah didn't so much want to be with Lane as to be Lane, while all he wanted was sex with an attractive and previously unavailable girl. Following his visits, she was unable to work. She filled with loathing for her projects, saw them as he did, tradition-shackled, derivative efforts. For days she would lie in bed, seeking the solace of sleep. If he was an opinionated dink, a twerp riding the crest of a wave that would ultimately leave him beached, a narcissistic little rich boy, she could only see what he had and she lacked. There is thievery and attempted thievery going on in this world, and not always of material resources.

And so she began to look at me in a new light. Whatever my flaws, I did not destroy her confidence in her own work or demoralize her to the point that she spent her days in bed. The influence of her mother may have been such that Sarah thought she was supposed to move on from me, but it turned out not to be a dictate in accord with her own. Evidently, I had more staying power in her life than she had realized. She took me back.

Celeste, if I address you constantly, see it as a measure of my constancy, or see it as you will. But I cannot speak to the void. It is too lonely, too barren a landscape for me to contemplate without shuddering. I must come in from the cold. I must.

After my shift at the museum I would walk across the park to my family's building on those evenings I had arranged to be there. The museum had given me some modest exposure to the world. It was a happy place free of the burdens and associations of family and the past, all of which awaited me, I was reminded, on seeing the verse of Scripture on the building wall. The renting office, so small and cramped and cluttered, was my means for expanding my life, but sometimes I couldn't help but feel it was keeping me small and cramped and cluttered as well.

By now my mother was in her late sixties, her gait slower each year. And my father, with his prosthesis, had already hit the biblical threescore and ten. On nicer days he managed, with the aid of his walker, to struggle out to the traffic island in the middle of Broadway. There, while other old folks fed the pigeons or stared vacantly, he would sit and involve himself in outdoor prayer, thanking God for his mercy and waiting to be taken. Constantinople, Marseilles, Nice, Paris, Boston, New York City, where he met my mother. A tired, tired man he was. He had walked the streets long enough. He had been wrapped in his solitude long enough. He wanted out. He wanted a place on the other side where order would prevail and he would be safe from the sharp knives, the axes, the hoes. Soon he would be gone. I could hear the grave calling to him. All my life I have heard the grave calling to my family, saying only here can order prevail. It cannot be obtained while you are going about on this earth. For others, maybe, but not for you.

By now my sister Naomi was big with her second child. It wasn't enough that Jeanne, her daughter, had run off and followed the hippie trail out to California. Naomi had to try again. "But Luther, the father is not my husband, Chuck. I am pregnant by a man named Al who lives down the hall from us. Chuck doesn't want me anymore. He is only interested in little boys. What was I to do? I am a real woman and I need a real man. But please, do not breathe a word of this to Chuck, as Mother would say."

In this way did Naomi speak to me that summer. She was ready to depart well before threescore and ten. Do not say that the possibility for order lies anywhere but on the other side.

Sarah and I went away that summer. Other kids were crisscrossing the country and backpacking around the globe and it weighed on me that I had not really explored the world beyond my hometown. And yet, in preparing to leave, I saw once again the trap the renting office, and the easy money it offered, had become. It was hard to let go, but there we were, boarding a flight chartered by CCNY, with identical backpacks I had purchased at Hudson's, down on lower Third Avenue.

With hindsight, I see the foolishness of my ways, that I would board an old jet owned by a no-name company, the kind that bursts into flames on the runway or loses an engine on takeoff. When it comes to airlines, one must seek out quality.

Celeste, the trip was difficult, and things I am loath to describe took place. But you must understand that relations were not quite right between Sarah and me. I was not good enough for her. She had said as much. Only because Lane was too good for her, or too destructive of her, had she come back. And then there was an incident at Camp before we took off for Europe.

Efram Ellsberg and his friend Zach Zeckler, the Scale Master, came to visit us at Camp. Why? In a moment of hysteria I invited Efram, who invited Zach, who invited five others from their City College crowd. Sarah came to me, astonished, to say that Efram and his pals had called to say they were down at the Log Cabin Inn at the bottom of the road. And so we fetched them, making two trips with the jeep to bring the band onto the property. Peter and Lydia were together again, or appeared to be, and if they were miffed at this surprise visit, they kept such feelings to themselves. But it wasn't lost on me what I had done in extending such an invitation when it was not my place to do so, given the simple fact that the property wasn't mine. Other than Efram and Zach, I didn't know who these people were, though a couple looked vaguely familiar from the college. I felt stupid and unprepared, overrun.

The visitors bathed naked in the pool, and when Sarah joined them, I felt obliged to as well. Seeing my pale, meager body, Efram looked away. "Some of us look better in clothes," he said later, as if obliged to give verbal confirmation of what I had sensed.

How low those of us who have nothing can be and still survive, Celeste, while beauty such as Lenore personified perishes young.

Some sparking was going on that day. The distorting light of lust was in Zach Zeckler's eyes for Sarah, and she showed reciprocal desire.

"I'm taking him up to the lean-to," she said that afternoon, after she had shown Zach her studio.

"She's an artist. How come you don't do something with your life?" Zach asked.

"I'm trying to," I replied, but they were gone before the words had left my mouth.

I watched them begin their ascent of the mountain in the jeep and walked up into the meadow, where, on an earlier weekend, I had photographed Sarah as she took me in her mouth, that is, until she said, "Please don't do that. I don't like it." Right then and there did she identify and protest against the pornographer in me. I say these things, Celeste, to acknowledge a degree of sickness that mitigates against true partnership. There are things we don't and can't understand about the forces that shape us, but is one of them, in my case, the dominating role of women? Can anyone without a sister, as Quentin Compson asked, really know what it is to have a sister? Excuses, excuses, I hear myself say. Always with the excuses, Luther, as if it is anyone's fault but your own that you cannot walk a straight line.

When a dog bites, without provocation, it will often be put down for its treachery. Why? Because having crossed that line once, it will surely do so again. So too did I cross a line that weekend, striking Sarah when she came back, her face flushed, from her outing with scale master Zach. By then, Efram and Zach and their friends had gone, and we were alone in the guest house.

“You pathetic bastard,” she said quietly, before fleeing to the main house.

Why had I lashed out with my open hand to her cheek? You must know, Celeste, what the feel, the texture, of humiliation is like. Countless ways have you experienced people walking all over you and then expecting you to smile. But I should not seek to excuse myself by dragging you into the situation. Cowardice is cowardice, and it was on full display when I raised my hand to Sarah that day. Had I called Zach Zeckler out for sparking with Sarah? Had I offered even the mildest protest? Not at all. Why? Because stripped down to his birthday suit, it was clearly seen that he had a greater endowment than I possessed, and what is a man to do when he sees such a thing but to step aside, especially when the woman who is the object of the other’s desire sees the same thing as well?

In London Sarah noticed that her locket was missing and questioned the male maid, who had no light to shed on its whereabouts. When she persisted, the only conclusion he could draw was that she was accusing him of theft. Later, she found it in the bottom of her knapsack. The incident pained me. From the window of our room I saw the man, in his gray smock, on the street below smoking a cigarette. A humble man, I thought. A man who cleaned rooms, as my mother cleaned rooms. A good man who had made peace with his lot in life. A man who had the telly and his smokes and Manchester United or Arsenal to root for, I thought, as he stood there stolid on his break under a gray sky. He could meet life head on. He could say, "I'm a bloody maid, Jack, and it's OK. Just minding my business and smoking my fags."

I had left him a note of apology and five pounds, but Sarah was less contrite.

"I didn't like his eyes. Even if he didn't take the locket, he's the kind who could have," she said.

In Piccadilly Circus we heard, behind us, gentle voices singing a gentle song, "I'm forever blowing bubbles." I turned to see that the singers themselves were less than gentle, with their shaved heads and stomp boots and hard smiles. Three skinheads, all in a row, had come up behind us. The song, from their mouths, was, I now understood, taunting, insinuating. Kick, Gouge, and Maim moved past us as we stepped aside.

From London we took the train to Dover, and then a ferry to Calais, where the white cliffs and the English Channel were not enough to keep us from fighting.

"Lane's better in bed than you. He's better, period. Don't you get it?" she exploded, as ocean spray broke over the bow.

I retreated to the dining room, where the mocking glances of formally clad French waiters drove me back outside.

We must be honest, Celeste. We must. The time is too short for anything less. I, more than some, have seen the way that words can fly here and there and miss the mark.

Paris was wide boulevards that reminded Sarah of the Bowery, in New York City. It was books in quality paperback editions that made you want to possess them. It was the strange contraption called the bidet and old men in the Luxembourg Gardens playing boules. Paris was also a man's blood pouring onto the cobblestone roadway near the Louvre as he lay unconscious, Peugeots and Citroens whizzing all around him and the wail of an ambulance siren a distant cry. In that moment, I saw the coldness and self-hatred of the French. Everywhere was the strong, sharp smell of those fat Gauloises. I had given up smoking the month before and was managing to resist. We were OK in Paris. We were doing fine.

How the mind works is this, Celeste. I imagine myself with a better score on the SAT and my classmates looking at me with interest and respect for the first time. One of the prettier girls is among them. In the moment that our eyes meet it is understood that we will be alone together soon. But then I see the sneering face and hear the caustic words of another female classmate as she says, "The only thing funny about you is the shape of your head." Do you see what we are up against, Celeste? Do you see? The door perpetually slamming shut as we move toward liberation. Vigilance, Celeste, vigilance.

The light was different in Spain. It had a clarity you didn't elsewhere find. And Spanish trains ran on a wider gauge track, causing a delay at the border. These were countries that had been at each other's throats. There was no need to increase the number of invasion routes.

Spain was dying, the old Spain anyway. A waiter with a long, solemn face stood haplessly in the wood-paneled dining car, the linen-covered tables empty except for Sarah and me, her long-haired friend. Elegance and normalcy had fled. The riff raff were here.

The sun was a beast we hadn't the sense to avoid at its peak, even after finding a pension in the historic part of Madrid. A feeling of torment and helplessness took hold. Our jeans were not light enough for the heat. My impatience with the map left us with my poor sense of direction. Our time was being squandered. We weren't navigating the streets and finding the sights. In and out of it, my blood was set boiling by the Spanish sun. Sarah touched my Nikon the wrong way in our room. My slap turned her face into a red mask of rage. She hit back. We wrestled on the floor. I held her down.

*"I'll kill you, you skinny dick," she screamed. In that moment I saw the old man whose fury Jason Compson ignites toward the end of The Sound and the Fury. It was not good.*

The next day we made an outing to the Prado, its artwork displayed in a murky light. Though the sun was at its cruelest, Sarah wore long sleeves to cover the bruises on her arms.

Franco was still in power. There were proprieties to be observed, a member of the Guardia Civil declared, with a sharp rap of his nightstick to my knee as I lay with my head in Sarah's lap in a peaceful moment outside a church. Liar, Luther, liar. Not a sharp rap. More like a tap. Be faithful to your plain experience.

I had bought an expensive camera, and with it took mediocre pictures. At times the camera was a torment, testifying to my unworthiness and incompetence. A pencil, a piece of paper, a book. The world of mechanical things I was as ill-equipped for as to father and care for a child.

We met two French-Canadian women at the pension. Their plan was to head for the Costa Brava in a Citroen they had purchased. Would we join them? Louise was short and fat and voluble. Simone was tall and thin and reserved. We said OK, placing ourselves in their hands.

In fact, they were afraid of rape. Other female travelers had been assaulted, Louise said. "You are big, strong man. You will protect us," she said, indulging in ironic mockery with a smile.

Celeste, my brains had been scrambled by the Spanish sun. There are those who laugh when all the markers are gone and they know not where they are, but I am not among them. Leon Trotsky claimed to be amused by his "topographical cretinism," but such disorientation summoned in me only panic and rage, bad enough when I was alone but shameful when Sarah was with me and I made her the target of my wrath. Now here came Louise and Simone, with an offer to organize our trip for us. Suddenly we were not alone. For a while I could put away the maps, sit back, and relax.

But the Spanish driving culture did not inspire peace of mind. Every five miles we came to scenes of carnage, vehicles in flames and occupants screaming in agony or already dead. There is no malady like car-induced psychosis. Sitting with our foot to the gas pedal and our hand on the wheel, we ascribe to ourselves special powers. Sarah's father showed a controlled madness in the elaborate fuss he made over what is a point A to point B exercise, but the Spaniards took it to another level, passing at will on the right as well as the left, regardless how tight the space or how close an oncoming vehicle might be. Seemingly, it never occurred to them that lives, their own and those of others, could be spared by a more modest, less crazed approach to operating a motor vehicle. For the sake of a few seconds they would kill themselves and everyone around them. Children drunk on their own sense of power. And so, my vigilance was called upon to soar there in the back seat if I did not wish for calamity to strike.

We were in August now, and if the streets of Paris were not thronged with Parisians, it was because they and those from elsewhere on the continent had converged on Spain: thirty-one million tourists in a country with a population of 22 million. For some reason, this statistic I cited many times, even when its repetition began to sound strange and off-putting to my own ears. Celeste, when you cannot speak informatively about the topography of a country, on such humble facts do you rely.

But the impact of the influx was that there was no room at the inn. As night fell, we discovered that every roadside place was booked full. A carful of young Spanish men offered their services. They appeared to have taken a shine to Sarah and the two French-Canadians. We followed behind them to a number of different accommodations, but the result was the same. After a while the young men became a torment to me, as I imagined them plotting among themselves to lure us to a desolate area where they would rape the women and kill me. Who were these strangers we had entrusted ourselves to, after all, and what sort of recompense might they ask? It was a relief when they abandoned us and I no longer had to look at their red tail lights in the night, which had begun to glow with demonic power.

That night we slept on a sprawling beach in Gandia, at the edge of the Mediterranean Sea, too tired to care about the warnings that sleeping on the cool sands was against the law and could wind us up in a Spanish jail. The next morning, woken by a blazing sun, Sarah and I found shelter on the outskirts with a poor family in a small house along a dirt road on which chickens wandered. Louise and Simone found similar shelter somewhere nearby.

That same afternoon I came out on the beach wearing a pair of shorts. My pale, thin legs and knobby knees were not a hit with either Louise or Simone. A look of disappointment can easily be distinguished from a look of interest. "You should be careful with your expensive camera," Louise said. "Did no one ever tell you that sand is not exactly good for it?" Their glances and Louise's contempt-tinged reproach were enough to sink me. Many times we are slain in this lifetime. Many times. Sometimes our assassins are known to us. Sometimes they are perfect strangers.

Louise wasn't quite done with me. "Take that ice cream and push it into his face," she suggested to Sarah, the following day, in Valencia, when I seemed to be making her personally responsible for the fact that I could not find color film for my camera.

Then, in Barcelona, Louise was done with me, and Simone as well, though not before a tour of the Ramblas and Gaudi Park and that crazy cathedral. We had checked into a hotel, where one afternoon Sarah and I had a huge fight, worse than any of the others. My insanity had led me to focus on her mouth, a churning mass of mocking red, all her venom concentrated in that one orifice. There, in that room, with the door locked, I slapped her, then slapped her again. My open hand craved her cheek. It could not get enough. Sarah tore a lamp free of its outlet and swung it at my head and then tried to gouge me with her tweezers. "I'll put your eyes out in your sleep. I'll cut off your useless dick," she shouted.

Celeste, no one had ever before struck Sarah. She had not grown up with Hannah of the tongue clamped between her thick lips as she smacked and smacked. She did not have a father such as mine who had perfected the art of the smack. And so it was for me to present her with this education in vileness. Such was the nature of the gift I came bearing. Ultimately it is best for someone like me to go off alone and find God, as there is no other I can have or who can have me.

Louise and Simone had their own method of inflicting brutality, unless we are to consider it a kindness. They simply disappeared. Possibly they came to our door and, hearing the row, said enough was enough of that ludicrous freak and his masochistic girlfriend. Or maybe they heard nothing and simply decided we had served their purposes and because we would not be needed in the future, there was no need to say goodbye before checking out. In any case, they were now gone, vanished, and we were once again alone.

Our trip ended in Holland, where the sun was warm but not malicious. In Rotterdam we walked along the waterfront and engaged with a young Dutch couple who took us into their home for dinner, an event of dubious value, unless there is some benefit to be derived from passing time feeling uncomfortable with strangers you will never see again. The young man, an architecture student, had designed their living space. Rather than take pleasure in the airy, comfortable dwelling, I could only play host to the usual set of miserable feelings that set upon me when I sensed I was in the presence of a creature entirely my superior. Love is not a virtue easily come by, Celeste. We must die and die and die before accessing that wellspring.

All the while we sat with this earnest young couple, struggling to understand and be understood, a great weeping was going on in me at my deceit. In truth, a bit of quid pro quo was in the air, the basis of all social contracts: I will do for you if you will do for me. Because they had taken us into their home, the expectation arose in them that we would reciprocate when they journeyed to the New World, as they someday hoped to do. Sarah had the capacity to receive people. Guests were always arriving at her family's home, whether at the apartment in New York City or at Camp, and their lives were rich beyond measure because of these friendships. But did my father and mother have people into our home? Did we have dinner guests, or guests for any kind of visit? Never. Not once. It did not happen. It was dangerous to have people into my family's apartment. The word "pigsty" resounded throughout the school following such a visit, as I have reported elsewhere. The message I received is clear: the Garatdjians receive no one, absolutely no one, on a social basis. You want to meet with me? I'll see you at the coffee shop, at Chock Full O'Nuts, at Horn and Hardart, etc. So no, Celeste, this earnest young Dutch couple might be received by Sarah, but me they would never see again.

We spend our whole life striving to be presentable, and do so in loneliness and solitude only to lie alone for an eternity after passing from this life. At some point it must stop, Celeste. It must. We must disrobe and say, quoting once again the great Georgette, "What you see is what you get."

In Amsterdam we slept one night in a low-budget facility with several floors but no outside walls. On these floors hundreds of young travelers such as ourselves lay through the night. The absence of privacy was too much for Sarah, and so we rented a small room under the eaves of a gabled house. From our window we could stare down at the quiet, tree-lined street and the narrow canal.

Dam Square was cluttered with the young lying unwashed and stoned. Such riffraff were a source of great concern to the elderly proprietor, Mr. Joost, and his wife, who lived comfortably on the floor below. Evidently these young people were a source of concern to the Dutch authorities as well. We watched on TV as a phalanx of gray-uniformed police with shields and batons moved against the young people resisting expulsion from the square. A clip was shown of a truck equipped with water cannons trying to hose the squatters away as a shopkeeper might try to hose litter from the sidewalk in front of his store into the street.

“Garbage. Vermin. They are not our own. They come to us with nothing but their sick attitudes and contribute nothing. They should be expelled, all of them.”

Mr. Joost, in his evening robe, and with a glass of brandy in hand, was visibly upset. His face had reddened and his voice filled with self-righteous anger. “Do you know how hard I have had to work? I came to this city with nothing, nothing, as a boy.”

There is no cause for me to go histrionic and put the laughing thing on Mr. Joost, Celeste, as he was only expressing an emotion that has gripped me many, many times. In truth, the apathy and the indolence of those who occupied the square was a disturbing sight, but not to the extent that I could be in full sympathy with the solid burgher, for whom propriety was clearly everything. And possibly this ambivalent attitude of mine was not lost on Mr. Joost, who, after his outburst, seemed for the first time to take note of my hair and in that same instant to associate its wildness with the anarchy in the streets. Suddenly, it may have occurred to him, the enemy outside had breached the boundaries of his own home.

“Your hair has an interesting shape. It goes in different directions, like a vacillating wind.”

“Yes, that is true,” I said, unable and unwilling to dispute with Mr. Joost, who, after all, had taken us in.

We rented bicycles and rode them over the cobblestone streets of Amsterdam. More than once I felt the wild thing rise in me and succumbed to the psychosis that I so routinely accuse those with vehicles of being afflicted by. I too experienced a degree of madness while pedaling among the mechanized behemoths. Celeste, the speed I achieved made me heady with my own success. I began to ascribe to myself special skills. Gasps of admiration could be heard from all those who witnessed my performance as I whizzed between cars and trucks and flew around sharp curves. Abandoned by the side of the road was the principle I had so steadfastly applied to others of point A to point B driving, remanding all those who exceeded such utility to the madhouses of the world. It was for Sarah to come fetch me with her sharp words.

“Stop it. Just stop it. You’re an idiot. You’re going to get killed,” she screamed, after I fell from my bike to the rain-slicked street and was nearly struck by a car. I want to tell you that her words sank in, even if their staying power was not for eternity.

*We visited the Rijksmuseum and drank beer at an outdoor café in Vondelpark, where the bees hovered but did not sting. At night the city would call to me in our little room, where Sarah was already settled into bed with a book. I too was reading, a nonfiction paperback by Tom Wolfe called The Electric Kool Aid Acid Test, and once again was dumbfounded that someone could write such energized, well-tooled prose. Was that what Tom Wolfe was really getting at when he said you were either on the bus or off the bus, meaning you either had the necessities or you didn't.*

"Where are you going?" Sarah asked, surprised to see me heading, fully dressed, for the door.

"I just need to take a walk. I'll be back," I said. By now the crisp air was signaling the advent of fall. I drifted toward the red light district where women in erotic lingerie stood or sat behind big windows. Neither their undergarments—halter tops, garter belts, black stockings—or the bodies they adorned drew me to them. They wanted your wallet and nothing more, and there were men who wanted only one thing from them as well, and so business was conducted. And yet their commodity status was not the sole deterrent, Celeste. These women looked into your soul. They saw who you were as a man, what your proclivities might be, a shy sort though you might present yourself as. Such knowingness as was seen in their bold stares was too much for me to stand up to.

Now Celeste, Sarah had a feel to her, a warmth, when we lay together that I took with me into the chilly night. As I left she sat curled up with her book. Her curiosity and her rootedness in her art caused me to wonder whether I was on a deviant path as I headed toward the bars, drawn by the thrilling sound of "Bad Moon Rising" and the hideously compelling sound of "Satisfaction." Wild upon the street were several GIs calling to a blond woman ahead of them, but she only increased her distance and so they turned back to the bar from which they all had streamed.

Heineken's was the national beer, and that night I drained two green bottles. A special kind of beer Heineken's is, with a bracing taste not as creamy as Budweiser or as metallic and quarrelsome as Miller. It is a taste you can trust, as you can that red star on the label. In Paris I had been able to drink the cheap wine served in a carafe and not order a second, but here, in this crowded nightspot in Amsterdam, far from Gosees in downtown Manhattan, it took some effort to break away. Though I had no way of seeing it, a change was occurring in my drinking and would more fully manifest in the coming year.

Either Mr. Joost ran a tight ship or he was a light sleeper who didn't mind being woken in the night by late-returning tenants. The door was locked, and as no key had been given me, I had no choice but to ring the bell. Shortly, the door opened. Attached to the latch was a long thick rope, the other end of which ran to the top of the steep stairs, pitched as such a sharp angle as protection against flooding. Mr. Joost had only to pull on the rope for the latch to lift and the door to swing open. There he stood, at the top of the stairs, a stocking cap on his balding head and a pair of slippers on his feet and with a robe over his pajamas. He appeared to be a state of high dudgeon, judging from the sizzle beaming down at me from his small eyes.

"Good evening," I said.

"Do you know the hour?"

“The hour?”

“It is after midnight. We have a curfew. Was that not explained to you?”

“I must not have heard.”

“You have come home alone? Where is your friend?”

“Asleep, as you probably were. I am sorry to have woken you.”

“You leave your friend all alone and go out into the night?”

“I was restless.”

“Restless? What does that mean?”

“I thought there was something out there I needed to see,” I said.

“I am sorry for her that she is with someone such as you,” Mr. Joost said. Having nothing more to say, he returned to his dwelling and closed the door.

The next morning we packed our bags and headed for Schiphol International Airport for the return flight home. Having finished the Tom Wolfe book, I had begun to read Portnoy’s Complaint. The vitality of the writing and the explicit treatment of sex led me to want to share the contents with Sarah, but after reading less than a page she threw the paperback so it skittered along the terminal floor. “He’s a sexist pig,” she said, with vehemence. Sometimes a question does not need to be asked, Celeste, or if it does, the question is more for me than for the other person, especially when her pissed-off reaction evokes in me nervous laughter rather than annoyance, as it did that day. Sarah could slap a label on Philip Roth and hurl his novel, but it occurred to me that her angry display was an expression of jealousy and hurt. Philip Roth was Jewish and running amok among goy women and Lane was Jewish and he was doing the same thing. And if this was so, then the question was really for me. Why was I laughing? Because if she had left me for Lane and caused me pain, why shouldn't I take some satisfaction in knowing that Lane had left her and caused her pain? How did it feel to be a nobody in the day and night? It didn't feel good, did it?

But there were other things as well. There always are, with these minds of ours. Who but a sadist can for long take satisfaction in the pain of another?

Now Celeste, we must discuss a matter fairly rank, as these things go, but candor is essential at this late stage. Let me begin by saying I am not an especially odoriferous man. Being someone who bathes regularly, my smell is within the normal range. I am not one of those who go without soap and water and a change of clothes for months and whose stench is sufficient to cause the evacuation of an entire subway car or public bus. And as for flatulence, I have been keen on containing myself in the public sphere and have even tried to be decorous about breaking wind when in the privacy of my apartment, at least during daylight hours. But such restraint was not in evidence on the return flight. My bowels were speaking to me. Great silent gusts of wind broke from me, summoning the attention of those near and far.

"Jesus, is that you? What did you eat?" So spoke Sarah, in a state of astonishment, her hand to her nose and mouth, even as more gas passed through me. One cannot always fight the currents of his time, nor should he have to. If the moment calls for gaseousness, then let gaseousness fill the air.

“Hey, Lord Stinky, put a cork in your ass, will you?” shouted a man across the aisle. Here too my only response was to let loose a topflight stinker that drove my outraged friend from his seat.

Celeste, all facets of our being must be revealed and accepted for true love to be born. From the false image we strive to maintain to the reality of the stink machine within must the embrace of love extend. Homeward bound we were, with me still far from such an understanding.

*That fall I registered for a writing class in fiction at the New School, down on West Twelfth Street. The class was led by Alison Redd, an author whose novel The Penelope Puzzle, had received great acclaim, including the National Book Award. The novel was over one thousand pages in length and represented a lifelong labor of love for Ms. Redd. In fact, it was her first published work of fiction. At age sixty-four she found herself famous, and she was seven years into that new period of her life when I came to her class. Whether those years were fallow or new seeds of growth had been planted she would not say, but no new work had appeared in print under her name.*

Ms. Redd had the craggy face of W. H. Auden in his later years, a downturned mouth, and the dolorous eyes of a basset hound. That first day she spoke of the flow, the flow, and urged us to read Anais Nin, her literary hero. The eight other students, I came to understand, were devotees of Ms. Redd, having studied with her for several years. And in fact, they emulated her prose style with long sentences that went along like a lazy, meandering river. “Great flow. Wonderful flow, George. Keep up that flow,” she said, after the student had read several pages of his novel in a dreamy voice and with an annoying smile of self-approval. He had been working on the section for five years, he said, adjusting this and that sentence to create maximum flow.

The atmosphere felt stultifying, as if I had walked in on a cult. I dropped the class and enrolled in another, called "Free-Style Writing." The instructor was a man named Bill Gofner. At age twenty-three an accident had left him paraplegic. Until then he had been a man headed for a big life, given that he had all the necessities: good genes, an Ivy League degree, ambition, and the drive for excellence. Now he went about in a wheelchair and had need of an aide to get through his days. The opportunity had been given him to contemplate a reality more profound than the one he had been living in: mortality, the meaning of life, how to adapt oneself to a circumscribed existence. His mind turned to such considerations. Writing became his means of salvation. Reflection would be his alternative to a life of action.

Though we couldn't help but be aware of his disability, he did not call attention to it, except for the several times the racket of a motorcycle on the street below caused him to shout, "'Right on. Far out. Do your thing, psycho mother f'er." In that lapse from his usual modulated manner he told us everything we needed to know about his pain. Actions had consequences. Be mindful of your life. Be vigilant. Here was a man who spoke my language, at least in this one area. I would see a driver, when the traffic light became green, burn rubber from the cross street where he had stopped into the avenue, only to brake sharply because the light at the next corner was still red. For what purpose such histrionics? For the purpose of power and nothing more. Or perhaps something more.

Perhaps for the opportunity to hurt someone and still be able to claim, as the driver, that he was innocent by virtue of having the right of way. Agents of pain existed in the world, and maybe Bill Gofner as well as I suspected some drivers were among them.

“Did I not tell you that you have no talent?” Dr. Dressler said, when I told her of my activity.

“I don’t care what you say. Actually, I would prefer if you keep your opinion to yourself, or refrain from telling me every week. Or how about you just drop dead? Would that be too much to ask?”

“So violent. So much anger. So much pride. I have hurt your feelings?”

“Isn’t that what you want to do?”

“What I want is for you to have a reasonable life and not be a bum.”

“A bum?”

“You will hide from life if you are given the chance. That is what I am saying.”

“I don’t think you know what you’re saying. Someone who hides from life is not necessarily a bum.”

“I do not want to see you develop bad habits while waiting to go to law school next fall.”

In such a way did she speak, as if to impose on me her own hard-won experience. And yet, that was only one side. When I came to her anxious about Sarah, who had returned to Boston for what was called a fifth year competition, and requested a prescription for tranquilizers, Dr. Dressler explained that she wasn’t authorized, by terms of her service with the clinic, to prescribe such medications.

“Try the old-fashioned tranquilizer,” Dr. Dressler said to me that afternoon.

“What old-fashioned tranquilizer?”

“Wine. Try wine.”

Now Celeste, I have been honest and forthright about my drinking to this point. At the same time I would have to say that alcohol was out of favor with my generation. Drinking was for older generations. It caused people to be loud and belligerent, to smell bad and vomit. Grass and hash and acid, on the other hand, made a person mellow and contemplative. There was also my mother’s warning about alcohol. I can’t say that somewhere in my mind I was entirely heedless of her concerns. But here was Dr. Dressler giving me the green light to drink. Her suggestion was all I could think of for the duration of the session, and afterward I made a beeline for a liquor store on Tenth Avenue, a tiny space you could barely turn around in, where I bought two bottles of chilled rosé wine. I returned to my apartment a block away, where I quickly opened one of the bottles and began to drink.

Sometime later I came to on the floor in the dark, and had no idea where I was. I struggled to my feet and turned on a light. Evidently, I had drunk both bottles, as they stood on the kitchen table drained of the pinkish wine. I had no regret about the wasted hours. On the contrary, I was aware only of a sense of elation. I had found a friend who would not be fickle and who would never abandon me, as Sarah might. It would be with me on the rocky road of life and see me through all of its vicissitudes; it would open doors for me, boost my intelligence, and spark my creativity. This was a friend that would turn the night into a call to adventure and fling open doors of possibility.

I began to stop in at a bar on the corner of Fifty-Seventh Street and Tenth Avenue. The bartender had gray hair and a cold manner. He seemed to reserve any kindness he possessed for the regulars, older men from the neighborhood, and the staff from WABC, whose studios were just down the block. One was a newscaster who appeared regularly on the evening news. His name was John Judd, the way all newscasters had to be named John Judd. In the bar as on TV, his face generated a dominating power. The bartender had nothing but friendliness for John Judd, who spoke in the same deep, earnest voice with which he delivered the news of body counts and Vietcong atrocities and whatnot from the broadcast studio. But I saw what I saw. The bartender was not really friends with John Judd anymore than a doorman is really friends with the tenants whose bags he helps them with. It was only a matter of time before the bartender began to live in his differences with John Judd: the fact that John Judd wore an expensive suit and tie and he, the bartender, wore an apron; the fact that John Judd earned a high salary and the bartender was dependent on tips to augment his modest wages. Yes, it was that, their stations in life that would ultimately bring an end to the affable exchanges so the real story, the one of difference, could emerge. And it was not for me to be there when the conflict that followed erupted.

In this time I was reading the Paris Review Interviews with Writers series, and the one with Truman Capote stayed in my mind more than any other because he made the all-important link between creativity and drinking. The author of Breakfast at Tiffany's and In Cold Blood started his morning with coffee and then followed with sherry and brandy and other necessary facilitators of the muse. We are talking about Truman Capote here, who published three stories in the New Yorker when he was only seventeen and so earned the rightful designation of genius.

We all need enhancers in this life, Celeste, to provide us with what we haven't otherwise got.

One fall afternoon I was walking along Broadway when the thought occurred to me that a drink would be nice, and so I purchased a bottle of sweet vermouth at a nearby liquor store. The great Nelson Rockefeller, governor of New York State, drank sweet vermouth. I had read as much in some publication, and so, if it was a drink worthy of our powerful governor, maybe it would do for me as well. Besides, nobody could put the laughing thing on me for ordering a sweet wine favored by someone of his caliber. To be on the safe side, I ordered two bottles. Dubonnet, it read on the label. A classy French name.

In Riverside Park, children were scampering about in the playground under the watchful eyes of their mothers or nannies. It would not do to drink from these bottles in public, and so I entered the railroad tunnel that ran under the park not far from the Seventy-ninth Street boat basin. Like liquid candy the Dubonnet sweet vermouth tasted, and yet with a cutting sharpness to let you know you were engaged with serious stuff.

Far down the straightaway, you could see the rail yard beyond where the tunnel ended. Soon a northbound freight entered the tunnel. I had been sitting against a near wall but now stood as it roared past, saluting the power of the Penn Central switcher pulling a string of boxcars. As the cabooses rolled past, I turned my back, succumbing to an old fear that the workers were armed with guns capable of firing blasts of rock salt at intruders in their realm. Even with the overhead vents, the diesel fumes were strong and lingering, not quite up there with the smell of a wood-burning fire, but fine all the same. The smell summoned the image of men hard at work and brought a feeling of bright promise.

I wandered outside. There, on the grass by a footpath, drowsiness overcame me. Sometime later I was woken by a child's voice.

"Mommy, Mommy. Why is that man sleeping in the grass?" The girl stood with her big, inquiring eyes only a few feet away. The girl's mother came to her quickly and took her by the hand.

"Are you all right?" the mother said. I told her I was.

"What's wrong with him?" I heard the girl ask, in a loud voice, as her mother led her away. I didn't hear the mother's answer, but it wasn't necessary. She had seen the second bottle, empty, by my side.

Celeste, no one likes to be regarded as a bum, but we are in a city of eight million, and the page can be turned as one day is followed by the next.

"I'm uneasy about my drinking," I said to Dr. Dressler soon after the park experience.

"How do you mean?" she asked.

Regretting my admission, I held back. If I said too much, she would take away what she had given me, and then where would I be? I could not let her destroy my life when it was just beginning.

"Nothing," I said.

“You are just worried because you have older siblings who drink,” she said. I had told her about Luke and Rachel and Naomi.

When I was a child, Hannah would meet Luke and Vera and me after our Friday Bible school class at the tabernacle. Often she would have a girlfriend with her. From there we would go to the St. George Hotel, down on Clark Street, in Brooklyn, and swim in what the hotel advertised as the largest indoor pool in America. I would stay in the water until my lips turned blue and my skin was covered with goose bumps, then run shivering to the steam bath, where, in the mist, I would sit on a wooden bench among the old men with big bellies and skinny legs. Having sought refuge in the warm embrace of the steam bath, I was unable to go back into the water. And it was a bit like that with drinking. By now I had experienced the warmth that alcohol could provide and I could not live in this cold, cold world without it. Even at this early stage, alcohol had become the thing of value in my life from which I must not be parted by anyone or anything.

Some years ago you and I were driving back to New York from a weekend in Wellesley, Massachusetts, where we had visited with your sister Melba and her family. In the car with us was Mia, your daughter from a previous marriage. My topographical cretinism, as Trotsky called it, kicked in, and soon we were off course, all the road signs pointing us in an unwanted direction. Because of these signs, we knew to turn around. But alcoholism is not like that. By the roadside are beautiful, scantily clad women with signs that read, “Pleasure pit five miles ahead. Keep going.” And so, with the promise of hedonistic delight the bait, we continue on our course, going farther and farther afield of a more proper destination.

Alcoholism is the discovery of an alternate route through life, one that has no toll booths or traffic snarls or potholes. It is smooth cruising all the way, with the top down and a gorgeous woman by your side.

All through college I had been reliant on others to type my papers, as I did not imagine myself to have the mental suppleness to master QWERTYUIOP and all the rest. But as part of my self-improvement program, I bought a typewriting manual and did the practice lessons. (Also, at this time, Celeste, I took the Evelyn Wood speed reading course, so I could finish the fattest book in record-setting time with full comprehension, but I'm afraid I soon returned to my old way of going slowly from word to word.) For these practice sessions I had bought an old L. C. Smith office machine with elite, not pica type, so I could fit more words on the page. Though it was difficult to get past "white line, continue," the conservationist in me required that space not be wasted. As for the heft of the machine, I wanted a model that would provide the assurance of permanence.

My neighbor Jackson Holyoke had gone to sea as the entertainment director on a cruise ship, where he could earn his daily bread and perhaps find companionship with a pretty admirer of the vocal artistry he displayed on such songs as "Country Road, Take Me Home." Though the impulse is to mock him by suggesting the more desperate passengers might jump overboard if all efforts to silence him failed, I must not go down that road. I mustn't. As a man thinks, so does he become. I must not elevate above Jackson Holyoke, with his thinning hair and pasty skin and denim duds. Let me be courteous and just, so I may escape this prison of my own making.

While Jackson was away, I would see a man substantially older than me entering and leaving the building. He would have been memorable for his dark, handsome features alone but the crescent-shaped scar starting near his left eye and ending midway along his chin added to his staying power in my mind. We got to talking one afternoon, and it turned out Roddy Rumble was a friend of Jackson's from their army days. While Jackson was away at sea, Roddy would be staying in his apartment. He came from Louisiana and had the Southern drawl to prove it, as if talking was a wearisome thing you needed to be sparing of under the hot sun.

It turned out we shared an interest in baseball and a similar fascination with that simian-like creature Pete Rose. We noted his appropriation of the plate, in particular that manner he had of not only following the pitch as it flew past and into the catcher's mitt but also smelling it. We both agreed the moniker Charlie Hustle fit, given the way he ran to first base even when he had drawn a walk, and the firebrand style of baseball that was a trademark of his game. Rose, as a rookie, sought out Frank Robinson and Vada Pinson, the two reigning stars of those early 1960s Cincinnati teams. Both Robinson and Pinson were black, and Rose had gone to them because they were, in his estimation, where the action was. They were with it, and everything in Pete Rose screamed to be with it, too. With the moment, Celeste, with the moment. To go where the wind took him, where his impulses took him, regardless of circumstance.

But I could not forgive the Cincinnati Reds for their new incarnation. They had abandoned the name "Redlegs" and their distinctive uniform, which featured a sleeveless top worn with a long-sleeved red sweatshirt, for garb as ugly and synthetic as the grotesque Astroturf management had substituted for sod in a hideous new ballpark called Riverfront Stadium. Gone was the inner city gem that Crosley Field had been. Where are you, Ed Bailey and Ted Kluzewski and Jim O'Toole? Where are you childhood? These are things we must ask from time to time, even if the answer is obvious and the predictable chorus stands ready to blast us with its predictable cold chant, "Your childhood is gone. Get over it." Childhood is never over. Never. And memory is never over, calling us back, through images, to a shimmering world in which adults in uniforms played a children's game where grass and dirt complemented the artifacts of man to create unearthly beauty, and in these ballparks we sat closer to the face of God and yet some distance away. All memory is only a disguised longing for that face, that unity, Celeste.

Roddy Rumble lived at the margins of life. Lacking the temperament for a nine to five existence, he got by as a freelance copy editor and proofreader, dependent on the assignment here and there of some big manuscript from a publisher on a tight deadline. Evidently he had no killer overhead back home, no wife and children and no home with a monthly mortgage or rent. He lived in a trailer given him by his older brother Eustis, a big-time businessman in the local community. People can hang free and easy when they have a safety net beneath them, and Roddy was of that kind. The earth wasn't giving way under his feet, as it was for me. He seemed to look at the world with some detachment, as if it was a place for others, not for him. What he liked was sitting in front of the TV all afternoon with a big bag of chips and a six-pack of beer watching the Cincinnati Reds and the Baltimore Orioles go at it in the World Series, and so did I.

Now, Celeste, I can no more tell you why I was drawn to Roddy Rumble than I was to Efram Ellsberg, my City College chum, except to say that they were both older men and perhaps in the image of my brother, Luke. I seemed to have no power of choice in these connections.

“My face is real pretty, isn't it?” Roddy said to me one afternoon, when Jim Palmer was dazzling the Reds with his elegant delivery and over-the-top stuff.

“Pretty?” I asked.

“You heard me. Isn't it pretty?” he went on, with uncharacteristic gruffness. Possibly the beer was speaking, though you wouldn't think two cans would do that to a person of his size.

“I don't know if pretty is the word I would use. Can I say handsome?”

“Liar. It's not pretty and it's not handsome. My face is fucked up, and do you know who fucked it up?”

“I really don't,” I said.

“Pussy fucked it up. That's who.”

“Pussy fucked up your face?”

“That's right. She fucked it up real good.”

“Where? Why?”

“A drugstore in Mobile, Alabama. I'm minding my own business browsing the dime store novel rack when she walks in. She smiled at me and I did what Poppa told me to do. ‘A woman smiles at you, you smile back at her. It's called politeness,’ is what Poppa said. So I did, and I won't pretend I didn't take a shine to her. But Poppa didn't tell me about Cut Man."

"Cut Man?"

"This guy comes over and starts with me. 'You like my lady friend Luella here? You like her real fine?' All the while he's got this insane smile on his face. So I say, 'I don't know her so's I could say, but she seems nice.' What I don't see is that this whole little exchange is his way of priming himself for the violence to come."

And come it did. Roddy Rumble's inquisitor whipped out a box knife and sliced open Roddy's face as deftly as if he were slicing through packing tape.

"Now you go on and check out my work in a mirror, you hear, and if you're satisfied with the job I've done, you just let me know and I'll come back and do the other side. You hear what I'm saying?" Roddy reported Cut Man as saying.

That same night I lay in bed, still unnerved by Roddy's story, which seemed only to underscore the tendency of the world toward random violence when it wasn't busy organizing for a more sustained and lethal effort. Roddy Rumble, despite his name, was a relatively harmless soul who, like my brother, received punishment in excess of his crime. I thought of the harm's way I had placed myself in with girls, namely the beating Joe Szymborska had dealt me for breathing the same air as his girlfriend Imelda and the beating Maura's father tried to inflict on me. As I grew drowsy and my thoughts grew wispier, the phone rang.

"Is this Luther?"

"Yes. Who is calling?"

“This is Luella? Luella from Baton Rouge, Louisiana?”

“Luella? Louisiana?”

“Are you looking to make me repeat myself so as to rile me, Luther?”

“No, not at all.”

“You be good now and go on upstairs and tell Roderick Luella does not appreciate him not responding to her calls and to pick up the phone, you hear? Unless maybe you want me to fly on up there and tell him myself? That would make me mighty unhappy, and am I right in understanding that you don’t want to see me unhappy?”

“He has your number?”

“Does the world need one more foolish question, Luther? Now does it?”

It wouldn’t do to tell her she was the queen of questions and that in fact I did have one more for her: how on earth had she gotten my name and number? But Roddy Rumble supplied the answer, saying only, “Trust me, she has her ways.”

One evening, in Bill Gofner’s writing class, a man read from his rambling story about a family of elves that takes up residence in an East Side townhouse. He prefaced the reading by asking the class to be alert for symbolism and what he called the aura of myth in his tale. The head of the family was named Cherokee. His wife was named Beulah, and their children were named after the states of the Union. One of the elves had been caught trying to sodomize a sheep while on an out-of-town trip and all the other elves had mobilized for his defense. The writer stopped there and assured us that he had a firm outline for the rest of the novel.

Celeste, during this reading I whispered to the woman seated next to me, "An epic of American culture." In so doing, of course, I was making the mistake of asserting my superiority. Equally as bad, I had assumed an identity not my own. Earlier on I mentioned a young man named Colin Westland and presented him as the crème de la crème. His first book published when he was sixteen, a Columbia undergraduate, and named by Time magazine one of the most promising young writers in America. What I failed to report was that, after his brief involvement with Pam Becker, he took up with my sister Vera. In fact, they showed up at Camp one summer day in his rented car and, after a brief visit, drove Sarah and me back to the city along winding Route 9W, which follows the Hudson River. At one point, in the car, Vera asked Colin, as he was driving, "Do you have a brush?" "Does it look like my hair has seen a brush?" he replied. There was no humor or affection in his voice, only testiness, and right there I filled with sadness, as it was clear to me that Colin did not have the same feelings for Vera as she did for him. Once again a Garatdjian going where she or he did not belong, trying to engage with our betters instead of accepting our place as unsightly creatures with ugly last names whom no one on this planet can truly accept, let alone admire. A remnant of the filthy, forgotten Armenian tribe.

On our journey back to Manhattan, Colin Westland had the hit parade going on the radio: "Proud Mary" and "I've Been Loving You Too Long" and a lot more, with all those commercials in between.

"An epic of American culture," Colin remarked.

There it was in one phrase—humor, irony, wit, perspective—as if he were looking down from above. And is that not what intelligence is, to look down from above? Is that not the vantage point of the gods? Right there I saw the difference between us. He was Olympian and I was ordinary, a drudge among the horde.

And now, here I was at the New School, not Columbia, uttering that same phrase in something called a free-style writing course, in that moment succumbing to my desire to be Colin Westland. What victory is to be gained from such falseness, you may well ask, and I would, without my own experience as a guide, perhaps say none. But if I am to draw on my experience, then my conclusion must be a different one. Everything was to be gained. And what exactly was that everything, Celeste? It was you. You are what I eventually gained by uttering that little phrase.

The woman touched my arm, and after a moment of looking startled, had to hold her hand to her mouth to muffle her laughter. Her name was Hermione Grunfelt and she told me that evening that she wrote poetry to rock and roll music. Her current favorite, she said, was “Maggie May,” by Rod Stewart. She had gotten a lot of good poems from that song and hoped to get more. We had gone together to the Cedar Tavern, down on University Place. The artists like Jackson Pollock who had made it famous had gone elsewhere by now or were dead. A soft glow of golden light held off the darkness.

If Hermione and I had anything in common, it was a desire to be special but no particular talent that would warrant such a status. Her music-inspired poems were stream-of-consciousness bits of prose broken into arbitrary lines.

Her father had remarried after her mother's death, and it was a painful blow to be told nothing had been left for her in her mother's will. She was not without some means through a trust fund set up for her by one of her aunts, but Hermione's mind went dark in the matter of the larger inheritance she suspected she was being denied. The wicked stepmother had seen to it, Hermione was sure, that she was written out of her father's will. Hermione's father had taken up with her even as Hermione's mother was slowly dying of cancer.

Something was owed to Hermione. She had been deprived, cheated, and her grievance against her nemesis, the wicked stepmother, was severe. I thought back to my epiphany years before, en route to the community center, which had led me to enter the renting office of my family's building and claim my own inheritance so I too would not be deprived. Celeste, both Hermione and I were operating from a sense of entitlement, only my desire was being fulfilled and hers was being thwarted. She had no job, only her poetry, and I had no job either, or not one I wished to speak of with any honesty.

The evening came in Bill Gofner's class when it was my turn to present. I had given him a long story for his comments and he now wanted me to read it out loud in front of the other students, but lack of confidence in the story's quality prevented me from going forward. Seeing my reticence, Mr. Gofner offered to read it himself. The lengthy story involved a man of limited mental capacity and no means who marries a plain, petite woman and quickly goes through her modest assets. The story was most notable for its long, run-on sentences and the thinness of the writing. A meager mind and body will produce meager prose. It will lie there, skeletal, on the page, unlike the high-specific density a reviewer noted in the work of Heinrich Boll (and which is present in the writings of Colin Westland as well). Being present for the reading of a small portion of the story, and the comments afterward, was no less difficult, as everyone knew who had penned the piece. It was everything for me not to bolt from the room.

“Marvelous, just marvelous,” Hermione opined afterward. “Such energy. Such exuberance.” She was a big bird who took flight often into the realm of hyperbole
We had gone once again to the Cedar Tavern, where I drank a great deal of red wine. By and large, in this time, I stayed with the “old-fashioned tranquilizer,” as Dr. Dressler had recommended. Drinking wine and beer was not really drinking, I could tell myself, as a way of easing any lingering qualms about drinking at all. By the time we got in the cab, I was drunk and looking at Hermione in a different light. Her dowdiness and sad face had worked against any sexual interest, but now, in the back seat of the Checker, I felt aroused and became verbally aggressive. She was living farther uptown than me at the time, and so I got out first.

The next morning I received a call from her. “What on earth happened to you last night? Are you all right?”

“How do you mean?”

“You were so changed in the cab. It was like being with a different person.”

I thought of Lydia and what she had written in her journal: “When he drinks, the beast comes out.”

“I’ll see that it doesn’t happen again,” I said.

Sarah had not gone away. You should not think she had. But something had gone out of her. She was afflicted with ennui. You could say I was many things to Sarah, among them lover and tormentor, but my main role was that of helper. It was understood by each of us that she was the superior person and in the dominant role. Fearful as I could be, I was mainly her cheerleader, offering her support when she was dispirited about her work. But now it was not a matter of a bad day but of bad weeks and even months.

Celeste, Sarah had not so much loved Lane as she had wanted to be Lane. She had always measured up, and now she wasn't, in her own mind.

And if the truth is to be spoken she wasn't fully measuring up in my mind either. Some of the luster was gone. Why did it depress me to consider that perhaps she didn't possess as special a talent as I had believed? And I was having reservations about another matter. This is a great failing on my part, but where women are concerned, it is hard for me to see beyond the body. Sarah did not have an entirely womanly body. Her hips were not curvy but those of a man. She had said so herself early on. What hadn't attracted my notice then now did.

Celeste, if I have dwelt in the realm of spiritual pomposity, seeking to pretend that I see beyond the body to the spirit, then you have every right to hurl at me the word hypocrite. But a man has to be honest with himself if not with others, in the event such honesty should cause harm. And what manner of person tells a woman that he cannot be with her because she has masculine hips, even if he is only confirming what she already knows? The truth without love is an attack. So I was told and so I believe. And there can be no love in such a statement. And yet, Celeste. And yet. Was it not true that what drew me away from Sarah to you years later was your womanly figure? Was I not in thrall to your physical as well as spiritual dimension?

And here is another “and yet, and yet.” What is one to do when, in fear of hurting her, a man withholds the truth or asserts its very opposite to the woman in his life? Can that be said to be love, or is it the very antithesis of love, given the harm that can ensue?

One truth I could freely assert was a feeling of liberation from the constraints of the academic life I had pursued and in which I had fallen short. I was writing, Celeste. I was writing. Or maybe it was only typewriting, as Truman Capote dismissively said of Jack Kerouac’s prose, but even if there wasn’t an ounce of merit in my white line, continue approach, the therapeutic value was enormous. All I had to do was hit the keys of my L.C. Smith office machine and I had my center—I had myself—for the day. I was making something, something of my very own, not just endlessly following the words of others in the paperback books I read. As once I dreamt of being the second coming of Mickey Mantle or Jerry “Zeke from Cabin Creek” West, I could now dream of literary stardom, where no such dreams were possible in the drudgery fields of academia or the law.

The bars of New York City were calling to me, and to them I went to drink my red wine. There was one, the St. Adrian Holding Company, on lower Broadway, just north of Houston Street and next to the old Broadway Central Hotel. Into it I had dashed in an earlier chapter of my life for a bag of ice to take back to the room I had rented with Dahlia from Darien . (Some years later the hotel would collapse into a pile of bricks without so much as a kiss from the wrecking ball.) But now it was not about dashing but about settling in. The wine came in something the bartender called a shell glass, narrow and not very tall and so in frequent need of refilling.

The bartender was a big guy with a sloping forehead and, I suspected, a high capacity brain. In size and demeanor and ability he reminded me of my friend Efram. His name was Dave, a grotesque truncation of David. Why would anyone drop the “id” and substitute a one-syllable sound that summoned the image of a square-faced man with a buzz cut and a plastic pen protector in his shirt pocket?

Dave gave the impression of a man of quiet earnestness. He was a jazz musician, a saxophonist, so how square could he have been? But his sober demeanor—I never saw him take a drink and suspected alcohol was not part of his life—began to feel like a reproach to those of us sitting for hours on those stools. I couldn't help but wonder what sort of man works the stick and witnesses others lose control while he remains in full possession of himself? It was a puzzle to me and also a source of resentment.

There was another bartender from that time, a light-skinned and handsome black man, only his was a smiling countenance and he wore dashikis and other garb more stylish than the denim duds favored by Dave.

A smile. A friendly request for more. My relationship with these men never developed beyond such superficial interactions. I feared them. I may have sensed they had power—the power to cut me off—and I had no power.

It felt good to listen to Carole King sing "Tapestry" while I drank my wine in the dark and soulful bar. The song entered me into the pathos of my own life. And then along came the rousing, upbeat "I Feel the Earth Move" to take me into a state of jubilation. Oh, what a happy thing to have found such a place. And my muse was present. Words and ideas came to me. Some I would scribble in my notebook for consolidation into my work the next day. Others I would simply pledge to remember.

One night I even met a woman at St. Adrian's. Her name was Flo. She was a secretary at a Park Avenue law firm. I told her I was interested in the law and would be attending Rutgers-Newark in the fall. I let her know that I was busy working on a novel and some short stories and that the working titles for all these manuscripts was "White Line, Continue." I told her nothing was more beautiful than the white line down the middle of a country road in the day or the night.

"Gee, I never thought of it that way, but you're right. I think I see that you mean," she said.

Her friend Roxie didn't take the same shine to me. Evidently, our spirits were not in alignment. It will sound unkind, Celeste, but this was a woman who broke rocks with her big teeth and then swallowed them. The light of calculation and assessment was always on in her mind of case-hardened steel. A real net assets type was she even in this idlers' paradise. That is a lot to say of a woman who had nothing to say to me and little to say of me, though the little she did utter was devastating.

"Don't go with him. He has only himself," she said, just as Flo and I were about to head off to my place. And when Flo wavered, like a tennis ball deciding which way to fall as it paused at the top of the net, I thought all was lost. But the promise of the night was calling to her as well as to me, and off we went, putting some distance between us and Roxy's basilisk glare and shouted words. "You'll be sorry. He pees in the sink. He doesn't change his underwear. He has a teeny dick. He's a rapist, a serial killer. He likes little boys."

So Roxie, from Brooklyn, had her little orgy of words, and who is to say love, not jealousy, was not informing her outburst. Is it not possible that Roxy went on to a better life, with a husband and children, while Flo, having entrusted herself to some deranged man, was found by the police in the trunk of an abandoned car, Roxy's cautionary words exploding in her terrified consciousness as it sank in that she had been left to die a slow, painful death? Life is serious, and the night is serious, and I was serious about only one thing, the pleasure to be had in the privacy of my Hell's Kitchen apartment with Flo, whose last name I never learned, on a cold fall night in 1970.

A young man began to appear at the bar. Not only the frequency of his visits but his appearance brought him to my attention. He had an intelligent face, informed by the powerful brain I suspected his big head of housing, and the wire-frame glasses, Oxford shirt open at the collar, and tweed jacket only added to the impression of an intellectual. A writer, maybe, or a graduate student in a challenging field. But what really came across was the nakedness of his intent. As he stood away from the bar against the wall with his glass of Scotch in hand, he was clearly identifiable, to my eye at least, as a hunter. His expression was one of seriousness, even Van Gogh-like intensity, as if a smile was foreign to him. But there was also an aura of guilt, or at least acute self- consciousness, as if he had to try to mask his lascivious hunger with a somber air. His obviousness was astonishing; even more astonishing, and painful, was the recognition that his singleness of purpose mirrored my own.

“He has only himself,” Roxy had said, of me. Perhaps she had been right, and all context for my life was lacking except for this imprisoning solitude. And perhaps she would have said the same about this man I have identified as my double, the shock of recognition constituting a repelling force field so severe that I never learned his name or exchanged a single word with him. Or perhaps Roxy’s judgment was incorrect in regard to me and would have been incorrect if applied to him as well. Perhaps she would have had to modify her statement as follows: They have only themselves, and if they each have women whom they see regularly, they still have only themselves, as these women are shelf items in their lives, books they have collected that will have pride of place yet remain unread.

What is a bar, anyway, Celeste? It is a church for the damned, a haven from the street for those who, in their own misguided way, are seeking. And where did this seeking lead me? It led me to a place where, when Sarah called from Boston one day, clearly out of sorts, and screamed into the phone, “Do you still want me to come down to New York City? Do you still want to live together? Well, do you?” I could only say yes while something in me was saying, no, no, I don’t know. Because sometimes to tell the truth is to cause yourself to die and the other person to die as well, or so I believed. A man who thinks he is the be all and end all for another person, when he has full evidence to the contrary—what is that but the tyranny of misplaced responsibility established in the long ago when the lesson I learned was that my mother would die without me, absolutely perish from this earth, and then where could I go but to the same resting place?

Sarah's phone call, left me feeling utterly sad. The burden of her neediness was worse than the pain I experienced when she would discard me. And yet, the question remained, even though I had answered in the affirmative: If I was emerging into a new life, could she be part of it?

On a March night in 1971 I sat in the balcony of the Riviera Theater, on Ninety-sixth Street and Broadway, and watched on the screen the Ali-Frazier fight of the century, as it was billed. Ali had entered my consciousness years before when, as Cassius Clay, he had defeated Sonny Liston, older and more experienced, for the heavyweight championship. My mother had given me a small white radio in the hope that I would listen to broadcasts from the Calvary Baptist Church. Instead I would tune to Measerri Measorri Murray the K, who hosted the Swinging Soiree every evening. But on this evening I was listening, with my heart racing, to Clay take on Liston, the heavyweight champion of the world, a bruiser and an ex-con with a baleful stare. Clay was young, an Olympic gold medalist, brash and boastful, an irresistible life force. Having given myself to him before he stepped into the ring that night, I thought I would die, when clearly ahead, he couldn't see. Ointment had gotten into his eyes and he balked at coming out of his corner for the next round. And yet, one round later, it was Liston who stayed in his corner. "I am the greatest," Cassius Clay said over and over that night. Hadn't I said something similar back in junior high school, writing in my books "Luther is great," before I learned not to.

Now it was seven years later, and Cassius Clay was now Muhammad Ali and in the embrace of Elijah Muhammad and the Black Muslims. I had no historical understanding of the Nation of Islam. I had only the memory of the violent young Negro boys who would migrate from Harlem to the Upper West Side during the summer months and the beatings they would inflict on some of the white kids in the neighborhood. As for the former Clay, could a playful, flamboyant, bombastic young man remain so when he discarded his light and happy name for one so earnest and foreign?

Celeste, I had a history with that theater, and its companion, the Riverside, right next door, as I have previously noted. (The Riverside you could understand, as the Hudson was only down the way. But the Riviera? Was that to make one think of the French Riviera, to add a touch of false elegance? Well, why not?) In early adolescence my mother had taken a belt to me. In a moment of rage she had struck me across the face. This from a woman who had never before lifted a hand to me and shown me only kindness and love and endless patience. But my father had flown off to Marseilles to visit with his remaining two sisters and it is possible she was going through a difficult time with him, given his tendency to stray. There was also the possibility she was in physical pain owing to the severe case of varicose veins in one leg, the other having been operated on the year before. Suddenly she felt the absence of love and saw the squalid conditions in which we lived and heard the bratty sound of her repulsive second son and revealed her other side, the side she had always left it to my older sisters to show. And so I went with my brother Luke that cold, rainy night to a movie down at the Riviera, or was it the Riverside, and watched a sad film called Town Without Pity, with an even sadder theme song of the same name, as sung by the very great Gene Pitney, so full of the earnestness and pathos of his own sound. Four American GIs were accused of raping a girl from the town in West Germany where they were stationed, and it was for Kirk Douglas, as their attorney, to save them from death. Like a turbulent ocean my emotions grew, my true self obscured not only the feelings triggered by my mother's blow but now the sorrow and concern for these unjustly accused young men as I followed their plight on the silver screen. How was one to live in such a world with Gene Pitney filling the old theater and my head with his mournful song?

And I thought of those Friday nights during my high school years at the theater with the boys from Amsterdam Avenue—Fatso Scully and Luis and the Itty Bitty Little One whose name I am now forgetting. Ben Hur, Spartacus, The Magnificent Seven, Hud, West Side Story, Irma la Douce. As with Town Without Pity, those films and others like giant waves crashing down on our small lives and carrying us away. And, of course, the men who loitered in the bathrooms I was drawn to who took me in their mouths.

Celeste, Joe Frazier was a good man from the land of everyday people, a former worker at a meatpacking plant. He did not spew braggadocio into the air of America and ride the crest of the fomenting zeitgeist of the nation. He did not say, in his manner and his speech, that he was in his time and of his time and for all of time. He was as slow with his words as Muhammad Ali was glib. He showed himself a relentless forward motion machine, living for the chance to land that left hook that would separate his chatterbox opponent from his senses.

But my identification was with Ali. The boxing commission had done him wrong with banishment from the ring for over three years for saying "I ain't got nothing against those Vietcong. They never did nothing to me" and refusing military induction. Like a mythic hero, he had suffered exile, and now he was returning defiant, unbroken, undefeated, even by the government. And yet, the fight was hard to watch. In the early rounds, long before Joe Frazier put him on his back, I had the fear that time had diminished Ali's skills. The winds of change do not cease. It is hard to experience the death of a dream by a machinelike one-man wrecking crew.

"Red," I called to a young man outside the theater. The man was black, not red, and he too had been one of the boys from Scully's stoop, if only on the periphery. In fact, he was the son of the superintendent of Scully's building, and so while Scully came down the stairs so he could stand on the street, it was for Red to come up the stairs from his family's basement apartment. He was short and muscular, with broad shoulders and a thick neck, and though untested in battle, no one in our bunch wise-mouthed him, for fear of the damage he could inflict. Not even Red's stammer could tempt Scully into a piece of mouth-flapping foolishness.

"What?" he called out, when he turned and saw me. I heard anger in his tone and saw it in his scowling face. Red didn't want to have to deal with the likes of me now. He was dealing with his blackness. Ali had brought him out of the basement and given him a voice.

"Never mind," I said.

"That's right, never mind," Red said, and went on his way.

Don't be calling some people out of the past, Celeste. Don't be doing that. They might not give you the reception you were hoping for.

But there was one that night who was not from my past, not then and maybe not ever. He was doing his doofus strut right past the theater in pants sized for a clown as the crowd emerged. "God is the end all and be all. Do you understand what I am saying, Luther? Do you?" A plea for understanding played on his holy fool face, seeking to communicate the state of consciousness he had reached, that made of current events like the one that had just roiled my emotional waters nothing more than piffle.

"I do," I said, kowtowing to his earnestness.

"Then get on your knees with me right now and embrace the Christ Jesus as your savior. Will you do that?"

"Another time," I said to Melvin, another master calling to me on this painful night.

Luther was woken in the dark by the ringing phone. He had been sleeping off a drunk. Sarah was on the line, and in a state of agitation he had not heard from her before. “A man has been here. A man has been here,” she said, and then repeated herself again.

“What do you mean?” Luther asked, all the fear in the universe now coursing through him.

“A man. He came and went.”

“A man came and went? Who was he?”

“He came through the window.”

The story emerged. A burglar had entered and taken what money she had in her wallet, then tried to rape her, but was too afraid to succeed. No, she had not called the police. She had not called anyone, just him.

“You must call them right away,” Luther said.

He boarded a flight early that morning out at LaGuardia Airport, but something was wrong, he thought, as the plane rose above the clouds. He didn't deserve her trust. It was as simple as that. Where had he been the night before but in St. Adrian's, drinking his red wine and trying unsuccessfully to meet a woman he could fool around with. Sarah could have been killed during his pleasure cruise.

And this too, he thought: the windows are broken, the doors are off the hinges, the roof has been blown away, and there is no protection to be had from the hard rain that is falling and has been falling all my life, only I thought it could fall only on the Garatdjians, never on the Van Dines.

He held her later that morning and they both cried. He had older sisters dead in life and now he had to fear that he would lose her, but at least they could take precautionary steps to reduce the potential of disaster. An unsightly gate went up on the window through which the intruder had entered.

Sarah's parents came up that weekend as well, and her painting teacher, Mr. Allbury, whom Luther suspected had fallen in and out of love with her. The presence of these adults was reassuring, as was a visit by a girlfriend of Sarah's from the school. She wasn't alone. There would always be someone there for her to bring light where there had been darkness.

"We're so glad to finally meet you. We've heard so much about you," Lydia said that day, to Mr. Allbury. "You've meant the world to Sarah, the world," Lydia went on.

Mr. Allbury had Cary Grant hair, and had aged well. He did not have the look of a hound. As befit a teacher, he had no lewdness showing. Sarah had been out to his house in Brookline, where he lived with his wife and daughter. Mr. Allbury had taken her to his studio and showed her his paintings. They were the paintings of a dead man, and if his paintings were dead, then he had to be dead too. He was just a dead man walking about in his life, hanging around the young he sought to draw from but could not touch. It had made Luther sad for Mr. Allbury that Sarah had described him in such a way.

Mr. Allbury put Luther in his place that day. He didn't mean to. It wasn't a conscious decision. It was just superiority asserting itself. Mr. Allbury had gone to Yale. He had received an MFA from that prestigious school. This information had come from Sarah, not from Mr. Allbury himself, who was too under the cloud of midlife depression to trumpet his own achievements. Yale had not fixed Mr. Albury. It had not given him permanent happiness or glittering success. It had given him dead paintings and flight into the consolations of teaching to mitigate the reality of his failure. But on this day, perhaps because he was still hung over from his wine binge of the night before and feeling suspect in the eyes of all, Luther could only focus on the Yale aspect of Mr. Allburys' life. He thought: Mr. Allbury is Yale and Lydia is Radcliffe and Peter is Harvard, if only briefly, and I can only draw a stick figure and copied the drawings of others in grade school because I could not come up with my own. He was sure his deficiencies were obvious to Mr. Allbury and that this recognition of his inferior status was the reason Mr. Allbury did not so much as look his way in the brief time they were together.

One image persisted, a detail provided by Sarah. She had been wearing a sleeping gown. The intruder lifted it before attempting to rape her, as if to see if she merited his attention. It was an image Luther didn't want, and yet it lingered. A man realizing the treasure he had found.

Luther couldn't draw or paint, but he could try to capture what he saw with his camera and the assortment of lenses he had purchased in those gold Nikon boxes. Oh, Jesus, what fine equipment. Sometimes he just wanted to sit there and stare at his purchases. Their beauty made him crazy, created genuine torment in his mind, like those feelings he would have in the long ago about the model railroad in his room Luke had assembled, Luke having the mind to wire a transformer and make it work and Luther being terrified of such challenges. How he would stare at those Lionel catalogs, the images of gorgeous twin diesel Southern and Santa Fe and New York Central engines, tormented by the need for more than the unsatisfactory Texas Special O27 gauge train he and Luke had purchased on sale at Macy's as a Christmas gift for themselves. But now he had what he wanted in the way of cameras and it still wasn't enough. Maybe what he really needed was something of German manufacture, a Leica, instead of these Japanese products.

He was photographing and writing. He had seen the work of Cartier-Bresson and Atget and Walker Evans and Eugene Smith and Berenice Abbott and Alfred Steiglitz and many others and had begun to sense that intelligence was required in this medium as well, that the arts might not be as free of this prerequisite as he had hoped. Composition was intelligence. It meant an understanding of spatial relationships. It meant using existing elements to create an aesthetically pleasing print. And you needn't be a phrenologist to notice that many of the great photographers had bulging foreheads or foreheads like sheer cliffs and to correlate these shapes with superior intellect. And, of course, there was Edward Weston and the zone system, from black and shades of gray to white, for which light meter readings were necessary. Well, what was he to do? He had a need to capture what he saw.

"Of course you can use the darkroom. You're family," Claire said, when he called with his request. Family. How strange. Only four years before he had resolved never to set foot in the Van Dines' apartment, and now he had just requested and received permission from his girlfriend's older sister to use Peter's darkroom.

Developer. Fixer. Stop bath. All the chemicals he needed were available, and the trays and the enlarger. How organized Peter was. One photo album after another on shelves in the maid's quarters he had turned into a darkroom. Peter's father had been a plumber. Plumbers were intelligent. They had to be to assemble pipes and joints properly. He had thought these thoughts would stop after the LSAT, but they were worse. Anyway, he had cheated on the law school test. His thoughts turned to sex, Peter's big cock, but that was no place to stay either.

"When are we going to see your photographs? I'll bet they're great," Claire said, when he emerged some hours later.

"They're not very good," he said.

"I'm sure you're just being modest," Claire said.

How she talked to him, he thought, as he left. Teasing him, asking him to do what he couldn't do. That journal entry of Lydia's came to mind, the one in which Claire said he was like their Estonian maid.

He came home to find his door off its hinges and splintered. Two thick boards were nailed to the battered door and the frame and a note was attached.

If you want your stuff, what's left of it, come get it across the street.

NYPD.

Stuff. What's left of it. What kind of note was that? A flimsy door. Why hadn't he seen as much. A door that wouldn't protect anyone. But he hadn't needed protection. He had felt safe. Now he didn't.

A uniformed officer sat eating a Blimpie's hero at his desk and sipping from a big container of Coke.

“Hey, Bill, take care of this guy. Will you? I’m busy here.” The officer had sized Luther up with his crafty eyes and decided quickly he wasn’t anyone to give up hoogie heaven for.

A second officer appeared. “What’s the story?” he asked the desk officer.

“Those perps. That Felix and Ramon crew. You know who I mean?”

“What about it?”

“I got this guy here they ripped off,” the first officer said, handing Officer Bill the note.

“Kid, you’re lucky you weren’t home. Those fuckers don’t care if someone’s in the apartment or not. They’re just coming in, and if you’re there, they waste you. It ain’t even about the merchandise with them. They just dig sticking people and doing the shoot em boy run run. Two of those fuckers was out on parole for murder. You dig what I’m saying?”

“Murder. They were murderers?”

“Don’t matter how much you beg for your life with those guys. Like I said, they dig closing their victims out.”

“Where are they now?”

“Who the fuck knows. Down at the Tombs probably.”

“What’s going to happen to them?”

“What happens when you make a full turn through a revolving door?” Officer Bill said. “So there’s your junk. You want it?”

“That’s all?” Luther asked. On a table stood a big gray tape recorder, its casing broken and the spools missing. Luke had given it to him, as he had the old stereo receiver and turntable and speakers. Hand-me-downs, like those shirts of Luke’s that got passed on to him when they were growing up.

“Like I said, we only caught the two of them. That was a big crew. You got a lot of old shit in there they left behind. If there was anything valuable, believe me, it’s gone,” Officer Bill went on.

“What am I supposed to do?” Luther’s question came out as a wail of distress.

The reply from the first officer was emphatic. “You get the hell out of here. That’s what,” he said, then wiped away the remains of his Blimpie with the back of his hand.

Luther stood on the dark street. It was late now, after 10 pm. He couldn’t go back into that building. He just couldn’t, anymore than he could live in a place that had been overrun by rats. Maybe tomorrow, in daylight, he would be able to. He called Claire. She had said he was family, even if she meant like Helja, the Estonian maid, might be considered family.

“What a terrible thing. Yes, please don’t stay there in your apartment tonight. Come up here immediately,” Claire said.

The doorman building had always stood as a symbol of security, and never more than now, as he passed through the marble lobby. Claire received him in her nightgown.

“I’m sorry. I’ve woken you,” Luther said.

“Not at all. I was just reading in bed. Come talk to me.”

And so he did, following her into the living room. Trauma had its benefits. It helped to bridge the divide. He felt close to Claire as he sat with her going over the details of his evening. And he sensed that she felt close to him. She was a frightened human being herself. Why else would she still be living at home and clinging to her family?

He stayed in Sarah's room that night. As he lay in her bed, he visualized the bottles in the little hallway passage to the dining room. He could always drink whiskey if there was no beer or wine in the house. Claire's door would be closed, and chances were she was already fast asleep. And even if she did see him with a glass in hand, would that be so bad after the shock he had experienced? Surely she would understand.

He returned to the bedroom with a tall glass three-quarters filled with bourbon and the rest with water so he wouldn't have to make a second trip. He didn't know about mixed drinks and he wasn't sure he cared. He just wanted the effect the alcohol would produce in him. Anyway, he had picked up a bartending book lying around Camp a while back, thinking he might like to be a bartender, but the recipes were hard to retain. The difference between a rob roy and a manhattan seemed like too much to master, especially under the pressure of impatient patrons. Bartending was just another thing he wouldn't be able to do, like chemistry.

But Claire could do chemistry. She could do biology. She could do everything. That was why she was at Barnard. The college had recognized she was a girl of substance. That's why she was with her high IQ boyfriend, who put his laughing thing on everything. It was why she could recognize that Luther was nothing more than a menial, like Helja. That's what intelligent, substantial people did: they saw to the heart of the matter. They had the capacity to strip away all the excess and just see.

As he drank, he began to have other thoughts about Claire. Just on the other side of that shared bathroom was her bedroom. He had only to pass through it to be with her. And he did want to be with her, to experience the dark fury that lay behind her mild manner. In the stillness, a perfect medium for communication, what he was hearing was that she wanted him, too, that they were alone together in the universe through circumstances beyond their control, and now their attraction to each other was beyond their control as well. The burglars had knocked down his door. He would not do anything so crude. He would simply knock. That was the excitement of sex. You knocked on the door and you didn't know what to expect on the other side. That was what the Bible meant by knowing a woman. You couldn't possibly know her until you had lain with her. And Claire had invited him to knock. She had already received him. When the call of adventure came you were supposed to heed it.

He entered the bathroom from Sarah's room. Even half-drunk he understood that he had a choice. If he returned to Sarah's bed, he could wake without remorse in the morning and go on about his day. But what kind of choice was that? The night was too long. It was not humanly possible to hold out. He would have to be placed in restraints. It did not matter that he had gone down this road with Lenore. The memory of that brief experience of pleasure was far greater than that of the pain that had followed.

He pushed the door open slowly, just a crack. He did not want to startle her. He just wanted to make a request, and in a reasonable manner. Nice, he wanted to sound nice.

“Claire?” he called.

“Luther?” He had not summoned her from sleep. She had been lying awake, waiting for him.

“This will sound strange, but may I come in?”

“Why? What is it?”

“Can I stay with you for the night?”

“No, you can’t.” Her answer came flat and emphatic.

“I’m sorry,” he said. He had no reserves of confidence on which to draw, no clever power of persuasion he could use. No was no.

Back in Sarah’s room he stood with his head pressed against the wall and his eyes closed. He should leave, but he couldn’t leave, couldn’t go back to his wrecked, unsafe apartment, not in the dark of night. Where then? The park? The subway? No, he would stay and get up early and leave, so he didn’t have to see Claire. He was family after all. Claire had said as much.

“I cannot make you more intelligent, but I can make you more moral. Have I not told you this before? Do you want to be more moral?”

He had told Dr. Dressler about the incident with Claire. What he was thinking. What he wasn't thinking. Everything. "Why can't you make me more intelligent?" Luther asked.

"That is not for me to do."

"Who can I see about doing this for me if you can't?"

"That is part of your sickness that you want more than you have. More intelligence. More sex. You want what isn't yours."

"What kind of analyst are you, anyway? Are you a priest? You sound like a priest."

She said nothing. Sometimes she would go silent, just leave him on his own.

He told her about the break-in. He presented it as an extenuating circumstance.

"Thieves attract thieves," she said.

"You shouldn't talk to me that way," he said.

"They will go back to jail, and you could end up in jail, too."

"I said don't talk to me that way."

"What way should I talk to you?"

"You should be nice, like me."

"You? You are not nice. You are not so nice at all."

"You don't know me."

"Don't I?" she said, holding up her notepad.

"I don't like you," he said.

"Now we're getting somewhere."

The two women came together to the bar, as women often did. The taller one was sickly thin, her skin sallow. She was recovering from an illness that she didn't specify. Her jaundiced complexion made him think it was a liver problem. Luther talked with her, but really, it was her friend he was interested in, and the friend seemed interested in him. But before he could be alone with her, the sick woman, whose name was Sadie, insisted that he come to her apartment around the corner and listen to a record that had important information for him.

“What is this record?” Luther asked, but Sadie wouldn't say.

“I'll be here. Don't worry,” the other woman said. Her name was Maggie.

Luther went with Sadie to her apartment, where she played the record, as she had promised. The animal sounds he heard surprised him, the vocalizations of elephants and wolves and the hideous laughter of hyenas. He could hardly listen, his mind so much on Maggie back in the bar. The fear was growing in him that she would be gone by the time he returned or that someone else would have claimed her for his own. Seeing that the album of animal sounds was not doing the job, Sadie gripped him by the wrists and delivered the message herself.

“You are not the person you want to be. You are terribly disappointed with yourself. It shows in your face. Admit it.”

Her face and voice were full of intensity, as warranted by the holy truth he imagined she thought she was dispensing. In spite of her gravity, he laughed, not dismissively, but from nervousness.

“I am sorry,” he said, before fleeing from the woman. And he was sorry, sorry that she appeared to be dying and that he couldn’t help her. But there was also wonderment at her proprietary hold on him. How did someone presume to take such possession of another person, a perfect stranger? What in him had invited such an onslaught of peculiarity?

Maggie was still at the bar. That she was alone surprised him, and yet she had a plain face that might not attract some men. Still, she attracted him. They went back to her place in the East Village.

“I’ve been dying to get out of these clothes,” she said, as she undressed. Small and thin, she had a pretty body under her garments, a body that would not overwhelm him.

They did fine in bed and had enough between them that they could see each other a second and a third and even a fourth time. But seeing Maggie brought anxiety. She was not like the other girls he came and went from. She wanted something more than sex. Her father was a professor of comparative literature at Rutgers University, in New Brunswick.

“You should come out and meet him and my mother,” Maggie said.

By this time Luther had told Maggie that he was writing. It was the same thing he told everyone. He was writing fiction and in the fall would be going off to college at Rutgers, in Newark. He heard what he said as a prerecorded message and in darker moments saw himself as a lunatic, an incompetent lunatic, with his hand in his mother’s purse, a man who lived more for reading the New York Post and eating hero sandwiches than for any strenuous literary activity. And as for law school, well, it was beginning to feel like a fake ID.

“What should I do about my filth?” he said to Dr. Dressler.

“What filth are you talking about? Your filth in stealing money or your whoring filth?”

“You have no right to talk to me this way. I could report you to the police. Or at least the head of this clinic. I am talking about my whoring filth, as you call it.”

“Tell me about this new whoring filth.”

“I get frightened before I meet her. I feel it is a betrayal of Sarah and that I should pick up the phone and call to cancel.”

“We are here to make you more moral, as I have mentioned before.”

“Who are you? Have I asked you that question?”

“Who do you think I am?”

“I will tell you if I ever find out.”

“We regret to inform you that because of the unusual number of highly qualified applicants, you have been placed on the waiting list....”

He returned the letter to its envelope and placed it atop some books on the shelf. The dean at Rutgers had promised. He had promised. And now he had gone back on his word. Luther had placed his whole life on hold awaiting this new chapter. Yes, he had been unsure as to whether the law was right for him, but still, a promise was a promise.

He put a call in to Dean Fletcher. "I must speak with him. It's urgent," Luther said to the dean's secretary.

"May I ask who is calling and what the call is in reference to?" she asked.

"My name is Luther Garatdjian and it is about my life. I need to make an appointment."

"I see," the secretary said. She asked for the spelling of his last name and put him on hold. The hold was a long one. He could only imagine Dean Fletcher guessing the nature of the call and trying to figure out a way not to see him. Who wanted to meet with a reject? But the secretary came back on the line and said the dean would see him the following week.

"At some point you must accept reality," Dr. Dressler said.

"What reality?"

"Maybe you are not good enough for that law school."

"Stop it. Stop it. You are killing me," he said.

"You are killing yourself," Dr. Dressler said.

"Were you born mean?" Luther asked.

"No one is as mean as you," she replied.

"Oh, what am I doing here?"

"Yes, what are you doing here? That is as good a place as any to end this session," she said, closing her notebook.

As the bus entered the Lincoln Tunnel, he imagined the walls crumbling and the foul water of the Hudson River quickly pouring in. A view of old, sad-looking towns and marshland poisoned by the toxic chemical plants and refineries awaited him on the other side. It wasn't right that the world should be so ugly, laid out with roadways for cars and trucks and buses to roar about on, turning the air gray every day. New Jersey was for the dead and dying and shunned. He didn't want to be forgotten, left to live in obscurity. Leaving New York City was like giving up a front row orchestra seat for the far reaches of the balcony.

Famous. He wanted to be famous, or at least seen. Invisibility was a kind of death. Before receiving the rejection letter he had begun to see law school, and the tunnel vision it required, as a graveyard where his true ambition, a writing career, would be buried. But law school represented confirmation that the world wanted him. It was a way of packaging his life. He was afraid what too much failure would do to him. He saw what the failure he had met with had already done. He had thrown himself at the world and grown more and more cowed and depressed as the evidence mounted that the world was indifferent and even outright rejecting of him.

Dean Fletcher received him in his office. Dean Fletcher was God, though he didn't look like God as Luther imagined God, not with his mild, cautious manner and blond hair. And yet he was God, having given Luther all his pain and being the only one who could take it away.

“What can I do for you?” Dean Fletcher asked.

The question lacked warmth. It was hard to find any hope in it. “That’s what I’m here to try to find out. I feel I received from you assurance last year, when I was wait-listed, that I would be admitted to the law school this year. Instead I got placed on the waiting list again. I’m very disappointed. I feel my whole life has been on hold, and now I’m worried I won’t get in.”

“Why do you want to come to this law school?”

“Because it would offer me a quality education at an affordable tuition.”

“And why have you chosen to enter the field of law.”

Luther thought to tell Dean Fletcher about how, since childhood, it had been his ambition to right the wrongs that Simon Weill had been visiting on his family. But that would have been yesterday’s answer, as dated as last year’s newspaper. He thought of saying he wanted to become a lawyer so he could help people, but he would have had to shout “Liar! Liar!” immediately afterward, as he saw by now that he was only, or primarily, concerned with himself. “It’s a field, I sense, in line with my abilities and in which I may be able to do some good,” he said. A lie too, perhaps, but not so great he would have to denounce himself.

Dean Fletcher surprised him with a smile. “I will see what I can do. You’ll be hearing in a few days,” he said, and rose to signal that the meeting was over.

The girl Maggie brought up her parents again. Would he come meet them for dinner? But he saw that he had made himself something he wasn’t by telling her about law school and his writing activity. He had made himself into a liar and her father, being a full professor and thus a true intellectual, would see what his daughter could not, that Luther was a sham. Maybe her father even knew Dean Fletcher, who would tell him how Luther begged to get into his law school. In any case, she had no right to make him adopt a third family when the two he already had were more than enough. He could not take his betrayal of Sarah to that level. He had his limits. And so he said yes when he really meant no, wanting to sleep with her too much to be honest.

They did it the other way that night, a way he had never done it with Sarah or any other girl. Maggie said she wanted to do it that way, too. She didn't say if she had done it that way before, and it wasn't for him to ask, though he wanted to. After a while she said she was sore, and so he stopped. Although she didn't say so, he had gone too fast and too hard. It bothered him to think that that in taking his pleasure he had caused her pain, and that it had been left to her to tell him. What did it mean that it was in his nature to do such a thing? He thought of Dr. Dressler. It wasn't anything to discuss with her. God only knew what she would say. Not true. He knew very well what she would say.

"He took pity on you," Dr. Dressler said.

"Pity?" Dean Fletcher had come through for him. A letter of acceptance had come.

"He saw how desperate you were. Did you thank him?"

"Sure I thanked him."

"Gratitude does not come naturally to you. It is an old-fashioned virtue young people dismiss."

“That’s not true.”

“Name one thing you’re grateful for.”

“I’m grateful I’m not you.”

“Do you care to explain?”

“I’m sorry. That is not true. I’m grateful to have this room to come to three times a week and to have you as a composite of my three older sisters.”

“In what way am I a composite of your three older sisters?”

“Don’t ask me things I cannot say.”

“What can’t you say?”

“Some women hit with their hands. Some women hit with their mouths.”

“Are you saying that I hit you?”

“Never mind.”

“What never mind? We are here to discuss such things.”

Hitting was her birthright. He would never ask her to give up such a thing.

Lewdness was now part of the fabric of his life. The Summer of Love had given him permission to fall on the floor and “ball” (the hideousness of that term), and in his mind it was linked with another turning point, that summer night in the late 1950s he and the other children had taken flight from Pastor’s Chernenko’s fiery sermon in the aluminum-sided tabernacle in the Catskills and flocked to the meadow for the kissing and other activities twelve-year-olds were capable of. But this growing preoccupation with sex worried him. Hemingway hadn’t been lewd, nor had Fitzgerald or Faulkner. Yes, Henry Miller had filled his pages with bawdy yip yap, but he was an anomaly whose winning personality shone through. Now too there was Philip Roth, with Portnoy's Complaint, but he overpowered you with his comic genius and intelligence. There were social mores but Luther was coming to see there were also literary mores. It was all right for others to be sex-driven, but the main character generally had to possess a core of moral fitness. Being in there with the rabble meant automatic dismissal. And Dr. Dressler herself had said he was immoral.

Sex. It was like drinking. It was what you turned to when you couldn't turn to anything else.

And intelligence. You had to have that. You could play-act at failure, but the reader had to know you had the goods, however little you did with them. Otherwise the reader could not love you.

"We're going out tonight, Luther. We're doing something big, but I'm not going to tell you what," Brenda said.

He had stopped by the penthouse to visit with his brother, but Luke had stepped out.

"What's big, Momma? Tell me." Her son, Benjy, raced into the room. He was three years old and cross-eyed.

"The world is big," Brenda said.

Benjy's little body felt hard when Luther lifted him. The boy pulled off Luther's glasses and threw them on the floor and laughed.

“Benjy, you shouldn’t do that. Apologize to Luther,” Brenda said.

The boy made no apology. He flopped onto the bed and buried his face in the quilt after Luther had put him down. Luther did not hold out too much hope for the boy, conceived as he had been in the womb of selfishness and his father, Lenny Cerone, having a proclivity for con artistry and heroin.

“Where will he stay tonight?” Luther asked.

“With my mother,” Brenda said. “Do you like this blouse?”

“Sure I like it,” Luther said, of the skimpy white blouse through which he could faintly see the cups of her bra.

“I bought two of them. I like the cut, the way it shows me off a little bit. Don’t you?”

“I do,” he said, hesitation in his voice. He sensed she possessed a defense as thin as her blouse against sex. It was the language she spoke in.

“Why do I have to stay with Grandma?” Benjy had rolled over onto his back.

“You like Grandma and she likes you. That’s why.”

“But Grandpa smells bad.”

“It’s just for the night,” Brenda said.

Brenda’s mother was a thick-set, careworn woman. Her sad, defeated face testified to the difficulty of her life, having a husband come home with a load on after spending his evening in the Irish bar down on One Hundred Ninth Street and Broadway drinking whiskey with beer for a chaser. It was said by Luke that Brenda had a hard time being with her father, especially alone, and that he was a man who had crossed lines with her.

“I should be going,” Luther said.

“Are you sure? Luke won’t be gone long.”

“No, I need to be going. Tell him I stopped by.”

“OK. I’m still looking forward to meeting your girlfriend,” Brenda said.

“That will happen. It’s just a little hard right now. She goes to school in Boston.”

“Luke says she’s really pretty and talented, too.” Brenda’s grin increased his discomfort.

“Well, I agree.”

“It must be hard being apart like that. So many things can happen when people are apart. You know what I mean?”

“Sure. I know what you mean,” Luther said.

Out on Broadway he saw Luke coming out of a liquor store on the other side of the street with his purchase in a brown bag. Luther didn’t feel obliged to call to him. Luke and Brenda had their evening planned out. He had his own.

Adult films had begun to appear in some of the movie theaters around the city. Names like Philly Foxes and Nancy the Nympho had begun to appear on marquees. When the thought of such a film came to his mind, he would run to it, the way he would to a bar or liquor store when his mind turned to alcohol. But you couldn’t just duck into the theater. You had to pay the admission price at the ticket window right there on the street where passersby would see you. He learned to glance at the ticket price as he walked past so he could turn over the exact amount to expedite the transaction. And he also learned to wait until the street wasn't packed with pedestrians. It wouldn't do to be seen going into such a theater. It wouldn't do at all.

Big Broadway theaters that once filled with laughter were now as silent as a tomb. No smell of hot dogs or popcorn, as the refreshment stands were closed. On the dirt-flecked screens no coming attractions, and in the seats only men sitting scattered and separate, feasting on carnal images of women taking giant penises in their mouths and their vaginas and sometimes in the third place.

Among these men Luther sat, feeling the same arousal provided the porn did not feature drug-addicted street walkers like those out on Eighth Avenue wearing enormously high heels and garish makeup. He wanted on the screen normal-looking women such as you would find on an Ivy League campus. He wanted to believe what he didn't fully believe, in spite of his own experience, that women as well as men actually liked sex. Did they not simply tolerate semen in their mouths but actually enjoy the taste? And was that a grimace or a smile of pleasure when the man stuck his giant penis in her butt? If it was the former, then the scene would be ruined for him. He was there to witness pleasure, not pain.

He stared at the sturdy black phone. Every month now he paid his bill promptly so that the folks at New York Telephone would see that he was a trustworthy customer. He no longer relied on stolen credit card numbers for his long-distance calls to Boston. If indeed his activity at the office amounted to little more than thievery, and he generally didn't believe that was so, it had nonetheless made a dependable man of him with his creditors.

Sometimes he would reposition the phone on the small round table Vera had given him so he could only see its back while lying down. Other times he would turn it so the dial was visible. Such delight his phone gave him. Happiness was in feeling safe, and the phone was a visible symbol of that safety.

Not that he always felt so safe anymore. Following the break-in, management had replaced the old wooden door with a plainer, unpainted door little more than balsa wood. But he had gone and bought a police lock, the kind with an iron bar that extended from the lock itself to a groove in the floor. He told himself that the lock would provide the necessary deterrent from unwanted visitors.

But on this day he wasn't deriving any pleasure from the phone, however it was positioned. He was thinking about Maggie. One minute he was intent on calling her. The next he considered that he should just leave her alone. But he needed to find out that her door was closed. He owed it to himself—and to her—to let her hurt him, as he had hurt her. The situation called for it.

“Hi,” he said.

“Oh, it's you.” She was not a nasty or unkind person, not by nature. He had led her to this pass. He could accept that this was so.

“I just called to say hello.” Just. He wanted the word back.

“Did you?”

“How are you? Are you OK?”

“Sure I am.”

“I’m glad to hear. What are you doing?”

“What am I doing?”

“Right. I mean, you don’t have to answer.”

“What are you doing?”

“Me? Nothing.” He answered as if had been an accusation.

“What do you want?”

“I don’t know. I thought maybe...”

“Look, Luther, I don’t think we have much to say to each other. Do you?”

“Maybe we could get together and talk?”

“I have plans for this evening.”

“Plans?”

“I’m going out with friends.”

“I’ll call another night.”

“I don’t think so, Luther. Don’t call here anymore. OK?”

“OK. I’m sorry.”

“Don’t be sorry.”

“But I am. I feel I hurt you.”

“It’s OK. It really is. Now goodbye.”

He didn’t like that word goodbye. He didn’t like it at all. Not at that moment he didn’t.

The girl said, “Are you interested in me or only in my body?” as she stood naked before him.

“Can I be interested in both?” he asked.

The girl, a different one, said, “You should see yourself. You really, really should.” He had taken her photograph in Central Park and persuaded her to come back to his apartment. She was not laughing when she said what she did to him.

The girl, again a different one, said, “No, don’t do that,” when he moved down between her legs with his mouth.

The girl, a very different girl, said, “Oh, oh, oh, I didn’t know it could feel this good. Oh, oh.”

The woman—she was no longer a girl—said, “OK,” when he followed her out of the bar and asked if he could ride with her in the cab she had hailed. She lived in a big loft in a terra cotta building on Prince Street. Six other women lived in the same loft, in sheet-rocked rooms. He made love to the woman that night in her bed, a sheeted mattress on the floor. In the morning he woke alone. The sun came strong through the skylight and was a torment. His head ached from all the wine of the night before. He found the woman in the kitchen in a terrycloth robe drinking from a carton of milk.

“Who are you?” he said.

“I’m Elsie.”

“Where are you from?”

“Indiana.”

“Why are you here?”

“To make my way in the art world as a painter.”

“There is no art world in Indiana?”

“There is only basketball in Indiana. And my alcoholic ex-husband.”

“Why do you call him such a name?”

“What name? Alcoholic? Because he is one.”

“Why is he one?”

“Because he just is. And you’re one too, though you are just starting out.”

She had said a word she wasn’t supposed to say. He went away from the woman and returned home and knelt in front of the toilet bowl, where he threw up.

“Oh, God, I won’t do this again. Please help me. Please help me,” he prayed. He then lay on the floor before crawling into bed.

The woman—she had been a girl when he knew her in college but now she wasn’t—said, “I’m an alcoholic.” Right there on Broadway did she say such a thing to him, and with a smile of acceptance to accompany her admission. In the long ago she had been walking about the campus with the collected poems of T. S. Eliot clasped to her chest. In that time she had said that her boyfriend had twenty-five pairs of underwear, and expressed a desire to buy for Luther a jacket to protect him from the winter cold. He would always remember her for that. But now she was telling him this, and this too he would remember.

“It doesn’t compute,” Luther said.

“What doesn’t compute?”

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

He had seen the girl wandering back and forth along a dreary stretch of sidewalk not far from where he lived and so brought her home with him. “I don’t do that with boys or with anyone,” she said, when he touched her.

“Is sex so important?” the woman said. He had met her in a bar. She had a French accent, and so he listened to her carefully.

“Yes,” he said, and went ahead.

He said to Nadia, the girl from upstairs, “I want to photograph you naked. Can you do that for me?” She would always be back there in that time when she was a girl, at least for him.

“Why?” she said.

“Because I have to.”

“Why do you have to?”

“Because I see the photograph, I really do, and I can’t get it out of my mind.”

He felt strong with Nadia, and she surrendered to his confidence. She shed her blouse, her skirt, everything.

He took the photograph right there in her apartment, in natural light, using a slow exposure. The photograph turned out well. Though she was naked, not too much of her showed. A nude, yes, but not an explicit nude, not a pornographic nude. And yet it was sensual, Nadia sitting cross-legged on a chair in the afternoon light in her apartment, her image reflected in a mirror.

In addition to writing, Luther had enrolled in a photography course at the New School. The instructor had won acclaim for a photo essay on a community in Spanish Harlem. He was admiring of the photograph but he also said, “Did you get her permission to circulate this print? You understand that you are not free to do that without her consent? That would be immoral as well as against the law. You do understand that, don’t you?”

“I...I don’t know...”

“What don’t you know? That it’s illegal and immoral?”

The instructor’s words hit Luther hard. He had opened Luther’s eyes, making him see he was a thief in more ways than one and that his thievery had no beginning and no end.

But there were other thieves in the world. It didn’t make his thievery any less, but they were there. How did he know? He called Nadia one night and asked her if he could come upstairs and be with her. When he arrived, Nadia opened the door but offered neither a greeting nor a smile.

“Is something wrong?” Luther said.

“You. You are wrong,” she said.

“I am wrong?” It was the first time she had directed anything like peeve at him.

“Everyone is wrong. I am wrong,” Nadia said.

“What is going on?”

Nadia did not live in a void. She did have people in her life, in addition to the Rumanian piano player about whom she fantasized. There was a couple who came to visit her, a loud, brash woman of sizable girth and her thin, introverted boyfriend. The woman had proposed to Nadia several times that she join them for a ménage a trois. The woman finally bent Nadia to her will and now Nadia wanted nothing more to do with the woman or her boyfriend or anyone.

“It was disgusting,” Nadia said, and began to cry.

“I wonder what will happen to all of us,” Luther said.

“What are you talking about now?” Nadia said.

“I don’t really know. It was all I could think to say,” Luther said.

Nadia began to laugh through her tears. “Did you bring some wine?” she said.

“Oh yes. Hearty burgundy. I think it will be pretty good,” he said.

Nadia laughed some more. “I like it when you come to me. Sometimes.”

They drank the wine and smoked some grass and lay together for a while.

When you come to me. In the smoke heaven he had entered those words became so big, so revealing of the secret of the universe. Of course, of course. You must go to it.

In Central Park he met a woman whose skin was so pale as to make him believe she did not keep daylight hours, though in fact it was daylight when they met. She took him home, where they made love. "For many years my brother and I did this every day, and some days more than once," she said to Luther. When he remained silent, she said, "Don't you want to say something? Don't you?"

"My sisters do not look like you," he finally said. It was all he could think to say. She too was some sort of secret of the universe, her strange, out-of-the-way life a quiet respite from the roaring trucks.

"You're with me for a reason. Just remember that," the woman said. "You're a dink, just like me. You're just a taller dink."

"A dink?" Luther said.

"You heard me," the woman said.

Central Park was not his alone. Roberto had found it as well. By Bethesda Fountain Luther saw him one afternoon.

"Remember me, Gargoyle?"

In the three years since Luther had left that apartment, Roberto was beginning to have the appearance of a derelict. His hair had grown to a ball of steel wool and his front teeth were chipped and stained. He neither shaved nor bathed, judging from the unpleasant facial hair and the oily sheen of his skin.

"I do," Luther said. One thing hadn't changed. Roberto still had that smile that said he was on top of things even as he edged toward the cliff. The smile of a lunatic, of someone well defended against the truth. But Luther softened. That smile was all Roberto had. For some reason he didn't have the gift of connection. He didn't know how to say he was afraid or hurt or what was on his mind. Just that smile. That damn stupid smile.

"All I have to do is flash and they come to me," Roberto said.

"Flash what?"

"You know what I mean, Gargoyle. Don't pretend you don't. I show them my thing and they can't resist. Then I take them to my pad right here in the park."

"You have a pad here in the park?"

"It's my very own, and beautifully furnished. I make sure they come and go blindfolded so they can't find their way back."

"I'm worried about you, Roberto."

"No, you're worried about yourself, motherfucking gargoyle."

"Maybe you're right." Seeing Roberto was only seeing some more horrible version of himself and made him want to flee. "Goodbye," Luther said.

"Goodbye, Gargoyle. And remember, it's all about symbolic logic." The anger that had briefly frozen Roberto's face was gone. The imbecilic smile had returned.

On the terrace, near the fountain, an outdoor café served sangria by the pitcher. How happy it made him to come to the park after a morning of working on his manuscripts and sit by himself at a table watching strollers gather around the fountain. He stayed in the recess of the café in case Roberto showed up, but on this day, a week after their encounter, Roberto was nowhere to be seen.

The fountain was where he had come after the high school commencement at the Barbizon Plaza, just south of the park. He remembered that awful scene with Mr. Sadowski, how his basketball coach had approached and said he would be proud to have a son like him. The nerve of him saying such a thing. The nerve. But nerve wasn't quite the right word, was it? More the pain of him saying such a thing. Even six years later it came as a shock that Mr. Sadowski had dared to care. And then fleeing from Mr. Sadowski, well-meaning Mr. Sadowski with those tears in his eyes. Just fleeing from him and all of them and the chance he had blown to make something of his life, to be better than the garbage he was with his low SAT score. Fleeing from Mr. Sadowski and his mother and all his Yale- and Harvard-bound classmates. Fleeing, just fleeing the unbearable intimacy of that moment.

He had trouble with the long set of stairs leading away from the terrace. Now that he was out of the shade, the overhead sun was brutal. His legs had turned to lead; his whole being felt sodden. He sank down on one of the steps.

"Are you all right?" he heard a woman say.

He nodded, without looking up.

"Are you feeling sick? Do you need a doctor?"

"He needs a cup of coffee. He's drunk. Come on, Louise." A man's voice.

He made his way up the remaining stairs and found a bench near the band shell on which to sit. "Help me," he heard himself say. Over and over did he say the same thing.

From nearby came a voice. "You here to hear my music, Gargoyle?" On the deserted stage of the crumbling band shell stood Roberto in dark glasses, strumming his imaginary guitar. Luther eased away. “Hey, Gargoyle, I’m only warming up,” Roberto called out.

Sarah and her family serving as an anchor, of sorts. They were given a trip to Puerto Rico by Sarah’s mother. Luther thanked Lydia but she said, “It’s not for you. It’s a gift for my daughter on her graduation from art school.” Luther told himself Lydia wasn’t trying to hurt him but only to explain, and yet he was hurt, he was very hurt. The way she had said my daughter, as if to make Sarah hers and separate and apart from him and at the same time to make clear that he was not family, he was not anyone to her. He felt like a big sloppy dog running excitedly to his master only to receive a kick. But Lydia was not his master, and he was not a dog. And yet she was, and he was. He would be more careful. He would be on guard. After all, they had compared him to their maid.

They stayed three nights at the El Convento, in San Juan. Because the beaches in and around the city were polluted, they drove to a sandy stretch thirty miles away, where he underestimated the potency of the sun and was badly burned. It was a day before the torment began to end.

From San Juan they drove across the island to Ponce, where they were startled by the black and red Moorish firehouse, and on to Mayaguez. En route, in the hills, he pulled off the road to relieve himself, and heard, from somewhere far above, someone call, “Yo, hippie.” Though the voice was playful, it was cause for uneasiness that he—they—were being watched by unseen forces who could, if they chose, as they clearly did, play with them, as that meant they could also possibly do worse. He didn’t entirely trust an island with a passion for cockfighting, creatures with razor-sharp metal talons set loose in a confined space to tear each other to pieces for the amusement of the spectators. Some blood lust there.

Sarah had her own thing going on. It came suddenly, with virulence and viciousness, as if a door within her opened and something new and dangerous was let out.

“Do you want this plate in your face, mister? Do you?”

They were in a restaurant. Chicken with rice had been served them.

“What have I done?” Luther said.

“Shut up,” she hissed. Her eyes were ablaze. “Those homosexuals at the next table? They are listening. Do you hear me? They are listening.”

Luther did see two men at a table not so close to their own, but they were talking animatedly with each other, seemingly unconcerned with the life around them.

“Why do you say that?” No sign of eavesdropping was apparent. And Luther couldn't say the men struck him as being clearly homosexual, if anyone could verifiably know such a thing at a glance.

“I said shut up and I mean shut up.”

Luther ate quietly, and Sarah did the same, though she did not spare him periodic glares. The situation was preposterous but her pain was evident, and so he did not dare laugh, though he wanted to. That would have been so wrong, to laugh at his girlfriend's pain. But laughter came from a mysterious place, just like her paranoia. That was the word he was looking for. Paranoia. Her father had a strain of it and so did she.

Her father. Did he have something to do with this? Luther could only believe that he did, though he could not exactly say why.

On the trip he thought: her neck is short, her shoulders big, and her hips those of a boy. Why have I not seen this before?

On the trip she said: "I can put the blocks together a hundred times faster than you. Remember that."

Those words. They had come from a different place. It was her place, just not a place she showed him every day. In fact she had not showed it to him before. It was a place that lay there in waiting, a place from which she could strike him dead if she chose. She had crashed through his gates with those words; she had launched her Tet offensive, said she knew all about him and there was nothing he could do about it.

Lydia came back to Peter with the proviso that she could keep the lover she had found through the personals ads in the Village Voice. She did not give Peter clobber, but she did not give him exclusive love either. The lover's name was Ron Howell. He was a black man with a solid build. Luther saw the three of them together at the Riverside Drive apartment one afternoon. No one got killed. Then Lydia and Peter and Ron Howell spent a weekend together at Camp as well, and no one got killed there either.

Lydia wrote in her journal: Now I can have my eros and my love. My life is finally whole and complete.

How did Luther know? Because he read her journal. He read his girlfriend's mother's journal.

Then Ron Howell disappeared. Nothing of a violent or criminal nature had happened. Lydia came to see that she couldn't have her eros and her love, or that Eros maybe was a fleeting thing.

Luther came to see...Luther couldn't say what he had come to see.

Then Peter went and got famous. Genius entered and filled the solitary spaces of his life. He wrote a play, and after an out-of-town tryout, it was brought to Broadway by a director whom Lydia and Peter had met back when summer stock was alive and well at the Phoenicia Playhouse. Bill Buhle possessed a hunger for the bright lights of Broadway going back to his childhood in an impoverished town in east Texas. He was hard as glass and just as brittle, in Luther's eyes, a man who had no time or appetite for the likes of him. But Peter could command Bill Buhle with his beauty, and then there was Lydia to keep him warm with her unreserved receipt of him.

The play featured a president pulled from the graveyard of history. His name was Woodrow Wilson, but his real name was Agony; he was tortured day and night by his decision as a man of peace to send young men to war.

"Thy will, not mine. Show me Thy will," the president prayed.

History was a light shed on the past so it could be fully understood while the earth rotated through space where oblivion, not contemplation, awaited.

Or history was a hot iron applied to a wrinkled shirt, so it could be worn presentably. Was that what history was, too?

The God stuff stirred memories of varnished wood pews in which men and women wailed for Jesus, the tumult causing Luther to worry not only for them but for the world, because if grownups were crying, what hope was there for children? Bad things happening in the skies and on the earth to make these adults cry.

But Peter sent Woodrow Wilson to his knees, right there on a Broadway stage. The play was about faith, or the lack of faith. Luther heard the same despair and barrenness as he did in an Ingmar Bergman film.

Lydia's eros, Ron Howell, may have been gone, that love falling away like a dead leaf. Lenore was surely gone. Lydia's life as it could have been, with her actors equity card and people begging her to stay on the stage, was gone. But Peter, the agent of her pain, her failed god, was not gone. He was still there and he had lurched from the graveyard of history and brought it with him into the realm of the living in invading her domain. Luther saw the tremble in Lydia's hand and the distress in her face. He saw how inhospitable her mind and being had become to Peter's success.

The play did not have a long run. The reviews were not favorable. Pedantic. Strange. Irrelevant. A real yawner. Words like this were applied to Peter's play so the obscurity he had known could reclaim him.

"Lydia wants me to teach. She has always wanted me to be part of the world," Peter said to Luther. "But there is no place in the world for someone such as me, no place whatsoever."

Luther did not say to Peter, "Why is that?" A question could be begging to be asked and yet not be called for. Besides, Peter was surely hearing the question without Luther asking it. In that moment, feeling Peter's anxiety, Luther wanted to hold him and protect him from the cold that awaited him. He did not want to see Peter try to enter the world in middle age lost and confused and rendered sad and ordinary in his own sight by teaching a bunch of community college students or whatever he would be assigned to do. He wanted Peter to remain inviolate in that Riverside Drive apartment and at Camp, whose grounds he had sculpted to conform to his ideal of beauty. He surely did not want Lydia to cut Peter loose so he would have to see how little he was worth in the world. That would have been too cruel. Lydia and Peter were not his parents, but they were like his parents. Luther wanted them to stay together. He did not want them creating anymore earthquakes in his mind with their fissures and fractures.

“Luther, between you and me I don't believe in psychiatry. It is but a tool to preserve the capitalist order when you analyze it,” Peter said.

“How is that?” Luther allowed himself to ask.

“Because you have to be part of the system in order to afford it,” Peter answered.

Luther did not tell Peter about the Karen Horney Clinic or the three dollars per hour he paid. He had no spirit of contradiction going where Peter was concerned.

Lydia was herself out in the world, teaching reading, writing, and math skills to children in a remedial learning program. Dr. Norton, her therapist, had encouraged her, now that the children were in college, to engage with society through work. Her employer encouraged her to stay on in the education field and was willing to pay her tuition should she enroll at Teachers College, but she declined. Teaching minority children by day and taking courses in the evening toward a master's degree in education was more of a commitment than she wanted. She had raised a family on her inheritance. She was done.

With the money he was extracting from the building. Luther made frequent trips to Willoughby's, near Grand Central Station, where weary-looking salespersons with cynical faces filled his orders for Nikons cameras and lenses, and even a Bolex 16 mm Bolex. Somewhere he had read that it was the top-of-the-line hand-held camera for independent filmmakers.

Colin Westland was a filmmaker. At least his character was in the novel he had published. And so it was for Luther to follow in Colin's footsteps even if the gifts that had been bestowed on him were not of a kind or quality that Colin possessed. A writer, a filmmaker, and a photographer he could be. He didn't have to be tied down to just one thing.

New York University offered a summer filmmaking course, led by an old man with gray skin and gray hair. Aram Manoogian had made a name for himself in the film industry as a young man, but over the years slowly succumbed to the security of a faculty position. It had been decades since his last movie, and he had seemingly made peace with the reality that his former life was forever behind him. Such effusiveness he displayed when addressing the group. Was joy an Armenian trait, Luther wondered, or did young people dependent on his guidance offer him a sense of reprieve from a sense of uselessness? And why did Aram Manoogian look so dirty and to be disintegrating right before Luther's eyes? Why did he so clearly throw himself at his students? Where was the dignity in an old man acting like a clown in trying to make young people like him? And Luther had another question: why was the laughing thing so fierce in him at the very thought of the old man? He saw once again that he didn't believe in Armenians and that they were a virtually exterminated race, the remnant so beaten as to be useless in the world, as was the grinning old fool. To be a Jew was something; to be an Armenian was to be a hairy joke.

"You're so contemporary," his sister Vera sneered at him, when he shot a clip of her twirling in a room and then stand in a chalk-drawn circle on the street. But he couldn't build on the idea. It lacked a structure. Things fell down or fell apart as soon as he thought of them.

The film projector at the school defeated him. He fumbled trying to thread the loops, and grew self-conscious when he sensed the eyes of others on him. Once again he was defenseless against the truth that the performance part of the intelligence test had revealed.

"Let me help you," a woman said, and quickly wound the film through the threads, as she had done on her own.

"Thank you," he said.

"Don't mention it," she said.

So many secrets to conceal. The flatness of his head. The emptiness of his mind.

And yet he did have thoughts, even if they were not good ones.

During this time he took several photographs of Vera. Head shots, not the nude kind that he had taken of Nadia. Vera photographed well. She did not flinch with the lens on her and the camera responded by capturing her even more favorably than real life.

Some days later he went back to her for another photograph, but she said no. When he pressed the matter, she said, “Get some help” and hung up the phone. The photography sessions had drawn him close to her, but now she had pushed him away. More than that, she had inflicted on him another defeat, and he understood it was all his fault. With her sharp listening device, she had heard his anger sickness and laid him low with the club of her imperative.

That she could beat him in this way. But she was not the only one.

He fell in with two other students, Enrico and the woman who had assisted him with the projector. Hadley was her name; it had the sound of classy English distinction to it, if also a touch of manliness. Enrico had a leg up on all of them, if photography skills were transferable to the medium of filmmaking, with a portfolio of museum-quality prints, full of those rich blacks, grays, and whites that would have made Edward Weston, master of the zone system, proud. The things he photographed were mundane—a streetlamp, a driveway, a parked car, a tricycle left on the lawn of a suburban home—but his technique gave them a profundity that entered you into a space of meditative stillness.

That portfolio. It was a credential but also a weapon. It set Enrico apart as a man among boys. But a small man, round-shouldered, with the sliver lips and fixed gaze of the predator. The kind who could hurt you from the smallness of his being. Luther wanted to like Enrico, but he mostly feared him, Enrico being a man as connected as Luther was at loose in the world. Luther struggled to minimize Enrico in his mind, so he could have some room for his own existence. He told himself that Enrico might be a gifted photographer but that didn't mean he was America's chosen one.

Luther wondered if Hadley might be in love with Enrico, especially after she saw his portfolio. She struck Luther as a woman oriented toward excellence and with the eyes and ears for finding it. Fear and resentment had built in his heart toward her since the episode with the projector, as a manly man woman of her kind could have no room in her heart for him. At best she might see him as a feckless child. Actually, he had no idea what Hadley was thinking or not thinking, but her steady gaze unnerved him and led him to believe she was seeing into his vault of secrets and drawing conclusions based on her findings. At times he wanted to come out into the open with his hands up, like a holed-up bandito who throws in the towel. Subterfuge—call it image—could not stand up under such scrutiny.

But one day he did come out of hiding, or it came out of hiding, not through any conscious decision-making process but because it just appeared. He arrived late for class and the auditorium was abuzz. Aram Manoogian was in rapture over a short film of Enrico's that had just been screened. He said the film was one of the finest things he had seen in all his years at the school. Luther wasn't prepared for such a development. He had no time to process his emotions and keep them from flooding his face. And there Hadley was with her clinically observant gaze.

"Enrico, everyone, look at Luther. Just look at him," Hadley shouted, and quickly not only Enrico but the whole room was staring at Luther.

“That’s not nice,” Luther said quietly to Hadley.

“Not nice? Not nice? What’s not nice is the envy written all over your face,”

Hadley retorted.

Back in his apartment, Luther opened a bottle of red wine. As he drank, he remembered a summer from his childhood and a pickup game he was part of on one of the baseball diamonds down in Riverside Park. Something had gone wrong. Some kid hadn’t done what he wanted him to do. He couldn’t quite remember. What was clear was that he had walked off the field while the game was still in progress, just as he some years later he quit a basketball game in high school because things hadn’t been going his way. It was all right. It had to be all right to be the way he was, a quitter when things, when the world, didn’t go his way. And all those people out there just waiting to do him dirty. That was all right, too. He deserved what he had gotten for being around a person like Hadley with her penetrating power. He didn’t have to kill himself just because life wanted him to.

Claire never did kill him for his indiscretion in requesting to lie between her thighs that traumatic night. She did not go to Sarah with his blunder but simply placed the incident in her sealed vault in the way that oldest sisters can do. And so Sarah remained with him and he remained with her despite all that was going on in his life and all that was happening in hers, their love surviving the hideously mournful “Hey Jude” and “Bridge Over Troubled Waters” and the tortured vocals of Blood, Sweat, and Tears. “I love you,” he said to her, all the time, and “I love you,” she said to him, some of the time. He did not make love to Sarah and then run from her but had a need to stay beyond the act itself, and she was the same way, and even if they were both beginning to have other thoughts, they still saw no way out but to be together. When he was with her, he was home. She was still the America of his dreams, the one for whom he had grown emotionally configured.

But he also remained in love with the mystery of women and the adventure of knocking on their doors so he might discover who they really were. Sex was as much a journey into the unknown as drinking and being stoned. And so, for the magic to happen, he had to be at the bar every night drinking his shell glasses of wine. On those nights he returned home alone he would emerge from the subway at Fifty-seventh Street and Eighth Avenue and stop off at a twenty-four diner next to the newspaper stand and order fried eggs over easy with bacon and whiskey down, as the counterman called rye toast. Ravenous, he would devour the food and soon thereafter be in bed, the clock often showing three or four a.m. when finally he passed out.

Late to bed meant late to rise, often not before noon. Though it made him unhappy, the cycle was one he could not seem to break.

“Don’t worry. You’ll get up when there are real demands on your time,” Dr. Dressler said. By that she meant the discipline, the tunnel vision, that attendance at law school would impose.

And yet, as the reality of this new phase of his life loomed, he grew more reticent. “White line, continue” had taken hold of him, the few hours a day he could spend pecking at the keys of his L. C. Smith office machine. He should postpone his dream of a writing life, and all the satisfaction it gave him, for the rigorous demands of a dry, tedious curriculum? For three years he should forfeit his freedom for a straitjacket and, in so doing, give up the financial bonanza that the renting office had become? He should spend all his waking hours reading about writs and torts and other matters he had no real interest in when he could be reading paperback novels? He should remove himself from the spirit of his generation—wild and crazy abandon— for a buttoned-down existence? Was this not insanity, that he should try to be more than he was by entering a field he was no more suited for by temperament than he was by aptitude for science or math?

In the dream he sat on the terrace outside the law school building with two young men. The two were also students at the law school and had developed a hard masculine casing that made them impervious to everything but the task at hand. Whatever their inner reality, they did not strike him as the kind to ever be in gross dependence on women. Their lives were progressing in orderly fashion, each step carefully planned out. Calibration. Calculation. These were words Luther applied to these young men in bondage only to their ambition.

A feeling of unnaturalness persisted in Luther. The two were friends, he could see, from the ease of their rapport. Compact, self-contained young men who could live in the world of ideas and avoid lurching into ad hominem argument. A passage from one of the volumes of Remembrance of Things Past came to him in crude paraphrase; Proust noted that at some point in their lives, solitaires seek, often awkwardly, to integrate into society. And was that not Luther's situation? In entering law school, was he not giving up a state of being, a whole way of living in the world?

A forest bordered the law school, and from between the trees now came a barefoot goddess in a diaphanous white robe. Incredibly, she walked in a direct line toward him, her eyes locked on his, and held out her hand. He took it and she began to lead him away across the lawn and back toward the forest.

“But where are we going? I have law school to attend,” he cried out to the goddess. What else could he call a woman with such a graceful and ethereal manner?

“That is too common and unworthy a goal for you,” the goddess replied.

Dr. Dressler, as he might have expected, had a different take on Luther’s goddess.

“That was no goddess. That was just your arrogance and your cowardice,” Dr. Dressler said.

“My arrogance and my cowardice both? And they are both so beautiful and wear such a gown?”

“They come in many guises.”

“And your brutality comes with no disguise,” Luther said.

“Don’t chick out. Don’t chick out. Your fear is your only enemy.”

She was who she was, sometimes a scold and sometimes kind, and often a more benign version of his sister Hannah. Luther had no choice but to love her. However dark she might appear, she embraced life, she was out there in it, not hunkered down in that damn building like some of his older siblings. How frightful to be given life without also being given a life force. In her sometimes crude and even discouraging way, she was calling him into the light. Germans were like that, brimming with vitality, flocking to the beaches, scaling mountains, hard-wired for science and math and forcing these disciplines to yield their secrets. Well, the Nazis—that was another matter.

Roberto or no Roberto, Luther would not be kept from the park. It was his sanctuary and connection to childhood. That Labor Day weekend, he sat on the edge of the band shell stage and stared out at the empty seats. In another lifetime a plainclothes cop had slammed him to the ground with a flying tackle as an audience was enjoying an outdoor classical music concert. Prior to the ruckus, Luther had filled his mouth with water from a nearby fountain and spit it into the face of Jerry Jones-Nobleonian, then ran away helter-skelter. Jerry followed in full pursuit, wanting only to return the favor, and Luther turned over a garbage can to block his path. In so doing he brought himself to the attention of the plainclothes cop who, after flattening Luther, pulled him up by the back of his polo shirt and gave him a hard kick in the ass. To those cultivated classical music lovers who had gathered for a tranquil evening, he must have been an example of the juvenile delinquency that was plaguing New York City, just another piece of urban riffraff, but that wasn't who he was in Luther's memory. He would never abandon that child. That child was a fury of sweetness living within him.

A woman came to him that evening, making her way through the empty chairs. She too was alone in the city, except for her father, whom she had come to visit. She lived in Pittsburgh, she said, and Luther felt obliged to tell her he had been to that city, if only passing through on a Greyhound bus en route to the Mickey Owen baseball camp in Missouri, back in the summer following sixth grade. He didn't tell her of the unbearable homesickness that cut short his camp time or of the sight of his mother moaning in the living room on that hot summer night he returned home. She had been released only hours before from the hospital, where she had undergone an operation on the varicose veins in her right leg. The sight of those legs, with blue veins showing, was enough to make his stomach flip. There was no need to tell the stranger any such thing, but he did tell her about the flying tackle.

“You want me to love you but I’m only passing through,” the woman said.

“You don’t know what I want,” Luther said. NB—stopped here

“I feel so bruised and hurt,” she said, as if she hadn’t heard him.

“What about?” he said.

“None of your business,” she said.

He took her home with him. She needed no persuasion.

“Amor fati,” he said.

“What?” she said.

“Love of fate. I read that somewhere.”

“So?”

They passed through the narrow corridor of the front building and sat on the steps leading to the courtyard.

“You see that big windowless white building?” he said, pointing to the New York Telephone Building a block south that rose over the rows of tenements.

“Sure I see it,” she said.

“That’s the future trying to obliterate the past.”

“You have something against change?”

“Only that the past is always better. Always,” Luther said.

“Would you rather have a toothache in 1871 or 1971?” the woman said.

“I hadn’t thought of that,” Luther acknowledged.

“There’s a lot you haven’t thought of. You look smart but you aren’t smart.”

“Why do you say that?”

“I’m not the first person to tell you so, I’m sure.”

“No. You’re not,” he said.

“Don’t hang out in the past. It’s musty back there,” she said, exercising her right to a scary wisdom beyond her years.

They went inside, where she allowed him to make love to her after they both had entered smoke heaven. She was more hungry for contact than her impassive manner suggested. Her mouth flew open, as if she were a creature with a retractable jaw and might initiate a devouring, but he found a way forward, grateful for the gift she had made of herself. Luther thinking, I knocked on your door and you answered.

Afterward she wailed, “He left me. He left me,” as had Zoe, the museum girl with the pornography future.

“Who left you?” Luther said, as amplification was not forthcoming.

“Ronnie. My black hero. My liberator. He just left me.”

“When did he leave you, and why?” Luther felt the fear coming over him.

“His name was Arthur. My little white man. He had me in a box of his own making. He was finishing up his doctorate in engineering at Carnegie-Mellon, and thereafter we were to be married. But I was restless. I could not see myself as part of his package. I began stepping out. Do you know what I mean by stepping out? I suspect you do.”

“Please tell me,” Luther said.

“Stepping out means going out when you have every reason to stay home. It means the bar, not your home, has become your home. It means returning at 4 am with your makeup smeared and your clothes disheveled and the smell of another man on you. It means full rebellion against the servitude that has been placed on you by your fiancé. Have you ever heard a more ludicrous word in the English language? In fact it is so sissified we had to borrow it from the French.”

“So what happened?”

“One morning I came in the door and Arthur was waiting. With his back turned he said I would have to leave. It was hard for him to come to that place, but I had left him no choice. We both cried and I was gone that same day.”

“Gone where?”

“Gone to Ronnie. I had met him in the bar. He was an artist who could capture the whole world in a single drawing or just in his tone of voice. I guess that sounds extreme but he was just that way.”

The story was not one that Luther liked. He had wanted the woman to stay with Arthur, not bust loose for a life in the bars and with this mysterious artist Ronnie, whom Luther instinctively feared. In that moment he did not care for the woman and the chaos she had brought on herself but even more on Arthur.

“So what is the problem? You got what you wanted. You got Ronnie.”

“But that’s just it. Ronnie left me. He packed up and moved back South. I begged him to take me but he said he had to travel alone.”

“Do you ever think of going back to Arthur?”

“That’s over.”

“Does it have to be over?”

“Over is over.”

“I don’t like that, over is over,” Luther said.

“It will happen to you someday.”

“No, never. I will never leave her.”

“Her? There is a girl in your life?”

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“You will know,” the woman said.

“That’s what you say,” Luther said.

“Yes. That’s what I say,” the woman said.

The air smelled rank even after she had left. Talking to him that way. Trying to bust him loose into a future he did not want.

Free of city traffic and the crawl through the Lincoln Tunnel, the bus rolled toward Newark. His gray thoughts were a match for the gloomy spectacle of strip malls and refineries pouring poison from their stacks into the air and toxic swampland. And yet, suddenly he experienced a burst of light that brought with it joy that had eluded him since childhood. He would go to law school. He would stay the course. He would elevate in the world above the station he now occupied. He would expand beyond the confines of Manhattan into the greater world. His mother would be proud of him. Sarah would be proud of him. He would leave behind the lifestyle of easy money and late nights in the bars and sleeping until noon. His life would be full of purpose and industry. He would actually give something to Sarah and his mother. Jesus, they would be proud of him.

New students had gathered outside the law school building prior to the orientation. The warm early September day had turned beautiful, the sun having burned away the gray clouds. A happy buzz came from the gathered as Luther stood across the street. The motion of the bus had lifted his spirits, but now, on foot, the inner glow had dissipated, and once again he was afraid and conflicted. As a precaution, he stepped back even further. A little safety was good, but more was even better. How delicious that he knew who they were, these socializing students, but they didn't know who he was. And they needn't know and shouldn't know because then his safety would be gone; there would be no cloud cover to shield him from their bright, intense rays. Yes, he wanted to go over to them but no, he didn't want to at the same time, and what difference did it make what he wanted or didn't want. He couldn't cross over. He wasn't fit to cross over. He had bullied and badgered his way into the school. A person should never go where he was not wanted. Never. Not ever.

The peaceful clip-clop of a horse sounded in Luther's ears. Luther looked to see a mounted police officer approach on a big beautiful bay. For a while Luther followed, as if entranced by a metronome, the casual swishing of the horse's tail. Surely the law school had requested the officer's presence, given the sense of danger almost palpable in the riot-ravaged city. He had been sent to protect the precious enclave of mostly white students across the way.

As if reading Luther's mind, the officer expertly turned his mount and said, "You see those kids over there?"

"Yes," Luther said.

"I'll bet you wish you were one of them."

"Sure. I guess," Luther said.

"You've got to be smart to be on that side of the street and to want it. You understand what I'm saying?"

"Sure. Sure I do," Luther said, feeling the officer beginning to take control of him from his seat of power.

The horse had drawn the attention of several women from the law school, and as they approached Luther eased away.

As the bus looped down toward the entrance to the Lincoln Tunnel, a truck passed on the left. The name "Hemingway" was written on its side in red letters. A beautiful name. A one hundred percent American name. Not a name such as Garatdjian, lying amid bleached bones on desert sands. Luther took it as a sign, Hem showing him the way.

Others had signs. Others had wonders. Why shouldn't he have signs and wonders, too?

He returned that evening to the security of the familiar. Soon after his arrival in the renting office, Mr. Fitzpatrick showed his sweaty, ruined face, red with the wrath of God, in the window. "One good man, Luther. One good man. That's what your mother needs. I don't see you fitting that bill. I don't see it at all. I'm praying for her. I'm praying hard for her.” Mr. Fitzpatrick placed a pile of single dollar bills and a small mound of coins on the counter. “This is for two weeks’ rent. Two weeks. I always pay in advance. Money has to be earned, young man, earned. No freeloading in this country.”

Melvin followed right after. As if he had access to Luther’s mind, Melvin said, “He means well, but he is a Catholic. It does not do to have a woman like Mary as a saint. It doesn’t do to have any woman as a saint or any man for that matter. We cannot have that kind of hierarchy in Christianity. It leads only to deceit and ruination, the amassing of wealth for sin and worldly pleasure. Luther, would you like to come to my room for a prayer session and a glass of lemonade? Would you like to do that when you are through here?”

Luther thought of Melvin as a simple man without guile, and could see no hint of duplicity in his eyes. And yet the invitation to his room did set off an alarm bell. Was it possible Melvin didn’t know himself as well as he might? Suppose there was a beast dwelling in his basement dying to get out?

“Maybe another time,” Luther said, while holding to kinder feelings about Melvin than he had for Mr. Fitzpatrick.

He drank that night, as he did virtually every night now, at the downtown bar, with the money he had taken from the renting office. There were no women to pick up on this night. There were only the glasses of red wine he consumed and the rock and roll music from the jukebox. “Tapestry” was a favorite, the easy pathos of it. And the joy of “I Feel the Earth Move.” But some songs were stinky or at best to be endured, like “Bridge Over Troubled Water.” Well, maybe it was OK, like the licorice Chuckle in the middle of the pack, but definitely not up there with the cherry or orange or lemon or lime Chuckles. Definitely not. I'm free, he thought, as he lifted his glass.

But back home and lying in bed, he began to cry. After a while there were no more tears. They had come and they had gone. As he waited for sleep, he remembered a line from F. Scott Fitzgerald, something about taking the back door out of reality. He wondered what that might exactly mean but was asleep before his exploration could begin.

"Chick chick. Chicky chick. You chicked out."

In such a way did Dr. Dressler greet his news that he had not set foot in the law school before leaving the scene. He did not feel the need to tell her that her favorite expression was not quite correct. She had been banking on him to perform for her so she could go before her supervisors and cite the progress he had made while in her care. And now a sizable indicator of that progress was gone. Well, it was all right. Let her have her ire.

"How do you come to do such a thing? Do you know what you have done? You have walked away from your future. You will be nothing, a bum who steals money and writes nothing anyone wants to read. Is that how you want to spend your days?"

"A bindlestiff."

"What is that you say?"

"A hobo. A bum, as you call me."

"What is your plan?"

"White line continue. That is my plan."

“What?”

“Never mind.”

She had no children of her own. She had made him her child, her ugly child. But now she recoiled. He could feel her disowning him. It was OK. White line continue was more important than anything she might have to say about it or him.

Sarah continued with her own commitment. Her world was painting and sculpture. That was the world she had entered and could not leave. There was no sense asking her to. Lydia had tried and Lydia had gotten her answer. Sarah had flown out the door of the paste-ups and mechanicals studio at the end of the first day and had not gone back. She looked like her father and she had the same disposition toward the work world as her father. They were not made for any other world than the one they were in. She was entered in a fifth year competition at the art school. A panel of judges would evaluate her work in June of the following year. They would tell her if she had excellence or not. It sounded scary. Somehow Luther sensed that she would not win. The bloom was off her rose. True was true. All she had now was her hunger and her drive and her despair and desperation. The rest would not come to her. He did not say this. It was enough that he should know. Even so, she had more than enough. She had the gift of her genes. She had read The Nude more than once. She had a way of seeing that was not his. She showed it with the occasional photographs she took with his camera. Beautifully composed photographs that caught your attention.

She had shown him the way out, and he had no choice but to take it. White line continue meant what? That his experience meant something, whatever that experience might be. Mr. Fitzpatrick meant something. Melvin meant something. Get-it-on Brenda and sybaritic Luke meant something. The building his family managed meant something. He had been here. He had seen things. People must know what he had seen. He had a story to tell.

That fall he applied to the Columbia University School of the Arts for a master of fine arts degree in creative writing. He was on the other side now. He was not only reading books but also trying to write them. Why not find out how? Columbia had no test, no Graduate Record Exam he would have to score high on for admission. Now he could be a Columbia without being a high board score man. He sent the school a writing sample, as requested, drawing heavily on white line, continue. How happy he was at the prospect of acceptance and that he should soon find such a wonderful home.

The school wrote him back quickly. The thin letter in the mailbox contained a punch in the face. Jesus, what a punch. The school didn't even give him time to get into his dream before delivering it. Not even any mention of an exceptional number of qualified applicants. Just "We have considered your application and will be unable to admit you to the program."

He lay face down on his bed for a long while, wondering what he could do now that the school had taken away his life. Then Bill Gofner's face appeared in his mind. He called his former writing teacher at the New School. Bill Gofner listened as Luther told him of the rejection and his distress. Luther sensed sympathy and compassion in the sound of Bill Gofner's listening and in his words as well.

"It means nothing, absolutely nothing. Do you hear me?" Bill Gofner said.

"Yes, I hear you," Luther said.

Then Bill Gofner said, "Anyway, in a short while many people will think you are a good writer."

"Thank you. Thank you," Luther said. Oh Jesus. He could hardly believe how instantly good Bill Gofner's words had made him feel. Bill Gofner had given him his seal of approval. What an amazing thing.

All day he lived in Bill Gofner's words, but as he did so, doubt began to enter his mind. "Many people," Bill Gofner had said. Bill Gofner hadn't been speaking for himself. He had been speaking for others. Bill Gofner had withheld his personal endorsement; he hadn't wanted to compromise his personal integrity by saying something he did not believe to be true. Bill Gofner didn't believe Luther was a good writer because many people meant many people, not Bill Gofner.

It was all right. It was just all right. Luther would go to the bar. He would sit there and drink. In the bar he could get away from such thoughts and have better ones. There was magic in the bar that he had found. That's why it was important that he keep going back.

Jane Thayer was in town, only she wasn't walking so tall or feeling so proud. So Luther sensed hearing the insecurity in her voice as she asked to come over. But he did not have to go down the path of crazy hate in "Like a Rolling Stone."

She came to his door in cheap pink boots and a matching dress a size too small and only a flimsy coat as protection against the fall cold. Life had gotten hard for her. She had overdone her stay down in Mexico City. After all, how long could you live with your relatives? She had tried college, but it really wasn't for her. She was staying with her parents down in Brooklyn and working the ticket window at some midtown movie theater.

He didn't tell her that he had died and died and was living again in the way that he could. He did not gloat that she could not put the laughing thing on him with her incessant talk of parties and the names of young men flowing ceaselessly from her tongue. He did not marvel at the powerlessness of the La Rochefoucauld maxim, "Whom one has loved once one cannot love again," to destroy him as it had when he translated it in his tenth grade French class. He had heeded Benvolio's advice to lovelorn Romeo and taken some new infection to his eye, that the rank poison of the old should die. Jane Thayer had died to him. Even his sadness at her go-go girl outfit and extra pounds and faded looks and insecure manner was fleeting.

"Do you have a girlfriend?" she asked him that night.

"I do," he said.

"What's her name?"

"Sarah. Sarah Van Dine."

“That’s a nice name, I guess.”

“Yes.”

“Is she in school?”

“She’s an art student.”

“That’s something,” Jane Thayer said. “Is that one of her paintings?” Jane Thayer said, motioning to the nude on the wall.

“Yes,” he said.

“She’s kind of out there,” Jane Thayer said.

Luther remained silent. He could not give her that. He had a love for Sarah Van Dine that would not permit it, regardless of his shortcomings. Jane Thayer felt his silence. Her face contorted and she began to cry and cry. She had tried to pretend but now she couldn’t. She was so hurt and lonely and lost.

“You’ve grown up and I haven’t,” she sobbed.

He didn’t know what to say. His history with her got in the way. She gave him a kiss on the cheek as she left. He could smell the alcohol on her breath. She had needed to drink before her visit. She had become a drinker, like her mother. Like his sisters Rachel and Naomi. Like him.

Jane Thayer went away, as had the woman from Pittsburgh, one representing the old, the other advocating the new. As in a dream, he had no warning who would come next. His sister Vera reached him through the telephone.

“He’s dead. Daddy’s dead. Mommy wants to know if you will even bother to show up.” She had her hysteria, her anger, her complication going, some unspecified emotion promoting incivility and the justification for it. There was another word he hadn’t used. Histrionics. She had that going, too. Doing the weeping and wailing thing, Luther picturing strands of spittle in her agape mouth. That she had the freedom to be all over him with her big reaction, leaving no room for anything but asperity and outrage, even grief being something they had to fight about. Not that he had any.

“Stop. Stop,” he said, resisting her assault and unable to ascribe a genuine sense of loss to his younger sister. And why should he? She had only lost what he had never had, her phony tears just another way to rub in the fact of her theft. Now she had only the nothing he had always had where his father was concerned.

He took a cab uptown. Hildy Gomez was at the wheel, her hair in a duck’s ass and her face cast in a permanent smile, as if to deny the world an admission that it continued to screw her. She had a monstrous case of teeth-sucking going on, now and then casting a glance at him through the rear-view mirror to check whether she had driven him bat shit with her hideous noise. At Seventy-second Street and Broadway, her delight peaked at the spectacle of two cars in a smashup, one of the drivers slumped and unmoving over the wheel.

“That is one dead rigor mortis,” Hildy exclaimed, rubbernecking so she could take her fill of the sight. It was that way with some that death could make their day. Best to understand what the world contained, he thought, sensing that he might be the same.

Who was there in his family's apartment that night? His sister Hannah and his nephew Moses; his sister Naomi but not her husband Chuck or her daughter Jeanne; his brother Luke but not his girlfriend Brenda or her boy Benjy; most present of all was his sister Vera. What Luther heard was a jumble of emoting he had no patience for, arriving as he did with a cresting sense of empowerment. That his father's death should make him feel so strong, so triumphant.

He pushed beyond them through the dining room and kitchen. At the end of the hallway, smaller than he had remembered, were the two bedrooms, the one on the left for his parents and the one on the right for the children. But the children were gone, at least from the apartment, and his mother had found it easier, in the last few years, to move into their room. Her sleep was too interrupted sharing the same bed with a man missing half of one leg who had to get up frequently during the night to urinate. And so it was there, in his childhood room, that he found her, lying in bed, her glasses off.

On the night table was an amber prescription bottle. His witchy older sisters had tried to get her to drink—"Come on, Ma, stop trying to be a saint"—but, to his relief, she never took the glass of wine they pushed on her those few times alcohol was brought into the home. Though alcohol was not part of her life, she did rely on sleeping pills and pain medication, and Luther imagined the small plastic bottle contained something of the kind.

"Lie still so it can take effect," she would say, after handing him one of her sleep aids, during those times of torment when Jane Thayer would break up with him and find another boy to be with. The effect was miraculous, a whole change in his psyche and outlook. Brimming with confidence and joy, he couldn't wait to take his new self to school the next day. But the morning would find him back in his contracted, fearful state.

"I didn't even have a chance to say goodbye," his mother said, and wept, as he stood in the doorway. He could only listen. This was her pain, not his. She understood that, he was sure. For her tears there could be no scorn, no dismissal. She had loved his father. She had always been his and his alone, though the same could not be said for him. And there was the loss of her own father, to drunkenness, when she was young. Two sorrows would be joined as one, Luther sensed. He felt afraid, tentative. He felt suspected by her, as if at any moment her tears would dry and she would turn on him with fury for having killed his father. On that night he didn't dare come near, for fear that she would strike him, and soon he fled the minefield of her sorrow.

There was a doctor with a feline face luminous with intelligence. His name was Doctor Edelbaum and he had an office and an apartment in the building of order that stood in mockery and reproach of the building of chaos just across the street. Dr. Edelbaum walked alone and with a feline step. Often he was seen in the neighborhood with his little black bag. House calls were still being made. He had been the Garatdjian's family doctor for many years, and though Luther's older sisters Naomi and Rachel would go delirious in describing the doctor's attempted advances, Luther understood, even at a young age, that histrionics of a gross kind were on display, as no one of the doctor's caliber could find his older sisters alluring. Sometimes Dr. Edelbaum could show his claws. There was the time Mrs. Garatdjian sent Luther across the street to ask the doctor for a medication to keep Chuck, Naomi's husband, from drinking.

"Give him arsenic," Doctor Edelbaum said, while writing out a prescription for Antabuse.

The doctor's office was on the main floor. Often, in his growing up years, Luther would see Molly, the doctor's maid, peering out at the street from behind the curtain on the kitchen window. A Scotswoman, she had a friendly manner toward Luther. She would see him with Jane Thayer and when he was alone say, "You will have lots of girlfriends before you are through." They were not words he heard as frightening, as her face at such times was like the sun gently shining on him.

And Dr. Edelbaum could also shine a kindly light on Luther, as when he said, during a physical examination in Luther's senior year of high school, "You have a good set of shoulders. You should join the Air Force." No one had ever said anything good to Luther about his body, and here was the doctor offering his seal of approval, if only to a portion of his anatomy. The doctor also confided his dream of serving as a pilot in the Israeli Air Force. What a strange world, that the cat doctor would wish to fly high above the world.

None of the above would have mattered much except for the fact that Dr. Edelbaum was also the Van Dines' family doctor. But he was more to them than a doctor. Lydia adored his drollness and was intrigued by the fact that a man so seemingly stable in the world could not accomplish the same stability in his home life, the doctor having been married and divorced four times.

Lydia had invited Dr. Edelbaum to a party earlier that month. A wave of fear hit Luther when he walked in the door and saw the doctor chatting with Lydia and Claire. With the window Dr. Edelbaum had into the lives of the Garatdjians, Luther could only imagine what the doctor might say of them to the Van Dines. Would he tell them of Luther's drunken brother-in-law Chuck and Luther's often institutionalized sister Naomi? Would he tell them of the squalid conditions of the Garatdjian family's apartment, which he had visited on house calls, or of the decrepitude of his father? Luther was unable to negotiate with the shame that came over him at the sight of the doctor, and so he drank great quantities of champagne. He might have done so anyway, but his fear turned him in desperation to the bubbly.

And yet, even fortified with champagne, Luther could not approach the doctor. Nor did the doctor make any attempt to engage with Luther. With his serene, penetrating gaze, he had seen all he needed to see right there on Luther's panic-stricken face. He had seen the low IQ, the emaciation, his unlovely sisters and the squalid conditions in which the Garatdjians lived. He had seen defeat and, having no desire to be a part of it, was choosing to stay with the Van Dines and all those who were on the side of order. Once more Luther was the Estonian maid.

He retreated to Sarah's room, where, feeling woozy, he lay down. The fall night was cold, and the guests' coats and jackets covered Sarah's bed. Thinking he would only rest for a minute or two, he passed out quickly, and might have snoozed straight through to daybreak, if Sarah hadn't shaken him awake.

"Luther, the guests are leaving. They need to get their coats," she whispered.

Several of those guests, including Dr. Edelbaum, stood behind Sarah, he saw, as he sat up. The sight of Luther laid out drunk on the bed had brought the doctor to the peak of amusement. Luther stood up, steadying himself against the wall.

“I guess that wasn’t too great,” he said, when he and Sarah were alone.

“Dr. Edelbaum asked me if you do this a lot.”

“What did you tell him?”

“I told him we’re not at parties a lot.”

“Thanks,” Luther said.

“I think he was interested, sort of excited, seeing you on top of the coats.”

“That doesn’t sound quite right,” Luther said.

The following day Lydia reported on a conversation she had had with Dr. Edelbaum.

“Dr. Edelbaum says there are two sets of children in your family, and that each set has a different father.” She was delivering a fact; no question mark appeared at the end of her statement.

The doctor had graduated from Townsend Harris High School, a New York City public school for the supremely gifted that was no longer in existence. He had attended Brown University. He was of the Jewish faith. What had Luther’s father done but be an Armenian?

Luther took this information into his session with Dr. Dressler following his father’s death. It had not been alive in his mind the night he saw his mother laid low by her loss and in bed in his childhood room, but now it was.

“My whole life I have been lied to. My father was not my father,” he said, his face contorted with self-righteous anger. He was to weep for a man who was not even his flesh and blood? Not that he had ever wanted him to be his flesh and blood.

“I know you are sadistic, but if you were to say such a thing to your mother, especially at a time like this. Nothing could be lower than that,” Dr. Dressler said.

The poverty of his mind had already been well established, but Dr. Dressler was now addressing his poverty of spirit, saying to him that he was downtrodden in his way of thinking and being and feeling. He heard her words as he could, through the filter of the historical forces driving him, and met her assessment not with outrage or even protest but with a smile that indicated the language she was addressing him in he could easily hear but not absorb.

Dr. Dressler did have other things to offer besides her verbal hand.

“You are beginning to look like a somewhat normal human being,” she said, seeing him in a suit and tie. He had also cut his hair to a reasonable length, and this too met with her approval.

He went forth, that afternoon, from the clinic west to Central Park. His state of being felt glorious, radiant, as expansive as the tall trees whose thick branches he walked beneath along the footpaths. He couldn't say where this joy approaching delirium was coming from, but he felt like a man coming into his own strength, a conqueror in his time of triumph. He did not wonder for his sanity. Energy was sanity. Joy was sanity.

At the top of the stairs heading down to the terrace and the Bethesda Fountain stood a dealer in an army jacket and I-can-see-you-you-can't see-me-shades. Down below some white kids sailed a Frisbee back and forth. Luther imagined them as hard and alienated. Something had changed. He couldn't say what. The door had closed on whatever had been. The flowers were gone. Something new and more menacing had begun.

On Columbus Avenue, he stepped into a restaurant with a bar for a drink. It was a cheery place full of light and plants hanging in the windows. He ordered a cognac, as he had seen someone else do at the bar downtown. It burned as he swallowed. Then he ordered another and a couple after that.

A girl was walking past as he left. She filled her jeans well and wore her brown hair boldly short. He followed in her path as she turned and headed across the avenue in the same direction he was headed. Just beyond the awning of the funeral home he approached her.

"Meet me here at 8 pm. Can you do that?" he said to her.

"Why? Who are you?" she said.

"My name is Luther. I have to go into the funeral home for a wake. A relative passed away," he said.

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"Can you do that? We'll have fun."

"What kind of fun?"

"We'll go for drinks. Dinner. You'll see."

"OK," she said.

His decisiveness had summoned her compliance. So he thought as he stared at the signboard with the moveable white letters that spelled out, just below Agnes Fulgencio, his father's name in the third floor viewing room. He was laid out in an open coffin in a coat and tie. His waxy face was cast in a serene smile, an expression he would have worn more often if only the world would behave itself. Luther recalled his mother's words. "Your father has a condition. He can't handle much stress."

But now his mother had different words for him. "Have you been drinking, my son?" she said, after he had kissed her on the cheek. A mole had formed to the side of her mouth, from which a whisker had sprouted.

"Yes." He was overcome with shame that she had noticed.

"Wine is a mocker. Have I not told you that, my son?"

Vera arrived with her boyfriend, Max Geller, a bear of a man with gleaming dark eyes under a crown of thick black hair on an uninterrupted path to success: The Boston Latin School, in Cambridge, where he had been taunted for being a Jew; Columbia University; now Juilliard, to study music composition.

"They have such fine minds," Mrs. Garatdjian would say, of Jews in general. Vera had taken her words to heart. And why wouldn't she? All of Manhattan had taken her words to heart without having heard them. There was no need for hearing them. They had only to see for themselves.

What further proof did Luther need that his sister was fundamentally histrionic? The girl going to any length to make his father's death about her, first with less than genuine tears when she broke the news to Luther over the phone and now making Max a captive audience for the ongoing spectacle of her phony mourning. People of the caliber of the Garatdjians had no capacity for genuineness. His mother was the exception. What hideous deformity drove such a need? And then to bring a genius, a genius, into their midst, to witness their filth, to tyrannize and terrify them with his excellence, his academic glitter, when they were in servitude to failure. It was too much. If he had no relationship with his father, why should he ascribe one to her? Beyond his scorn, he could only find himself in a state of perplexity at her ability to reveal his family to the world.

He took the roll call. Hannah and her son, Moses. Naomi and Chuck. Luke and Brenda and her boy Benjy. And he noted the absent: Jeanne, somewhere out there with the hippie horde, and his sister Rachel, who lived for nonappearance. And yes, Max Geller a beacon of reproach. They, Luther's family, would never be good enough. He would never be good enough.

Then Rachel did arrive, a different Rachel in a long brown coat and low-cut black Converse sneakers several sizes too big for her feet, the kind he would hear kids refer to as gunboats. A straw hat with a fake cluster of fruit sat on her dull brown hair; a black veil hung stapled to the brim. On her hands she wore the ribbed white linen gloves his mother was given to wear on church days. By intention or otherwise, she was a startling presence as she knelt briefly before the casket and then sat down.

"Rachel, is that you?" Mrs. Garatdjian said.

"Hello, Mother," she replied, in a dull, tired voice.

If a change had come over Rachel, Mrs. Garatdjian intuited its nature. "She has come home to the Lord, my son, as I pray all of my children will."

The girl was waiting for him after the viewing. “Who did you say it was for?”

“A relative,” Luther said.

“What relative?” the girl asked. He had taken her by surprise, with the momentum all his. But now she was recovering. Luther heard her showing her substance in her line of questioning and her tone.

“My father,” Luther said, almost as a confession. His energy and confidence had left him.

“Your father?” A puzzled look came over the girl’s earnest, pretty face. She was not out of alignment with the patriarch in the way that Sarah was. She had no rebellion flag flying. Luther saw that she was one who would practice filial devotion.

“We weren’t that close,” he said, sensing he must bring circumspection to any discussion of his father and not display the jeering lunacy of his oedipal mindset. “Let’s go for a drink.”

“You had been drinking when I met you. I smelled it on your breath,” the girl said. It was a statement but also an accusation.

“A little.”

“There’s something wrong with you, isn’t there?”

“I don’t understand.”

“You’re so skinny. Is that what you do, drink instead of eat?”

“No, I eat,” he said, her body blow bringing his head low.

“Look, I’m sorry, but this was a mistake. I should go. Goodbye,” she said, hearing the defeat in his voice, and walked off quickly. He offered no argument. There was no argument to make. She had put him in the shame place.

The next morning he dressed in a pair of dark blue velvet pants, as tight around his legs as his socks were on his feet. Then he put on an equally tight black corduroy jacket with a mod cut and slipped into a brown pair of expensive Bally shoes. He looked in the mirror and saw the same miracle of transformation that had been reflected back to him in the mirror of the East Side boutique where he had purchased the pants and jacket. He had heard the girl’s words the night before. He had felt her rebuff. But each day was new, and brought its own promise.

Luther turned into a saloon just above Columbus Circle for fortification. He downed the brandy and ordered a second. At the other end a man brought his mouth to his drink rather than risk lifting it from the bar with his unsteady hand.

“That’s you down the road,” the bartender said.

“What do you mean?” Luther said.

“You’ll find out,” the bartender said.

“Go away,” Luther said.

The bartender lived to put a bruise on people’s faces and bodies with his fists as well as to wound their minds with his words. “You want me to come over the bar? You want the kind of trouble I can bring you?”

“I don’t ever want that,” Luther said.

“You’re too skinny to fight me. You’re too skinny to even be breathing. I was just trying to save your life. Now finish your drink and get out of here.”

Luther did as he was told, wanting no part of the bartender’s fists and fury.

Mrs. Garatdjian had called on the son of Brother Nyquist, the pastor of the church in the garage in Astoria, Queens, where the men of the Christ Jesus came together to worship, to deliver the eulogy, as Brother Nyquist was unavailable. Mrs. Garatdjian trusted the men of the Christ Jesus more than anybody in the world because they were bathed in the Christ love. The Christ love was a love your own father could not give. It was unearthly and eternal love.

In Luther’s memory, Brother Nyquist was a man empowered by the sense of his own competence. He wore a tool belt and jeans he filled as well as any man and showed an intense determination that was the antithesis of the open-mouthed stare with which the Garatdjians approached the world. He was imbued with God love but he could do the things of this realm too, from installing flooring, electrical wiring, and plumbing. He had no need of corporations or their kind to make his way and wore a suit not for money but only for Sunday worship.

Brother Nyquist was Mrs. Garatdjian’s Swedish connection. She turned to him when his skills were needed at the building but she had also turned to him at a time Mr. Garatdjian was out of sorts with the tabernacle where the family worshiped on West Thirty-third Street. The problem was that Pastor Cohn, the man in whose face the sun shone forth as he uttered his disappearing words, was unwilling to give up any of his word time so Luther’s father could share his words with the congregation, too. A woman such as Mrs. Garatdjian could have the virtue of her own silence, but a man was full of his own foolishness. A man had to give voice to his words. It did not matter if the words fell on fallow ground. They had to be uttered.

Mrs. Garatdjian did not say to Brother Nyquist that Mr. Garatdjian had to be important in America beyond the job he had as a midtown cashier. She just said words were important to Mr. Garatdjian and that he had to witness to what he had seen and heard. She expressed concern that he was too alone, walking as he did the great distances of Manhattan and stopping off at the Horn and Hardart Automat for coffee and the Danishes he was supposed to stay away from, as by this time he had been diagnosed with diabetes. Brother Nyquist heard what Mrs. Garatdjian was saying, that walking could not be the solution for everything, that now and then you had to stop and talk to people, but that Mr. Garatdjian didn't stop and talk. He just walked and walked, saying he didn't need anyone, he had never needed anyone, and now he had a need for anyone even less because when you filled up with God, how could you ever need anything else?

Brother Nyquist sought to bring Mr. Garatdjian into the fold. He gave him time to speak his words and slap his Bible as Pastor Cohn did at the tabernacle on Thirty-third Street. Brother Nyquist made it possible for Mr. Garatdjian to feel he had not been erased, and the gathered were compassionate when Mr. Garatdjian's words led him to weep and weep, tears falling onto his Robert Hall suit and tie. They felt his joy that he had been saved from a life of wretched drifting when he met Mrs. Garatdjian, who took him into her softness, and they felt his joy that he was here in America, and why he might shout, of those who burned their draft cards and the American flag, that they should be shot and why Republican blue made him feel in the fold of normalcy, while Democratic red could only mean the anarchy of the horde. But only Mr. Garatdjian himself understood the gratitude he felt at being removed from Constantinople to the safety of New York City, where he could sip his Horn and Hardart coffee without fear of extinction by the hate-filled Turk, and that his most abiding desire was to be left in peace.

“It would make him so happy,” his mother had said, in urging Luther to go with his father to the garage church and hear him preach in the long ago. He would have been in the fourth or fifth grade. It hadn’t been for his father to ask him directly. His father’s one grievance against Mrs. Garatdjian was that she had kept the children away from him. What did it matter that he had said, “Are you trying to aggravate me? Because if you make me get up, I could lose all control and will not be responsible for what I do” to the children when they were rambunctious? Or that he flew into a rage the few times they tried to ask him a question related to their schoolwork. So what if he had knocked Luke to the floor and then kicked him hard in the face with his shoe. “Are you crazy that you would do this to a child?” Mrs. Garatdjian had said, stooping to tend to Luke’s bruised and bleeding face. Or those battles with Hannah, including the one that led him to shout, “In Armenia you would be stoned to death for speaking to your father in this way.” Luther had needed nothing more than these outbursts to steer clear of his father. Mrs. Garatdjian presented his father as a man with limitations. “He has a condition. He cannot take much stress.” But she also said, with a tone of lament in her voice, “He has no ambition,” while noting with approval and admiration how accomplished so many in the Jewish community had become. “They came here with nothing. Nothing. Look what they have done. Doctors, lawyers. Scholars. My word.”

So he had reluctantly gone with his father that evening. The Mad Bomber was still on the loose, leaving his lethal pipe bombs in public places, including the subways of New York City. But as they passed through the Times Square station to catch the R train to Astoria, Luther’s fear was not of a hellish explosion courtesy of the madman on the loose but of the human time bomb right beside him. And yet there was no flare-up. His father did not strike him, as he had Luke before they had gone a few steps from the building on an outing to Coney Island. En route they did not stop for dinner at any of the Greek coffee shops but went directly to the garage church of Brother Nyquist. Luther had seen his father at the height of his anger and he seen him act silly, but he had never seen him cry. It shamed Luther that his father would stand before other grown men seated in folding chairs set out on a cement floor and show himself in such a light. Was this what his father had intended for him to witness, a spectacle of tears and his choked avowal of love and gratitude for Luther’s mother? What was he supposed to do with such tears? He did not see them as contrition or sorrow or love or any such thing. They did not evoke compassion for his father. They were just one more reason to be dismissive of him. It did not occur to Luther then that the power of a father was such that the one uncomfortable outing he took with him alone would stand out above all others.

Blond and aggressively ebullient with his chipmunk face, Brother Nyquist’s son began his eulogy. “Brother Garatdjian was a kind man, a good man, a man who loved God and his dear wife and his wonderful children. He worked hard to put food on the table. But he also prayed. Brother Garatdjian was always praying. You had only to look at him to see he was a man of prayer. And his prayers had given him Mrs. Garatdjian, his dearly beloved wife, and so many beautiful, wonderful children. Prayer is work, too. To be a man of prayer is to be working all the time...

Pastor Nyquist's lack of familiarity with the family showed. He was just another word man. Words and more words and Bible slaps and that self-satisfied smile that told you he was not so much a preacher as a preening performer, as they all were, full of the smug assurance that Jesus was theirs and they were fixed in this life and the life to come. The kind who would preach at you but do nothing to help you.

As Luther surveyed the room, he saw that his thoughts were not only with his father but the half-dead, those who would be better off dead, such as Naomi, and that his family had been dying when he came from the womb. You couldn't reverse decay. What was there to do but accept that simple reality? The mirror that family held up to him was hideously unflattering.

Two limousines and their drivers—a pair of thuggish-looking men in dark suits and shades—awaited them outside the funeral home. The drinks had made Luther sodden. His head hurt, and those expensive shoes were too tight.

“Where did you get those pants, Luther? Your legs look like twigs in them,” Vera had climbed into the same limo. Luther had been hoping she wouldn't, as she had in tow her genius boyfriend.

“I don't know. Somewhere,” Luther said.

“You stink. Have you been drinking?”

“Ushtah, Vera. Don’t speak that way to your brother,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“Do you remember at Camp, Luther, how the counselors would all say you were underweight?”

“Is that what they said?”

“Max, they would run their fingers up Luther’s rib cage as if it were a washboard.”

“That wasn’t a nice thing to do,” Max said.

“They were trying to help him. That’s all. But he wouldn’t eat. He called the food stinky food. And he was homesick. All the time. He cried and cried for you, Mother. Did you know that?”

“You leave my Svenska pojka alone,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

It was a long time since his mother had referred to him as such, Luther thought. As a child the proprietary claim had embarrassed him. Now it seemed grotesque, as if for the first time she had said something untrue. He wasn’t her Svenska pojka. She had discarded him long ago when he became ugly in her sight.

“I feel Daddy chose me to carry on his name. I will never give up my last name. Do you hear that, Luther?” she jeered at Luther.

“How can I not?”

“Jesus, your breath really does stink. What’s wrong with you?” Vera said.

Wrong. Nothing wrong, other than that she had driven a spike through his heart.

The limo had a comforting heft and offered a cushioned ride through the pothole-strewn streets of the city. Once beyond the congestion of the Lincoln Tunnel it seemed to glide along the New Jersey turnpike toward the cemetery, the funeral home director having recommended Rosedale as a far less expensive alternative to a burial plot in Manhattan. Luther stared at the thick neck of the driver. All throughout the ride he was concerned that one of the family members would offend him and incur his wrath? How could he, Luther, keep things peaceful? And if it wasn't the driver on his mind, then it was Max, and the contempt he must be feeling behind that amiable smile. Such preoccupations might be a waste of time, but what could he do? He had the mind that he had been given.

Pastor Nyquist offered a prayer that God receive Mr. Garatdjian in his everlasting arms. Holding tight to canvas straps, a crew of workers lowered the casket into the six-foot grave. Nearby a worker leaned against his backhoe and flicked away the cigarette he had been smoking. As tearful family members tossed flowers into the hole, Luther took off his shoes. Without thinking he then flung them into the grave, where they landed on the casket with a thud.

"Are you crazy, my son?" Mrs. Garatdjian had a look of fury he had seldom seen on her face.

"They were killing me."

"So you throw them in your father's grave?" Hannah demanded.

"Lunatic. Drunken lunatic," Vera screamed. "Why don't you throw your socks and pants in there, too? In fact, why don't you jump in yourself?"

Maybe in some other culture such an act might be perceived as grossly disrespectful, but Luther hadn't meant it as such. Did he need to show them the blood-soaked back of his socks to prove the distress he had been in? Still, he felt the weight of their opprobrium, and when his mother said, through her tears, “You are not my son. You are not my son, it pains me to say,” he felt it even more.

But a mother’s love is a longtime thing, and if she had cast him out, it was only to take him back in, as she may have lived in the place of sorrow but the place where lack of forgiveness dwelt would never be her home. By this time in her life she was hearing the call of the other world, and had built substantially on her conviction that this earthly realm had nothing that she wanted, and if the world had nothing for her, then it could have nothing for Luther or Luke or Hannah or any of them, and it could only be a matter of time before they came to this same understanding.

“You are searching, my son. Your father was a searcher before he met me. He went here and there when what he needed was to go inside where the Christ Jesus lives. Rachel has been searching, but now she has begun to find herself. She thought she had to live among all those with the fine minds, but what she needed was to get right with Jesus. You know it is my prayer that we will all be in Heaven together. You know that, my son.”

So his mother said, when next he saw her at the building. Rachel had come home, or as close to home as any of the children came after they had left. Like Hannah and Naomi and Luke, she was given a room of her own—7B6—in which to live out her days in satellite orbit around Mrs. Garatdjian. Her face, scrubbed clean of war paint, had settled into an expression of childlike innocence. The smirk, the caustic tongue, the belittling remarks had vanished, along with the bottle. She has been on one track, and now she has been switched to another, Luther thought, visualizing her in railroad terms. It was mysterious, if not spooky, what a father could do. He it had to have been who threw the switch.

“Hello, Luther,” she said now, in a somber voice, and then would move on, as if further communication were an intolerable strain. Or if she happened to be in the family’s apartment when he entered, she would simply leave, with nothing more than a quick and explosive “goodbye,” the one word sounding like a rebuke more than a farewell. But a rebuke for what? For his being there. For any of them, except for his mother, being there. One afternoon he saw her in the Chock Full O’ Nuts, across from Columbia University, but when he entered through the revolving door she hurriedly finished her coffee and took her powdered doughnut with her.

The books that he remembered blanketing the floor of her room when he was a child were gone. Now she read only the Bible, as if everything she needed to know was there in the King James version. At night she would go out on the roof and stand on the parapet overlooking Broadway. When Luke saw her up there, he was terrified that she was preparing to leap. When he asked her gently to come down, she turned and coldly told him not to interfere and that she was about her father’s business. As to what business that could be, she replied that getting closer to God meant just that, getting physically closer, and if Luke didn’t mind, would he now please leave her alone. When he attempted a second time, she turned and said, with vehemence, “Have I not told you that I am about my father’s business?”

Gone too was the sharp-finned hairdo and the henna. She let her naturally sandy brown hair grow out and wore it in a braid, as she had years before. As for her clothes, they were as plain as her face. Day after day she would be seen in the same baggy, shapeless blouses and skirts she had picked from the GoodWill bag, her feet like those of a wading bird in low-cut Converse sneakers.

Instead of riding the subway to midtown each weekday morning, Rachel could be seen strolling along the bridle path in Riverside Park with her Bible in hand. “She has been planted in new soil. We will see now how she grows. What is not normal to your afflicted eye may be a delight to God,” his mother said. To offset the financial burden of Mrs. Garatdjian having to support Rachel, Vera assisted Rachel with a successful disability claim. Her stays in the Bellevue Hospital psychiatric ward were sufficient to compel the doctors who had treated her to testify to her unfitness for the world of work.

In his growing up years he would at times hear Rachel accompany Naomi on the upright piano in their parents’ bedroom as Naomi belted out Broadway show tunes, sad songs like “The Man Who Got Away” and more upbeat ones like “I’m Gonna Wash That Man Right Out of My Hair” and “Hard-Hearted Hannah.” The wonder of these two sisters embracing a world of glitter and gaiety condemned by the tabernacle was like the sun burning away gray and oppressive clouds. The realization of having such sophisticated sisters filled him with joy and hope that he too could escape the confines of drabness and dire contemplation of hellfire and brimstone.

And Hannah too at times provided access to a world beyond that of the church pew. True, she had dragged him from the Nemo Theater soon after he had entered it, depriving him of the film noir Rififi; not that, as a nine-year-old, he had any knowledge of such genre films. But then she relented from the stricture against movie theaters and took Luke and Vera and him to see Lady and the Tramp at the Symphony Theater down on Ninety-fifth Street and Broadway. And that too was a revelation, that he could enter a theater and watch a motion picture, even if it was only a Walt Disney movie, when previously such a venue was off limits. But that gesture by Hannah, as well as the evening outings following Friday Bible School to the swimming pool of the St. George Hotel, down in Brooklyn Heights she arranged offered only a flash of brightness quickly obscured by the billowing darkness brought on by the experience of her hand striking his cheek and the general oppression of her depressed and angry manner. And that same resentment extended to Naomi. She too had betrayed him with her smiling malice and physical assaults. As he grew older, Hannah and Naomi became, far from beacons of hope, cautionary tales of what could and would happen to him if he didn't break free of the debilitating swamp of family. Their legacy was one of dread that he might become like them.

But Rachel did not summon a similar emotion. True, she had been cutting in her remarks, joining with the others in calling him Flathead and Squarehead and Blockhead, and in other ways humiliating and ridiculing him. True, she had to be kept away from him when he was an infant, or so he was told. But her acceptance to Vassar College was the first tangible evidence of success offered by any of the older set of children. Hannah and Naomi seemed mired in failure, while Rachel was heading off to a top college just a short train ride away. She had escaped to the world of bright lights and he would imagine following after her along the train tracks, starting with the railroad tunnel under Riverside Park and up beyond the George Washington Bridge. He would leave the city environs behind and be where greenery abounded, and sleep under the stars alongside his beloved railroad tracks during his journey. His pride about his older sister continued when she transferred to Barnard for her junior year. Back then a wooden fence bordered the campus along Broadway. The fence was painted a heartbreaking forest green so in line with the pastoral look of the small campus. My sister goes here, Luther would think. She has been let in. But her grades at Barnard had not been good grades. They lowered her overall average when she returned to Vassar for her senior year. She learned that she would not be graduating with honors, and so she quit, unable to tolerate the ignominy of defeat.

The downward trend continued. A good job, then lesser jobs. Bellevue. Drunkenness. Smirking. Bellevue. Running naked down Broadway while drunk. Bellevue. That he should care about someone moving away from him even as he came toward her. That he should care about a woman who didn't care about him.

He typed up some white line poems and stuck them in an envelope along with an application form. He had read Tarantula, by Bob Dylan, or part of it, at the Coliseum Bookstore opposite Carnegie Hall. If Bob Dylan could write craziness, then he had a right to write his craziness, too. It did bother him that his poems were in free verse, but he had to say something on paper so he would not be lost forever and could have a chance to feel good. He mailed the envelope to the admissions office at the City College of New York, hoping that he would be accepted into its newly begun master's degree program in creative writing.

His writing sample was not science. It was not facts. It was not an organized system of tightly formed logic on the page. There was no beginning or middle or end, and his words did have his smell on them. But the program was just starting. Maybe there would be fewer applicants than the school was hoping for. When a month went by without any word, Luther rode up to Harlem on the number 11 bus, and then walked a few blocks to the campus.

The New Year had come. Richard Milhous Nixon was still installed in the White House with his Vice President. Spiro Agnew was taking off the gloves to punch the nattering nabobs of negativism in their eyes and all the different parts of their bodies so they would fall to the ground and be heard from no more. Spiro Agnew had well-oiled hair. He had small eyes that spoke of his ire. He had the ability to smile even when he was angry so you knew that though he was smiling he meant business. And he had an IQ of 135 and had graduated from night law school, and that really meant he meant business.

A Quonset hut had been built on the south campus since Luther had graduated. Aided by the harsh fluorescent lighting, Luther sought out the professor he had been told to see by the admissions office about his application.

"Professor Malkinoff?" In spite of the question, Luther was certain he had found his man, as the nameplate outside the office door said "Professor Melky Malkinoff."

"Speaking," Professor Malkinoff said, a response that left Luther wondering as to its appropriateness. Did Professor Malkinoff not know that you said "speaking" when verifying your identity to a caller on the phone, not in face-to-face communication? Or maybe Professor Malkinoff simply had an understanding of words and their usage that Luther should accept rather than question. Or maybe Professor Malkinoff was more innovative than he looked and breaking new ground. Luther, allowing common sense to be his guide, got on with it.

“My name is Luther Garatdjian. I am here to inquire about my application for admission to the writing program. I am a word man and I put some of those words on paper for you in the form of what I can only loosely call poems, but I also included something from my white line oeuvre which I hoped would grab your fancy. But now I am in fear that my best was only good enough for your garbage can,” Luther said, seeing the receptacle overflowing with discarded papers. He was aware of an arch and even affected manner—oeuvre?—in which he was now communicating, but he could not help himself. Go with the flow. He heard this imperative and resolved to do exactly that.

“I would never do such a cruel thing as to deposit an applicant’s work in the waste basket,” Professor Malkinoff assured him, as he set about going through the stacks of paper on his desk. “Here we are,” he said, having pulled from one teetering pile the manila envelope Luther had dropped in the mail. As Luther sat there, Professor Malkinoff opened and sampled the content, now and then nodding his head as he read.

“OK. You’re in. You’re definitely a word man,” Professor Malkinoff said.

“I’m in?”

“We can absolutely use your kind. The new term starts in February. I will see to it that you receive your acceptance letter so that you can register before the deadline.”

The assurance was welcome, but an asterisk had to be attached. Had the diminutive, rumped professor with the personality of a church mouse been intimidated by the sudden presence of a supplicant? And what on earth would have been the fate of his application if he hadn't shown up at the professor's office door? More than likely it would have sat there for several months more. The professor had been negligent, and now, motivated by kindness, an unwillingness to hurt Luther's feelings, he was allowing him to enroll. As with law school, Luther hadn't earned his way in. Persuasion, in one degree or another, had been necessary. Merit and Luther Garatdjian do not go together, his mind said.

Professor Malkinoff may have been dwelling in his own special hell. The smallness and timidity of his persona suggested a man adrift in the valley of depression. Luther was not completely unaware that Ivy League bona fides did not assure one's happiness, though he could not imagine why. If Luther was in need of a clearer perspective on Professor Malkinoff, it was provided as he was leaving when a man popped his head in the office. It was a massive head, as a genius or a man of considerable intellectual firepower might possess. Crafty, or Foxy, could have been his nickname, given the look of smiling deviousness he offered law-abiding, dutiful, and endlessly dull Professor Malkinoff. A trickster, a joker, a laugher at all things, most immediately the preposterous institution trying to contain someone of his dimensions. All this did not come to Luther immediately, but a significant portion did hearing the man say, in a teasing manner, "See you, Malky."

I must go to this man, Luther thought. I must be in his class. No, I must not, was his next thought.

In that brief sighting facial recognition had occurred. This was a man whose deeds were in line with his appearance. His novel about World War II had been recognized by critics for its profundity as well as its comic genius, and his author photo on the back cover ensured that every literate person in the country would also recognize him. Forty-seven-year-old Solomon Reisner was in fact a war hero, an Air Force pilot who had received many medals for the bombing missions he flew over Nazi Germany. Following the war he had attended Cornell University on the GI Bill and then spent a year at Oxford as a Rhodes Scholar. Before the publication of his novel, Heads Up, Kraut, he had worked for many years in the field of advertising. Not bad for a boy from Brooklyn, whose education prior to the war had gone no further than graduation from Brooklyn Tech.

Luther assessed the situation vis a vis Solomon Reisner. Yes, he had gone to the finest schools, as Bob Dylan had said of the girl he berated in “Like a Rolling Stone,” and yes, he was a decorated war hero and the author of an acclaimed novel, placing him in a category far above Mr. Van Dine, who had only served as a bombardier and was turned down by Harvard when he applied for admission on the GI Bill, but Luther would surpass him all the same. How could Luther be so certain? Because Solomon Reisner, gray-haired and approaching fifty, had written only one novel, and Luther would write many. That was why. Beating Solomon Reisner was only a matter of time. In such a way did Luther think.

“I will be frank with you,” Sol said, in addressing the six students who showed up for his class that first day. “You’re not geniuses. In fact you’re without talent. Judging from your writing samples, some of you belong in a remedial English program. Let’s face it. You’re bottom-dwellers, but the school is paying me a lot of money, so I am obliged to read your self-indulgent scribbles. All I ask is that your manuscripts be typed and double-spaced and free of any dinner droppings or gross bodily emissions. Can you do that for me?”

“Sure. We’ll do whatever you say, Coach,” a chinless young man said, causing Sol to erupt in laughter. The dimwits laughed along with him, nervously at first, but then surrendering to it, as to a giant wave that swept them along. Luther was, if not entirely comfortable with Sol’s brutality, accepting of it. Not everyone could be a comic genius, and such individuals, for all he knew, were obliged to tell the truth.

“By the way, you can leave manuscripts for me between classes. I live at The Dakota, on Seventy-second Street and Central Park West, but I would prefer you bring your work to my office at 230 Central Park South. You can drop it off in an envelope with my doorman.” The Dakota location was noteworthy for having an IND line subway stop on the mysterious B and C lines en route to Harlem. The Polo Grounds, up at Coogan’s Bluff, Willie Mays running out from under his cap in the direction of the Rheingold sign in the recesses of centerfield in pursuit of a long fly ball, Billie Holiday singing “Gloomy Sunday”—a complex of associations, of longings, were summoned in Luther when Sol told them where he lived. And what was that golden light Luther saw at the mention of Central Park South? Was it Cary Grant, at the Plaza Hotel? Was it America calling him to a life he did not have? That same emotion had been summoned by the illuminated Chevrolet billboard, above the West Side Highway, up near the meatpacking plants, on One Hundred Twenty-fifth Street, back in his childhood. Life calling to him but always somewhere where he was not.

“We’re going to do good, now,” Luther said, to his L. C. Smith typewriter. “Everything is grist for the literary mill,” he went on, having read as much somewhere. Every week he would take his writings to Sol care of Sol’s doorman at the Central Park South address. The frequency of his appearances led the doorman to become familiar with him rather than maintain that doorman distance of one who was supposed to know his place in life.

“You again?” this one particularly rude doorman said.

“Oh yes,” Luther said.

“What are you, a messenger or something?” the doorman asked.

“A special kind of messenger,” Luther answered, hearing with his third ear how the doorman was trying to bring him down to his doorman level.

“You’re not sick, are you?” the doorman said, being a very bold and presumptuous doorman.

“Not at all,” Luther said.

“Because Mr. Reisner is not a doctor, so he can’t help you if are sick, and you do look pretty sick.”

“Do I tell you your mother looks sick?” Luther said. The worst thing you could ever do with these doormen types was talk about their mothers. Their mothers were the reason they were doormen in the first place.

“Don’t be talking about my mother,” the doorman said.

“Then don’t talk to me about my mother either,” Luther said.

“Have you heard me talk about your mother?” the doorman said.

“You just did,” Luther said, dealing harshly with the doorman only because he understood how some doormen could adopt the haughty ways of their masters, as this one so clearly had, and forget they were crumb bum Louies in the eyes of those same masters, who never thought about them unless the doormen stood in their presence

“I may just have to throw you a beating,” the doorman said.

“That wouldn’t be very doorman-like,” Luther said.

Luther returned several days later with a story titled “The Doorman.” He placed great quantities of tape on the envelope so the doorman wouldn’t snoop. He sensed that doormen, by and large, had to be snoops, by degrees infiltrating themselves into the lives of the building tenants in a psychic attempt to move up socially. Like Luther himself and that Estonian maid Claire so identified him with. And should the doorman in fact snoop and read the unflattering characterization of him in the story, then surely he would be throwing him a beating.

“It’s against the law to read other people’s mail,” Luther said to the doorman as he handed him the envelope.

“This isn’t mail. It’s a package,” the doorman said.

“Even so,” Luther said.

“‘Even so.’ You should hear yourself.”

“Even so,” Luther said, “I expect the package, as you call it, to be delivered to Mr. Reisner sans tampering. Is that understood?”

“What is understood is that I don’t like you.”

“Don’t personalize our relationship,” Luther said. “This is about business.”

“Don’t come back here when I’m on duty. Can you manage that?”

“Frankly, I don’t know what I can manage,” Luther said. “I’ve been feeling a great deal of stress.”

But the doorman didn’t respond. He simply closed the front door to signal the conversation was over and Luther went on his way. If the doorman had bested him with his symbolic rejection, Luther was willing to give him that.

After the next class Sol Reisner called Luther aside. “Have you been getting into trouble with my doorman?” Sol said.

“No. Why would I do that? Luther said.

“He said an unusually skinny young guy was giving him a hard time every time he dropped off an envelope for me. So that wasn’t you?”

“No, not me. Luther said. I don’t cause anyone any trouble.”

“And that story about the doorman you submitted. The one in which you call him ‘sliver lips.’ You weren’t writing about my doorman?”

“No, no. That’s fiction. It’s true fiction, but it’s fiction all the same,” Luther assured Sol Reisner.

“True fiction?”

“All fiction has some truth to it,” Luther said. “Even science fiction. Not that I’ve read any of that stuff.”

“I don’t mean to pry, but do you have a job?”

“Sure. I have a job.”

“What kind of work do you do?”

“I’m the assistant manager of a hotel. Sort of,” Luther said.

“Sort of.” Sol laughed. “I like that.”

A month into the semester a new student arrived. The girl was gap-toothed and round. She had frizzy brown hair and a sweaty face and a low center of gravity. She wrote short pieces about a Jewish family in the Midwood section of Brooklyn that had Sol Reisner laughing out loud. It was everything for Luther not to stop up his ears and run from the room, as he had no place in his heart for the excellence of others.

The following week he saw the girl enter Sol Reisner’s office. Feigning an interest in the fliers on the hallway bulletin board, he strained to overhear the conversation between Sol Reisner and his star pupil. He was looking for pain, old pain; he had to have it. Sol Reisner did not disappoint. “Look, I called you in because you are too good for this program. You can see that as well as I can. My other students are interesting but not very bright. Some have emotional difficulties and one is completely strange and hopeless. I'll put you in touch with my agent. She could use some new talent. And I would encourage you to apply to better programs, like Columbia or Stanford or Iowa..."

There had been a boy in his third grade class he had been friends of a kind with, but then the boy got promoted to the next grade in the middle of the school year. The boy's advancement dismayed Luther. He would fill with fear and anger on seeing the boy, whose existence would forever be a reminder that some were chosen and some were not. And that experience was repeated over and over in the years that followed, the high board score boys and girls separating out from those who were less intelligent. How wrong he had been to think he could escape from such hierarchies and quantification in the word world.

"Luther, you must not die and die and die." This and more he said to himself back in his apartment that evening, while listening to his Billie Holiday record and drinking his red wine.

Sometime later he climbed the stairs to Nadia's apartment. "I'm a complete and worthless bum," he said, his self-therapy having proven unsuccessful.

"No one is a complete anything," Nadia said.

"Thank you for that," Luther said, and began to laugh. Nadia laughed, too.

"You really stink of wine," she said, as he opened the bottle he had brought along. having finished the first.

"Bums do get stinky, even partial ones," he said.

"What is wrong?" Nadia said.

“Everything and nothing. I’ve trapped myself in something I can’t get out of,”
Luther said.
“What is that?”
“Luther is great.”
“What?”
“The idea of being great, when clearly I am a bottom dweller, just as Sol Reisner says.”

“Who is Sol Reisner?”
“You’ve never heard of Sol Reisner? He’s a world-famous author.”
“I don’t read that much,” Nadia said.
“How do you find out the truth?”
“I look into people’s faces.”
“How far will that get you? People are opaque. There are barracuda in human form in this world.”
“Far enough.”

He had run into the wall of her certitude, as could sometimes happen. It was good to see that she was finding her strength, and that it did not occlude him from her life. Still, there was strangeness, the fact that, with the brief exception of a couple of visits by Nadia to his apartment, he had only been with her at her place. No restaurants. No walks in the park. No movies. Several times he had run into her either coming in or out of the building. Such occasions had been awkward, as if they were meant to see each other only in the dark.

He lay with her that night. She let him have his way. He wondered again at his lack of effect on her that she should be so passive. He left as he always did, guiltily, as if he had stolen something.

Luther went down to the railroad tracks to orient himself, hoping that the grayness of the afternoon would find its way into his photos as he trained the Rolleiflex on a boxcar on a siding. Jesus, it was good to be down in the rail yard, even with the reduced scale of activity. Once again he thought how the truckers were killing rail freight in a country that was indifferent if not hostile to its own past. He brightened as a Penn Central switcher pulled a string of gondola cars from another siding, then came back for the boxcars. Still, it wasn't right that all this should die. There was no power like railroad power, the throb of a diesel engine and the clatter of the rolling stock it pulled in its path.

He had not yet read Gertrude Stein's Melanctha. He had not come yet to her clear understanding of what railroads signified to men of his kind.

"What are you doing here?" Luther said, seeing Jerry Jones-Nobleonian sitting on a rusted rail.

"I'm here to see your moms," Jerry said.

"Stop. We're not in high school anymore." There had been much sounding going on back then. Your momma wears combat boots. Your momma goes down for wooden nickels. Your momma this, your momma that. Verbal cruelties he had been unable to participate in.

“We are in high school, Luther. You and me, we don’t ever get to leave high school.”

“Why do you talk that way?” Luther said.

“You don’t know?”

“I guess not.”

“You’re fucked up just like I am. You just want to pretend that you’re not.”

“You know a whole lot.”

“I know you’re here.”

“I’m here to photograph.”

“You’re a jerk,” Jerry snickered. He had become more openly hostile, but then, his situation wasn’t good. His little sister was selling herself down on Forty-Second Street. His Estonian mother had to be institutionalized for talking loud and crazy on the street. His father was serving a sentence for killing a pedestrian while driving his taxi drunk. And there was Jerry’s brief experience in the army. The pinkish blotches on all parts of his body made him an easy target of the recruits. The hazing got out of hand and was to the detriment of morale and unity so the army sent him home.

“Stop calling me names,” Luther said.

“Like you haven’t been calling me names for years?”

“What names have I ever called you? I called you by your name. That’s all I ever called you,” Luther said.

“Calling me nigger under your breath. That’s what you’ve been calling me.”

“Never.”

“Thinking of me as a nigger. Acting toward me as if I was a nigger. The whole world thinking it could nigger me some more with a giant shit. But I throw your shit right back at you. Understand where I’m coming from with that?”

“I don’t understand anything you’re saying,” Luther said, although he did understand. Jerry Jones-Nobleonian was calling him on the unspoken attitude of superiority he had carried since they met back in grade school at a time when he had received his first rebuff from his classmates, the realization that they were having birthday parties organized by their parents and that he hadn’t been invited. They had said no to his flat head, his cutup ways, his odd last name that didn’t fit with Johnny Lacy and Edward Macy or Alison Pauley or any of the other girls they had claimed for their own.

They had been drawn into the tunnel, with its high walls and tunnel smell of things rank and yet pleasing. A sense of heightened expectation it summoned, as if the creation space itself where sex and birth were joined and the forever quality of childhood could be rediscovered by following the line of the tracks down the endless straightaway. You had entered another universe distant from the highway sounds and fragments of conversation that came to you through the vents and the overhead grates.

In the long ago it had been dread of the Freight Kings and the baseball bats they were reputed to bash your head with. Now it was of more solitary predator types.

“Be quiet? Shit. A nigger don’t have to be no kind of fucking quiet. That’s just what the white man want him to do. And another thing. A nigger don’t have to be afraid of no railroad tunnel and the things and people in it. A nigger can go where he goes with no fear because his time is coming. It is coming.”

Had Jerry been listening to Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown and Huey Newton? Jerry's whole thing had been to be white. He would tell everyone his black cabdriver father was only his stepfather. His real father had been Estonian, like his mother, and had been crushed by a Soviet tank while resisting the invasion of his homeland. Given his resemblance to his clearly black "stepfather," Jerry's story could only be a fiction, a desperate attempt to deny the reality of his lineage. And that last name, Nobleonian, he had insisted on. The last three letters would have suggested Armenian, not Estonian, descent.

"You the same as me, nigger. Don't ever forget it. You still pretending your father ain't your father, but your ugly-assed father is you and you is he. I done copped to my lie, but you still be lying through your skinny white ass. Talking to me all these years as if I was so much shit. Fuck your motherfucking bullshit self, motherfucker."

"Yes. And fuck you, too," Luther said, but without vehemence. That had been obliterated, if only for the moment, by Jerry's truth bombs.

"Don't be making me cut you, Mr. Phony Assed White Boy Nigger. Black man has the right to cut any white man he sees. Cut you so your own mother don't know who you is."

In the long ago, as well, the time of Breyer's ice cream and Old Gold cigarettes, those days spent exploring, alley climbing, finding pathways from Broadway down to Riverside Drive without using the street and of entering basements and hauling empty bottles to the grocery store for refunds, Jerry Jones Nobleonian would say, "Ellie's good too. Right?" of Elston Howard, the black catcher for the predominantly white New York Yankees, and Luther would understand, with full clarity, that Jerry was really asking to hear that Elston Howard deserved a place at the table with Mickey Mantle and Roger Maris and Tom Tresh and Clete Boyer and Bobby Richardson and Yogi Berra and all the rest of those Yankees players. The question would bring so close to the light the lie that Jerry was living, but all Luther could say in that time was “Sure, Ellie’s good. Ellie’s great.” He had heard you never startle a sleepwalker back to consciousness, and in the same way, it would have been dangerous to call Jerry on his fiction. Not only dangerous, but unkind. What he saw now was that perhaps he had not so much been protecting Jerry as protecting himself. If he left Jerry alone with his lies, then maybe Jerry would leave him alone with his own lies.

“Motherfucking pretend white boy need a lowdown nigger living in a stinky hotel to feel good about hisself,” Jerry continued, as if fully attuned to Luther’s thoughts.

Far down in the bend of the tunnel, a warm and light spread on the high walls, bringing them both to attention. Though the approaching train lacked regal bearing, being only a workaday switcher and not a twin diesel—it commanded respect. Behind it came the boxcars and the gondola cars and refrigerator cars and oil cars that Luther remembered from bygone days. He did not reach for rock ballast to bang off the rolling stock, nor did Jerry, as they would have back then. That phase was over. Now it was about—Luther didn’t know what it was about. He only sensed that he had to be there. And so too, evidently, did Jerry.

Jerry Jones-Nobelonian's shit storm stayed with Luther for some days. A substantial dose of guilt had been injected into his system by his former friend. But what could he do? Was it really his fault if an unreasoning fear of blacks had been instilled in him by traumatic childhood incidents, mainly the terror spread by bicycle caravans of young black men in summer migration from Harlem to the two welfare hotels on Luther's block? Hadn't they not beaten Luke's friend Whitey, just beaten and beaten on him until he fell to the sidewalk in front of Luther's building, then kicked and kicked him until driven off by the sound of an approaching police siren? His skull fractured, his jaw broken, his teeth knocked out, and his eyes blackened, Whitey lay crumpled on the sidewalk, his white shirt soaked with blood. His black attackers had been smiling as they did their work, work they could not get enough of. But had he not brought it on himself earlier in the day when, passing a couple of these same young blacks, he had been heard to sing, "If you're looking for trouble, you've come to the right place"? Where had that piece of stunning stupidity taken place? On Riverside Drive, as Luther was walking with Luke and Whitey. How was it that Whitey could not grasp what Luther grasped even as Whitey sang his idiotic song, that you don't, through innuendo or direct address, rile those born with bottomless anger? How could he not understand that those same black kids would be on them, like a swarm of yellow jackets, by the time they reached Broadway, where Whitey and Luke and Luther withdrew into a store for safety? Or that, still later that day, they would be waiting as Whitey emerged from Luther's building? Whitey had thought dressing up in the costume of toughness, with his garrison belt buckled on the side and the short sleeves of his tight T-shirt given an extra flip to show off his biceps, and his blond Elvis hairdo, was the same as being tough. Whitey could not understand that these black boys did not need the adornment of garrison belts and tight T-shirts, that they were born for battle and needed neither food nor water for sustenance when they had their own rage to feed on. And so, on that day, Luther had been given to see, from the safety of his window, the disproportionate response a minor offense could and would bring, that when a young black or a black of any age said, "I'm not playing," then in fact it must be completely understood that he wasn't playing. He did not see that their bottomless anger was, in some way, his own, that as a child, when he grew angry, that anger took on a life of its own.

And his mother. Though she was love itself, did she not have her own attitudes? Did she not say, "We cannot have this here," referring to the ceaseless violence that occurred in the two welfare hotels for the Negroes on that same block? Did she not rise above them in saying, "I work. Why should they not do the same?" Did she not deny them rooms in the building, saying there were no vacancies, when they came to her and she saw bedlam in their eyes and smelled the fury in their fists? She had grown up with the sound and the reality of violence in her home. She could not have it where she now lived. She could have the Kenyans and the Ethiopians and the Nigerians and the peaceful Negroes of New York City on the premises, but not those still formatted for violent rage.

And so his mother's world became his world, a world predicated on personal safety and not the larger issue of morality and justice and an end to rampant inequality. Not that those things didn't matter, but ultimately, fear was what really mattered, and fear told him he had to be good, he had to be very good, to avoid the same savage beating as the young blacks had inflicted on Whitey. We will beat you senseless. Such was the message he heard in the angry rhetoric of Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown and Huey Newton.

Only a couple of years before noisy demonstrations had taken place at City College in favor of open enrollment. Selective admission was discriminatory, some said. Throw open the doors. City College was situated in Harlem, and yet where were the black and Puerto Rican students? Luther saw not a plea for social justice but an angry mob at the gates, with vengeance as their driving force. He had been afraid—afraid for the college and afraid for himself. He was barely qualified to be there, and now even those whom tests had determined were not truly “college material” would be allowed in. People shouldn’t ask for things they didn’t deserve. He thought of Rutgers Law School. He had not earned his way in. That was the real reason he couldn’t cross the street and join the other first-year students at orientation. He had not been fit to be there. And if you were not fit, you were not fit. No amount of angry shouting, no amount of violence, could still that voice that told you so.

He felt so stripped, as if he stood naked on Broadway with his ribs showing and that ugly declivity in his chest for all to see. Where did you go but to the railroads or the obscurity of other desolate spaces when the conviction arose that a number was a number for all time to bow down before, to be beaten by, whipped and broken and left for dead, like poor Whitey in the long ago. Because a number was a hellish thing that had no mercy and still it was beating him, not into humility, but into a state of abjectness where all he could do was watch the trains go by.

Luther thought of Tom Smits, the boy to whom, with savage glee, he had sent the suicide note that summer day after Tom stood in the lobby of Luther's building, having finally discovered where Luther lived so he could put his laughing thing on him, as he was always putting his laughing thing on Luther, being born to do nothing but laugh at Luther the way that white folks were always laughing at the black man mocking the black man saying the black man lacked the necessities. Only he wasn't laughing. He was in grief that his father had left his mother and now summer was at an end and he would be going away to his fancy high board score college, a real college, and Luther hadn't called him or returned any of his calls, in spite of all the calling Tom Smits had done, Tom Smits saying without laughter all over his face that Luther meant something to him. Luther saw Tom Smits's pain but didn't care, seeing it as the phony pain of someone who had the security of his high intelligence to keep him afloat in the waters of life, like a man secured to a lifeline who pretends to be drowning.

Such a cleaver that suicide letter had been, severing for all time their connection. But had it? He thought of Tom Smits frequently, and of the Claremont School, as a paradise lost. The SAT. Jerry is to Luther as Luther is to Tom. That wasn't right. That wasn't a proper analogy. Anyway, Tom would have embraced Jerry. He wouldn't have shunned him. Tom was always embracing the other, those different from him. He thought back to Tom's adulation of Chicago Loyola University and its all-black starting five, led by racehorse guard Jerry Harkness, as it destroyed its mostly white opponent at Madison Square Garden, or the way he whooped when unheralded and all-black Texas Western crushed the Kentucky Wildcats, with its overrated white boys. How amazing that Tom could be so unthreatened by the progress of blacks. Tom had the cosmic consciousness that Zoe, the museum girl, had scolded Luther for lacking. But such a consciousness was dependent on an intelligence Luther didn't possess. He saw once again that his whole life was in service of holding others back—his sister Vera, Sarah, the blacks of America. And why? Because he could not move forward? Because he could not even leave Manhattan?

Sarah had not gone away. She was still in Boston and completing the fifth year program. Apathy was having its way with her, depositing her in the slough of despond for days on end. By now he had read Malone Dies, and he tried to give her Samuel Beckett's courage. "I can't go on, I won't go on, I must go on," he said, quoting or misquoting from the text.

But Sarah waved her hand dismissively. "You don't know anything."

"What does that mean?" Luther said.

"It means I'm being steamrolled by the genius. That's what it means."

Luther fell silent. There was no use pretending he didn't grasp what Sarah meant. The genius had become part of his life as well. Try as he might to resist the aura of the genius, Luther was in thrall to him, too. Wasn't the special power of a genius to make you bow down in recognition of his gifts?

"Well, this is very worrisome," Luther said, Sarah having pulled him into her sadness. But it was a sadness from the long ago too, summoned by his mother crying in front of him over something either he or some other of her worthless children had done. The kind of sadness that brought the end of the world so near, because if Sarah couldn't live, then how could he? If her sun went out, then he too would have to live in the cold and the darkness. She was still his guiding light. Or was she?

Sarah had, for a brief time, tried to make herself part of Lane's social circle, but she lacked the social confidence to hold her own among his friends. At a gathering in his apartment, she had gotten drunk and disgraced herself by making love with one of Lane's girlfriends. Luther learned of the incident not from Sarah but by reading about it in her journal. She was like him in some way. Her social footing was unsure, in some circles, even if she possessed the gift of friendship far more than he ever would. The humiliation was reassuring, if sad to read; it confirmed that she did not belong with Lane and his cool kind.

The social failure and the cloud of impending defeat in the fifth year competition allowed a thought to enter Luther's mind. Maybe Sarah was not everything he had thought she was. Maybe now was the time, with June approaching, to reconsider whether it was really a good idea for her to come to New York City and live with him. Evidently, Sarah had the same matter on her mind, if she expressed it a different way.

"So are we going to live together? Are we?" she screamed into the phone.

These were not words, or a tone, that Luther ever expected to hear from Sarah, but he had taught her well, he understood, how to be uncivil. And he saw too the sadness that was driving her words, the sense that she was being defeated by her genius boyfriend on two fronts, artistically and socially, and so she had nowhere to go but to Luther and that it would be all right for her to show her ugly and unbecoming side, as he did all the time. Or maybe she thought if she made herself unpleasant, that would be sufficient to drive him away. He saw the freedom highway calling to him. There was no use saying he was unaware of the fork in the road that Sarah had brought them to and that he might be better off taking the road less hard and burdensome. But he could not forsake her, however she might be presenting herself to him in that moment. He could not allow the anarchy and death that a parting of the ways would bring and so he said, in a tone as moderate as hers was inflamed, that of course he wanted them to live together. Of course. A plan was a plan, and what was life without one?

“The wages of sin are death. The wages. Do you understand the seriousness of that, Luther. Do you?” Melvin’s mouth hung open as he awaited Luther’s response.

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“Maybe I can help you to know, Luther. Would you like me to instruct you? Would you like to be under my wing?”

“Maybe not,” Luther said.

“Are you hungry, Luther? Would you like a hot dog? Would you like my hot dog?”

“Your hot dog?” Luther said.

“I did not mean that, Luther. Honest I didn’t. I meant your hot dog. I meant...I’ve got to get away. The devil is calling me,” Melvin said, and left Luther where he had found him.

The Godfather had opened. Luther saw it with Sarah at a theater along the Great White Way, and the film opened his mind to the possibilities of an acting career, as the acid trip with Lenore had some years before. He would follow Marlon Brando and Al Pacino and James Caan and Robert Duvall onto the silver screen. He too would be seen. He had to be seen. Such was his calling. It did not matter that he was ugly and had too many bones showing and a head that evoked laughter and even ridicule. Acting, like writing, would be a reprieve from the gnawing sense of inadequacy so much a part of his mental life. He would have something more than his words, which went nowhere but onto the page.

Luther was troubled as well as inspired by what he saw on the screen that night. Sonny's love for his abused sister and the rage he displayed on learning that his crumb-bum brother-in-law had beaten her once again, was something of a reproach. Sonny was showing him what a brother should be, what a man should be, even if his passion did get him killed in an ambush before Sonny could get to and kill the wife-beating son of a bitch. Such horror and sadness Luther felt on seeing Sonny massacred, to use the Godfather's word, by Tommy gun wielding gangsters. Don't go there. Just don't go there, Luther had shouted, in his mind, as Sonny's car approached the toll booth, which even before the bullets flew had the forlorn look of death. It was not right to obliterate human life, especially that of someone so vibrant. It was just not right. And something else was not right. He, Luther, was not right. So Sonny was telling him with his displays of outraged fury that anyone should lay a hand on his sister. Because Sonny had love for his sister, not competition, not petty jealousy. Love. He was his sister's protector. He was Harry Hotspur, the theme of honor's tongue, when it came to that sister of his.

And good Lord, Michael Corleone, Sonny's younger brother. He had all the necessities. Dartmouth College. (Those green and white book covers Luther bought at the Columbia University bookstore when he was a kid and the Ivy League was everything and Steve Spahn, the nifty Dartmouth guard, crying, crying, when violence broke out on the court in a varsity game at the Columbia gym. Players just beating and beating each other. No, no. It was very understandable why Steve Spahn would cry as he did, given that he came from the world of intelligence and not crazy fists. And then that big, rugged boy who lived down the hill on Riverside Drive in one of the houses of order who had applied to Dartmouth College, only he wasn't sure if his 1300 board scores were high enough. What more proof was needed that geniuses and only geniuses entered the realm of the Ivy league?) A decorated hero fighting for America in the United States Army. Michael Corleone had stepped out of Brooklyn. He had stepped out of college. He had stepped out of family and into the world and now he was returning to family with a girl who was not from Brooklyn, not from that world. A young man who had the love of his father and who loved his father right back with the love a son should feel for his father. There was love abounding between father and son that did not need to speak its name.

All this Luther saw, and this as well, that Santino, Sonny, for all his power and passion (those suspenders) was afraid of his younger brother, because Michael Corleone had been out in the world whereas Santino had not. You could see the fear that had traveled from his mind to his face that he was nothing but the Sonny that his family and friends called him. That Luther could surely see.

And these were the things that Luther heard as well as saw, that men could have such names as Luca Brasi and Bruno Tattaglia and Virgil Sollozzo, names that needed to be sung, not said, and demanded repetition and lived uncluttered with consonants. Names you wanted to eat with a knife and fork or do something with, they were that delicious.

“The Italians have always been something,” Luther said to Sarah that same night. “They will do battle with anyone. Anyone. They are the one ethnic group black gangs won’t mess with in this city. Why? Because blacks know the Italians will fight with ferocity. They don’t play. They simply don’t play, just as blacks don’t play.”

“Is that right?” Sarah said, because she heard him with her third ear. Heard how he was trying to make the movie his, not theirs, with the imposition of his nebulous experience. At the same time she wanted to be kind, recognizing that the past, inflated though it might be in his consciousness, was his only treasure trove.

“Did I ever tell you about Raymond Donatelli, older brother of Johnny Donatelli, who was beaten to the pavement by the knuckle punches to the spine of a black kid who wore the smile of savage revenge as he did his work? Did I ever tell you how Raymond Donatelli called on the black kid to come from the hotel where Raymond knew him to live and how many, many blacks poured from that building to do battle with Raymond Donatelli and how he broke many of their faces even as they broke his?”

“Tell me,” she said, in spite of her previously supercilious-appearing manner. Childhood was their bond; family was their bond. His somewhat unsheltered life growing up drew her to him.

And so he did tell her what little more he could about Raymond Donatelli as an exemplar of the fierceness of Italians, though his brief account did not fully convey what he was trying to say. And how could it, since words inevitably fell short. To be honest, he could not say that he truly liked Italians. Hardness and a lack of forgiveness were part of their makeup. They were like a diamond with an incredibly sharp edge. You touched their beauty and you bled. The Godfather gave them a human quality. The family gatherings and the wedding of at which the Godfather dances with his daughter and drops dead in the garden as he plays with his grandson. But the Godfather was a dog. He was a parasite and a murderer and an egomaniac. At the risk of being beaten to the point where he could not be recognized, Luther had to be free to think such a thing. And the fatuousness of the Godfather's concept of respect when he had no idea what the word meant, given the way he walked over those who opposed him. No, no. You could give yourself to a father only so far. Then you must kill him.

“And you know what?”

“No. Tell me.”

“I'm going to be an actor too, just like them. I made up my mind while sitting in the movie theater.”

“Luther, I don't think so.”

“Why not? I had a part in the senior play.”

“I know, but...”

“But what?”

“Nothing. Go ahead. You'll be fine.”

“I’ll be fine?”

“That’s what I said.”

“You’re not telling me I’m going to swim with the fishes, like Luca Brasi?”

“It’s not swim with the fishes. It’s sleep with the fishes.”

“Same difference.”

“Same difference to you.”

He heard what she was saying. He wasn’t precise. He would try to be more careful in how he expressed himself. If everything else defied order, you could at least try to line up your words.

“I don’t think this one is quite right,” Sarah said.

“What’s wrong with it?”

“It’s too finished. Too slick. It looks like something out of a magazine on home design.”

The loft was on the top floor of an old building on Canal Street overlooking the Bowery. Luther stared at the new and gleaming wood floor and the modern kitchen and wondered what it meant to possess such capability. The man showing them the loft made his living renovating raw spaces and making them habitable. This is a real man, Luther thought, a man who can dispense with paperback books and actually do things.

He was so sorry to hear Sarah put the nix on it, because, in Luther’s estimation, they were standing in a loft of order, if he could not quite say the same of the dilapidated building itself. But he was also aware that he was with his lady love, a grotesque term that had just sailed into his mind, and that every cell in his body wanted to do right by her. How much space, after all, did you need for a typewriter? The loft was for her glory, not his own, and required a vast space for the big canvases she was working on, while “White Line Continue” he could simply hide in a drawer. And hiding would be something he needed to do, he understood, lacking, as he did, the substance she possessed that allowed her to show herself through her art. She could stand behind what she did without putting the laughing thing on it.

“Amour propre,” he said, pronouncing the second word to rhyme with rope.

“What?” she said.

“Self-regard. Self-love. You possess it,” he said.

“Don’t start with your bags of bullshit,” Sarah said.

“OK. But it’s not bullshit,” he replied.

A Chinese man, shriveled and old, hawked up phlegm and spit a gob, narrowly missing Luther’s foot as he and Sarah passed by on the narrow sidewalk.

“That’s pretty disgusting,” Sarah said.

“Lo fan. That’s what they call us, or what some of them call us.”

“What’s that?”

“White devils, I think. I read that somewhere,” Luther said.

“Well, we’ve managed to piss off half the world. Why not the Chinese?” she said.

“They aren’t always so nice either. They can do some nasty stuff. How would you like to be called a running dog of capitalism?”

“I see your point. God, it’s hot.”

The sun was directly overhead and scorching as they hung a sharp left on the Bowery onto East Broadway at Chatham Square. He had never heard of East Broadway before responding to the classified for a loft in the Village Voice. Did that mean there was a West Broadway? And what the hell did it have to do with Broadway, which curved from Inwood to the South Ferry. East sounded so repellent, like day-old scrambled eggs, and anxiety-inducing, like a flapping hinge precariously attached at an odd and impossible angle to the main structure. He could only wonder at the skill of cartographers in organizing the earth for easy inspection.

“Topographical cretinism,” Luther said.

“What is that?” Sarah asked.

“Trotsky, living in exile, had difficulty finding the British Museum. And so he gave himself that diagnosis.” He had begun reading the Isaac Deutscher trilogy on the great Bolshevik revolutionary. It gave him hope when the prominent men of history were humanized in such ways.

“Why are you talking this way?”

“I don’t know,” he said.

A classic Greek coffee shop on the corner and a public library, but otherwise a street teeming with Chinese commerce. Strips of orange-glazed duck meat hanging in one store window, while next door, on a sidewalk stall, fish and crustaceans were laid out on a bed of ice and in the distance, banded grayly across the sky, the Manhattan Bridge. Here he felt himself in a different world, faceless, anonymous, and yet safe; the hum of industry, not violence, was in this community’s bones.

The second loft was a disappointment, as old and dilapidated as the first was modern and sparkling. Two sad-looking wicker chairs and a wicker sofa with stained cushions in the living area, a hotplate but no stove in the kitchen, and a bathroom that had a toilet but no sink and a curtain hanging from a rod as a gesture at privacy. But Sarah surprised him. She was taken not with the possibilities of the two-thousand-square-foot space, but with the space as it was.

“This is a loft for artists, not a decorator’s showplace,” she said.

There was no elevator, and it was a long walk up the brightly lit staircase to the fourth floor. But the downstairs door had a locked door and an intercom, which provided a sense of safety, as did the firehouse directly across the street.

“I am having a nervous breakdown,” the woman who had buzzed them in said. “My husband is leaving me, I fear. All our money he has poured into this new loft we have rented on Wooster Street, just a block east of West Broadway...”

“Did I just hear you say West Broadway?” Luther was beside himself in anticipation of her answer.

“I did,” the woman said. “Is that important?”

“No. Yes. Maybe. I believe so.”

“Luther, do you suppose you could let her finish what she was saying?” Sarah asked.

“Yes, of course. I’m sorry.”

“He is over there now, as he is every day. The space looks like a construction site. New wiring, new plumbing, the list is endless of the things he has set himself to do. I have no doubt the place will be functional and livable, but I never feel it will be those things for me. I feel I have no place in this new loft and no place in his life, and he does nothing to reassure me. He is relentless and has become inhuman. Hungarians can be that way. Mean, small, petty. We are not nice people. The French are not nice either, but they have their pretty language and pretty faces to hide that reality.”

“I love Hungarian goulash. Properly spiced, nothing beats it,” Luther said. The normal thing when a woman, or anyone, expressed pain and despair was to try to wrap them in his warmth, but he could not do that with Edit Kadar. She had a huge overbite, which for some reason mitigated against compassion, and the fact that she was a graduate student in art history at Columbia University was something to hold against her as well. It meant she had a core of toughness and competence over and above anything he possessed. Why should anyone stay with a woman who stuck her nose in paperback books while he seized life with his two strong hands? The words just deserts came to Luther’s mind. He visualized the second word correctly as having one ‘s,’ sensing as he did that a second “s” just wouldn’t cut it. And then these unspoken words also came to him: “When something is over, it is over,” because already he was understanding who Edit Kadar’s husband was. He was the train that you could only stand back and watch as it roared down the track.

And something else was over—his time at the Hell’s Kitchen apartment. That does not mean he did not have loose ends to tie up. Roddy Rumble, the footloose man with the crescent-shaped scar who was living just above him with Jackson, the sliver-lipped singer

(and whatever else he said he was) of “Country Road,” had found a place in Luther’s heart as well as his psyche. The prefecture of pain Luther sensed Roddy Rumble silently walked in and his resemblance to Luke had fostered that bond, as had their time together watching the Big Red Machine and Manny “Jump for Joy” Sanguillen and all the other Pittsburgh Pirates and the Birds of Baltimore with revenge-seeking Frank Robinson in playoff baseball. Because there was no bond like that which baseball established. None whatsoever.

“Roddy, I want to make you an offer you cannot refuse,” Luther said.

“What’s that?” Roddy said, oblivious of the Godfather influence.

“A new chapter of my life is beginning. Sarah, my girlfriend and I, will be taking a place together farther downtown. My thought was that maybe you would like this place for yourself instead of having to room with Jackson upstairs.” Luther went on to explain that Roddy could move in as a subtenant, which the lease permitted. Luther couldn’t see making a clean break. He was entering new and scary territory, and a vast one, down on East Broadway, and his Hell’s Kitchen cubbyhole could provide security. You didn’t just let go of an apartment renting for fifty bucks a month. That wouldn’t be normal, as his mother would say.

“Sure. I could go for that,” Roddy said, in his laconic way.

“And who knows? Maybe you and your friend from down south will come up and join you. You never know, right?” Because if Luther was crossing a line with Sarah, then maybe Roddy would also. But Roddy didn’t give him any words in response. Laconic he might be, but now all Luther could hear was his unsmiling silence.

“You must do your business with Janos. I am just his secretary, not his wife,” Edit Kadar said, continuing with her theme of despair. Luther had returned to the loft with a check to seal the deal, but she said firmly, “I will arrange for you to meet with him.” Faithful to her words, she reached for the phone and said, “Janos, he is here. I am sending him to you to do with what you want. Am I being clear?” Evidently, she was, though what secretary spoke to her boss in such a manner Luther could not imagine. “You must go to him. He will not come to you. So he said to me,” Edit said, after hanging up the phone.

“Is this some sort of Hungarian tradition?” Luther asked.

“Do not ask me to think of the Hungarians. It will only make me ill. Of beautiful art you may speak, but not the Hungarians.”

“But I love the Hungarians. They are the bravest people on this earth, standing up to Soviet tanks in Budapest in 1956.”

“Have you not been listening to me?” Edit asked.

“I will go to him. That is not a problem.”

“I will give you the address. But first you will have a cup of tea so you will have the strength to deal with him.”

“Thank you,” Luther said, when what he really wanted was to be out the door.

“Your girlfriend is pretty. Is she a good artist?”

“Oh yes. The very best,” Luther said.

“And how about you? Are you an artist, too?”

“I am not an artist at all,” Luther said.

“I am not surprised. You do not look like an artist. You look like a man who sits around and drinks a lot of tea and coffee and stronger things. Is this true?”

“Yes. This is true,” Luther said.

“You are like me. You are a woman, but this is not a good thing. I am a woman, so it is OK for me to be a woman. But you are a man, so that is not OK that you should be a woman. Do you understand?”

“I think so,” Luther said. It was all right with him if Edit Kadar assigned herself the role of truth-teller.

“Do you want to love me? I wouldn’t mind,” Edit said.

“I don’t think I can do that,” Luther said.

“Why is that? Do you believe, in your fictional world, that a woman cannot make love to a woman? Are you not a progressive spirit?”

“No. Of course not, but...”

“It is OK. Let us drink our tea.”

It was good tea, smoky and delicious. “I am sorry to leave you like this,” Luther said, after a long silence.

“Pah. You have been in my position before and will be again. Women are always being left by their men,” Edit said.

An hour later he entered a corner building on Wooster Street, at the north end of SoHo. The prestigious galleries and fancy boutiques Luther had passed on the cobblestone streets supported his sense that in leaving East Broadway, Janos Kador had moved up in the world. When he opened the door of the tight, narrow elevator, he stepped directly into a space easily double the size of the Chinatown loft. Wires hung from the ceiling, an assortment of pipes of varying size and shape lay unassembled in a mound, and plaster powder covered the floors.

In the midst of this chaos, shirtless and wearing only a bowler hat and shorts and sneakers, knelt a man with a face as hard and tough as his wiry body, poring over a folded out diagram. Luther had read an inflammatory quote that Frank Sinatra weighed ninety-eight pounds, and that ninety-two of those pounds were in his dick. Surely the preponderance of Janos Kadar's meager weight was in his massive head. And he would need all the mental powers available to him, as at a glance Luther judged the diagram to be of considerable complexity and to contain figures of a kind that had appeared on the army intelligence test he had failed.

Reduced to superlatives by the spectacle of industry before him, Luther said, "You are an expansionist empire, a sleeping giant now awakened, like mainland China. You definitely have a plan. But if I may also say, my aunt came to this country and bought two buildings and now she lies dying."

"You are stupid American man, coming here with your stupid American noise," Janos Kadar replied, without looking up.

"That's not a very friendly thing to say."

"Hungarian people tell truth when not telling lies. You Americans. I spit on you. I laugh at you. I pull down my pants and take giant crap on you. And the more I do that the more you love me."

"Why is that?" Luther asked.

“Why? Why? Why you have to ask why all the time? Why you not just know something?”

“You just asked why. In fact, you asked why four times.”

But Janos felt no need to defend his obnoxious pronouncements. He simply went where the currents of his mind took him. “You bring check? You talking the turkey?”

“I am very much talking the turkey,” Luther said, unworried that Janos would pick up on his mockery. Janos might be a force—in fact, he and his wife together had been serving up some Hungarian clobber—but that didn’t mean Luther had to negate his own existence.

“Let me see.” Janos’s plaster dust-covered hand moved with the quickness of a snake for the check. “This a forgery? Some kind of swindle? You a crook?”

“No, no, and no,” Luther said.

“You too stupid for crook. Crook need this,” Janos said, tapping his temple, a harsh smile revealing his bad Hungarian teeth.

Luther had wanted to say something nice and even insightful to Janos Kadar. He had wanted to express his longstanding conviction that the Warsaw Pact countries would tear the asses off the wimpy Western European forces gathered together under NATO’s command, that Rumanians and Bulgarians and Albanians and Poles and Czechs would as well break the face of Western civilization in many different places. But now he couldn’t and wouldn’t. He had had just about enough of Janos Kadar.

Outside, Luther sat on a standpipe and sought to gather himself. He held his sides as if he had received a merciless flogging. After a while he began to walk. So this is SoHo, he thought, passing under a beautiful corrugated metal awning sloping down over a disused loading dock. The image of a cold beer in a big, sweaty glass came to him. Soon he passed a bar with a cantilevered TV and soft amber lights. Let me go in, he said to himself. Let me be among friends.

Hungarian love is better than no love at all. This thought occurred to Luther as he came to the following morning. It hurt to move his head and he was a while before getting up and relieving the cottonmouth with a glass of water. Another thought came to him that morning, that he might be truly insane for turning over the key money to Janos Kadar and finalizing the deal. He stared with bleary eyes at himself in the mirror over the kitchen sink. You are stealing money, Luther. Your hand is in Mommy's pocketbook, as it was when you were a child. You are a thief. He heard the word in his mind as his mother would pronounce it. Tief, as in leaf. You must end this. You must stop. But how? He had "White Line Continue" to write. He had an acting career to launch. He had a girlfriend to be with so he didn't have to die and she wouldn't have to die. He had a piece of garbage degree, failing even to graduate with honors from a college with such low status that recruiters stayed away. What company would hire him? How could he possibly fit into an office environment? Interviewers would look at his mediocre transcript and embarrassing test scores and laugh.

But as the morning progressed his mood shifted. We're not going to do the monkey shit thing, Luther. We're not going to piss and shit all over our self and beg forgiveness. We're not going to reduce our self to nothingness. We're going to put the laughing thing on this fear, this guilt, and remorse. We are going to move forward with our life and see what happens. No more old rugged cross, Luther. No more Calvary. No more tired old rocks of ancient Judea or whatever. No more gnashing of teeth and all that blah de blah blah blah. Do you want to be blown back into one of those shithole rooms of your sisters and brother? Do you want that? Well, do you? Jamais. Jamais. Take what is yours if the others are too timid to take what is theirs. Do not wear the hair shirt. Do not do the long-suffering thing. That's right, Luther. Laugh. Put that motherfucking laughing thing on the whole sorry business of your fear and get on with it.

Edit Kadar had invited Luther to a party that evening. He would have an opportunity to meet artists from the Chinatown community. In fact, the party was in a loft right across the street from where Luther and Sarah would be living and was hosted by a dear friend of Edit's, Olga Masaryk. Luther quickly discerned that Olga's husband, who had the unfortunate name Glyt, was a woman, too. It wasn't Glyt's ponytail. Many manly men wore their hair like a high school girl, including Hell's Angels and contract killers and slice and dice knife men of the night. Men named Bruce and Ron Doug and Bruno had ponytails. Nor was his womanliness determined by his scary smile, like that of a snake, or any other aspect of his appearance.

"I try not to take up space on the planet. That is why I write poems in very tiny handwriting so the reader needs a magnifying glass to read them."

"Why would you want to do such a thing, Glyt? Don't you see you are full of self-hatred when you try to hide yourself that way."

“There is no hiding. This is aesthetic, if you even know what the word means,” Glyt said, clearly annoyed by Luther’s question. “My wife is artist, too” he said, nodding to Olga, a woman as large as Glyt was slender. “Just this morning, with my friend Horvath, I carried a bathtub up all these flights and installed it. Now she can take all the baths she wants. That is good, is it not?”

“Oh yes, that is very good,” Luther said.

“So maybe now you have something more of criticism you want to make of me?” Glyt asked.

Glyt may have been a woman, but Luther suspected that he may also have been a homicidal woman. Some bottomless fury, ancient in origin, was informing his face. Across the room Luther saw a real woman staring at him even as she lifted a glass of wine to her mouth. “If you will excuse me,” Luther said.

“You been seeking to assign my worth, and now you are moving on?”

“Nothing of the kind, Glyt. Nothing of the kind. But it would be good to circulate, wouldn’t you agree?” Hearing himself as some English actor with an air of refinement.

“Do not make mockery of me. I burn your house down with you in it. Do you understand?”

“Oh yes, Glyt. I do understand. But let me leave you with this. Let reason prevail.”

“I don’t talk to you anymore. You are nothing. Nobody. You are not even air.”

“Yes, Glyt. It will not profit you to speak to someone who is not here.”

“Shut up your face. Just shut it up,” Glyt said.

Luther nodded, in deference to the enraged Glyt's imperative, and made his way to the woman. "I have been looking for you for a long time," he said.

"Is that some line you heard in a movie?" the woman asked.

"It could be," Luther said. "You take what is available to you."

"Does that apply to women as well?"

"Some air might be nice. Can we walk?"

"Sure," she said. Such a sexy, expressive word, opening the doors of heaven when she spoke it.

He paused to consider the wisdom of leaving with a woman he had just met. Hadn't Edit gone out of her way to introduce him to others living in the community? And had he not explained, more than once, that the loft was more for his girlfriend than for him? One in particular, to whom he had spoken, a sad-faced handsome man with earnest, compelling eyes, was staring at him from across the room that very moment. A filmmaker who lived where he worked, in the loft below Sarah and Luther's. Some kind of film production company he owned. A man rising on his own strength and innate capacity. A man with the goods, in looks as well as brains. Where did they come from? They couldn't all be in the 99th percentile. A Dartmouth dropout. Gregory. John Gregory. Four years in the military. From Tennessee. Jesus, who knew what drove such a person?

But Luther couldn't wait. He would concoct a story later. What later? He was nothing to these people, except for crazy Glyt, who wanted to murder him.

He told the woman, Lindsay, about the loft but not about Sarah. She was poor, just out of the Peace Corps. A two-year stint in Kenya where she had taught and tried to nurture malnourished children. Essex, Delancey, Rivington, Stanton. Up they walked to East Houston and on into the East Village, where she lived.

A storefront on East Fourth Street, with a boarded-up window that bulged into the street. Who knew what it had been? A grocery? A hardware store? A store such as Luigi, the building upholsterer, had moved into years before up on First Avenue, in Germantown. At the back a four-step staircase leading to a door and her private quarters. An artist, she was. A storefront artist, not a loft artist, for now.

She opened a bottle of wine. Red wine. The kind with a foil wrap and a cork.

“I’m an alcoholic,” she said, as she sat cross-legged and applied the corkscrew.

“What?”

“I’m an alcoholic,” she said.

“Why are you that?” Luther said. The word disturbed him beyond his ability to say.

“Because when I open a bottle I have to finish it,” she said.

“But suppose you’re sharing the bottle with someone?”

“Then I have to open two,” she said.

“Jesus,” Luther said.

“Jesus liked his wine, but I don’t think he was an alcoholic. Although if he lived long enough, who knows?”

“Jesus living on the Bowery?”

“You never know. He could be there right now.”

“You’re scaring me,” Luther said.

“Why am I scaring you?”

“I don’t know.”

“Because if I’m one, then maybe you are, too?”

“I said I don’t know.”

“It’s not the worst thing. My father was a drunk and he got sober.”

“Sober?”

“He doesn’t drink anymore.”

“That doesn’t sound like fun,” Luther said.

“I agree, so let’s drink up.”

She had a life force all her own that had told her who she was and where she needed to be. It had settled her on the Boston Museum School long before she had arrived, as if Park Row and the Fenway had been her destiny. But now that same school was saying she must go off on her own. It did not want her anymore, and told her so emphatically in giving the fifth year competition award to the genius, who had already flown off to Greece with the prize money and was sending her brilliant letters about his travels. Such a thing genius was that to get near it was to be burned by its bright flame. And Sarah had been badly burned.

“He has killed me all over again,” Sarah said.

“No he hasn’t. He hasn’t killed you or anyone.”

“What do you know? Are you a genius? Are you anything?” Sarah said.

“I don’t know. Am I?” he said. It wasn’t a club she hadn’t beaten him with before, and though the wound smarted, he had faith it would not be life-threatening. She was disappointed. That was all. She was saying that she had nowhere to go but to him, but that didn’t mean she had to be happy about her situation. Many, many times she had said she was born to live alone, childless and husbandless, and that a family life was not suitable for her. Because she had a vision. She wanted for herself the life neither her father nor her mother were able to take.

She did not hear his question, or if she did, she ran right over it. “If I am to live with you, you will have to sign a contract,” she said.

“What kind of contract?”

“A contract that you’re not going to push me around. You’re not going to dictate to me. Can you do that?”

“Sure. Draw up a contract and I’ll sign it.” He found himself laughing in a way that later made him uneasy. An image of his mother laughing after saying they were living in the last days came to him, her laughter fed by his furious protest. He saying to her, in the long ago, in his child’s voice, “You have had your life. Can you please allow me to have mine? Can you do that? Can you?” As if enjoying the fear she had elicited in him that he would burn and burn in hell unless he were just like her. Yes, yes, the laughter of someone who had power over him, as he was now exercising it over Sarah with his laughter. We cannot have this. We cannot have this. These words too he heard, in his mother’s voice, in reference to his laughter.

The roar of the trains rumbling over the Manhattan Bridge carried to the loft, causing it to vibrate. Edit had said they would get used to both the noise and the shaking, Luther recalled, and after a week he did. Something else he got used to was her, Sarah, the two of them living together. It was good to go to sleep with her and to get up with her, in the continuity of days. Finally, finally, the geographical barrier had been removed. The finish line—that improbable five-year plan—had been reached. Union, of a kind, had been reached.

No contract was needed; he didn't hear from her about a written agreement again. The shared purpose of organizing the loft, placing their modest stamp on it, fostered a sense of harmony, as did the sense that a new and possibly exciting chapter of their lives was beginning. And possibly she was grateful for the security he was providing. She was her father's daughter, at a loss how to move forward in the world outside of the structure of school.

“You cannot build a life on a lie. No architect builds a house on quicksand. Only time will tell what you have made. You have done nothing for me, while I have done everything for you, but I am not in this profession for gratitude. I am in it for healing.” So Dr. Dressler said, at what she announced was their last session.

“You sound so bitter,” Luther said.

“Three years with you would make any person bitter. I feel for your mother, your siblings, and for Sarah and her family. “

“You don't have to be talking this way,” Luther said.

“I asked you to do a simple thing, to write a report stating the progress you had made while in my care. And you did not do it. You refused.”

“Yes,” Luther said.

“Why? Why would you do such a thing?”

“I’m not sure.”

“I asked you to lie down, and you wouldn’t do that either. For three years you cast your eyes on me like a mongoose eyes a snake.”

“Do you want me to lie down and die? Would that make you happy?”

“I am not your mother. Do not start this sort of thing with me.”

She was tagging him with the guilt she sought to induce. She was letting him go without letting him go. She was saying she would see him again sometime in the future. Well, it was as it was.

The walls in the living area were too uniformly white. Their whiteness was confining, oppressive. And so they knocked down the plaster on the portion of wall behind the box spring they had bought at the Salvation Army in order to expose the brick. With hammers and chisels they worked away, covering their mouths with scarves. The plaster came loose in large and small pieces.

At night, as Sarah lay in bed, he stayed up and drank beer, trying to hush the sound of the pull tab on the cans he opened. The unfinished project was a burden. He was not built to tolerate disorder. He was not Janos Kadar.

Halfway through Luther began to fear that structural damage might be done and that the owners might not share his and Sarah's aesthetic appreciation of exposed brick with a coating of shellac to seal in the dirt. Suppose they were hit with a bill for damages? Suppose they were evicted? He began to worry that the job would never end. When the plaster was entirely off the wall, the hard part of hauling it downstairs in plastic garbage bags began. Even when the plaster was sitting bagged by the curb, the problem wasn't entirely solved. Day after day the bags stayed in place, as evidence of the destruction they had wrought.

From his window one night, he saw a dark green garbage truck pull to the curb. Santorelli Brothers, the name on the side of the truck said. Santorelli. Like Santino. Like Corleone. Like bodies, human bodies, as well as garbage could be crunched in the truck's maw and wind up in the belly of the beast. I am messing with the Mob, Luther thought. They control this area. I am showing them colossal disrespect in assuming they will pick up bags of my garbage. They will learn I am responsible and sleep me with the fishes.

A thirty-foot dumpster was sitting down the block. For an hour Luther hauled one heavy bag after another and, with maximum effort, deposited them over the side of the dumpster. Exhausted and aching, he drank his beer that night and peered out the window. Suppose Santorelli Brothers owned the dumpster as well? Suppose they came with their gloved hands and broke his bones in many places and said, "You want a fucking dumpster? We'll give you a dumpster," and threw him in it, too.

But no posse of the aggrieved arrived at his door to break his bones or take issue with him in any way, and for this he was relieved and grateful.

The floors were a light and unappealing gray. And so, starting with her studio, they gave the boards a coat of high-gloss forest green. The project was much easier on his nerves than the wall had been. No landlord could object to tenants brightening their property.

“We did it,” Luther said, admiring the gleaming floor after the paint had dried.

“Yes. We did,” Sarah said.

Luther went over to the sink area, where he broke the seal on a pint bottle of Clan MacGregor scotch. Then he poured the scotch into a glass and added some tap water. He now drank scotch in the bars when he got impatient with the beer and wanted to speed up the action so he could get there faster. There was that happy place, which he knew when he found it. And now he could do the same thing at home.

He turned, and as he raised the glass to his lips, saw Sarah standing in front of him. She had arrived so quietly, almost mysteriously, from her studio.

“Luther, people in my family don’t drink this way.”

With those few words she summoned a feeling of unbearable shame, as if she had stripped him bare and was now shining a glaring light on his weakness, his sickness. Her tone, free of judgment, only added to the force of her words. She had taken a mental snapshot, far more revelatory than the endless photos he took of her.

A set of shelves and cabinets, the top portion designed to serve as a loft bed, divided the living area from her studio. She turned and went back through the underpass to her easel. Relieved that she had left him to himself and was now out of sight, he went over to the bed and sat on it, still holding onto the glass. Drinking the scotch wasn’t the same now that she had said what she did, and yet he couldn't just throw it away. She had said he was a cripple, a man who needed a crutch because he couldn't make it on his own. As gross as a grown man who had not been weaned from his mother. And she was right. Her family didn't drink the way he did. An old fashioned before dinner, maybe a drink after dinner, and that was it. Peter didn't just break the seal on a bottle and drink all by himself, as Luther did. But it wasn't right, the fact that Sarah would stop him in his tracks just when his train was leaving the station. That was what wasn't right. His new life had barely begun. She was trying to take away from him the very thing he needed to survive and flourish.

“I like happy endings. I've always been that way. Did you know that about me?” He had come into her studio as she stood with a brush in hand at her easel. “Audie Murphy had just come home from the war to learn his mother had died. He leaned his head against a wall and closed his eyes. That was unbearable sorrow. Unbearable. Poor Audie Murphy.” Audie Murphy had been a World War II hero who became an actor, playing himself in one war movie.

“Everyone likes happy endings, Luther. But I'm working. Can't you see that?”

“Yes, I do. OK,” he said, and went back to the glass he had left in the living area.

In the morning, when he was further away from his shame, he said, “Please, you have to understand. Drinking takes away my anxiety, but it's more than that. It helps me with my writing. I can't explain, but it's true. All those writers I read about in the Paris Review interviews drink. Truman Capote drinks and William Faulkner, he drank. Norman Mailer drinks. All of them. I'll do this. I promise to drink only beer and wine in the loft. I mean, that's not really drinking. How would that be?"

"Fine. It's OK, Luther. It's OK," Sarah said, as if she were no longer the person who had said those earlier words to him and he was speaking about things that didn't need to be said, at least to her.

The Van Dines came to visit. Though fatigued from their long climb up the stairs, Lydia reached into her bag for a smoke. But Peter did some conspicuous sniffing of the air.

"Am I smelling gas?" He asked, while reaching for Lydia's arm so she wouldn't light her Tareyton. He moved toward the kitchen area. "That isn't a pipe. It's a garden hose. Someone has hooked up a garden hose to run from the gas outlet to the water heater." He moved closer. "And good God, the hose has been sealed at either end with duct tape. Duct tape Who did this?"

Peter's father had been a plumber. Peter had grown up with admiration for his father's skill and loved him for the sacrifices he had made so Peter could go on to college. Peter did not forget where he had come from; his life was about remembering.

"Luther and I didn't do that, Daddy. It was that way when we moved in."

"Janos Kadar. Janos Kadar did it," Luther said.

"Janos Kadar?" Lydia asked.

"The previous tenant. He knows a thing or two about plumbing. Maybe he learned it in Budapest, or wherever in Hungary he is from. He came to this country with only a change of underwear and now is putting the finishing touches on a loft double this size on Wooster Street, in SoHo. I saw the evidence of his competence with my own eyes.

Diagrams of unbelievable complexity and mounds of piping and Janos sitting amid this chaos smiling serenely, the master plan clearly fixed in his mind.” So Luther said.

“This Janos obviously means something to you,” Lydia said.

“Excellence does have a way of standing out, but so does lunacy. And this handiwork is decidedly the latter,” Peter said.

“Yes. Well, we’ll deal with it. But why don’t we all sit? That was a lot of stairs to climb,” Luther said, ushering Sarah’s parents toward the wicker sofa, which creaked and sagged under their weight. He then opened the chicken wire window that looked out on a back alley to lessen the smell. A thought came to him to take flight, not out the window, but out the door. The pain of having Sarah’s parents’ eyes on the loft was almost too much to bear. Those old feelings, from childhood, were still there in him, the shame he had experienced when Johnny Lacy and Edward Macy had made their surprise visit and then let one and all at the school know he lived in what they called a “pigsty.”

“Honey, where is the stove? All I see is a refrigerator,” Lydia asked.

“We don’t have a stove. We have a hot plate. See?” Sarah said, standing up and pointing to the two-burner old thing that the Kadars had left behind along with the creaky wicker furniture and a filthy shower curtain.

“A hot plate? You can boil water and heat soup on a hot plate. That’s about it,” Lydia said.

“That’s all we need it for. Luther eats those ramen noodles. All you need to do is add boiling water and you’re done. And he eats slices of rye bread sprinkled with salt.”

“Rye bread sprinkled with salt?” Peter made a face.

“He says that Leon Trotsky subsisted on that regimen while in a czarist prison camp.”

“But Honey, Luther and you are not living in a czarist prison camp. You are living in Chinatown and in a city with great food resources.” So Lydia also said.

“Right. Chinatown. Luther and I go to Joy Palace, right down the block and get the house special, Joy Palace steak on a bed of bright broccoli.”

“I see,” Lydia said, from the vantage point of a woman who had poured her vast energy and intelligence into homemaking. Luther was certain that she did see, and that what she was seeing was so far below her own standard of good living as to be painful. Down and down he spiraled, to that place of excruciating self-consciousness, as if, in seeing where and how they lived, Lydia and Peter were seeing right into the core of him—his low IQ, his low board scores, his naked underweight frame, his flat head. All this they had access to when they walked through the door. In less than two weeks of living together, he had managed to corrupt their daughter and bring her down to his own feeble level.

They headed into Sarah’s studio, Lydia having expressed a desire to see her work. Sarah had wrapped and sewn canvas, such as used for a drop cloth, around cylinders of foam to create a long, thick sphere. Like a giant snake the thing lay on the floor, its phallic symbolism all too obvious. Luther stared with dismay at the splattering of paint in the area around Sarah’s easel. The droppings were a reminder that while she had her domestic side, in her studio order would be secondary to art.

“Oh, honey, it’s so creative, so expressive. You are growing so much.”

Luther saw what he often saw, that Lydia was a brave woman, always there exhorting and encouraging. She really did try to live in the light, all the more, he suspected, because darkness was so close by. And why wouldn’t darkness be close by? Her mother dying in an iron lung; her father a suicide; a lonely childhood at Camp with her dowager grandmother and an uncle rendered unreliable by his alcoholism; and then for her prize daughter, Lenore, to take her own life, driven to that place of despair by an Adonis of a boy, as Peter had been her Adonis. It brought Luther to a place of weariness to hear such cheerleading, as if Lydia were resisting a foe as implacable as the ocean tide in her daughter. And yet he sensed that his heart, which opened to her now, would close again. It would have to.

Peter’s response to the work was more restrained. “There are father’s daughters and then there are father’s daughters,” he simply said.

Luther was relieved when they all left the loft for Joy Palace, even if the restaurant was an indicator of their failure as hosts.

“You sit,” Shing Lo, their waiter, said, as he placed menus on the table and followed with glasses of water, a pot of tea, and small cups. In less than two weeks the old man with the opaque, solemn face and padding gait had come to represent the mysteriousness of the neighborhood into which they had moved. Disappointment, scorn, sorrow—all manner of emotion Luther ascribed to him. What kind of journey had it been that brought a person of obvious intelligence to serve platters of food, including fish with their heads still on them, to strangers? Did he live alone? Did he have family? Was he from the mainland? From Hong Kong? It wasn't Luther's place to ask. Shing Lo was Charlie Chan, from the days of his childhood. He wanted only to be good for Shing Lo.

What he really wanted was for Peter and Lydia to be gone. They were too good for the loft and too good for the plain décor of the restaurant. He wanted to be alone with Sarah again.

And when they were, he said, "I felt embarrassed that we have only a hot plate and not a stove. Growing up, I saw that my older sisters did not cook but relied on my mother to serve them food. Your parents seeing that we don't cook brings me closer to these sisters in my associations, and that is painful."

"You're brooding over the wrong thing," Sarah replied.

"And what would the right thing be?" Luther asked.

She pointed upward. "How about that little matter of the garden hose?"

"Oh, right," he replied.

Though I am not Janos Kadar, I can do the things that Janos Kadar does, if in a smaller way, Luther thought, having assembled the pieces of piping that he would need. And he was sure to have a wrench to make the connections fast, and a stepladder, too, to reach the gas outlet suspended from the ceiling. As he prepared to begin, he imagined a great ball of fire and the end of his and Sarah's days. Safety was essential. Thoroughness was essential.

After shutting off the gas valve, he checked twice to be sure the flame had gone out on the water heater. Then he applied sealing compound to an elbow and attached it to the mouth of the gas outlet. From there he added a long length of straight pipe and then another elbow for the descent to the mouth of the water heater, just above the floor. But would the last section fit or would it be too long or too short? Would he need some hideous apparatus to cut pipe and another gizmo to add threads to that cut pipe? Jesus, what had he gotten himself into? But he found that the joined pieces were not a rigid construct; they could be moved to accommodate the last short section of pipe.

He had done it. He had constructed a gas pipeline.

That the gas flow was unmetered and being stolen from Con Edison was not an issue. Janos Kadar had evidently given no thought to the matter in all the years he had lived at the Chinatown loft, and so Luther would dismiss all such thoughts of the theft from his mind. What he could not dismiss from his mind, at least for a few days, was the fear that the piping would fall in a loud clatter to the floor, to be followed by the strong smell of gas permeating the loft.

And so, just as safety and thoroughness had been his watchwords when assembling the connection, vigilance was now key. As the water heater was near the toilet, both Sarah and he must be sure not to grab hold of the pipe when lowering themselves or raising themselves from the toilet seat.

“Can you do that, Sarah?”

“I believe I can, Luther,” Sarah said.

“OK. Now comes the test. Let’s light up,” Luther said. Because, in deference to Peter’s concern, they had gone out on the fire escape to cop their smokes, and now here they were right there in the loft. “Are you ready? Have you made your peace with your maker in case its ka-boom?” Luther went on.

Sarah shrugged, then struck a match and put the flame to her Tareyton. Luther followed suit with the Marlboro he had extracted from the crush-proof box.

“So far, so good,” Luther said.

“So far, so good,” Sarah agreed.

“You can’t learn to swim the English Channel by reading Proust,” Bill Lahr said, that first day of classes at the Neighborhood Playhouse. Luther was to learn that he was a man who lived for pith and who would have you hang on his every word because, in the sag of his middle age, he had nothing else to attract you. He kept a pack of Larks on his desk, a Ronson lighter centered on them to signify his need for external order, but Luther was not fooled by his sad, wistful smile. He saw that Bill Lahr had a fire burning within him as hot and bright as the tip of his smoke when he drew on it. The force with which he suddenly slammed his hand down on the desk in demonstration of the deep reserves of emotion an actor had to be able to tap served as confirmation that he had the capacity for conflagration.

Bill Lahr was saying that Luther’s paperback novels, even the entire Remembrance of Things Past in those handsome Vintage editions, would not cut it.

“Can you be an open book? Can your face serve as your novel? Can you tell a story with a gesture?” This too Bill Lahr said.

Bill Lahr is a drinker. He sits at a bar at night as he now sits at his desk, only he has a scotch to go with his Lark cigarettes. Because the alcohol is the only way that he can deal with the fire within. This too Luther thought, picturing Bill Lahr in some quiet East Side tavern sipping scotch amid clouds of smoke.

Bill Lahr said, "I want each of you to stand in front of the class and do an activity that requires you to concentrate. The goal is for the activity to have your undivided attention."

One girl did figures in her checkbook, bringing it up to date. Another held a hand mirror as she brushed her hair. Another applied eyeliner. A man tried to correctly assemble the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle.

"Aces," Bill Lahr said, after each one, or "Simply aces," showing that while he was full of fire, he had the exhortatory and encouraging impulse required of a good teacher, which was all he probably was by then. Because you needed a job by day to be able to sit at a bar by night. This too Luther also thought, seeking to meet pith with pith.

Luther understood that Bill Lahr was saying he should lose himself, that is, lose his self-consciousness, and remembered a time when, in the E. S. Wilentz bookstore on Eighth Street, he looked up from Rimbaud's Illuminations to see a pretty girl staring at him. And why was she staring at him? Because she saw that for that moment at least he had something more than himself, an interest in the things of life, and this interest excited her, made of him someone worth knowing, made of him a challenge. Could she ever be as interesting to him as his book? These moments were precious but also painful, enough to bring him to his knees in recognition that there was a world ready to shower him, even him, with adulation, if he could only engage himself in the proper way, if he could only achieve.

And so Luther was ready when his time came. He stood and went before the class with his copy of Swann's Way and began to read silently from the spellbinding overture, in which young Swann blows out the candle and falls asleep only to dream that he is still reading. He read to the bottom of the page and onto the next when Bill Lahr cut in, only he didn't say "Aces" or "Simply aces" or some such. Bill Lahr said, "I'm not feeling it," in a tone that lacked all warmth.

"What is this it you are not feeling?" Luther inquired, to a ripple of laughter.

"I am not feeling you. That is the it I am not feeling. Authentic absorption is lacking. Next."

And though Luther felt dismissed and put down and had a resentment against Bill Lahr, he had to acknowledge the truth of what the teacher had said. Authentic absorption had been lacking. His mind had been on those watching him all the time. Even Proust had not been sufficient to pull him from preoccupation with how others were perceiving him.

As often was the case, he dwelt not on the thing at hand but in the realm of the personal, finding this or that to note about each member of the playhouse faculty. The voice teacher, Mr. Groon, was ashamed of himself that he was a voice teacher and nothing more. This Luther understood when a celebrity graduate of the playhouse whom Mr. Groon professed to know and know well came to visit and Mr. Groon was nowhere to be seen, though he had been clearly visible before the guest's arrival and after her departure. Luther took it as a sign of some deep shame abiding in the man as to who he was or could ever hope to be.

Of course, Mr. Groon had his own shame meter, as when he said to Luther, in the context of no context and yet it in the context of everything, “CCNYU,” as if to say, with supreme concision, that he knew Luther’s origins, his rank in the world, everything he couldn’t be.

And there was a movement teacher, Miss Borden, who said, “Your bones are too stiff. They are not meant for this,” when he showed up in jeans and not the tights the others, male as well as female, had put on.

As if the three teachers saw, understood, that he was lost and lesser than the kind needed to make the grade. That even here, in the arts, you could not escape a ranking. As if they were saying, “You need to stop and think about who you are, but not too much, lest you grow even more depressed.”

Luther brought his mind to attention on the students, too. They did not escape his detection, and in some cases, his love as well.

Ron Rocco was his name, and it can be surmised that he too had seen The Godfather, and so had come from the UC Berkeley campus to the playhouse to also follow in the footsteps of Al Pacino and even surpass him. White T-shirts and jeans were his staple dress. He had to live with great economy, he said, as he was getting through college on scholarships and loans his transcript of straight As had earned him.

“Do you see a silver spoon in my mouth? Well, do you?” Ron Rocco demanded, and Luther had to say he didn’t.

“I am Mr. Intensity,” Ron Rocco went on. “That is how I have gotten to where I am.”

“And where is that?” Luther dared to ask.

“Don’t fuck with me. I am Italian and I read minds,” Ron Rocco replied, and though a statement of fact had been followed by an assertion, Luther was not inclined to be disputatious with him, lest Ron Rocco inflict his Italian wrath on him.

Ron Rocco did not love or even like Luther, but had an affinity of some kind with him, seeing that Luther was relegated to the margins of life and he would be too, in spite of his great expenditures of energy, for at the end of the day Ron Ricco was still Ron Ricco, and nothing he said or did could change that. Being that he was, like Luther, in the assessment business, he dropped a bomb on him, saying, “You need a massive personality reconstruction.” A context could be requested, but what context is to be had when Ron Ricco approaches him with this truth as Luther is catching some sun outside the playhouse during the lunch hour? Like Smoking Joe Frazier putting the clobber on Muhammad Ali with a ferocious left hook did Ron Ricco come at Luther, but Luther did not fall down dead on the sidewalk, crushed with a system-destroying blow to the temple. He somehow slipped under the intended wrath and let it just whoosh on by, though forever the statement was to orbit within the circuitry of his brain.

Every group has its shining star, the one in whose light the others can only bask, having denied themselves the discovery of a light source of their own. Such a person was Robin Sedgwick, his status certified by the pedigree of his name. He had the necessities to go far, but his heart belonged to Daddy, who was calling him back to his oilfields in Oklahoma even as Robin felt the pull of the stage and screen. The beauty and power of his deep-set eyes and the handsomeness of his face were strangely enhanced by the lingering acne that roughened his full cheeks.

O that this too too solid flesh would melt

Thaw and resolve itself into a dew

Or that the Everlasting had not fix'd

His canon 'gainst self-slaughter! O God God

Mr. Groon had them recite Hamlet's soliloquy, and Robin Sedgwick put his laughing thing on Luther for his diction and his deadpan manner. Luther had shown Rob Sedgwick his nature and the limits of his talent with that one scene, and so Robin Sedgwick had no need to feel unsafe with Luther from that point on.

They were mostly passing faces on his journey, as if there wasn't enough to hold onto, but they were also faces that stayed in his mind, and so they existed as a record of where he was and who he was with and gave some texture to his days beyond simply continuing to work on "White Line, Continue" and also to avoid the oblivion portal toward which he was headed. Because someone had to know—someone—that amid the viciousness of rushing vehicles and the ceaseless rise of new and taller buildings, he had existed and to acknowledge his existence. If he could not count on anyone else providing the documentation, then he must do so himself.

Along with a feeling of joy at having been taken into Robin's circle of warmth, Luther had misgivings, the fear that he would do or say the wrong thing in Robin's company during those lunches at McCann's Bar and Grill, up on Third Avenue. Not that he was alone with Robin. Alvin Cordet had come along from Penn to study at the playhouse as well, and where Robin went that summer, so did Alvin, with his long, sunken face and the level stare of those mournful basset hound eyes. Maybe it was the things he had seen that made him look older than his twenty-four years. He had spent time in the army, including a tour in Vietnam, before entering college, and Luther came to sense that Alvin was silently communicating that he knew things he wasn't saying, and that those things included things about Robin more than the things Robin himself had said, such as his adulation of Merle Haggard for those wise, sad love songs he wrote and sang. Robin's spontaneous admission about Merle Haggard only added to his stature in Luther's book. It said something to Luther that someone with Robin Sedgwick's looks and material as well as physical endowment could also be such everyday people. But Alvin Cordet's face was saying his knowledge of Robin Sedgwick went beyond his musical tastes and that although he was sworn to secrecy about this knowledge, if you hung around long enough then possibly you would know what he knew, too. What Luther came to see was that Alvin Cordet's face was not so much a face as a mask, and that the man who looked out from behind that mask was intent on ascertaining the degree of astonishment you felt at the simple ugliness of it. But the thing of Alvin Cordet's knowingness about Robin Sedgwick was this. He offered a smile when Robin Sedgwick expressed his interest in some girl or another at the playhouse, which Luther might have dismissed as sheer envy on the part of Alvin that his buddy could effortlessly attract girls in a way Alvin Cordet could only dream of, if not for the day that Alvin said to Luther, "Robin likes to drive on both sides of the road."

“What is that supposed to mean?” Luther replied, wanting to be sure that Alvin wasn’t signifying more than he could deliver.

“Is Robin the name of a boy or a girl?” Alvin asked.

“I see,” Luther said, not saying that what he saw, more than anything about Robin, his reticence and unease generated not by Alvin Cordet’s smile as by the flames of a laughing hell in his eyes. Luther became afraid, as if Alvin Cordet was mocking him with a glimpse of his own tormented unknown. It was not territory for Luther to wander carelessly into; even in a corrupted life, he had some sense of propriety. Alvin Cordet, if Luther read him correctly, was signaling a proclivity for lewdness and extending an invitation to join him. In that moment Luther saw Robin Sedgwick as Prince Hal and Alvin Cordet as a prurient Falstaff long on lechery and short on honor, an assessment he felt compelled to moderate as too harsh and undeserved for his conscience to allow; Alvin Cordet might be a lonely boy but he nevertheless merited respect, as he was U of P, and fools were not allowed to set foot in that particular paradise.

Alvin Cordet’s innuendo notwithstanding, Robin Sedgwick was seen driving on only one side of the road that summer, having claimed a girl from the playhouse as his own. Her name was Cassie Dintenfass, and the light that was in her blond hair was in her mind and being as well. She had come from behind a white picket fence in small-town America to become a Broadway star, though no one was fooled into believing that she placed fame above love.

Now if Luther had closed the door on participating in the lewdness of Alvin Cordet, he had of course long since opened it in regard to himself. A great leap forward was the screen performance of John C. Holmes doing it to the women who presumably wanted to have it done to them with his gigantic dong, and it came as a source of amazement as well as arousal to Luther one afternoon in the locker room following a class in movement that Robin Sedgwick had an apparatus of commensurate size. And so he would stare in wonder at Cassie Dintenfass, his mind inevitably seized by the image of her accommodating someone with the massive tool of Robin Sedgwick between her long thin legs.

Some mornings, riding the First Avenue bus to the playhouse, Luther thought of the “white line, continue” life he was betraying in venturing out into the world in this unlikely way. He asked himself what kind of life he was creating for himself, given that it was built on so much air. Would it not be better to go someplace, like NYU (not CCNYU, Mr. Groon), and study Spanish, so he could have a solid footing in this world? What was it to live in New York City and know only three words, cerveza and vente, meda, of that language, unless you were to include the expletive mardecon? I am air and my life is air, he thought on such mornings. I really am a hanging string, just as Miss Schnell, the cat lady from my mother’s building, said in the long ago.

As the bus moseyed up First Avenue, he stared out at the shimmering green skin of glass on the United Nations and thought, I have never so much as set foot in that building, let alone the General Assembly, and of how Cary Grant did exactly that on some glorious day, also in the long ago, when he fled from the Plaza Hotel and a posse of the righteous to that landmark seeking to avoid arrest for a murder he hadn’t committed, before further fleeing to Grand Central Station for his rendezvous with Eve-Marie Sainte on the New York Central's Chicago Limited. And what was all of that but heaven in Luther's mind, the East Side commingled with Cary Grant, the two together giving new meaning to the word excellence in a way that made Luther indescribably happy, as did the sight of a coffee shop along the route, Luther saying, Oh what I would not give to stop in there every day of my life for a vanilla malted, poured from a metal shaker, though it was not a beverage he any longer drank, as his mind sought to find permanence in all that was evanescent.

I don't want to hurt anyone. I just want to be good. I just want to be love itself. Such was Luther's mindset in his time at the playhouse. And most acutely did this aspiration apply to his interaction with Robin Sedgwick, as it was not every day that someone of his caliber, with his U of P status and physical beauty and endowment, allowed him into his life. He must not disappoint Robin Sedgwick. Such was his feeling. Robin Sedgwick represented the bounty of America, as Sarah and Roddy Blakely had represented it. And what was the bounty of America? It was excellence in the bright light of day, all shadows banished. Everything was in America as it could not be elsewhere. He had been to Europe, and knew a retirement community when he saw one. And so you did not mess around when people who embodied the best of the USA appeared.

On this one night, toward the end of the playhouse term, he went out drinking with Robin Sedgwick and Alvin Cordet and Cassie Dintenfass. As they entered the subway at Fifty-ninth Street and Columbus Circle, Cassie walked with Luther behind Robin Sedgwick and Alvin Cordet, and said to him, "I don't want to go home alone. Will you come home with me?" Robin would not be with her that night, she explained. By now they had reached the turnstile. At the moment of her asking he did not have the power to refuse, because when a woman opened a door you were obliged to walk through.

Robin gave him a look of smiling surprise and even shook his fist when he saw Luther heading with Cassie for the stairway instead of following with him to the downtown platform, and Robin continued with his remonstrations, shaking his fist but with that smile still on his face, as Luther and Cassie stood moments later across the four sets of tracks on the uptown platform. Because Robin was complex, but he was also from a part of the country where a man knew who he was and when he was being wronged in a matter involving the woman he loved.

The night had no rhythm to it, a silence falling between Luther and Cassie that he was unable to break as the train roared north, as if, in the absence of Robin, they had been rendered strangers to each other. And the awkwardness continued all the way to her older sister's apartment on Riverside Drive where she was staying, her sister being away for the summer. He didn't quite know why he was with Cassie and he wasn't sure she knew either, and yet he was willing to live with that discomfort, as evidently she was too, though he was grateful when she went off to bed in the one-bedroom apartment after offering the sofa and some bedding to him. And so he called Sarah to tell her he would be back in the morning, given the lateness of the hour, and that he was staying over with friends from the playhouse.

On the side table he had seen the bottles of scotch and gin and vodka, and now they were calling to him. But the apartment was small and tense with the sound of active listening. He imagined Cassie lying in bed monitoring the situation for any movement toward her he might make. He waited ten minutes, and after another ten, was still wide awake. But if sleep hadn't come to him, he could reasonably assume Cassie had fallen off. By the light of a standing lamp next to the sofa, he headed for the liquor supply and filled a sixteen-ounce glass half full of scotch before adding tap water from the kitchen sink.

Jesus, the scotch tasted good, soft and smooth, and it also had the magic effect of burning away his imprisoning diffidence. Now he couldn't go to sleep. Now Cassie wasn't in dreamland but waiting, perhaps impatiently, for him to come to her. Why should he live in the shadow of Robin Sedgwick, or of anyone? Why?

But he did not have to go to Cassie. The bedroom door opened and she appeared in a thigh-length robe, in transit to the bathroom.

"Are you still up?" she asked, when she returned.

"I had some trouble falling asleep," he said.

"What are you drinking?"

"Just something to help me sleep," he said.

"Why couldn't you sleep?"

"I don't know. I was thinking of you and Robin and Alvin, I guess."

"What were you thinking?"

"Just stuff. I don't know."

“Tell me,” she said, sitting down beside him on the sofa.

“Actually, I started off thinking about Robin and Alvin and you, but then all I could think about was you. You came to occupy my mind. You just became this great presence in my mind, in the room. I guess I shouldn’t say such a thing to you.”

She reached for his glass and took a sip. “Why shouldn’t you say such a thing to me?”

“Isn’t it obvious? I mean, Robin and all.”

“Nothing is obvious. Nothing,” she said, bringing her face close to his.

The wonder that night was that Cassie took him to her bed, his meager endowment no deterrent. Though he was not Robin Sedgwick, Cassie responded to his touch. Even so, there was a price for his pleasure. When morning came, he shook in horror at what he had done and the consequences he would have to face. My life is not good, he thought. I am not good, he thought, as sleep continued its hold on Cassie.

What he did not understand was that Cassie’s time with Robin Sedgwick was over. Robin Sedgwick had taken his big gun and used it on other women at the playhouse. For that reason, and maybe others it was not for Luther to comprehend, Robin Sedgwick did not break his jaw in many places when the weekend passed and Luther encountered him at the playhouse the following Monday.

But Cassie did not allow Luther back in. She had plumbed his depth, extracted his essence, and was now moving on. Because like Robin, she was unattached, or only temporarily attached, a way Luther couldn’t be, not fully. He still had his new life with Sarah, the life he had waited five years for, and it had just begun, even if there were distractions.

And he still had the building, too. That had not gone away either. He saw the sadness of the arrangement, the string that tied him to his family. He saw it every evening he came over to the West Side from the playhouse for his shift in the renting office. And he heard the voices of those who lived or worked there and recorded them, because they too were now a part of “White Line Continue” if he was to show where he had come from. And everything he did or said or heard, or that was done to him, must go into the novel.

Nothing must be wasted. Nothing.

He heard the voice of Hannah, saying as she often did, “No one deprives my son. And no one deprives me either. No one. You pay your rent, you Pakistani towel head, or I’ll come out there and cut off your beard and your goddamn ears.”

And he heard the man, not a Pakistani but a Sikh, with a turban shaped like the prow of a ship, say, “But are you in your senses that you speak in such a manner?”

And heard as well, Hannah retort, “This is America. We speak as we please.”

And felt no love for his oldest sister that she should speak in such a way to a man of obvious intelligence and refinement, from a culture she knew nothing or little about, a man who had journeyed far from home to further himself only to be berated by a woman who had gone nowhere.

And heard his mother as well say, “But what ails you, Hannah, that you speak in such a way. We cannot have this,” when she happened upon the scene.

You lack forgiveness. You have no compassion in your heart. So Dr. Dressler had said to him when he spoke poorly of his older sisters. And he supposed she was right. Life had hit Hannah hard. He should try to understand what it meant being the oldest and bearing the brunt of parental dictates. It wasn't her fault that she was a creature of moods, bursting with good cheer one day and in the darkest depths the next. She was disappointed. That was all. Disappointed in herself, in her life. She had failed. She hadn't measured up. A graduate of a lesser college, Long Island University. A legal secretary when she could have been so much more. There had been men, men who came and went. She expected them to leave. There was no cause to claim heartbreak because they did. The sailor from the Greek navy no different, even when she found she was pregnant. A man adrift with nothing but his seaman's papers and his anger. No, she had not really wanted him, but she had wanted the baby. After all, Naomi had already given birth, and now it wouldn't do to go through the rest of her life without a child of her own, not with Naomi taunting and belittling her with that cruel mouth, and whispering that Daddy was the only husband she would ever know, and when Hannah began to show, that Daddy was in fact the father. And Rachel no better with her taunts. Living in a room given her by their mother on the same floor as the apartment. Sharing that room with her newborn son. The son not bringing her everything she had hoped for in the way of happiness. Oh, he was a gift all right, but then having to live with all the talk. A woman giving birth out of wedlock. And then the cancer. The removal of her left breast in its entirety three years after the birth of her son. Still young she was when that happened. And the following year the lawsuit she filed after tripping over a partially open cellar grate outside a neighborhood hardware store. Why wouldn't she file a lawsuit? She had fallen to the pavement and struck her head. Shouted for a lawyer before she shouted for an ambulance. Said then and there to the concerned owner that she would sue him for every penny and gave him a tremendous clout across the face when he tried to help her to her feet. The owner saying to her, "Lady, what's your problem?" as he held his battered head. She replying, "You're my problem, and I plan on fixing you real good. Nobody deprives me, and nobody deprives my son. Nobody." Telling one and all of the apartment she would rent and the big color TV she would buy and the trip to Greece she would take with the money she was awarded from her lawsuit. Saying to anyone who asked why she would go to Greece and not some other country, "Don't get personal unless you want me to get personal with you. Understand?" But she had gotten personal. Her revelation of her dream, which the lawsuit would make come true, was personal. Saying, "You don't have to believe," when their mother said she didn't believe in lawsuits.

The Sikh had come thousands of miles, and Hannah had not left home. That was what Luther saw.

And his sister Naomi. He heard her, too. Naomi saying, "Chuck beats me, Luther. He beats me black and blue. He beats me because that's what real men do when they drink. And I deserve to be beaten. I do. I really do. I was unfaithful. I broke my wedding vow. I lay with another man and carried his child to term. These things I did, Luther, so beat me, beat me, beat me. I will tell you, Luther. I will. It is very black. Very very black. You don't think so. You think my words mean nothing, as Mother would say. You think I don't see it, but I do. I feel it. I know you don't care about anyone. Why do I know that?"

Because I don't care about anyone either. I didn't care about giving up my newborn son to a Christian foster home. Someday I'm going to die, and this will all be over. You will see. You will definitely see. Have I ever told you, Luther, that Chuck likes little boys, and not in the way that older men should like little boys? But he never liked you. You were never in danger. You were too ugly to like. Your time is coming, too. Are you drinking now, Luther? Are you?"

Like raw sewage flowing from a rusty pipe. In this way did he receive his sister Naomi's words.

And Rachel. He heard her too, in the silence she imposed, continuing to say goodbye after you had said hello, just as the Beatles had predicted. Goodbye. Expelling that word like a bullet, the second syllable heavily accented, and after her breakfast of coffee and sugar doughnuts at Chock Full O'Nuts, walking down to Riverside Park, where she could be with the trees and the grass. Even now, Luther thinking, this is my sister from Vassar College, still wanting to see her in the light of the world and not of God. Luther thinking, she had been on one track but now she is on another track because God threw the switch. Imagining Rachel as a train racketing through the tunnel under Riverside Park on tracks that ran past Vassar College but not through it.

Thinking, a train did not need friends or interests or possessions or books. But a train did not need a room either or clothes from the Goodwill bag or any other source or food. A train did not look for God or talk to God or read about God. A train was God.

It was very confusing, this thing about trains and Rachel and God.

And he heard his brother, Luke, say “Fuck” and his girlfriend, Brenda, say, “Lingerie,” and his sister Vera say, “I am the one. I will go right where my sisters have gone wrong. I will carry on Daddy’s name, as there is no else to do that.” And he heard his mother say, “We cannot have this” and “I am tired, so very tired.” And he heard Auntie Eve say, “I am dead. I was dead a long time ago. But now I am really dead, but also risen, just as Jesus Christ told me I would be.” Because she was dead, having expired in her ground-floor apartment, a woman hardly able to lift herself from the sofa on which she lay in the last year of her life. And he heard his mother say, when she discovered her sister’s body, “Now I am alone, so utterly alone.” And heard himself say, “I am here but not here. I am but a witness. The earth is my family’s friend, but we must be in the earth, not on it. A hole must be dug for us to be laid to rest in and then dirt must be thrown on us, many many shovelfuls of dirt. And that dirt must be tamped down and smoothed, and grass must be allowed to grow. Then and only then will order prevail.”

He had a place to go now with death and with all the things of life, and that included Boston. He had not forgotten. He had a story to write. A boy from the other side of the tracks met a girl from the side of the tracks that was not the other side in New York City. But then she went away to college, and his pain began, though in truth his pain had begun long before she left. It began when he understood that she was the thing of value in his life and that he might think he was majoring in poli sci or soc or English, but his real and only course of study was her. And he had not forgotten the genius boyfriend Lane and what he, Luther, did to her life in trying to stop this star of the Boston Museum School from claiming her for his own. He could right the wrong he had done in the story, if not in life, by making himself the loser in the triangle. Did he not owe Sarah an acknowledgment that he had marred her college experience with his interrogations and panic-driven surprise visits? All those incessant phone calls an indicator of his fear and woeful insecurity. Not only Sarah but her whole family had seen his pathetic neediness. How shameful. He would call the story “The Way It Ought to Be.”

The writing was going well. The story, it seemed, was writing itself, so easily did the words flow. He had a thought: if the writing is going this well now, how much better will it go if I get some wine and really prime the pump? Because he wanted the words to continue to write themselves. He wanted writing to be like a button you pressed to set a machine in motion.

“I’ll be back in a minute,” he called to Sarah, in her studio. He did not want her to think he was just disappearing on this night. But she did not respond. He understood. Her silence was meant to discipline him to not need or expect a receipt for every word spoken, or maybe he didn’t have to speak the words at all when clearly he saw that she was in her studio working. She had rebuffed him, and he felt the pain of it. Felt too the pain that she could concentrate in a way that he couldn’t. She didn’t look for escapes the way that he was often doing.

The owner, Shing Lo, reached back and took a bottle of red wine from the shelf as Luther entered the store. “Spanish wine. Very good. Your favorite,” Shing Lo said. But Shing Lo was wrong. The wine was not Luther’s favorite. The wine was harsh and acidic. The cost, one dollar ninety-five cents, made him partial to it. That, and the fact the bottle had a cork in it and a foreign label. He wasn't a connoisseur of wines. He didn't know a pinot noir from a hearty burgundy. Sweet and dry, red and white, that much he had grasped.

"I see you tomorrow. You very good customer," Shing Lo said, as Luther turned to leave. He was a large man in a tunic with an open face and an easy smile. Luther felt his laughing eyes on him as he passed back out through the door and onto the street, the bottle in its brown bag under his arm.

There was no priming of the pump as Luther turned back to his story. The wine made him sodden before he was halfway through the bottle, and by the time he had drained the contents he wanted only to lie down. He remembered what the Peace Corps girl had said. If she opened a bottle of wine, she had to finish it, and for that reason she was an alcoholic. What a terrible thing to say about herself, he thought, as he passed out.

That night he dreamt of a young man dressed in a suit on the Manhattan Bridge. But the man was not one of those on the pedestrian path alongside the vehicular traffic. Far above the cars and trucks and everyone, he moved along the catwalk, his face aglow with happiness. Then he did the craziest thing. He stepped off the catwalk, that smile still on his face, and plunged in front of an onrushing Brooklyn-bound subway train. Luther woke up at that point, and so was spared the grisly outcome of the man's plunge.

In the morning Luther shared his dream with Sarah. "Who on earth do you suppose he could be?" Luther asked. "I mean, he looked sort of like me, but he wasn't me."

"I don't know, but don't go walking on any catwalks," Sarah said.

“No, I won’t. Thank you for that,” Luther said.

“In fact, don’t go walking on any bridges for a while.”

“OK. I get it,” Luther said, even if he didn’t truly get it.

Some days later he showed her the finished story, all thirty pages. She took it into her studio while he stayed back in the living area with his wine. As time passed, he had to restrain himself from going to her with an insecure noise to the effect that she needn’t read the story if she didn’t want to. He pictured her reading with full concentration, as she was given to do everything.

But this was not some little old thing. This was a major piece of work. He needed to know. When he didn’t think he could wait a minute longer, he heard the sound of hurried footsteps, as if she was coming at him in a great rush.

“You bastard. You thief. You stole my life and put it in these pages. Don’t ever show me something like this again,” she said, her eyes ablaze with fury, and tossed the manuscript at him before returning to her studio.

Though I have been in this place before, Luther thought, with the opprobrium posse riding hard, their sole intent being to shower me with shame, and then depart when they have done their work of debilitation, I will be methodical in the restoration of order, collecting one page after another until the document is secure and chaos has been defeated once again. Luther did just that, but a lingering and painful question remained. Had Sarah dropped on him a chunk of truth? That one word, thief. Was she not simply saying what he himself had thought, in certain moments, that like thievery, this writing thing, as he used it, constituted a wrongful appropriation of experience?

I have been caught dead to rights. I have been exposed, he thought, as he lay face down on the bed. Oh had she flattened him with her hellish truth bomb. Stripped him. Taken away his writing as she had tried to take away his drinking. With his hands up he was to come out and live joyless in the world? He did not see how he could go on deprived of “White Line Continue” in its many manifestations, but then he saw a way forward. She had only tried to confiscate his bottles that first week they were together in the loft. But what had in fact happened? He was still drinking. And if he was still drinking, maybe he could find a way to still write, even if he lacked imagination and his work for the most part was a naked transcription of event.

“I didn’t steal from you,” he said, when he could.

“Liar,” she said.

“I am not a liar. I am the one who gets punished in the story for my wickedness, not you. You get to be with the genius.”

“Shut up about that. Just shut up,” Sarah said.

But he wasn’t harming anyone, he thought. He was just telling the truth about the way it ought to be. He was writing truth fiction, or true fiction, even if the story had a twist, because he didn’t know any other kind to write.

“Do you want me to lie down and die? Well, do you?” Luther asked.

“Stop it.”

“Do you want to beat me with a stick?”

“I said stop it.”

I am a bad man, Luther thought, when even my best effort is not good. But maybe that is just the way it ought to be, too.

In the days that passed he continued to put his mind to the matter. She had thrown Philip Roth's novel Portnoy's Complaint halfway across Schiphol Airport, in Amsterdam, after reading half a page, and now she had tossed aside his little offering. Had Philip Roth reminded her, with his shiksa obsession, of the genius Lane? And that little offering he, Luther, had made of "The Way It Ought to Be"? Had she disposed of it in the same manner because it reminded her of what she had had with Lane? Was it less to do with writing about her than writing about him, the genius? He surely didn't know, but he wondered what it would be like to be free, the way she was, with her artwork all around and visible to everyone.

Was he living a lie? Was that what it meant to be living with the same woman you were writing about? The question terrified him, put him in the cold place of unrelenting pain and darkness. Whatever else she was to him, Sarah still represented the light. To be deprived of her—well, he couldn't fathom such a thing. And yet Ernest Hemingway's second wife, or was it his third, divorced him when she discovered he had made her a character in one of his works in progress. On the other hand, Arthur Miller freely admitted that some characters in his plays were closely drawn from family members. But Arthur Miller had a brilliant mind. His characters were probably composites barely traceable to his uncles or aunts or whomever.

Luther wished he could think these things through. What he really wished was to be able to say that Sarah wasn't being fair. She could paint someone from life and make him different. Hadn't he witnessed such distortions in the portraits she had made of him? Wasn't that an appropriation? And yet he would never throw the word "thief" at her when it was more a matter of vision and artistic license.

But it wasn't the same. It was different. He didn't know how, but it was.

Even so, he must not let her trespass. He must not let her shut down his operation. He had things to say, even if he did not know how to say them. He had a truth to find out, a reckoning to make. He had a past that would burn a hole in him unless he could bring it to life. He must let people see he had been here. What was "here"?" Here was everything. It was the disappearing words of Pastor Cohn. It was the Ukrainians for Christ camp in the Catskills and the rubber-lipped girls he kissed. It was Louie, the Columbia University guard, and the excitement he brought to Luther's life. It was the trains. Always it was the trains that ran and ran and that vicious, vicious America was always threatening to kill. He could not stay alive without "White Line Continue" in all its manifestations just as he couldn't without alcohol.

"So, Luther, what do you think about this so-called break-in at the Watergate complex? Don't you think it's the liberal media making a big deal about nothing?" Hannah was animated and happy that afternoon, as she could be before the darkness claimed her. But her happiness, in this case, seemed built on mischief. She was baiting him, seeking conflict, not harmony, her smile suggested. Politics was not a road he wished to go down with his oldest sister. A lightning bolt would strike her dead should she vote anything less than a straight Republican ticket. Or their father would come back from the grave and inflict the mortal blow. And she had to realize he, Luther, wasn't enamored of Richard Milhous Nixon or his administration.

"How so-called can it be? They were caught red-handed breaking into Democratic national headquarters," he said, taking the bait in spite of himself.

"You don't think that's just the liberal media's slant on things?"

"The Washington, D.C., police placed them under arrest, not the liberal media,"

Luther said.

"But they love to exaggerate," she said.

"Who is they?"

"All of them."

"All of who?"

"Don't get personal."

"Don't get personal?"

"You heard me."

The door opened on the small room off the living room where Jeanne, his niece, had stayed before she ran off. "Do you need me, Ma?" His nephew, Moses, was strapping for a twelve-year-old. He filled his jeans and T-shirt well.

"It's all right, Moses. It's all right. You just go back to your room," Hannah said.

"I'll go back because I'm your son, but I'll be listening. I don't want you upsetting my mother. You understand, Luther?"

Not even Uncle Luther. The boy's tone and manner were menacing. Intimidated, Luther sensed that anything less than compliance would cause an escalation, and yet it pushed at what self-respect he had to be bullied by a child, or a man child. Hadn't there been enough of that kind of thing from his mother? "No, I don't understand," he said.

"You keep pushing me, there's going to be a problem. Don't be making me tell you a second time."

"All right, Moses. That's enough. You've made your point," Hannah said.

His point? Moses had made his point? In that moment was confirmed what Luther had feared since Moses' birth, that his nephew would grow up to be an extension of Hannah and in some way her weapon. Hannah might be friendless in the universe, but she had broken her son's wing sufficiently that he would always be under her control. Luther had lived with the threat of her as a child and now he would have to live with the threat of her son as an adult. We've got you. We've got you in our power. I have done things to you and there's nothing you can do about it because if you dare to bring up my mistreatment of you, all you will get from me is a bigger smile, and if you continue to press the issue, then I will have no choice but to call on my son, who will know how to deal with you. Nothing more nor less than that was his oldest sister's smile saying.

And that power extended to the president as well, at least in Luther's mind. The president now came into sharper focus as a kindred soul with Hannah, a man who pressed the levers of power for a malign purpose. She was comfortable with the president's tricks, his deviousness. A dark and secret sort of man, as she was dark and secret. A president who, like her, would never own up to what he had done.

A thought from Luther: I do not know the lyrics to a single song. When a song moves me, I become awash in feelings that don't leave room for words. No one must know this. Titles and snippets, and that is all. "John Wesley Harding." And "Lay, lady, lay, lay across my big brass bed." And "Dawn, you're no good for me" or "I'm no good for you." And "Rag doll oooh."

He read Advertisements for Myself, by Norman Mailer. He read Play It as It Lays, by Joan Didion. He read The Sotweed Factor, by John Barth (professor at Johns Hopkins U., as well as author). He read The Moviegoer, by Walker Percy. He read The New Yorker. He did not read the Bible that his father had given him, but he took good care of it, never placing it on the floor. That would be disrespectful. (But he could place Play It as It Lays on the floor.)

Other disturbing things involving the president were happening. His dirty laundry was beginning to hang out.

The President is blotto in the Oval Office by 11 am every morning.

So Luther read in a Village Voice column by the newspaper's political writer, Rose Bannon. Three times Luther read her column to be sure he wasn't imagining this astonishing assertion. And there was more.

Aides Haldeman and Ehrlichman serve as his male nurses during these sprees.

Luther had some notion he needed to talk with the columnist and found her listed, to his surprise, in the White Pages. Faye Dunaway wasn't in the White Pages. Of course Rose Bannon wasn't Faye Dunaway. Still, many people read her column. Suppose some crazy person objected to what she wrote? He could show up at her door and do all kinds of violence. A crazy person like him. But he wasn't a crazy person. He was just inquiring. He just wanted Rose Bannon to put his life back in order after breaking it apart. Blotto by 11 am? His aides serving as nurses? Luther wouldn't have been more shocked if Rose Bannon had reported that the president was a cross-dresser.

He had been drinking Shing Lo's Spanish red wine, and now he had a little more before dialing. A woman answered.

"Is this Rose Bannon?"

"Speaking," Rose Bannon said, showing a firm directness with her brevity.

"I am a reader of your column and a longtime follower of Richard Milhous Nixon. You could say I grew up with him and even campaigned for him in 1960. I was twelve at the time and impressionable, the pastor of my church suggesting John Fitzgerald Kennedy was the anti-Christ..."

"How can I help you?" Rose Bannon cut in.

"I need to know this. Is it really true that the president is blotto in the Oval Office by 11 am every day?"

"It's absolutely true," Rose Bannon said.

"Well, that makes me very sad. Worlds are in collision now."

"Excuse me?"

“I will not take any more of your time,” Luther said, and hung up.

He opened another bottle of wine, having finished the first. He had made Shing Lo a happy man with his purchase of two bottles instead of the usual one. “You very good customer. Very good,” Shing Lo had said once again, putting pressure on Luther to maintain his goodness in the eyes of the liquor store owner. And a good thing he had picked up the spare, as Luther was needing both to get through his night.

As he continued to drink, he had a thought: Rose Bannon is like Chinese food. I talk to her and an hour later I am hungry for more. A closer reading of the column turned up four words he had previously overlooked: according to my sources.

Luther once again reached for the phone. “I have one more thing to ask, and then you will hear from me no more. Who were your sources?”

“The Rockefeller people,” Rose Bannon said.

Good to his word, Luther hung up. But a meditation on Rose Bannon’s response followed. Rockefeller? He was granite, stability itself. And yet, even so, suppose his people, as Rose Bannon referred to them, had an ax to grind with jowly RMN, who had crushed Rocky with his wily power. Suppose those Rockefeller people were living in the land of the snit?

Once more the need for certainty drove him to the phone.

“Hello?” Rose Bannon said, in the voice of one who has just been roused from a deep sleep.

“Luther Garatdjian here. Are you sure these Rockefeller people are credible? Suppose they have been to spitefulness driven owing to the whipping they took from RMN?”

The dial tone sounded. She had done hang up on him.

Luther had another thought: Rose Bannon is like this wine. I have to drink it all, just as I had to take my inquiry to the limit. That is what thoroughness is all about.

One night Luther surprised Shing Lo, going not for the Spanish red wine but for the modestly priced Clan MacGregor scotch. He needed more than the wine and beer he normally drank at home could give him, and because he had been very good in maintaining his pledge to Sarah, he was certain she would not mind if he took an occasional break from his routine. Consistency was the hobgoblin of little minds, he had read somewhere. Oliver Wendell Holmes had said that, or something like it. There was a name wrapped in a bowtie. Maybe Luther could offer the quote to Sarah should she remonstrate with him, but no, that might not be wise.

Shing Lo was bearish in his build, with sloping shoulders, and tall for a Chinese man. Perhaps it is his height that gives him his serene disposition, like a man looking down from the vantage point of a mountain top, Luther thought. Once again he was struck by how defenseless he was against Shing Lo’s smile. He reads me as if I were an open book, noting the staying power of the cliché in his mind. Well, that was OK. He would leave Shing Lo’s smile right there in the store. He didn’t have to carry it with him and make Shing Lo’s knowingness a source of constant torture.

And another thing. Because Shing Lo was slow in his movements, Luther could call him Slow-Mo Shing Lo in the privacy of his mind.

He came to the darkened public library up the block and was reassured by its presence. He recalled his several visits and the joy he experienced seeing young Chinese boys and girls combing the shelves and reading quietly at the tables. He ascribed to them a quality of mind not his own and bowed down to their excellence.

Farther along was the Fire Dragon Lounge, where young Chinese men with sleek physiques and dangerous smiles hung out, playing backgammon and drinking Johnny Walker Black. How did he know? He had dropped in briefly for a drink and heard the clatter of their board game. There were reports of Hong Kong bang-bang toughs in the community, and Luther had some sense, seeing the traffic in and out, that the Fire Dragon Lounge might be their watering hole.

Next door was a narrow firehouse, with room for a single fire engine. Two firemen stood outside. Their voices were strong and masculine, the voices of men who preferred facts to feelings. Luther was all right with that. He felt a certain love for these men standing there in their rugged handsomeness. He had seen the bravery of these smoke eaters. Thinking, I am not of their world. They must not hear these feelings I harbor for them. Let me be as inconspicuous as possible lest I be beaten. Let me be good.

When are you going to be a man? The night cried out.

When I am able, he answered back.

Luther drank his scotch that night. He did not take it neat, because a fire without water could be dangerous. Sarah did not shine a light on him. She did not shame him close to death. And as he drank he thought, “I am not a connoisseur of fine wines. I do not have time to tether myself to such detail. I must save myself for the things of importance in this life. The ingredients of a martini I am on shaky ground about (though I could ask for it shaken, not stirred, as James Bond has instructed, should pretentiousness seize me).

After a while he was startled to see a silhouette on the alley wall beyond the open window, and was further astonished that when he raised his arm to bring the glass to his mouth and then lowered that same glass back to the table, the silhouette did the same. This was not right. This was not normal, as his mother would say. But what was not right? What was not normal? That his neighbors should see him about his business. Because it was not normal business. It was drinking business. Oh, the shame of it, that now not only Sarah but others would know his name, and that name would be He Who Bends His Elbow All Hours of the Night.

The phone rang that night. His brother Luke was on the line. His brother was still his brother. He had a feeling for him as such, even if he was stealing Luke’s birthright. He had never liked that Bible story much. Jacob left him cold, that he should be rewarded for his thievery and cunning. Poor Esau. Even God didn’t care for the slow and dull.

“Me and Brenda want to come down. We want to check out your place,” Luke said.

“You want to come down?”

“Didn’t I just say that?”

“You can come down tomorrow.” Luther moved the receiver away from his ear and covered it while he took another sip of his Clan MacGregor scotch.

“Are you drinking?” Luke asked.

“Why do you say that?”

“Why do I hear ice cubes rattling?”

“I’m doing OK,” Luther said.

“What kind of answer is that?”

“I’m doing OK, I said.”

“Sure you are. We’re all doing OK,” Luke said.

It was foolishness (his mother’s words) to love his brother from a distance and think he could love him up close. And now Luke would be bringing his darkness down to the loft. Once again he resented his older siblings for making a mess of their lives so he was less free to make a mess of his.

Luther had no name for the dance that Brenda did the next night. That world of fancy footwork was lost to him by his inhibition. He might be able to distinguish a Funky Chicken from the Lindy, but not much more. All he could say about her shimmying and pelvic gyrations shortly after she and Luke arrived at the loft was that she was living up to the name he had secretly assigned her, Get It On Brenda. When “Proud Mary” finished, Luther lifted the needle on the Creedence Clearwater album to bring her to a stop. If he hadn’t, she might have gone on for an hour. She was definitely in a trance.

“I just love to let loose,” she said. “Don’t you?” She had turned to Sarah.

“Dancing can be a lot of fun,” Sarah said, taken back by the unbridled performance.

“You guys have a nice place here,” Luke said

“Thank you,” Sarah said.

“How much do you pay?” Luke went on.

“Four hundred a month,” Luther said.

The question begging to be asked was where did the money come from? And yet, where could it come from other than the renting office, which Luther spent four evenings in now, getting in and out as fast as he could? Couldn't Luke see what was going on? Couldn't anyone else in the family see? Luther wondered. He just wondered.

“We're not always going to be in the penthouse. We're going to get ourselves a nice place,” Luke said.

“I like your place. It's really nice,” Sarah said.

Luke's expression grew sullen. He went a different way. It was as if Sarah hadn't even spoken.

“Luther thinks he's hiding his drinking from me while we're on the phone. He thinks I don't hear him gulping and the ice cubes rattling,” he said.

“Don't listen to him. He's just trying to make trouble,” Brenda said, directing her comments more to Sarah than to Luther. “Besides, everybody likes to drink. Luke and me do, especially when we party.”

“We've been doing a different kind of partying,” Luke said.

“Don't,” Brenda gasped.

“It’s OK. They’re cool. They were at Woodstock,” Luke said.

“It’s not OK,” Brenda said.

“We’ve been doing a little experimenting. That’s all. It keeps things fresh.”

“Luke, I mean it.” There was finality in Brenda’s voice.

They had dinner that night at the Joy Palace, where Luther and Sarah had the Joy Palace steak again, and convinced Luke to do the same, while Brenda held out for General Tso’s chicken. Luther could only wonder who this General Tso might be that a chicken dish was named after him.

The evening passed without incident, or further incident, or something like that.

“What did Luke and Brenda mean about partying? And what was that about experimenting?” Sarah asked, later that night.

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“Whatever it was, Brenda didn’t want him to say.”

“True.”

“Whatever it was, it didn’t sound good.”

“How do you mean?”

“Well, how good could it be if she was embarrassed to talk about it?”

“I guess you’re right.”

“Aren’t you curious to know?”

“I’m not sure I want to know everything my brother is up to.” Was withholding the same thing as lying? Luther wasn’t sure.

“She’s kind of wild.”

“She’s had a twisted life.”

“What do you mean?”

“Her home life wasn’t good. Her father was too free with her, Luke said, and she ran away.”

“Free with her?”

“He did things to her he wasn’t supposed to do.”

“The pig.”

“Anyway, she wound up in reform school. Spent a number of her teenage years there. I think that’s why she can’t ever be beautiful. She’s supposed to be beautiful, with a face like that, but there’s this hardness in it that shows. She looks like she has seen too much.” He didn’t tell Sarah that Brenda’s father was a get-a-load-on-Louie every night of the week. There had been enough reference to alcohol earlier in the evening. He didn’t want Sarah associating him with Brenda’s trespassing old man.

“I see what you mean,” Sarah said.

“I felt like we let wild animals into the loft tonight. It’s a horrible thing to say, but that’s what I feel.”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, that they could go out of control.”

“It was that dancing, wasn’t it? That was pretty uninhibited.”

“Yeah, it was the dancing.”

“It was like a jungle dance. Primitive. Sexualized.”

“I guess,” Luther said, muting his full agreement with her.

“How did Luke meet her?”

“Lenny from Long Beach.”

“Lenny from Long Beach?”

“Long Beach, Long Island. That’s how I used to think of him. My friend Jerry brought him around the neighborhood back when I was in high school. Lenny wasn’t like the rest of us. He looked good in a T-shirt or those sharp outfits he would wear, you know, dress slacks with a crease and tight shirts. None of us had cars but Lenny did, a Bonneville. He would drive us up and down the West Side Highway and over the GW Bridge to the Palisades Turnpike. Once we got stuck out on Long Island on a brutally cold night when the car broke down. We stayed at his mother’s place in Long Beach that night. Lenny was living with his father in Manhattan by then. His father was a building engineer. But then his father accused Lenny of stealing his tools and selling them and kicked him out. Lenny did OK on his own. He had an amazing mechanical aptitude. He could pop the hood and take an engine apart and put it back together again virtually blindfolded. And he understood electricity and how to work with it, so he didn’t lack for jobs. Anyway, it was about this time Lenny met Brenda. They got married and had a kid, Benjy. But then Lenny went and got involved with smack. It took him down. They lost their apartment and she and her son had to move back in with her parents. Anyway, Luke had met Brenda through Lenny. Soon she moved in with him and Benjy. I guess he offered her a roof over her head that wasn’t her parents’ and some kind of security.

Brenda was a high school dropout, a teenage mother with a drug addict husband. What was she to do?"

"What happened to Lenny?"

"The last time I saw him he was wearing a T-shirt that had once been white but had since turned gray. He looks like a man going down."

"That's sad. But Luke and Brenda look pretty good."

"Dirt is the only solution for my family."

"What is that supposed to mean?"

"Six feet under. That is the only way order can prevail." It gave him savage satisfaction to render such a colossal judgment and he had no power to resist. In that moment he saw himself as a mental executioner.

"That sounds pretty extreme."

"Yes, I suppose it does," Luther said.

Although all of America had its eyes on him now, The Village Voice was not only about Richard Milhous Nixon. In a following issue it ran an article on niacin, explaining that it was an essential nutrient in the B vitamin family that showed astonishing results in alleviating the craving for alcohol. And so it was for Luther to run on his long legs, as his mother would say when he was a child, and purchase this miraculous remedy, and he did just that. Soon after swallowing three pills, he experienced a feeling of great heat in his face, which had turned an alarming red. From the neck up a thousand tiny needles were pricking his skin. He rushed to the sink and drank glass after glass of water to put out the fire, and after a short time the crisis passed.

The niacin did just what the article said it would do. Oh, happy day, Luther sang, all that day, in the privacy of his mind, as the hours passed without him once running to Shing Lo for Spanish wine or to buy a six pack at the Chinese grocery down the block. Every second of every minute of every hour was he aware of his victory.

The next evening, to celebrate, he visited Shing Lo for two bottles of red wine and stopped off at the Chinese grocery for a six-pack of Budweiser. He could stop drinking any time he wanted to. It had been proven.

There was an OTB on Doyers Street where men went to lose everything.

Pell Street. Division Street. Catherine Street. Bayard Street. Mott and Mulberry—Chinese people lived here too, in their world of mystery.

Some evenings they went to Schezuan Taste for sesame noodles—noodles flavored with sesame paste. No noodles were as good as that.

On the corner was the restaurant of the Greeks, where he would sometimes go for breakfast. “What will be it, Boss? Yes, Boss. OK, Boss,” the counterman said, bursting with morning energy and American good cheer. Luther ordered eggs over easy. He ordered home fries and rye toast. “Whiskey down,” the counterman shouted.

Luther thought, I could come here for the rest of my life. I could make this my home.

Canal Street. There had been boats and barges on it once upon a time, or maybe not.

History. History was a world you excavated and which you hadn't seen in a long time.

Holland Stationers was its name, to remind you that the Dutch had been here, with all the hope and industry they could bring. The store was roomy—too much space for what it sold. Luther bought discounted paper—reams of 16 lb. weight white and pink and green bond so he could have a system. Drafts on the pink and green and white on the final so his life could be in order on the paper.

“Will you be here for a long time, or will you disappear now that I have found you?” Luther said to the owner.

“What?” the owner replied.

“I withdraw my question,” Luther said.

“Are you all right?”

“I'm cash-on-the-barrelhead all right,” Luther said, as he pulled out his wallet.

Later he had words for the reams of paper as well. “Will you be here for a long time? Is your quality substantial or will the years erase you, too? Speak. Let your intentions be known.” He spoke under his breath so as not to worry Sarah. Not that she had any cause for concern.

Antioch Review, The Paris Review, Michigan Quarterly, Southern Review, Agni, Epoch, The Virginia Quarterly, Sou'wester. These were some of the publications to which he submitted his fiction based on fact. Publications seeking quality fiction.

Thank you for considering these stories. A SASE is enclosed.

Due to the volume of submissions...we wish you the best of luck...

The stories came back in manila envelopes, slipped by the mailman through the slot in the locked front door leading to the street. There were no individual mailboxes. It was for the tenants to sort the mail themselves.

Sorry! Thanks! Try us again! Such handwritten comments sometimes appeared along with the boilerplate.

Once again he was forced to see what the problem was. Because he did not have enough weight on his bones or in his mind, there could be no such weight in his sentences. Long or short, complex or simple, they lay on the page as just so many strands of skinniness.

And he saw something else. He saw once again you could not hide from intelligence in the realm of art. It was there in Janos Kadar, who by now had probably completed his massive loft construction on Wooster Street. And it was right there in the building with the sad-eyed Dartmouth dropout John Gregory, whom Luther had met at the welcoming party. And now here it was revealed in the man sorting through the mail.

“I see your returns all the time,” he said, handing Luther a manila envelope along with a telephone bill.

“Yes,” Luther could only say, reduced to that one word.

“Lance. Lance Whiting is my name. I live on the floor above you with my girlfriend, Sheila Starr. We see your silhouette on the wall of the adjoining building when you are getting into your cups. We both marvel at the metronomic rising and falling of your arm. In case you’re wondering, I’m a graduate of Amherst College and the Yale School of Dramatic Arts. Sheila and I are having a blast working our way into the theater. Where are you from and what do you do, besides send out manuscripts unsuitable for publication?"

Luther could only be struck by how worthy of his first name Lance Whiting was. "Sir, you have had at me and run me through. In answer to your question I eat Joy Palace steak when I am not elsewhere here in Chinatown devouring noodles with sesame paste," Luther simply said.

"You are a man who will go far."

"And you are already at the top—at the top of this building anyway," Luther replied.

"Do you use a persona in your fiction?" Lance Whiting asked.

"Persona non grata," Luther said.

On weekends when they were not at Camp, he and Sarah would wander through SoHo. Sarah had come under the spell of the synthetic creations of Eva Hesse, though the latex cylinders erect on the gallery floor only put Luther in mind of the sad messiness of life. And she was taken with Agnes Martin's vision, the frail purity of those lines across a field of white or gray. Luther could not fathom the distillation process, how all of life could be captured in such small vessels. They must be doing computations beyond the reach of the average mind; they must be speaking a visual and tactile language I am not privy to, he thought. But my life is ahead of me. "White Line, Continue" must continue. I must follow that road where it leads.

I am happy to be out and about with my girlfriend.

Her name is Sarah Van Dine.

We sleep in the same bed.

We make love all the time.

I tell her my dreams and she tells me hers.

These things he also thought.

But the nights, some of them, were for him alone. The galleries of SoHo would have closed but the bars were open, and the one on Spring Street called him to its amber softness. There he would listen to the great Otis Redding and the great Wilson Pickett and the equally great Carole King (of Brooklyn, New York), but the one who sent him soaring and plunging was fabulous Freddy Fender with “Before the Last Teardrop Falls” and another song, this one in Spanish, whose name he did not know and whose lyrics he did not understand. Freddy Fender drove right to his heart, or wherever the locus for the maudlin or ecstatic emotion he aroused could be found.

Heineken had a royal strain of European complexity, easily establishing its superiority to creamy Bud and without the metallic taste of Miller High Life. After several bottles there were the scotches, topped off with several Courvoisiers.

What was that bar to you, Luther?

It was where doors opened.

What doors?

You know what doors. The doors every man wants to knock on.

What else?

It was a way of saying nobody controls me. Nobody puts their hands on me. Nobody. So I could do what I wanted to do when I wanted to do it and as often as I wanted to do it.

There was another bar with a kitchen a block south where during the day Sarah and he went for burgers on pita bread. But it was not a bar where he liked to drink. It had a jukebox, that was true, but nothing could happen there. Nothing. It was a bar where he felt conspicuous.

Another bar, the Three Roses, was down on Canal Street. No loveliness was on display at that bar, no artists, only the sadness of older men drinking in a light that lacked all softness. He never started at that bar, but sometimes he wound up there.

Some things he wished to note about that amber-lit bar, things that were important to him:

1. That the owner dared to have a heavy presence of hair on his moon-shaped, meaty face. Brown hair, with traces of gray. He sat at the end of the bar facing the front door, as if his mind was not concerned with who was there but who was yet to arrive. Was he longing for love itself to walk through that door? Did he wish for his lips to be on something more than the mouth of the Heineken bottle he was never without? His beady eyes signaled those of a man of great calculation. The owner's shiftiness was not in lieu of his intelligence but in service to it. Luther could see that the owner placed himself in a higher realm and so had no reason to consort with the likes of him. They were on different paths, and if each was leading straight to hell, it was along different routes.

The talk was that the bar had been funded by cocaine money. A deal had been done along the Canadian border, and the owner was now set up for life with holdings from Bogota to Bologna. The owner was in the upper echelon of crime, commensurate with his intellect and shrewd, cunning nature.

Suppose you didn't need to talk to a person to know him? Suppose the picture emerged more clearly by not talking to him? This too Luther thought, while sitting within two feet of the beard-faced owner.

2. That the bar, apart from the machinating owner, had a hierarchy, drawing the worthy and the unworthy. One night he crossed into territory not his own and spoke with Vesuvia, an artist whose sculptures and paintings were regularly showcased in a first-rate SoHo gallery.

“You are a famous artist. You must be very happy with your success,” he said.

“Happy? Are you a newspaper reporter? Am I being interviewed?”

“I got off on the wrong foot. How clumsy of me.”

“What is the foot you want to get off on?” Vesuvia said, in her gruff impatient English.

“I don't know.”

“I will tell you something I have told no one, but you must guard my secret with your life. Is this understood?”

Luther paused, overwhelmed by the weight of the responsibility Vesuvia was placing on him. “I can do that,” he finally said.

“Do you know oceanography? What it is?”

“It is looking at the water and seeing its content, not just sailing over it like Christopher Columbus did,” Luther said.

Vesuvia gave him a hard look before going on. "Oceanography is my heart's passion. I will never be happy till I have understood its depths."

"Yes, I can see that," Luther said.

"Tell me what you see."

"I see a sadness so intrinsic to your face that not even the face police would dare to bust you for the absence of a smile."

"Are you borracho? Tell me that you are borracho."

"Not quite."

"What is this 'quite'? You are or you are not."

"Is that true?"

"Is an earthquake not quite? An earthquake is or is not."

"But--"

"Do not contradict me. Do you not see that I am Colombian?"

Luther was left to ponder this last in a void, as the cold shoulder Vesuvia turned to him was not a passing thing.

Luther thought, as he wandered drunkenly home: Suppose all conversations are one conversation? Suppose all women are one woman? Suppose not all women are women? Suppose not all men are men? "Oh, I really don't know or care," he shouted at the trucks of America rampaging along Canal Street in the dead of the Manhattan night.

3. That a man appeared, his true intent unfathomable, at least to Luther, in that same bar, and said, “You think you are here for the women, but you are really here for that.” The man then pointed to the rows of pretty bottles on the shelves behind the bar.

“Why do you talk to me in this way?” Luther asked.

“Why do you think?” the man replied.

“Would I ask if I knew?”

“You’re scared to know. You don’t want to know.”

“I don’t like you. I don’t like anything about you,” Luther said.

“Why would you? You feel that I am threatening your life.”

“Are you a prophet? Where is your robe? Where is your beard? Where is your fulminating Isaiah face? You are too bland and anonymous for prophet status.”

“I am saying only this,” the man went on, holding to his steady course. “Someday you will step over the body of a naked woman to get to those bottles, and then you will see what I mean.”

The man was looking for no response from Luther, and Luther gave him none. Instead Luther backed away, putting distance between himself and the message-bearing man in the thronged bar.

His mother was not far.

“I love you,” he said, and kissed her on the cheek. His mother, in whom all goodness was to be found.

No, she said, "I love you," and then he said, "I love you" and kissed her on the cheek. Sequence was important.

That fall he left behind his acting dream to take another course with Sol Reisner. He was happy on those days that the class met in the Quonset hut. Why? Because the class gave him structure. As the weather turned cool, he wore a patterned dark blue wool jacket and corduroy slacks with his low-cut black Converse sneakers. A class to give him structure and a jacket to give him the security slacks and a shirt by themselves could not provide.

He had not defeated Sol Reisner. Why? Because Sol Reisner was a formidable foe, a trickster who also happened to be a real man, i.e., fighter jet pilot and decorated war hero, Rhodes Scholar, winner of the Atlantic Monthly short story award with his first submission anywhere, advertising executive genius, family man.

But now Luther was hearing of a crack in that family image. Sol Reisner revealed to the class that he and his wife of many years were living apart. Still, he let it be known a propos the libertinism expressed in a story by one of Luther's classmates that his own generation was not driven by the hedonistic impulses that so many of the younger generation seemed to be ruled by. Sol Reisner took disapproving note of a character receiving a phone call from his lover at the family residence. What Luther heard Sol Reisner say was that with high intelligence and high achievement went high moral purpose. Sol Reisner was saying that a real man was capable of restraint.

One weekend afternoon Luther did not hear but saw something else in regard to Sol Reisner and his family. He was riding the Broadway bus and just minding his own business, trying out keeping his eyes out of other people's faces so he could have his life and they could have their own, when who came aboard but Sol Reisner himself, not in the duds of his teaching life, but a pair of faded jeans that yes, he wore so well. He has come from the Apthorp, Luther surmised, a block-long residence with a carriageway and an elegant courtyard. He goes to Zabar's and gnoshes on bagels and lox. He is a West Sider if ever I saw one, Luther concluded.

His experiment with avoiding eye contact over, Luther saw something else. With Sol Reisner was a boy who could only have been his son, but who could want a son with the face of a bulldog and of whom it might be said, "Boy, you are the spitting image of Edward G. Robinson"? Indeed, Sol Reisner's son looked older than Sol Reisner himself.

Well, who could fathom the ways of the world, Luther could only conclude, while acknowledging a more pressing issue than that of Sol Reisner's unsightly son and the sadness it evoked that the boy should have been born with such a face and of the weight his father had to bear. The issue was simply this: How do I deal with Sol Reisner here in the open space beyond the confines of the classroom and the group? Not very well. Not very well at all, came the answer. In that moment that they made eye contact, Sol Reisner surely had to see that he had defeated Luther completely, that Luther could not hold his own with a real man and was exposed as nothing more than a lowly worm in Sol Reisner's august gaze. A weak smile was all Luther could muster.

Luther thought: I must not go where I do not belong. I must not do that ever. And I must not be where I do not belong, as happened today. But then something else occurred to Luther: Sol Reisner does not live in the Apthorp. His wife lives in the Apthorp with their son. Sol Reisner lives in that writing studio down on Central Park West now that they have separated. He has come for his weekly outing with his only child.

In this time Luther continued with his reading, and one day found his world explained to him by Gertrude Stein, once of America but later of Paris, France, so she could be close to Pablo Picasso and other luminaries of the art and literary world she held in high regard.

The story Luther read was “Melanctha: Each One As She May.”

Melanctha liked to wander, and to stand by the railroad yard, and watch the men and the engines and the switches and everything that was busy there, working. Railroad yards are a ceaseless fascination. They satisfy every kind of nature. For the lazy man whose blood flows very slowly, it is a steady soothing world of motion which supplies him with the sense of a strong moving power. He need not work and yet he has it very deeply; he has it even better than the man who works in it or owns it. Then for others that like to feel emotion without the trouble of having any suffering, it is very nice to get the swelling in the throat, and the fullness, and the heart beats, and all the flutter of excitement that comes as one watches the people come and go, and hears the engine pound and give a long drawn whistle...

For the lazy man. So Luther was led to an understanding of his nature by this passage in a way that he had not been before, and he could only be amazed that Gertrude Stein could expose him so completely, shining a light into all the places he would hide.

But her insight did not cause him to repudiate the railroad under Riverside Park that he held dear anymore than the first two sentences of Molloy, by Samuel Beckett (also of Paris, France, but by way of Dublin, Ireland)—“I am in my mother’s room. It is I who live there now”—made him sever his involvement with his mother through the renting office. Quite the opposite, in fact. There was only one course of action to take, and that was to intensify his commitment to the path the universe had laid out for him. “White Line, Continue” must go on. He must go on. Still, that Gertrude Stein should write such a thing.

His past would come calling in some of the faces that appeared in the grille as he worked his renting office shift. Like that of Tall Tommy. Sad, defeated, pale, an old man now, reliant on a cane to support his big, bent frame. A lonely man living in a small room and dependent on the government check in a brown envelope Luther handed him. The communication was brief, minimal, as if by mutual agreement. The ashes of a relationship. There had been long walks with Tall Tommy and his black Labrador retriever Bib, where they would light small fires in the fall with dry kindling. Sweet memories of Tall Tommy playing “Home on the Range” on his harmonica and tapping tobacco from a string pouch into those thin papers he rolled and then smoked. The beef stew dinners Tall Tommy would heat up on the small stove and serve to Luther and Luke in his room. Tall Tommy saying to Luke, “There’s something wrong with your little brother. He likes sitting on my lap too much,” as he lifted Luther off him. Luther hearing Luke’s laughter and feeling shame. And then Tall Tommy saying, “Look at him, going so greedily for the meat before the vegetables.” Casting that kind of light on him, on that particular evening. But also like a father Tall Tommy had been. A man Luther ran to. Lying in bed at night thinking happily about the avocado farm Tall Tommy owned back in California and of his promise to send for Luke and him when he moved back there. Of course there were the times Tall Tommy could be disappointing, like the crazy railroad layout table he constructed for them. A table with a perimeter but no center. What were they supposed to do with that? Or the holes Tall Tommy drilled in the tubeless tires of Luther’s bicycle thinking that the change would make the bike lighter, but who ever heard of riding around with a bike that had small holes in the tires? And there was the night that Luther went alone with him into the park and Tall Tommy confided that he had been sent to New York City by the government on a secret mission. Luther must not tell anyone, Tall Tommy said, unless he wanted Tall Tommy’s life to be in danger. Did Luther want that for Tall Tommy? Well, did he? Tall Tommy demanded. In that moment Luther saw how unimportant Tall Tommy felt that he had to make up such a story. Luther was sad for Tall Tommy and protective of him but also disappointed and ashamed for him that he had to tell such a lie.

Tall Tommy was one of those men Gertrude Stein would have buried with her insight and moved on to her luminaries. And maybe Luther had buried Tall Tommy too, that he saw him now almost without seeing him, leaving him in a past that was no more but that had become no more too fast.

Then another Tommy came, Little Tommy, and he too lived in a small room in the building, but Luther and Luke had not gone to him for beef stew or walks in the park as he was a man with anger in his blood and no need for children around him. “Give me twenty dollars on account—on account of I’m broke,” he laughed, and Luther gave him the twenty because Little Tommy was the housepainter and Luther had heard him say the same thing for years. Yes, Little Tommy had his joking side but he also had his fury, saying one night, as he stood outside the building, “Those Barnard girls? They come to New York City from their small towns and then go back home and marry their high school sweethearts, who have no idea what kind of whoring around they have been doing with these black guys—orgies up in Harlem and all kinds of sick shit. It’s not right. It’s just not right.”

A man talking from his loneliness and his apartness from the world. A man who had the ponies to bet on and his Pall Mall cigarettes and his buckets of paint and his bulging muscles and the veins threatening to burst from his neck as he ranted. But he no longer had the woman. She had left because of his fists. Little Tommy, from a small coal-mining town in Pennsylvania. His heart grown as black as the coal he had left behind.

The building. It was like a gift Luther couldn’t properly wrap, a thing with too many parts. And yet he was supposed to wrap it. He was.

And there was another gift that did not have to do with his past but with his future, and he had only to think of this gift for his thoughts to turn golden, and all because of a young man who wore the number 32 on the back of his UCLA Bruins jersey and went by the All-American name Bill Walton.

“And where did you meet this young man, Luther?”

“I met him in the West End Bar, where he appeared on the screens of the cantilevered TVs toward the back, and where I had come after my office shift on a night in early April of 1972. I had not been expecting love. I had not expected my heart to open on this night, but who among us walks about expecting such a thing? Is it not when we are looking the other way that such miracles occur and only can occur?”

“And what did he do on this night?”

“He did the reject. He controlled the boards. He performed the outlet pass with perfection. And he was only a sophomore. A sophomore.”

“And what did you do with this love?”

“I put it where my heart is and carried him about, and though he was big, he was light in my being. This was not a heavy love. This was the light of America shining, and the light is always light. It cannot be otherwise.”

“Tell us now where that love truly started, that we may know.”

“Keith Erickson. Gail Goodrich. Walt Hazzard. Nineteen sixty-four. Alcindor. Silk Wilkes. All-American names. All-American colors. Who could resist? John Wooden. Westwood. Pauley Pavilion. ‘California Dreaming.’”

“And before that?”

“Jerry ‘Zeke from Cabin Creek’ West. Number 44. West Virginia Mountaineers. Johnny Egan, Providence. James “Slow Train” Hadnot. Tom ‘Slicer’ Stith, the Bonnies of St. Bonaventure. Jerry ‘Straight A student’ Lucas and the tyranny Paul Hogue and the Cincinnati Bearcats exercised over him. No one must ever forget. No one.”

“And before?”

“Mickey Mantle. Willie Mays. The Duke of Flatbush, number 4, most of all. Frank Robinson of the Cincinnati Redlegs (never Reds, never). The way he wore his pants so high. Stan Musial, number 6. Don Drysdale, number 53. Coming from the side. No, that was later.”

“What does it all mean?”

“What does God mean?”

“You tell me.”

“Don’t talk to me like that. Don’t do it, I say.”

Luther saw the genius boyfriend before the genius boyfriend saw him, though who could say for sure with those penetrating eyes the genius boyfriend possessed. The genius boyfriend there in a light black suit and a spiffy red gingham shirt, showing he knew how to dress, how to model himself. His black hair shorter than Luther remembered. Trim and cool and a cut above the rest. Probably down from Boston to claim SoHo as his own. It was only a matter of time before he sought a bigger stage for his talent. A show at the Castelli Gallery or some such venue for the art world royalty he was. Whatever he was about, at least Luther didn’t have to deal with him without the fortification of a couple of beers and three Scotches.

Luther had a choice. He could do just as Dionne Warwick instructed, and walk on by, even if Luther hadn’t been seen walking down the street or begun to cry or had any romance with the genius boyfriend. Quite the opposite, in fact. Or he could make an approach. He could close the door on Lane or keep it open.

If it occurred to him that he had no business with Lane, that Lane was not his friend and in a league far above any that Luther should even aspire to, still the two beers and three scotches he had consumed had sufficient power to diminish their differences. His low numbers were not assailing him. Besides, he was living with Sarah now. It was Lane who was on foreign soil. Luther would show himself magnanimous. It wasn't even that. He could just put the past behind him, just pretend that Lane hadn't challenged him to a fight over Sarah, a challenge he had lacked the courage to meet. Besides, why shouldn't he? Who was he to deprive her of Lane and her connection to Boston? Could Luther really say he was enough for her?

"Hi. I'm Luther. Do you remember me?" Luther had to shout over Freddy Fender to make himself heard.

"I do," Lane said, with matter-of-factness in his voice.

"How are you? What brings you to New York?"

"Visiting friends."

"Great. How is your work going?"

Lane reached into his jacket and took out a card that showed a four-color image, a sculpture of a terribly distorted head. On the back was Lane's name and that of a gallery with a Fifty-seventh Street address.

"Jesus. You're taking New York by storm."

But Lane appeared not to have heard. He was looking over Luther's shoulder and waving to someone. Luther turned and saw why Lane's bored expression had given way to a victor's smile. A girl, dizzyingly gorgeous, was threading her way through the throng.

"If you'll excuse me," Lane said, and headed off with the girl to the dining area.

I must go where his eyes cannot find me. I must vacate the premises. There were some things that even a state of semi-drunkenness would not allow him to endure. Lane must not see how alone he was, how dependent he was on conversation with complete strangers. I must take my business elsewhere. So Luther thought.

And he did just that, heading down to Canal Street and the Three Roses Bar, which had no amber lighting or a jukebox, just a black and white television. Though Jesus, Luther sure could have done with Roy Orbison belting out "Only the Lonely" right then and there. Well, the important thing was to get his drinking done with, because until then he wasn't ready to go home.

In the morning he spent time in his corner talking to himself, trying to block out the horror of the night before. I should be locked up. I should be made to sleep with the fishes for this self-betrayal. That I would bring old pain back into my life. Have I not had enough of what the genius boyfriend can do? Am I a masochist as well as the sadist that Dr. Dressler called me? I should go before the general assembly of the United Nations and denounce myself for crimes against my own humanity. In this way did he speak to himself out of earshot of Sarah.

That card. Why had he not dropped it down a sewer? Because while he was not the theme of honor's tongue, he was not inclined to indulge in merciless acts against his own life. To have destroyed the card would have been admitting to his pettiness, his inability to acknowledge his betters on the world stage.

By afternoon the self-recrimination and shame were in abeyance and he had once again given himself the right to live. He credited the action of the typewriter keys for his brighter mood. Even if what he wrote was rubbish, sentences embarrassingly thin, the mechanical exercise of typing enabled him to reclaim the terrain that Lane had appropriated. These geniuses had to be watched at all times.

“I have something to say to you,” he said to Sarah that evening.

“What is that?”

“I saw the genius last night.”

“You saw Lane?”

“I said I saw the genius.”

“All right. You saw the genius. Who and when have been answered. Now we come to where and why.”

“This is not journalism. This is life.”

“Try to make sense. Can you do that?”

“He gave me this,” Luther said, handing her the card.

She withdrew to her studio without a word, leaving him to wonder if he had assaulted her or gifted her. The continuing silence made him uneasy. He began to sense anger building in the atmosphere and soon saw the storm clouds gathering. And soon after that did he hear her fast steps approaching. A one-person posse of the righteous riding hard and kicking up dust on the trail.

“Stay out of my life. Just stay out of it. Stop stealing from my life. Do you hear me?”

“How do I do that? Do I disappear?”

“Yes, you disappear from my business. You don’t get involved where you don’t belong.”

“Yes. The limited role of government.”

“What?”

“Poli sci.”

“Stop it, Luther. Just stop it. You’re not a child and you’re not a lunatic. Not always, anyway.”

“Beat me with a stick, why don’t you?” he said.

“I can’t talk to you,” and so she didn’t, for several hours.

Sometimes he did not speak the language of foolishness, of self-deprecation, of simple weirdness. Sometimes he spoke the language of anger, pure and unrestrained.

“You don’t like it here? You don’t want to be with me? Then get out. Just get out. Go home to your parents. That’s what you want, isn’t it?”

Not once but many times would he repeat himself until she fled, leaving him in the place of pain. As the hours passed without her return, his fear would grow, not that she had left him forever, but that, having fled into the harsh city, she had met an evil fate. Vile and degrading forces had ushered her through the gates of death after having their way with her. He would never have the chance to tell her how much he loved her and how sorry he was. At such times he would experience the same devastation, the same ceaseless anxiety, as his brother Luke when get-it-on Brenda bolted from his tormenting treatment of her. Not that he would reach out to Luke as Luke would to him. To do so would bring chaos and the lower depths right to his door. It would bring the unbearable recognition that Baudelaire had expressed—“Hypocrite lecteur, mon semblable, mon frère.” And the thought of the renting office would be equally unbearable. No, all he could do was load up on beer and wine and keep a drunken vigil, pacing the loft and praying that the footsteps he heard on the stairs would be hers.

Sooner or later the footsteps would be hers. Not when he wanted. Not when he was listening but when his listening had been defeated, when his mind, through drunkenness, had gone through pain to unconsciousness. Only then, when he had been annihilated, would she reappear.

He had shown her his anger. She had shown him her power.

He was tied to a woman he didn't love in the way he should.

She was tied to her table.

Sometimes too, when he was drinking, he would dance. Al Green made him get up and try some moves, especially when he sang “Love and Happiness.” Luther had never heard singing like that, the alterations of pace and sound, from a high-pitched squeal to a low growl. Oh Jesus, Al Green was good. Al Green had some slow, crazy, churning power that needed to express itself, and Luther couldn't help but get caught up in that expression of it with some expression of his own.

He did his dancing alone in the privacy of the loft while Sarah was out. He had no mastery of steps or even any knowledge of them. You could not say there was any pattern to the movement of his feet. And he relied greatly on flailing his arms, like a man trying to wave away a swarm of bees. Now and then he danced when Sarah was in her studio and she would begin to dance as well, staying apart from him. It wouldn't do for them to dance together. Somewhere it was written that they must not. They could share a bed and their bodies and tell each other their dreams, but dancing was too intimate—like kissing, real kissing, was too intimate.

In part Luther liked Al Green because Sarah liked Al Green. Maybe he would have liked Al Green anyway, but Sarah liking Al Green made him like Al Green even more. When he thought of how much he liked Al Green, a special happiness came to him in knowing that Sarah liked Al Green, too. In fact, her liking of Al Green came to take precedence over his liking of Al Green to the point that Luther wondered if he could ever have liked Al Green if Sarah had not liked him first.

Sarah liked James Brown, too. She did not call him the Godfather of Soul, as some did. She just said he was authentic and knew how to “get down.” Luther could not say “get down.” Those words were a breach of propriety. They would have tied him to sex so directly as to bring embarrassment and probably outright shame and the memory of the mocking laughter of his sisters Naomi and Rachel that he had experienced as a child. No, he had no business talking that kind of language even if James Brown and Sarah could.

Besides, “get down” was black talk, like “get it on” was black talk (he could refer to get-it-on Brenda, but that was different because he wasn’t getting it on, she was). He had no right to sound black when he wasn’t. Black people didn’t need a white boy like him trying to sound like them. They didn’t need any more phoniness than there already was in the world.

But Sarah—Sarah could say these things, not because she sounded black but because she respected black and had been with black, the Harvard Law School man. These things Luther understood and so there was no need to discuss them with her.

John Gregory, the sad-eyed man in the loft below, tried to befriend them. Luther had met him at that party across the street just after moving into the Chinatown loft. Luther wasn’t fooled by John Gregory’s sad eyes. He understood that whatever sorrow patches life had led John Gregory into, this man was a real man infused with the American spirit of industry and self-reliance. And John Gregory understood where the two of them stood in relation to each other, that one was higher on the continuum by innate endowment than the other. Seeing John Gregory on the stairs or on the street, Luther just shriveled inside. Any talking he did with John Gregory was while in a state of contraction. Because when he encountered John Gregory, Luther did not have the confidence, the sense of purpose, that he felt while engaged in the act of writing. All that good feeling fled in the presence of the sad-eyed man. His security blanket gone, he had only John Gregory’s Dartmouth College numbers versus his Queens College/City College numbers. Because numbers did not lie. That’s why they were numbers in the first place. A word could speak a lie but not a number, and even if that was not true, it felt true at the moment he was confronted with the presence of John Gregory.

Then it occurred to Luther that John Gregory was approaching him from a place not of neutrality but concern and even reproach, that the sad-eyed man was developing a bias against him, not because he had nothing visible that he did in the way of art but because the sad-eyed man had been hearing his sounds and seeing the silhouette of him bending his elbow on the alleyway wall. It came to Luther that John Gregory had been hearing his anger binges and had been thinking, the way that real men, sad-eyed or not, can, what kind of man is this who abuses his girlfriend so that she must flee the loft where the two of them live?

Because John Gregory said to Sarah one day, “I need someone to make sketches for this work of animation I am doing. I can pay you five dollars an hour.” Do not think it was insignificant that John Gregory was asking Sarah, because it wasn’t. Why? Because John Gregory saw something in Sarah he didn’t see in Luther, that she was at home within her own self and was a true artist, and the same could not be said of Luther.

And though Sarah graciously declined, Luther understood that John Gregory was seeking to bring her into his sphere of influence so he could provide comfort and the goodness that he, Luther, was so obviously deficient in. In short, he had declared war on Luther.

But Luther’s research showed that John Gregory had some issues of his own. He had a wife he no longer lived with, and now he had a tiny girlfriend who appeared to have only one blouse—a black lace thing that racy underwear was made of and through which you could clearly see her black bra. Hah, Luther could have said if he had had a mind to, but John Gregory had too much quality notwithstanding his exhibitionistic girlfriend to incline Luther in that direction. Luther did allow himself to wonder if John Gregory ever spoke to his girlfriend about her attire but concluded it was not John Gregory's way to interfere in anyone's mode of being and that this quality was a sure indicator of John Gregory's integrity.

This is a summary of Luther's brief relationship with John Gregory before his downstairs neighbor followed wherever his eroticized girlfriend chose to lead.

John Gregory did not leave a physical void. A new tenant moved right in. His name was Ned Fuller and he was an architect. He seemed someone who went his own way in regard to dress. The tight-fitting suit he wore on his tall, thin frame was within conventional bounds, but the ten-gallon hat and cowboy boots he was seldom seen without gave him a signature style and suggested he had a depth beyond the placid, amiable Howdy Doody smile that ruled his face. Sarah got close enough to learn that he was recently separated, and she expressed sorrow that such a sweet-looking man should be alone, even going so far as to say she wished there was someone she could think of to introduce him to. But Luther couldn't go on that sorrow and compassion journey with her. He saw in Ned Fuller a man with an aptitude for seeing the world three-dimensionally, a man who could keep lines straight and in their own true place in space so they didn't collapse on each other. He saw a high board man and more than that, a man guided by rectitude he had acquired on the plains of Texas. Further, he saw a man who could admit a mistake—his marriage—and build a foundation for a new life. Ned Fuller was a rectilinear man—whatever he might be to others, that’s who Ned Fuller was to him.

Information was pouring in from all over. More than he could handle. And yet none of it should go to waste. He was too slim a repository for such a mass of material, but he must try. Others had their job. He had his.

His mother saying, “When you have your health, you have everything.”

Saying, “When you are seventy, you cannot do the things you did when you were sixty and fifty.”

Saying, “Whatever happened to that apartment you lived in downtown?”

And he, “It’s still mine. I sublet it, but I can take the apartment back any time. I’m still the prime tenant.” He felt no need to tell her Roddy Rumble, the man with the crescent-shaped scar on his face, was living in that apartment.

“And is it a nice apartment?”

“It is.”

“And the rent is affordable.”

“Fifty dollars a month.”

“My goodness.”

“Why do you ask, Mother?”

“No reason. I was just curious.”

“Are you asking for yourself, Mother?”

“Ushtah. Do not burden me with your foolishness, my son.”

“Why is it foolishness?”

“Because it just is.”

And so he left it there because she had told him without telling him. She was looking for her way out.

And he no son at all. Taking from her but not giving. Not helping her to find that way.

Then the others came. First Hannah in her black overcoat and next Naomi, in her sack dress, saying, “We’re looking forward to some of that chicken you make, Ma. No one makes chicken like good old Ma. Isn’t that right, Luther? You should stay and eat and let Ma put some meat on your bones so you can be a real man. Don’t you want to be a real man, Luther?”

“You are much too skinny, Luther,” Hannah said. He heard genuine concern in her voice and humanness beyond wrath in her being.

Grown women who couldn’t boil an egg showing up with their feedbags on and surviving his unkind thoughts.

A summons to jury duty came in the mail and so he reported to 100 Centre Street, as instructed. In truth, it filled him with pride to fulfill his civic duty, to enter a government building of granite designed to endure, grimy though it may have become through the years. A criminal case, as it turned out. Sitting in the jury box with the other prospective jurors, he listened as the judge explained that, if chosen, they were to base their decision on the law as it was read to them. The voir dire followed. Did any of the prospective jurors have a relative in law enforcement? Had any of them been a victim of a crime? Did any of them know the defendants sitting in that same courtroom? Were any of them related to the defendants?

The four handcuffed men, all black, cast baleful stares at those being questioned in the jury box. They were of a kind that sets mind and body quivering at the endless fascination a murderer, or one so accused, can spark. Luther could not say that he loved or adored them, but to say he was not in their thrall would have been a lie. They had gone where others dared not go in ushering their victims into eternity. Suddenly, Luther was seized with a desire to say, the murderers are me, and I am them. But the moment passed as he saw something else, that a panther, black or otherwise, was a predatory carnivore with a dictate to kill.

Advocating for the defendants was a young man with the bearing of an elegant dauphin. Oh Lord was he a worthy rival of the baleful ones for the eyes of the prospective jurors in his tailored suits and bright ties, his black curls cut short and tight and his deep-set dark eyes glittering with intelligence and his whole being exuding sexual brio. Solden Sondem definitely had the allure to create a heartthrob nation all his own and could only have been born of parents determined to give his name the alliterative force that would in itself propel him to the head of the pack and let the world know that he was of his own rare kind.

Of significance, to Luther if to no one else, was that Solden Sondem had earned a JD not from Harvard or Yale or Columbia but from Brooklyn Law School, and yet had the power to transform that lowly institution into one that was fully acceptable.

Something else of a transformative nature was happening. Luther was eager to speak about the whole process of jury selection he was engaged in when he encountered the Howdy Doody man in the loft below and Lance Whiting in the loft above. He now had a world beyond the hidden one of “White Line Continue” and his “job” at the renting office to share with them and others, a visible world. Sure, he still inwardly recoiled when someone such as Lance, in a tone of voice that carried a hint of mockery, asked about his writing, but the jury experience was proof that he had a place in the world.

One afternoon, while Sarah was out, Luther stood at the far end of her studio staring out the window. Down below the fire truck, its siren beginning to wail, was emerging from the firehouse. Those men, in their fire-retardant long coats, might find, at the site to which they had been called, an inferno or a false alarm. The fact was that their lives were on the line. Lance Whiting, the actor living upstairs from him, could strike no sardonic tone with these men, whose lives were right out there for everyone to see.

He remembered that bus ride out to Newark for the law school orientation and the elation that rose in him like a glorious sunrise. He would be a lawyer. Sarah would be proud of him. His mother would be proud of him. He also remembered Dr. Dressler’s words. “You chicked out. You chicked out,” she had said, and her dismissal of his writing ambition as a way of maintaining his distance.

And he remembered something else. Dr. Dressler had said, “They listen,” of those who gave undue weight to the negative voices in their minds, the voices that would prevent them from moving forward with their lives. Solden Sondem hasn’t listened to such voices. Solden Sondem hadn’t considered Brooklyn Law School to be beneath him.

Probably Solden Sondem hadn't given a rat's ass to what others might think. Why? Because all Solden Sondem cared about was practicing law, and one curriculum would suffice as well as another as a means to getting him past the bar exam. But I listened, Luther thought. I listened to the laughter and the ridicule and the pity that would come from Lydia and Peter and others. Poor Luther, they would say, when he was exposed as unable to get into a top-tier law school. Oh, what were those voices anyway that they should have such power?

All he knew was that coiffed Solden Sondem in his snappy suits made his life seem small.

The writing had been on the wall that would make star-status Solden Sondem necessary in the first place. Many, many walls, in fact, and on subway cars as well. Those dayglo-kissed trains spoke of spirits seeking a medium all their own for the full expression of their pain and aspiration. Luther, in his better moments, understood that once he had been with the urchin flock and too had taken the vandal's path, as if to say this window, this streetlight, are not a part of me nor I of them, and so it was for him to sing the song of disenfranchisement with the rocks he hurled against them. And while he as a boy had been driven to a track ballast-chucking frenzy by the boxcar might of America, this unbridled expression on the rolling stock of the transit system seemed different, a warning that the bells of anarchy were sounding louder and shoot 'em boy run run days were ahead.

Dayglo was one thing, but headlines screaming that bullets had been fired into the backs of two police officers on street patrol? Luther did not want to be part of a new world order of a kind planned by the Black Liberation Army, who were being accused of the assassinations. He was happy enough, Nixon and Watergate aside, with things as they were. He believed in federalism and the rule of law, even if he sometimes lived outside it. Mark Rudd and Lewis Cole and the firebrands at City College had scared him. He wasn't comfortable with those who had the vision or the recklessness to break the mold. He wasn't good at putting things together, and even if they were la crème de la crème, he couldn't believe that they were either, at least not whole countries.

Sometimes "Sally Go Round the Roses" played loud in his head. It was the most wonderful and mysterious song. The roses knew what secret? The Jaynettes weren't telling. Oh, he wished he could be in a room with the girls who had recorded that song so they could sing it just for him and he could watch them dance and make it fully comprehensible.

All this preoccupation with Solden Sondem did not mean that Solden Sondem was similarly thinking of him. Solden Sondem had a jury of twelve good men and women, and one alternate, to select who, in his estimation, would return a verdict of "not guilty" on all counts of the indictment. To aid him in the selection process, Solden Sondem had a man of soaring intellect and a thick beard worthy of an Old Testament prophet. Reese Farragut sat at the right hand of Solden Sondem, and when he was not making notes, he was whispering in his ear. These were not sweet nothings that Reese Farragut was whispering into the ear of his beloved. And yet he was arousing Solden Sondem with the insights he was providing: the peculiar things that the prospective juror in seat number 11 was doing with her hands and the hard stare seat number 11 was putting on the alleged perps. A blend of hard fact and surmise went into Reese Farragut's final analysis. Luther had learned in the newspapers of the painstaking research Reese Farragut had conducted as a scientist and now sought to apply in developing a science of jury selection. Reese Farragut's careful technique notwithstanding, Luther came to believe he and this man were in sympathetic accord. Why? Because Reese Farragut was in the image of Efram Ellsberg, Luther's friend from City College and post office days, sufficient that Luther could say of him, I know this man and have the strongest feeling that I am in his heart. And, in truth, Luther was attempting to thought-beam to Reese Farragut that love through the air even as he held his face expressionless.

Now something else of consequence was occurring to negate all of Luther's mental communiqués to the defense team. It came to Luther's understanding that for every defense there was an offense, and that offense could have a fearsome countenance, as the scowling face of the lead prosecutor, Stace Chunkly (BA, Amherst, JD, Columbia Law School), surely did. Stace Chunkly did not need wings of mercy or Judy Collins to remind him what love was. Love was muscular thought. Love was justice. Don't give me the historical injustice of slavery. Don't give me inequality and the ongoing iniquity perpetrated by white men against the black race. Do not give me Hattie Carroll being a maid in a kitchen. Do not give me any of that. Give me the fact that two young policemen on foot patrol on an East Village street had their lives taken when assassins fired bullets into their backs, extinguishing them forever. Give me the fact that wives and children and parents and siblings and friends were left to grieve their loss. Eternity. Do you know what eternity is, gentlemen and gentlewomen of the jury? This life is to eternity what a drop of water is to the ocean, vast beyond reckoning. And eternity is where these defendants wantonly dispatched these brave young men who were doing their duty in protecting you, the citizenry of this city. And why? Because these defendants were driven by a hateful ideology that gives them a license to kill.

Such was the muscular approach to the affairs of the world that Stace Chunkly took. No riding the crest of the wave of black rage like pretty boy Solden Sondem was doing. And no need for the services of the expert Reese Farragut to determine who he wanted and didn't want impaneled on the jury. Of each one, he asked the same question: Would the fact that the slain men were police officers have any bearing, one way or the other, on their verdict? No was the answer given by the prospective jurors whom Stace Chunkly questioned before coming to Luther.

"How about you, Mr. Garatdjian? Will the fact that the slain men in this case were police officers have any bearing, one way or the other, for you?"

"I can't say it will," Luther said.

"Then there is a possibility that it might?"

"You must understand that this is New York City, and danger is everywhere, and so the police must be everywhere, only they are not, because they cannot be," Luther said.

“Do you wish to explain?”

“When the men with violence in their bones came and knocked down my door, though the light was burning in my apartment, they would surely have deceased me had I been home. They were there but the police were not there.”

“Meaning?”

“Sometimes the police are where they need to be and sometimes they are not.”

“Thank you, Mr. Garatdjian,” Stace Chunkly said, and moved on to question another person in the jury box.

Luther had no apology he wished to make for his response, which the circumstances, and the presence of fearsome Stace Chunkly, seemed to elicit, and yet could only be sad at the peremptory dismissal that followed. Now he would not be a party to the courtroom drama sure to follow, in comparison with which his own life was a monotony of days.

“Oblivion-bound.” “Le malaise, c’est moi.” Message T-shirts such as these Efram Ellsburg, Luther’s friend from college days, was given to wear. Quaaludes, hash, grass, were staples of his day, his antidotes to despair. And yet, though Efram spent his evenings zonked and captive to prime time TV, Luther still thought of his friend as Buddha breath or Walt Whitman spouting bardic yip-yap, singing the song of democracy as he strode across the Brooklyn Bridge or the Continental Divide. Luther suspected Talmudic wisdom of the ages was stored in Efram’s genes.

Through much of college, Efram was hooked on Rosa Hessen, a woman who could smile but also fight you with her face and more, should you wish to get into it with her. She had long, thin dancer's legs and unruly hair she allowed to have its way. Luther had once gone to Rosa's apartment for grass so he could return to smoke heaven, Efram having alerted him that she had the goods. Luther felt overwhelmed by her sultry power. Evidently, Rosa lacked the capacity to be a do-right woman in regard to sex; she had not left behind the right to bed with others when she paired up with Efram. Those were one-and-done deals until she met Professor Hiram Forcemet, whose big head housed a big brain that had assimilated and synthesized the whole body of Western philosophic thought, from Aristotle to Heidegger to whoever the big cheese of the day might be. As a student of Professor Forcemet, she came to love him for his body as well as his mind, and he came to love her, too. And while it was true that she loved Efram for both his body and mind as well, she could not stop her love for Professor Forcemet from growing, and he did nothing to quell her ardor, simply saying, "Passion must have its expression. We must deny ourselves nothing, nothing."

Luther had not read the novel Of Human Bondage, but he had seen the film and could apply the same words to Efram's thing with Rosa as he could to his own desperate need for Sarah. Rosa did not try to hide her love lust. "I can't stop," she said, leaving aside Immanuel Kant and Nietzsche for plain speak.

"And I can't stop seeing her," Efram said to Luther. This was back in their post office days, which Luther now remembered fondly as a time of rich experience and growth. Penn Station. The tabernacle. The General Post Office just across the street. The area a wonderland of memory and smells from childhood that would overwhelm him with the sweet pain of longing, though for what he could never say.

And so Efram Ellsberg, sad-eyed and stressed in his farmer's overalls, had his time of torment too. But he also had a moral compass that he followed. His heart and his eros were one; they were where his treasure lay. He did not seek to relieve his anxiety or take his revenge by pouring his seed into other women. He stayed the course. And if Luther ever needed a window into Efram's soul, it occurred when in his hysteria he invited Efram to meet a speed freak woman, Desdemona, following their evening shift at the post office. Luther had introduced himself to her in Washington Square Park some nights before. She had the fragility of an insect and was in need of medical and psychiatric attention, but Luther had not been seeing her dire circumstances. He had thought to show Desdemona off to Efram and thus to demonstrate that he, Luther, had a wonderful life full of exciting, alluring women. He had not understood that he would be showing Efram sickness or that Efram, far from responding with prurient interest in this woman with the figure of Olive Oyl, would shortly take his leave. Even before Efram's departure, Luther had begun to see through his friend's eyes. He had felt Efram's sadness at the spectacle of the emaciated woman, a reality Luther had not been able to fully see on his own.

Efram's departure validated for Luther his friend's higher status. He had no choice but to place Efram in the moral pantheon with Gresham Dodger. "We don't do that here. We don't do that here," Gresham Dodger had shouted into Luther's face, having seen Luther strike a loathsome classmate back in seventh grade. And he had absorbed Gresham's message. He understood when a being from a higher order was addressing him, through his actions or his words.

There had been another occasion for moral instruction from Efram. Luther had found himself one night in a Bronx apartment with Efram and some of his friends. Because the hour had grown late, Efram encouraged Luther to stay over, as he would be doing. There were young women in that apartment, and Luther's shy contact with them had awakened sexual desire. While Efram slept the sleep of the supremely just, Luther struggled to restrain himself from knocking on the door of one of the women with whom, at least in his imagination, he had exchanged a look of mutual understanding. Actually, as he lay on a makeshift bed on the floor, he imagined, there in the dark, the entire apartment coming to prurient life, a full orgy erupting. He experienced this carnality as a fever, a torment.

Mercifully, he fell off to sleep, and in the morning Efram offered a raised eyebrow when Luther shared his impulse to knock on the woman's door, leaving out the fantasy of group sex. That raised eyebrow told Luther everything. Efram and his friends, all of them Jewish, had modes of communication and points of reference beyond Luther's ken, and they needed neither word nor gesture to achieve full understanding, their cohesiveness having been established in ancient times. We are brothers and sisters first, and lovers second, Efram was saying, casting Luther deeper and deeper into his apartness mindset.

But that was then and life had its turnings. Long after Luther had left the post office for the more profitable renting office, Efram had remained, giving himself daily to the meager challenge of the box scheme and those bins of mail lifted from the conveyor belt. And yet, even within the system in which he recognized himself as a mere cog or because of it, his voice had to be heard. Efram took to decorating first-class mail that passed through his hands with a hand-drawn peace symbol without thought to the potential consequences, including the federal marshals who arrived at his work station as he was engrossed in one of his doodles and led him in handcuffs from the general post office to a federal detention center in lower Manhattan for the alleged crime of defacing United States mail.

For one of the few times Luther saw his friend in this period with less than a serene visage. Wary of the system, he became its victim with his felony conviction for destroying government property. More humiliating was the absence of legal options; at the urging of his lawyer and his family, he entered a plea of guilty in exchange for a suspended five-year sentence and probation.

Deep in debt to his family for legal fees and shamed and humiliated that a cute gesture should summon such disproportionate clobber—what was that to be chewed up in the maw of the law for doodling?—he became a production coordinator for a corporate annual reports company. A more mainstream girlfriend than Rosa soon followed.

“Luther, where is the reason in this? I need to know. You just go on and on and on.”

“Do you not believe that order must prevail and that a full accounting must be made? Are you wedded to your foolishness in espousing anarchist principles so chaos can reign? We must sweep the floor and put things where they belong.”

Maude was not hooked on philosophy or the life of the mind. Her deference and humility led her to ask Efram the difference between modern and contemporary. She was simply present in the world, creating a niche for herself in a midtown marketing company, and lived in a ground-floor apartment in an art deco building on West Eighty-First Street. Her previous boyfriend, a photographer, she asked to leave when she learned he was doing the hanky-panky with some of his models. Maude was a one-man woman, and so Efram did not have to fear the cruel blow that sexual treachery or abandonment could deliver. But Efram did have to fear the closeness that Maude sought, the long cuddle time she required to assuage her asthma. He tried in vain to imagine train whistles in the night when he heard her wheezing in bed. Security being her goal, Maude could not long endure the limbo status of just living together. She had grown up in Brooklyn. She had heard the song "Today I Met the Boy I'm Going to Marry" and in fact sang it in a pretty soprano right there for Efram in the sunken living room on their first day together. She was not always so private with her vocals. On subway platforms and on buses she might be led to launch into other oldies but goodies that pertained to her man, like "He's a Rebel" and "He's So Fine," and was particularly vibrant on the doo lang doo lang part. Altogether he was perturbed, not reassured, when she offered her rendition of "I Will Follow Him," as he by now had a strong sense of her doggedness.

Efram saw that Maude, her song bursts notwithstanding, was the floor on which he stood, or sat, and if that floor opened up, he would fall and fall back into Midwood, Brooklyn, and the clutches of his loving but smothering mother. Evenings spent watching Hawaii Five-O and Ironside and The Mary Tyler Moore Show replaced all interest in literature and his own writing. Whereas he had once walked around with a knapsack full of books, he now rode the subway as part of the daily grind with his face in The New York Post or The Daily News. He wanted no reminders of where he had been. And yet he had enough of the manly thing that Maude, who recognized his potential, would overlook his lethargy and continued to claim him for her own.

The apartment of Efram and Maude had the things an apartment should have: a sofa, a color TV, a wall unit, a dining table that seated six, and a functional, modern kitchen. Once again wonder was summoned in Luther that there were those who could impose not only order but imagination on their domiciles.

By contrast, it was evident to Luther that Efram and Maude were seeing less than they had hoped—and perhaps more—when they came to visit the loft. There was sadness and even displeasure on their faces as they took in the stove-less kitchen and the crude sink-less bathroom with a shower curtain serving as a door. Does he really shave and brush his teeth in the kitchen sink, the same sink where they wash the dishes? So Luther could imagine Efram and circumspect Maude thinking. And the two of them sitting on the small wicker sofa that sagged and squeaked under their weight. Luther even caught them exchanging a look of commiseration. But was it for Efram and Maude to hose him down, and Sarah as well, with their unspoken sorrow and their pity?

Well, it was something of a relief when they could all go to the Joy Palace, as Luther and Sarah had done with Sarah's parents, where Luther once again ordered the house special, those glistening chunks of beef and bright green broccoli. There was nothing like warm, hearty food to make him feel substantial in the world.

It happens in this life that we are asked to step up and show what we are made of. So it occurred to Luther years later when he reflected on the invitation that followed to the wedding of Efram Ellsberg and Maude Sodenberg. Not that it was a formal, printed thing Luther received in the mail. Efram simply let Luther know that he and Sarah would be welcome at the ceremony and the reception to follow. Luther had never before received a wedding invitation, formal or otherwise. Luke's marriage to Maureen had been a City Hall kind of deal. But here life was calling to life. A ritual practiced through the centuries was to be enacted, tailored no doubt to Efram's sensibility. Even as Efram spoke, Luther could hear, in the background, his bride-to-be's soulful rendition of "Going to the Chapel." Wedding bells were no small thing, but Luther could not see what he could not see. He had come to occupy his own space and no other. The more time he had, the less time he had. The more time he had, the more time he needed. He couldn't give himself to Efram and Maude, not when he had words to write. OK for Efram to watch Ironside and HawaiiFive-0, given his high board score status. But not OK for Luther. Not OK at all. Luther had catching up to do before he could even hope to be presentable. Besides, Luther would be out of place among Efram's high board score friends.

Luther saw that he lacked a deep desire for friendship, the give and take required for a lasting bond to form. He wanted Efram to serve as an oracle whom he could come to with his anxieties about Sarah, but now that he had Sarah, he had less need of Efram. For the rest, he had the bars and the doors to magical, sensual nights that alcohol opened. The known left him nothing to explore, and what was more known, in his mind, than the suffocating normalcy of marriage.

As a child he would race up the stairs of the station at the Grand Concourse and 149th Street, in the Bronx, and transfer to the Jerome Avenue subway. Soon the train would leave behind the dark tunnel for the lingering daylight on a spring or summer evening. Before him came into view the cream-colored walls of Yankee Stadium. From the vantage point of the elevated rail line he would glimpse, through a space between the scoreboard and the right-field stands, the rich green outfield grass and Yankees in pinstripes or the visiting ballplayers in their road uniforms running wind sprints or shagging flies. That subway tunnel being the loft and Efram's wedding the waning light of day that alcohol and his own tendencies prevented him from experiencing.

That November Richard Milhous Nixon punched gentle George S. McGovern in the face and broke it in many different places. And Spiro Agnew took off the gloves and did the same to the Democratic vice-presidential candidate, Sargent Shriver.

“Well, we won the East Village,” a man who walked on the sunny side of the street was heard to say.

To Luther Spiro Agnew had cruelty in his bones and in his blood; in Greece, his ancestral homeland, he would surely be prime junta material. He stood out in his shiny, expensive suits and with his thinning hair slicked back and that constant look of peeve on his face even when he smiled. Spiro Agnew was not afraid to put his face, smiling or otherwise, before the public, and tell that public he had attended law school at night. But he also had a weapon with which to similarly bash John Q. Public should it wish to mess with him about his lack of Ivy League status, and that weapon was his IQ of 135.

Luther was showing some concern about other faces belonging to the rulers of the land. And why shouldn't he? RMN was surely deserving of the moniker "Tricky Dick" after his Checkers speech, though no one could say his face displayed the same cruel streak as that of his veep. As for his underlings, Bob "Buzz" Haldeman and John Ehrlichman, Luther had his eye on them as well. Ehrlichman had the malignancy gene, Luther feared, seeing the way his lips curled into a sneer, and Bob Haldeman appeared equally formatted to inflict pain.

The Grand Old Party had been wrapped in the colors of the American flag. It was the party of Lincoln he had read about in the history books, the Union Army, the Battle of Gettysburg, Grant's Tomb, the granite structures of government. But how was it he had come to demonize their competitors, the Democrats, and viscerally experience them as anarchists, the great unwashed, a frenzied mob seeking to storm the gates of government and sully and eventually destroy all our institutions? What engineering feat had been performed on his mind that he should sit as a child with his father's copy of the New York Times and fill with terror on reading that the Democrats had a chance to increase their number of statehouses and Senate seats and control of state legislatures?

And what had changed him? Kennedy had changed him. The denunciations by Pastor Cohn of Kennedy had changed him. Love had changed him. The handsome president. His beautiful wife. The assassination had put Kennedy in his heart forever. LBJ had changed him. And mean Barry Goldwater. He too had changed him. Leaving behind Pentecostalism meant leaving behind the Republican Party, meant leaving behind those who said no to life, meant leaving behind his narrow past for more open spaces.

Solomon Reisner had been a good father, a man who understood how to maintain distance and keep the thermostat set to cool. But two terms with Solomon Reisner, or any teacher, was enough. It was time to move on.

An additional feather had been placed in the cap of CCNY. A poet who had been the recipient of many prestigious literary awards and prizes was now the college's poet-in-residence. Many times Luther had contemplated abandoning the burden, the bondage, of "White Line Continue" and freeing himself of the merciless tyranny of narrative as he experienced it, packing every scrap of his existence into his meager sentences, seeing as he did that he lacked the engineer's aptitude for structure? He admired the freedom, the distillation of experience that permeated poetry but remained intimidated by the technical demands, still having only a passing acquaintance with dactyls and trochees and spondees and the like. But maybe Louise Richter would receive him. Maybe she would give him the direction he was seeking.

Through the half-open door of her small office he saw the poet standing by her desk. "I was hoping so much I could have the chance to be in your class. You see, there is another world..."

But Louise Richter was a woman of fire and constant in her ire. A demonstration of her fidelity to this animus quickly followed. To the door she strode, her eyes twin pools of darkness, and slammed it shut in his face without so much as a "no."

Such decisive action required a meditation. It could not simply be dismissed as rudeness. And so he came to the understanding that the slammed door was an expression of her commitment to principle. And what exactly was that principle? Simply this: People whose faces you do not like you do not let through the door. She had not liked his face. Why? Because it was a face worthy of being disliked. That was why. Because the time had come to actively dislike the fucking pricks. Because the fucking pricks had been getting away with murder and now their time was up.

Louise Richter was an avenging angel. She had staying power in his mind. Over and over the same scene he replayed, she coming to the door and slamming it resoundingly without so much as a “no,” giving him the silence he not only needed but deserved.

And Luther came to another understanding: the more sterling your quality, the more emphatic your rejection of non-quality had to be if you were to preserve your unalloyed status so integrity could continue to speak its name. After all, Louise Richter had gone to Harvard, and bards such as Robert Lowell and Wystan Hugh Auden were in her praise corner.

In pursuit of thoroughness, Luther headed for the St. Mark’s Bookstore, where he pulled from a shelf a slender volume of Louise Richter’s verse. Clearly the poet had been in communication with the Gertrude Stein of Melanctha, as where was he led but to lines that read “When the men in my life hit the hobo trail/I remain/ My power is local but I know my power.”

Oh dear God, Luther thought, there are those among us with special powers of perception. This woman has been sent to strip me to my essence and put me in my place. A feeling not of chagrin but of great joy suffused his entire being as he cried out, “I have been remanded to the railroad tunnel of my childhood. It is there that I must eventually go.”

Dov Drosky was his name. He too was from Harvard and came to CCNY with a master’s degree in creative writing and three published novels to his credit before the age of twenty-six. He didn’t try to be older than his years, freely acknowledging that he was a young writer struggling to learn his craft and leaving ample room for mentors in his life. A merry gleam often showed in the dark eyes of this man on the rise.

Dov Drovsky provided his students with a comprehensive reading list, from the Epic of Gilgamesh to Kleist and Knut Hamsun and Borges. And he was very big on John Hawkes, who wrote skinny books and, Luther somehow assumed, had skinny legs and was famous for his obscurity.

“I don’t care if you are underweight, but I don’t want you under-read. If you want meat on the bones of your prose, then you must devour, gorge, tear the very flesh of the text with your teeth. Do whatever you must so you absorb good writing into your bloodstream and let it carry to your very soul.” A tone and expression of earnestness accompanied this declaration by Dov Drovsky, though Luther suspected a prankster’s laugh was lurking behind his serious demeanor, as no Harvard man could be lacking in ironic levity.

Dov Drovsky was not the underweight kind but a serious devourer if his oak tree thighs and barrel chest were any indication. And yet suppose mesomorphic endowment was not owing in the least to nurture but entirely to nature? Had Luther not seen this thing before, men who went days and weeks without anything more than a sprig of parsley maintaining their robust physiques just as men and women blessed with encyclopedic knowledge often seemed to have that knowledge encoded in their genes? And what of Dov Drosky's passion for skinny-legged John Hawkes and his inscrutable texts? Here, Luther had a declaration of his own to silently make. I will not engage in such fruitless speculation but move forward with my life, he vowed.

Dov Drosky had a second declaration to make. "If you want to be published, you have to start your own magazine. Life is a quid pro quo thing." He himself had started a fiction magazine, Flame, on the college's budget, and used his own office as the base of operations. A beset-looking and overweight young woman in the writing program served as the magazine's unpaid intern. Dov Drosky's own work appeared in every other issue. He had everything: intelligence, vision, energy, charm, perseverance. But his prose lacked elasticity; it had a musclebound quality.

Dov Drosky was generous in the comments he attached to Luther's submitted stories. He did not hit him with a hammer, as Sol Reisner had done. Though his hair was black and his clothes equally dark, a nimbus of light shone around him and he communicated hope. Luther was grateful to have such a man in his life, even if the inevitable comparison between him and his not much older teacher was an unfavorable one. After all, Dov Drosky had a life of full responsibility and sizable accomplishment, while Luther, in quiet moments, understood that he was filching money from the renting office of the family business and had nothing to show for his years on the planet.

You must not continue on this path, my son. Did I not tell you to attend bible college and to prepare yourself for God's ministry? Do you not know that the Christ Jesus is the risen Christ, and that all cries and whispers and murmured lamentations, in writing and in the spoken word, are but prayers for salvation?

At Dov Drosky's first class, Luther came to notice a woman seated on the other side of the table. She would look and then look away and a minute later, set her eyes on him again. She appeared somewhat older than the other students and had arrived wearing a tight red silk blouse, the kind that might have come from an expensive boutique. The designer top didn't quite go with her workaday Levi jeans. But it was her unsettling and unwelcome attention to him that was more his concern than her mismatched outfit. She seemed to be communicating neediness and a plea for connection. It occurred to him that her attention to him was not so much abject as appropriating; some assumption of instant intimacy she had conveyed. He resolved to steer clear of her, fearing she would otherwise try to smother him. He wanted to do this writing program in the right way and intuitively sensed he would not be able to with her in his life.

She was waiting for him at the door when the class ended. "Are you heading for the subway. Because if you are, I have a car and could give you a lift."

"Sure," he said, her invitation setting aside the conclusion about her he had drawn.

Seeing that the gate near the Quonset hut was locked, Luther suggested they leave through the main exit at the northern end of the south campus. But the woman, whose name was Marge, said no, she could easily climb the seven-foot-high gate. Besides, her car was parked on the street just outside the gate so why take the long way around? A sense of danger was growing in Luther even as she spoke. A treacherous rain had begun to fall, the kind in which cars skidded and crashed and in which cold, sharp steel met unsuspecting flesh on garbage-strewn streets. Harlem, with its random bursts of deadly violence, felt like an encircling menace in the darkness beyond the confines of the now desolate campus.

The woman's innocence, her can-do spirit, was out of place with the sullenness, the atmosphere of grievance, that permeated the community around the campus. A scene from childhood came to him of Luke's friend Whitey swarmed over by black kids from the welfare hotels down the block. He saw him being beaten senseless and left curled in his own blood on the street, and with the images came fear bordering on panic, as it had during the open admissions controversy that had engulfed the college several years before, when he imagined thousands of angry blacks marauding through the campus. An intelligent woman emotionally stupid about the inherent dangers in the city was not someone to be with in a ghetto. No, she was the kind to summon the forces of rage to spring at her milky white throat and draw him into the danger zone as well.

The woman gripped the vertical bars of the wrought-iron gate and secured a foothold on the flat, diagonal bar that rose at a forty-five degree angle. The high-end hiking boots, with their lug soles, were designed for rugged trails, not climbing a rain-slicked gate, but she persevered, inching forward as if she were scaling a sheer cliff. Soon she was halfway over the top, her abdomen hovering less than an inch above the sharp, spiky tips of the bars. Terror-struck that she would lose her footing and be impaled on those tips, he coaxed her down and they exited through the main gate.

Her gray Buick sedan was in need of body work but offered a cushioned ride. As she drove out of Harlem and toward Morningside Heights, he learned that she was an adjunct lecturer at the college and eligible to take the writing class tuition-free. He also learned that she lived by herself on Riverside Drive and One Hundred Fifteenth Street in a building he had a history with that he had no need to share with her.

Waiting in the subway station for the Broadway local, he told himself that he had escaped. And now he could establish a new line of defense against this woman Marge. She could, if she wished, chauffeur him to the Upper West Side from CCNY, but he would make sure it stopped there.

And yet the new line he drew turned out to be no more defensible than the first. Following the next class, she overran it as quickly as the Germans had penetrated the Maginot Line.

“Let’s go for a beer. What do you say?” She went past the subway stop at One Hundred Sixteenth Street without waiting for a response and parked in front of the End Bar a couple of blocks south.

“Thanks for asking,” he said with some sarcasm, miffed at her high-handedness.

Her car. The soft lights of the End Bar. He would yield to those. But him she would never get. About that he had ironclad certainty. Physical attraction was lacking. He was saddened by her reliance on jeans as a staple of her dress, as he was by get-it-on Brenda. The jeans spoke of her shame about her body. They hid the knock knees or poorly shaped calves or thick ankles a skirt or dress would have exposed. He was grateful that even in warm weather he could wear long pants to cover his bony knees and meager calves.

But there was more than physical revulsion. Marge was his sisters and his sisters were Marge. There was the deterrent of incest.

Marge returned to the booth holding two steins, each with a straw, filled with cola and ice.

“Why the soda and not beer? And why two?” Luther asked.

“Your last question first. Because I get very thirsty. As to your first question, because alcohol makes me crazy. I do things I shouldn’t do.”

“Like what?”

“I throw my drinks in men’s faces. That’s what I do,” Marge said.

“You’ve done that?”

“I did just that in a bar last month, and caused a big scene.”

“You don’t like men?”

“I like them too much,” she said.

“That’s why you throw drinks in their faces?”

“Not exactly. Because they don’t do what I want them to do.”

“And what is that?”

“Love me.”

“They don’t?”

“My last boyfriend didn’t.”

“Why not?”

“He left me for another woman.”

“That must have been rough.”

“I put all his clothes in the bathtub and burned them.”

“Jesus.”

“I had to have some revenge.”

“Well, better that you burned his clothes than him.”

“Believe me, I would have set him on fire if he had been around.”

“Do you still feel that way?”

“I have nothing to say to Elgard Finnebrand III. We are done.”

“He sounds like royalty.”

“That’s how he thinks of himself, as a prince among men.”

“I’ve never met a prince.”

She was not royalty herself, but she was privileged. She made no secret of the enormous trust fund that enabled her to rent a spacious Riverside Drive apartment and see a therapist twice a week and own a car on the meager salary of an adjunct lecturer. Her father had reaped a fortune from a patent on a component essential for military defense systems. She might be off balance emotionally but she had her father’s smarts, and they had brought her a B.A. from Vassar College and an M.A. in English from Columbia. And so, because she was stamped with the seal of excellence, Luther had reason to fear her.

And there was another thing to fear, the smashing of his dream. His literary treasure was the building a half block away. He had done something risky and foolish in bringing Marge close to that treasure. He couldn't say what exactly would happen were she to discover his family ties and learn about his family's management of the property or of his three shifts per week in the renting office, only that he needed to be seen as alone and unattached. This was his time for inventing himself. Whatever Marge's image of him, any knowledge she gained of his origins would only destroy it.

"We should get together and do something sometime soon," Marge said.

"What should we do?"

"Something."

"Yes, well," Luther said.

"Well, what?"

"Nothing," Luther said.

For that night, at least, the wrecking ball did not come in. As the days passed and the memory of Marge's predatory manner receded, his attitude toward her began to soften. A little pushy, maybe, and even crazy, what with throwing drinks in men's faces and burning her ex-boyfriends clothes, but so what? She hadn't burned anyone with acid and in spite of the violence she had claimed to be capable of toward Elgard Finnebrand III, nothing of the kind had actually occurred. She was just a lonely woman going through a rough stretch. That was all. And it was kind of nice to have someone who thought so highly of his writing when all he had received were thumbs down. And yet, how nice to have the safety of the Chinatown loft to withdraw to, where he could have his life with Sarah.

That weekend Sarah called him to the phone. “A woman named Marge wants to speak with you,” she said. Astonished, he took the receiver.

“Luther, I’m very angry with you.”

“How did you get my number?”

“I have my ways.”

“What does that mean, you have your ways?”

“I went to the registrar’s office and said you were a student of mine and that I needed to speak with you because you had been missing classes.”

“You lied to get my number. That was an underhanded thing to do.”

“I will tell you what an underhanded thing to do is. You tried to undermine my growth. What is lower than that?”

“What?”

“You heard me. You saw me about to climb over that gate and insisted on pulling me back.”

“I believe I kept you from impaling yourself on the spiky tips of that gate.”

“I won’t get into the obvious Freudian implication of that fear. You couldn’t handle the fact that I, as a woman, could do something only men are supposed to do.”

“This is ridiculous.”

“I will tell you what is ridiculous—men who think they can hold me back. You’re just like those four men who came along and fixed my flat tire over my strenuous objection. I won’t go so far as to say you were one of those men in that car, but you could have been. Is that all you want for yourself in life, Luther, to be someone who purposely creates barriers for women? What other women have you been doing this to? Tell me.

Tell me now.”

“Please don’t call here again,” Luther said, and hung up the phone.

He hadn’t a minute to fathom the exchange that had taken place when the phone rang again.

“No one hangs up the phone on me. No one. Do you hear me?” Marge screamed, before hanging up the phone herself.

“Who is this woman?” Sarah asked.

“A woman from the writing program,” Luther said.

“What did she want?”

“She wanted me to stop interfering with her growth.”

“What?”

“That’s exactly what she said. She said I interfered with her growth.”

“How did you manage to do that?”

“Do what?”

“Interfere with her growth?”

“I didn’t interfere with her growth.”

“Then why did she say so? You must have done something.”

“I talked her down from a gate she was trying to climb because she was going to get hurt.”

“How was she going to get hurt?”

“Her belly was hanging over the sharp tips at the top of the gate. I could see she couldn’t make it over.”

“You couldn’t have let her try?”

“I’m not in this world to let people hurt themselves. I’m not. And if they do want to hurt themselves, then I don’t want it to be in front of me. Do I have to tell you all the times I see people, in the throes of their own sly viciousness, walk out into the street against the light looking in the wrong direction for traffic or not looking at all? Or those so-called victims who stand at the very edge of the platform as the train approaches the station and then ‘accidentally’ fall to their death? Don’t think for a minute I don’t get what they’re up to.”

“What were you doing with this woman anyway?”

“It was late and dark out when the class ended. She offered me a ride to the subway station in her car. That was all.”

“Obviously it wasn’t all for her,” Sarah said.

“I guess not. The really outrageous thing is that she tricked the people in the registrar’s office into giving her my phone number.”

“How did she do that?”

“By telling them I was a student of hers. She has some kind of temporary teaching position at the college.”

“She sounds like trouble.”

“She won’t be. You’ll see.”

“Just don’t go interfering with her growth anymore. Maybe killing herself is what she needs to do.”

In this time Sarah paid a visit to Dr. Edelbaum, the family doctor for both the Garatdjians and the Van Dines. “He said someday I will be a large lady, like my mother, and then he laughed,” Sarah said, when she returned to the loft.

Though Luther commiserated with her at the doctor’s tactlessness, secretly he sensed that the doctor was accurate in his projection of Sarah’s bodily dimensions some years down the road, as already her waistline was thickening. Shallow as it was, Luther at was disconcerted that she was not as striking as she had been when they first met.

The doctor could not have anticipated Sarah’s radical response to his forecast. Out with Palace of Joy special steak. No more pizza or ice cream or chocolate cake. No more sesame noodles. In with a dozen boiled shrimp, two cups of yogurt, and three boiled eggs per day. So her crash diet continued, into a second month. Gone the puffiness in her face and the ballooning waist. The transformation was stunning. She took on the appearance of a wan and fragile—and very sexy—waif.

In this time as well, a woman from the Edgerton Foundation, in Madison, Wisconsin, visited the loft to consider Sarah’s work for a possible grant. The trust fund money would last only a year more at most, and Luther had encouraged Sarah to apply.

Why? Why did you do that, Luther? We will not thrash you should you speak less than the truth, but we have the expectation that you will rise to the occasion.

I will tell you why. Because she had fallen into a hole back in that ruinous fifth year competition at the Boston Museum School, when the Prince of Darkness was holding sway and driving her down to the domain of death itself. That is why. I told her to apply precisely because I did not believe in the work she was producing there in the loft. That enormous stuffed canvas sculpture looked like nothing so much as a giant turd or her father's dingus. She was lost and fading. The signposts providing direction had vanished, hidden by a blizzard of doubt. In my perversity I held out hope that a lady from the suburbs of Madison could rescue her even as I suspected that she would hasten Sarah's demise. Why? Because if I had lost faith and Sarah had lost faith, then this shift had instantly been communicated to the lady from the Midwest. Sarah's connection to me had finally afflicted her with the loser's taint.

What else, Luther? What else? Do not dilly-dally. Do not shilly-shally. Do not go that route with us.

Other forces for her demise were accelerating. Despite my self-flagellating manner, a ruse to keep you from the happiness I was oftentimes experiencing, I was in the ascendant, if the attention I was receiving from this woman Marge and from Dov Drosky himself meant anything. Perhaps I was sensing that my time had come. After all, I had the structure of the writing program while school life was over for Sarah and she was on her own.

Go on with your narrative. We will be watching you. Of that you can be sure.

This woman from the Edgerton Foundation. It grieved Luther to hear that she was cold and proper and that flecks of metal bit into Sarah's face when the woman deigned to speak at all. Altogether the woman reached new heights of haughtiness in casting a dismissive eye at Sarah's offerings—paintings, prints, her canvas sculpture.

“We will have to wait and see if she was truly an agent of death and destruction,” Luther said. The waiting was not long. A letter came within a month informing Sarah that she would not, alas, be a recipient of a foundation grant, causing Sarah to dream that she was being buffeted by cold winds on an arid, desolate plain under the gaze of a steel gray sky that gave new meaning to the word infinity.

Luther had a dream of his own in this period. He was in a small town and had not paid his bill at the hotel, as he had no money. The townspeople sought to shame him. The usual treatment. Men, women, and children jeered and hurled rotten tomatoes as he passed by. The spectacle of four youths urinating on a bum passed out in a fetal position in a doorway the night before while their pink Cadillac idled calmly revealed the harsh character of the town. They nonchalantly hosed down his hair, his eyes, his beard, and directed their stream into his ears and open mouth, as if they were idly chatting while standing at restroom urinals. Luther had seen enough. He grabbed the string end of a big red balloon and let it take him away.

Some dreams, at least in part, came from real life, Luther could say, because he had one night witnessed, outside Umberto's Clam House, the sons of Joey Bag of Doughnuts Gonsofuerto showing similar disrespect to a drunk passed out in the doorway.

Luther got nowhere when he remonstrated with Marge about her phone call to the loft. She simply belched fire.

“You have been teasing me. You have been leading me on. You have been playing with my affections. Don’t even try to deny it, because you will only be a liar if you do. And remove that look of feigned incomprehension from your face. Remove it, I said.” In such a way that did Marge speak, seeking to bend him to her will.

But she had another and more effective tactic than fire. “You’re clearly some kind of eccentric genius,” she said, not understanding that the person she was so describing was her father, with his brilliant inventions, and not poor Luther, who struggled to put weight on the bones of his meager sentences and had just read, that evening, an undernourished story about his beloved railroad tunnel that ran under Riverside Park.

Another line was crossed that evening when Marge took him to her apartment. Such memories it brought back to enter that sturdy Riverside Drive building. The time that he and Jerry Jones-Nobleonian had turned over the fire extinguisher, the foam streaming from the nozzle and soaking the hallway as they raced down the stairs. Or the afternoon he spent with Jackie “Him-Who-Covers-His-Mouth-As-He-Snickers” Maltor, the bookstore owner’s son, who supplied him with martinis that left him passed out drunk in Jackie’s home the first time and falling down drunk in front of Luther’s building the second time. Or the homosexual man with the dyed blond hair who took him to his apartment for sex in that same building one summer night. The blue lighting in that apartment. The aquarium. The man’s aura of freedom. Luther didn’t tell her any of these things, lest she extinguish the light of love in which he viewed his childhood.

And if the line that excluded her from his past held, so too did the line against sex. She could serve him a beer, but she could not serve him herself. That much he remained clear about.

Celeste, an endless wave of minutiae keeps me from you. The past has made me its slave and would keep me from the moment. Where is it written that I must present every last detail of my existence and like a flagellant on the wearying road to Mecca whip myself bloody in the process? What can it be but an enduring concept of sin that roots me so permanently to a time that did not exist, if we are to believe that in the present is eternity to be found? There is no righting a wrong or assigning blame when an infinite number of influences from all areas of the universe are reporting simultaneously.

I had been down, going along in a grim, persevering way, imprisoned in a sense of my own mediocrity. A new professor, or writing instructor, or mentor, or whatever those people are who encourage us on the path, came into my life. And so did a woman, somewhat older than me, and with sadness in her bones. Together they gave me a lift. Once again I was in the springtime of my life; the drab winter landscape was gone. In this atmosphere of excitement, I said and did foolish things. This is not the stuff of criminality.

Nor is it criminal on my part that a quality of empathy was lacking in my relationship with Marge. Yes, I saw her wound: the mother who had left her for death when Marge was only twelve; the father who had left her for Florida and the inland waterway he cruised along in his yacht; his new wife, in whom Marge discerned a heart of stone; and the boyfriend who left her for another woman. Depression spoke loudly in her downcast face and in the tears she sometimes shed, but who would assign me responsibility for being its source? The truth was that Sarah was still at the center of my being, even if the mythology I had burdened her with was dissipating. There was no room for strong emotional connection with another woman.

The wages of sin is not death. The wages of sin are the mistakes we make and then correct. How long has it taken me to refute that sign commissioned by Auntie Eve, that verse of scripture, Romans 6:23, and how much longer will it take to emotionally assimilate the refutation?

In a state of lingering malaise Marge may have been, but it was not she who was run through by some spiky tip as threatened her that night she tried to climb the gate. She it was she who was the agent of penetration, lancing me with her words. Such was the power of her accusation that I had sought to retard her growth. Not that I felt its force all at once but over time was compelled to consider that her complaint could not be so easily dismissed as I had thought. Had I not hidden my sister Vera's books back in high school, motivated to do so by the fear that she would surpass me if I didn't? Hadn't that one act revealed my monstrous fear that she was gaining on me? And can it be said that I was an angel of light and kindness during those years Sarah attended the Boston Museum School? Would it not be fairer to say that I lived in great fear that admiration societies would spring up and draw her irreversibly away from me? And while it is said that unconditional love, that love which seeks only to give and furnishes its own reward, is merely a goal that we aspire to, and further that I must not beat myself mercilessly for falling short, the dictate that drives some of us for a perfection not our own must be acknowledged.

One night in early March Sarah put on her winter coat and headed for the door. “I need to go out,” she said.

“Out? It’s two in the morning,” Luther said, as he sat up in bed. The lights were blazing in her studio. She had been working late, reproaching him with her industry.

“I’m not going to hurt you,” Sarah said. “Please don’t worry. I’m not going back to Lane.”

“Where are you going?” he asked, unsettled not merely by the mention of the genius boyfriend’s name and the hour but her tone of innocent earnestness.

“I need to be where the air is,” Sarah said.

“There is air here.”

“This is troubled air.”

“What is troubled air?”

“You know what troubled air is, mister,” she said, taking a harder tone.

“I don’t, and I’m not mister, at least with you.” The night was dangerous, and full of depravity. Her beauty would make her a magnet.

“Are you trying to deprive me of my growth? Is that it? Are you afraid I too will be impaled on the sharp tips of the gate?”

“It’s late. That’s all,” he said, ignoring the jibe, or pretending to.

“I don’t want to hurt you. You understand that, don’t you?”

He followed her partway into her studio. The sight of it in the unflattering light dismayed him. The paint-splattered floor, which he had so carefully given two coats of forest green enamel, and the array of cans and bottles and tubes and fabrics arrayed willy-nilly on her work table with scattered sketches were in contrast with the orderly little desk and set of shelves he had in his corner of the loft. And those plain white curtains of thick cloth sagging from the twine that supported them in front of the big windows looking down on East Broadway. They didn't even fully cover the windows. The acute physical discomfort took him back to his family's apartment and the garbage cans in the kitchen overturned by the dogs—coffee grounds and banana peels and gnawed pork chop bones on the splotchy linoleum and roaches everywhere. She was a true artist; she could break the mold and embrace turbulence while he couldn't abide so much as a pencil out of place.

“You don't have to watch me. Nothing will happen to you. Sarah sat on a cot in a corner of her studio. Her coat remained on, though the loft was well heated.

“I'm not concerned about myself,” Luther said, though he wasn't sure that was true.

He returned to bed and lay there on alert, imagining her crashing through the window. Some minutes later she was at the door again.

“I'm not here to hurt you. I promise you won't get hurt. I just need to go out.”

“Go out where?” he said, springing up from the bed.

“In the air. I have to go out in the air and see my parents.”

“Your parents are asleep. They won’t be happy to be woken in the middle of the night. Let’s wait for the morning. Then you can see your parents.”

Once again he had placed himself between her and the door and grabbed her as she made a fierce effort to bull past him.

“I told you I wouldn’t hurt you. Isn’t that enough? What more do you want?”
There was fury in her voice as she struggled to break free.

The morning did come. He woke and found her asleep in her coat on the cot. She looked peaceful and childlike. A drama had begun to unfold. The anticipation of bringing her family into it filled him with excitement.

“Why would you want to bring her parents into the situation, Luther? Why would you want to concern them?”

“You needn’t ask why when you already have the answer. I had thinness in my bones and a meager quantity of flesh. I was not built for this kind of financial responsibility. I wanted to be Momma’s little helper.”

“And who would Momma be in this instance?”

“Lydia, of course. I wanted to be in the sunlight of her love with the gift I could offer; that gift being her daughter Sarah.”

“The gift of a damaged daughter?”

“Is not a daughter with a broken wing more of a gift than a daughter who has gone to the land of the dead, as Lenore had done? Am I not to be seen as a life-giver for such an act, a man choosing the light in the face of vast and complex forces?”

“Go on. Say what you need to say.”

“Do not take that tone with me. Do not do that.”

“Do what?”

“Do not suffer me to come to you. This I will not tolerate. Greet me with love or not at all. Have I made myself clear?”

“You have. Now please continue.”

“I swung into action. I suppose such a statement sounds grandiose given the simple step I took, which was to pick up the phone to put her parents on high alert as to what was coming. Yes, I’ve done it again. You can hear the drama, the self-importance, the casting of myself in an important if not heroic role. A winter wind blew through the phone when Peter picked it up. It was not merely the stiffness of his manner in saying “The Van Dine residence,” but his cold manner when I identified myself. I asked to speak with Lydia, who brought a definite warming trend to the interaction as soon as she came on the line. Recalling her reading of the collected works of Carl Jung, published by the Bollingen Press of Princeton University, I could be confident of her intuitive understanding when I said that Sarah was in distress and that we would be coming up together. That Lydia did not demand a fuller explanation or react with alarm suggests that my confidence in her was well placed. As to why Sarah did not speak for herself on the phone, let me just say that at the least both Lydia and Peter might have suffered befuddlement if Sarah came on the line and said she was in need of going into the air or made other baffling utterances. But do not say I was holding her back, as I have grown sensitive to that accusation.”

“Have no fear of that.”

“The ride uptown was uncomfortable. Sarah made it a point to go up against people in the subway with words. A man asked me for the time in the Canal Street station and she replied, ‘I’m so lonesome, Uncle Albert,’ provoking his annoyance. Had he been a more dangerous sort, he might have thrown us on the subway tracks. I suspect that whatever genuine suffering she was experiencing, she was also giving herself the freedom to be a cute little girl with a streak of eccentric freshness.”

Celeste, understand something, please. The previous exchange was not with you. I would never be short with you in this new life we have together, but there are times when I am and must be short with this God of my understanding, if I am to call him that. Even God must accept the need for discipline, as his history of distraction shows. OK, I have gone pompous, or perhaps just silly. This I understand. I will try to pull it back.

What I had intended to say was that Sarah’s parents were world class in the love department. For them there was no life without love, no sacrifice they would not make for their children. You could say that the removal of financial insecurity from their lives made this most sublime of emotions more readily accessible to them, that is, they did not have to get into the down and dirty like the rest of us. But that was money earned, if not by them, by Lydia’s forbears, prodigious in their entrepreneurial brilliance, the product they manufactured a staple of all those who owned a fountain pen. Peter had not coveted wealth. He had followed his own star to Harvard and Lydia, still at Radcliffe, had come calling on him with those pebbles thrown up at the window of his boarding house room, as I have previously mentioned. She had come to worship at his mighty throne. She did not foresee the radical nature of his mind, that he would dig and dig and unearth the lie of America for all those who wished to see in a scathing examination of the metaphysics of American history, and in doing so expose the driving force of these founders of our new republic. And why? Why would he launch himself in such an alienating, extreme way, rejecting the moderate path of the Arthur Schlesingers and his ilk? Because he was built for a truth all his own, a truth that would leave him all alone. It was that for which he had been made.

But these years later he was not alone, and Lydia, who was not built for aloneness, was not alone. They were in the presence of me, increasingly in the custody of the bottle, and their gone-dark daughter.

A sense of relief and gratitude filled Luther as he and Sarah passed the doorman and entered her family's building. With so much uncertainty, the marble lobby offered the reliability and permanence of a government institution. And the warm greeting that followed when Lydia answered the bell assured Luther that it had not been a mistake to reach out to her. If Lydia noticed the mocking, impudent tone in which Sarah said, "Hello, mother," she did not let on. In the living room she chatted easily about Camp and a possible trip she and Peter might take in the fall, her one-sided conversation so seemingly oblivious of the fact that Sarah was sitting on the sofa staring at her apathetically that Luther began to wonder if possibly Lydia was unaware that things weren't quite right with her daughter. But as Lydia's chatter went on, Luther decided that she was merely circling the drama and that her strategy was to put Sarah at ease rather than confront the matter head on. Perhaps the master, Carl Jung himself, was working through her. But strategy or no strategy, Sarah herself dispelled the charade when Lydia asked if she might like something to drink.

“Your days of giving me poison are over,” Sarah replied flatly.

Like a punch in the face Lydia received Sarah’s words.

“I don’t understand,” Lydia said.

“You don’t understand that the milk you fed me at birth was poisoned?”

“Sarah,” Lydia gasped.

“Don’t Sarah me. Don’t even think of Sarah-ing me,” Sarah said.

Peter had entered the living room in time to hear the exchange, but being the tactician he was, he kept his troops off the field of battle. A scuffle about mother’s milk was not one for him to enter. His intense scrutiny of his daughter suggested a perspective was being gained as to the nature of her malady that words would conceivably be fruitless in lessening.

“Is there something else that you might like?” Lydia asked.

“Air. Can you get me some air?”

It was not long after this exchange that Lydia swung into action with a phone call to Dr. Edelbaum, from whom she received a referral for a psychiatrist who would give her daughter back her mind and give Lydia back her daughter. Not that she could ever have Sarah as her daughter in the way that she had had Lenore. Sarah was her shadow, the perpetually dark side of her moon. But Lydia could love the darkness. She could do that.

Celeste, there is ailment and then there is ailment. Can you know what it is to lose a child, and be threatened with the loss of another? Can you? We must love Lydia. We must bow down to her as the Spartan woman Peter declared her to be. Well, I must, anyway. I cannot continue to resent my betters, those born with a more robust endowment than my own.

Did I tell you that following the destruction of the Twin Towers, I canceled my planned trip to Europe and instead rented a car, thinking I would see New York State and thus avoid the anxiety of international travel? I was afraid. That was the simple truth. I let those terrorists influence my decision, just as they hoped to do. A day or two before I picked up the car, I was sitting alone in my apartment when an image came to me of Peter and Lydia and it hit me that they were gone, gone, and I had never told them that I loved them, nor had I ever really expressed my gratitude for all they had done for me or the important role they had played in my life. I found myself weeping as I hadn't since my mother passed away some years before. I was weeping not only for them but for myself and the passage of time and all that had been lost. Then an image of that swing attached to the huge oak tree just up the way from the little wooden bridge over the brook came to mind. I suppose that swing represented a lost time I could never get back to, except in my dreams. But I was crying for America too, because America, in spite of its transgressions, was in its own way an innocent. As you may remember, I shared with you a while before 9/11 that I found myself one day in a state of terror. A sense of the excruciating vulnerability of our country came to me. A surprise attack was imminent, not from a network of stateless terrorists, but possibly from China, which was prepared to annihilate us with nuclear weapons. For all our power, we had come to be perceived as soft, afraid to mix it up. Our success, our indulgent lifestyle, had led us to this state of unpreparedness. We hadn't properly gauged the ruthlessness of other regimes. I suppose it will appear that I am attributing to myself some psychic power and thus am guilty of boasting. But you shouldn't assume that it is a welcome thing to be given a glimpse of the future, particularly when that future is a dark one.

Now Celeste, I will tell you, the flags of America were flying that fall, and while the red, white, and blue has been a stirring source of pride to me at various times in my life (none more poignantly than in Nashville, where a huge such flag gently ripples behind Ronee Blakely as she heartbreakingly sings "My Idaho Home"), I must report to you that, as I was heading up to the Catskill Mountains and beyond in my rental car, it became an affliction to my eye and a torment to my mind to see that same emblem of our country hanging from the private houses and stores that I passed. When too much attention is called to a thing, then that thing is lost, lost. That is what those flags meant—that our country was but a memory, a stupid flag, and I began to pray that if I just continued to drive and drive, I would come to a clearing and be free of this emoting madness.

Now Celeste, I had my pilgrimage to the past to make, if I am to be honest; atonement must have its day even for those such as me who have rejoiced in separation and made it the driving force in our lives, given the death trap of family we perceived ourselves to be born into. This shift can seem impossible, but nothing is impossible in the holy instant when love comes shining forth and takes its rightful place. We must give our due to our betters, or if not our betters, our mentors. And so I took the Kingston turnoff on I-87 and stopped in Woodstock. No, I did not go to the Bear Café, on Tinker Street, where Sarah and I had hitchhiked with Pam Becker in the spring of 1967, there to wait for Peter to arrive in his big black Chrysler for the last leg of the trip, as darkness had fallen by then and the cars on the road were particularly savage in their snubbing of us. The smell of burning wood was in the air and this sensory reminder of a finished chapter in my life almost brought me to my knees in grief. I took my pain into a nearby eatery where all was not as I had hoped it would be. What I am saying is fastidiousness did not reign in this establishment. Flecks of dried food on the fork and eggs swimming in grease and a slovenly waiter providing table service did not win my trust. In that moment I understood that a campaign of national excellence would have to be mounted, as it could not be trusted to be summoned from within, and sensed anew that those outside the generating power of New York City and such metropolises were in danger of a torpor not our own. A woodsy environment it might be, but one conducive to daytime TV and all-around sleepiness.

I pushed on. Sleepy Hollow. Mount Tremper. Bearsville. Shady. Phoenicia. Like local stops on the IRT they stayed in my mind, as we don't forget paradise once we have experienced it. Not that Camp was paradise in terms of the happiness it summoned, as strife and discord and rancor were often in its place, but in the ideal of placid beauty it aspired to. We must honor our past and those who loved us in the way they could, and not apply a scorched earth policy to all we have left behind, as if to burn the evidence that we had even been there. At some point we must stand and have the humility to say, This was the best I could do in the moment I was living then. These reserves of power we give our shame must not go on.

All at once the past I held at bay through rounds of daily meditation was breaking clear of such spiritual restraints and calling me, calling me to a tortured longing that nothing can ever satisfy but a return to the holy instant we have temporarily abandoned. The fall sun was falling fast as I followed the curve of the Esopus River, spotting the occasional fly fisherman in his waders. By the time I came to the straightaway stretch of Route 28 heading toward Shandaken, darkness had come. Though there were reports of growth in the area and increasing subdivision of the land, the roadside had not become the commercial strip I had feared.

Anticipation was succeeded by fear when I came to the turnoff. Slowly I drove up the hollow road, fear of the unknown and the past only growing with the car's progress. Some avenger in the night would come for me with Norman Bates-like fury, a carving knife in hand. And who else would it be but Jeffrey, the Van Dines' only son. I had heard he was struggling and that he was still living in the small house that had been built for him along the hollow road.

By this time Camp had been sold to New York State with an agreement that the property would not be developed. This commitment to its conservation did not bring the feeling of comfort I had hoped for as I cautiously crossed the little bridge over the brook. I got out and explored with the aid of a small flashlight, as the property was completely dark. The pool was empty, the walls and floor showing big cracks. The gazebo next to it was falling apart, and an inspection of the main house itself showed the same neglect, including broken steps on the front porch.

My fear turned to panic when, down the slope of the hill, a light went on in the new barn, where I had sequestered myself years before. I froze anticipating the sound of the big wooden door sliding open or seeing a completely deranged Jeffrey appear in one of the many windows. The mystery remained when a minute passed without any such occurrence, but if I thought the atmosphere could not grow more ominous, I was wrong. It was everything for me not to scream and pray to God for the morning to come when the light went out. Now he would come for me, the berserk avenger of my sordid past. After sinking his sharpened knife deep in my chest, he would hack me into pieces and scatter my remains throughout the mountains. The fear that immobilized me was the ancient fear that rooted me to the spot in my childhood dreams even though I had an enormous lead on my pursuer. He will go easier on me if I don't try to escape. Such was my thinking. In the minutes that passed I had to bear the torture of waiting for Jeffrey, the youngest of the Van Dine brood. Who else would have the pathological structure for such a deed? Unloved, unlovable, the least gifted of the offspring, a boy I had shown little interest in and a rival for his sister Sarah's affection, why would he not turn his rage on me?

But he did not show his face on that evening, nor did any other with homicidal intent, and yet, as I pulled away in the rental car I finally mustered the courage to return to, I was certain this least of the children, unable to leave, had made it his domain.

"You have made an assertion about this young man Jeffrey Van Dine. Would you care to tell us how you come to speak in such a manner about him?"

“Least is least and greatest is greatest. He was a boy with feebleness in his bones and no aptitude for anything but soreness. His father pitied him and his mother ignored him. Bard College, in Annandale-on-Hudson, took him when no other would, and his junior year he spent abroad at some obscure school in England. He returned with a pretty Irish girlfriend from the same college, and when they married, Peter had a house built for Jeffrey on a property just a ways down the hollow. Jeffrey did not build the house himself, nor did he contribute anything to the house’s interior structure either. He could only stand to the side while contractors and craftsmen came and went. His wife had a sharp tongue and soon zeroed in on his ineptness, and then found townies to sleep with as a prelude to leaving him. She knew a dead-end scene with a dullard when she saw one.”

“Where is the love here?”

“Yes. Where is the love? It is where you can find it. It is in every look of significance a woman gives you, whether she be in revenge mode or otherwise. And such a look was given me by the wife of young Jeffrey on the terrace at Camp many years ago. But her Irish ire was too much for me, and even I couldn’t summon the brazenness for such a romp in the fields of infidelity, sensing she would hurl a spike through my heart as she had through Jeffrey’s. To ‘know’ a woman may be among a man’s greatest desires, but a web of malice conspicuously displayed will not be an enticement.”

“You are troubled, my son. You carry a pain you can’t own.”

“Stop it.”

“You are like a cat doomed to forever attempt to clean itself in the wrong places.”

“Stop it, I said.”

At this point Dr. Milton Frodkey entered Sarah's life. A graduate of Yeshiva University, in Washington Heights, and Columbia Medical School, he had the credentials to heal Sarah's ailing mind. Such was the determination of Dr. Edelbaum when Lydia turned to him with her phone call for assistance on that day Luther and Sarah arrived at the Van Dines' door. That Aryan aristocracy was kneeling at the throne of Jewish intellect was not lost on Luther, though later he had to discard that assumption when Lydia was heard to say, "I would have preferred that Sarah be treated by a Jungian analyst than someone in the Freudian fold." So much was said; so little was understood.

Dr. Frodkey found time for an emergency consultation that afternoon. As the cab sped along the Eighty-sixth Street transverse through Central Park, Sarah sought to open the back door and fling herself out. The savage energy she applied to reaching her goal required the maximum resistance Luther could muster from where he sat beside her.

"What the hell is going on back there?" the cabbie shouted. It was not an easy question for Luther or the Van Dines or Sarah, for that matter, to answer.

Dr. Frodkey was a square-faced man with a head of cropped wiry hair. Luther was struck by his powerful physique—the barrel chest and running back's thighs and thick, strong neck. The slight smile he gave them from behind his heavy desk suggested that he was a man confident of his powers, and why wouldn't he? The man had a medical degree from Columbia University and a well-appointed office on Fifth Avenue, just a block north of the Guggenheim Museum.

Confident the doctor may have been, but he was also confused. “Which one of you is here to see me?” he asked, having taken in his four visitors.

“Well, Doctor Frodkey,” Lydia began.

“Butt out, lady. He’s mine, all mine. Got it?” Sarah said. Turning back from her rebuffed mother to Dr. Frodkey, Sarah said, “What have you got to show me, Doc?” Though Luther couldn’t be sure, there appeared to be on Sarah’s face a salacious grin, as if she were capitalizing on her mysterious malady to give herself the right to complete freedom of expression. And yet he wasn’t willing or able to denigrate her obvious suffering by labeling it histrionic, as he could with the monotone monologues of his sister Naomi. No, fakery was the domain of the Garatdjians. Authentic suffering he still reflexively reserved for those with a superior endowment than his own family had been gifted with.

Nor was Dr. Frodkey dismissive. Hearing from the Van Dines that Sarah had sought to bull her way out of a speeding cab, he shortly recommended that she be admitted to Gracie Square Hospital for further evaluation and treatment.

At the hospital, she had another truth bomb, this one for Luther, as a nurse was leading her away. “I’m sorry to hurt you by saying this, but I have always loved Lane. You came in only a poor second, which means you didn’t come in at all. Forgive me.”

The humiliation might have been less had Peter and Lydia not been present to hear her declaration. “She doesn’t know what she is saying,” Lydia said. Her innate kindness had no healing effect. If anything, her words only worsened his mood, as they were offered as a balm for the wound that Sarah had obviously inflicted. Besides, why try to lessen his pain? He deserved such treatment from Sarah, after all he had inflicted on her. After all, what was he but a potential murderer who had interfered with the one great love of Sarah's life?

That afternoon, Ned Fuller, the architect, was climbing the stairs as Luther entered the building. Though Luther had hardly spoken a word to the man, he now began to relate the events that had transpired since the night before. So desperate was he to bridge all differences with Ned with his sad account that Ned asked him in. But Ned had moves of his own to counter the personal drama gushing from Luther. He reached for a small mechanical monkey and after winding the key on its back, set the monkey on the floor. The light that came into Ned's face and the giddy glee with which he clapped his hands and slapped his thighs was almost a match for the wild performance the monkey gave before toppling into stillness even if Ned's unspoken message was a more sober and serious one: come to me with your tale of cheap sorrow and this is what you will get. Being from Texas, Ned wanted to share with Luther, in an oblique way, his understanding of what a man is. A man did not go the dinky route with a tale of woe as his calling card. A man laughed in the face of pain and said, with full defiance, is this all you can show me?

Well, there were mysteries continually unfolding and Luther, understanding he was a part of life, further understood that he had to give his full attention when the next person, whoever that might be, came down the road.

Ned did not hit Luther anymore than he needed to. After setting him straight, he invited Luther to a party he was throwing that night.

Luther had an idea for his own party: a six-pack of tallboys from the grocery store and a bottle of Spanish wine from Shing Lo's liquor store down on the corner. It was not lost on Luther that Shing Lo no longer talked him up. Shing Lo had no need to. He understood that Luther would keep coming back. Some nights Luther just didn't want to walk the few extra blocks and take his business to the liquor store north of Canal Street. Well, Shing Lo could lay his knowing smile on him if that's what he needed to do, and Ned Fuller could talk through his toys if he needed to. Luther had gotten the goods and was bringing them home to an empty loft where he could do himself up right. Something monumental had happened. His love had been brought low and Luther needed to drink himself straight about that.

He called his mother and gave her the news that afternoon and heard her say "Is that right? I pray the doctors don't give her the pills as they have given to Naomi. Pills and more pills are all they have to offer her. Is that right? Is that normal? Is that the Lord working through them or something else?"

The flame of resentment flared in Luther on hearing the sullying comparison of Sarah with Naomi, as if his mother was attempting to breach the wall of separateness Luther had erected between his girlfriend and his family. To compare his flower with the tawdry spectacle of his histrionic sister. It was not right. It was just not right. But the beer, and then the wine, seemed to douse the fire that had been building and he returned to a state of borderline weepiness, elevating Sarah's plight into a tragedy that was as much his as hers, given their closeness.

Ned Fuller's party, which had seemed beyond him to attend at the time of the invitation, became more of a possibility as he continued to drink. In fact, hearing the sound of soft music come up through the floorboards that evening, he found himself brimming with confidence and eager for social connection. His tears were a thing of the past; he now heard the night calling to him.

The party was a sedate affair. Only a handful had gathered by the time he arrived; mostly, they seemed to be members of the same architectural firm where Ned was employed. Drawn to a blond woman sitting alone on the sofa, Luther presented himself as Ned's neighbor and a writer. He told her of his white line continue project, how it was separating into different parts, and of the colors of paper—light blue, pale green, and pink—for his drafts. "I will know I am in the homestretch when my typewriter keys strike white bond. Mind you, the colored papers are bond as well, but I'm sure you will understand what I mean."

In his initial enthusiasm for the woman, Luther had not seen the carapace of hardness in which she was encased, nor that she had been born with a governor on her soul and lived in the province of calculation and caution, that a methodology had to be employed before she could move forward. He had not considered that the exactitude she brought to her profession as an architect might be in play in the social arena and that, a modest sampling of his repertoire having been received, she was already dead certain that the only movement she would offer would be away from this young man she had marked as predatory, egotistical, and useless.

“Is that right?” she said, the brief question meant to hold his foolishness up to the light and stall his pursuit. But on this night he was deaf to her subtle signal. What he saw obscured what he heard.

“How about you? Do you write, too?”

“What kind of writing are you referring to?”

“Fiction. Poetry. Do you have your own designs on immortality?”

“I’m afraid my concerns are more immediate and day to day.”

Seeing her look beyond him to the new arrivals Ned was greeting at the door, Luther sought to lock her in for the evening. “Would you like to come upstairs? I could show you where I live,” Luther said, only then realizing Sarah had been omitted from his conversation and now the woman would see that he did not live alone. But there was no need for concern, as the woman wasn’t going anywhere, at least with him.

“I don’t think so. It’s been nice meeting you,” she said, getting up to join the others.

If she meant that last as a hard slap, she had gotten the job done. Now were all eyes on Luther, and his social skinniness was showing at depth. The crying need arose to put some weight on his social bones. He could not have the death-dealing spectacle of him stripped to his aloneness for the gathered to see. I will get Marge on the line. She will be the cover I need for the thinness I am showing. These were the exact words that came to him, and after asking permission of socially engaged Ned Fuller, he picked up the phone and put out the call for immediate assistance. To her credit, Marge responded favorably to his plea. In a jiffy did she traverse Manhattan in her Marge mobile to stand, in her trademark jeans and hiking boots, in the loft of Luther's downstairs neighbor.

Luther was not a friend to Marge in the way that a friend should be. He did not sing her praises or give any recognition to her finer attributes in his mind, let alone directly. But seeing Ned in thrall as he greeted her at the door caused Luther to acknowledge why men without his baggage might find her attractive. That manly attire aside, she did have a pretty face and figure, her long black hair had a luster that could not be denied, and she showed an appealing openness to life and new people. Still, this newfound awareness of her attributes was less cause for admiration than for fear. Luther had expected her to be at his side, not his neighbor's, and he could only watch in horror as Ned appeared to claim her for his own. Not only had nuclear weapons been placed on the island of Cuba, but he, Luther, had aided in their installation.

He saw something else that evening. Marge had staying power and substance, the ability to present herself and also show a genuine interest in others. By comparison, he felt himself ungrounded, a flitting flighty thing, a mosquito pricking people for their blood and then moving on. He saw why, apart from Sarah, he was essentially friendless.

When Ned was distracted by even newer guests, Luther whisked Marge away on the pretext that he needed air, but she didn't go easily. "I was just settling in to a nice conversation with that friend of yours," she protested, as they headed down the stairs.

"Give me the keys. I'm driving," he said, perpetuating the evening's theme of lunacy.

"Do you even have a license?" Marge asked.

He did and he didn't. He had surrendered his antipathy to motorized transport sufficient to take a road test in a driver's ed car, which he failed, but then passed a similar test on his brother's motorcycle. Upon renewal some years later, he was astonished to discover that New York State had mistakenly issued him a license to drive both a vehicle and a motorcycle, a gift he had no intention of giving back, as by now he was certain that he was no more capable of passing the vehicle road test than he was of gaining a stellar score on the SAT.

"I'm fully licensed," Luther said. Even drunk he wasn't imprudent enough to give Marge any evidence of his incompetence. Things had been out of control in Ned Fuller's loft, but now there he was in the driver's seat as he put the car in gear and felt it lurch into the sparse traffic on East Broadway before turning up the Bowery.

"You're so crazy," Marge said. "You remind me so much of my friend Sally. If you met her, you would understand."

"How about tonight?"

"It's Saturday night. We can't just show up at her door unannounced."

"Let's do just that," Luther said. Such a soft, cushioned ride, even over potholes, the car provided. They had left the tightness of the avenue behind, and were now sailing over the wider thoroughfare of Third Avenue.

"Well, I guess we might. We're headed in the right direction. But it's really crazy."

Within minutes they were in the vestibule of an old East Side building and Marge was ringing the buzzer under Sally's brass mailbox. A feeling of fear came over Luther.

The false confidence and bravado were gone, and he was left with the prospect of meeting a stranger on the basis of nothing more than a drunken whim. He could easily imagine coming undone in the presence of this woman and of she and Marge discussing him the next day. The conclusion they would both arrive at would not be a flattering one. Marge had invaded, at Luther's invitation, his turf, and now he had invaded hers. And yet the net result had led to extreme discomfort.

"She's not answering," Marge said, and Luther tried to hide his relief as they returned to her car. His recklessness had not yet run its course. In backing out of the tight parking space, he knocked over several garbage cans lined up against the curb, and drove off without setting them right.

"You really are crazy," Marge said. Eccentric. Crazy. It was mainly these qualities that drew her admiration.

At Lexington Avenue, he pulled over and handed her the keys. "That's enough," he said.

"Enough of what, Luther?"

"Enough of me," he said, as he opened the door.

"You really are nuts," Marge called to him, but he didn't turn to respond.

He had come to expect a degree of guilt and remorse after a night of drinking, but the next morning was especially hard. He came to on the box-spring astonished by the degree of his betrayal. What kind of lunacy was that to bring a woman he feared and who had an interest in him into the very building where he lived on the night of the day his girlfriend had been admitted to a mental hospital for an unnamed psychiatric disorder?

And then to drunk-drive her big car through the streets of Manhattan and badger her to call on her crazy girlfriend?

He was pondering this pathetic madness when the phone rang. As if running on the energy of the night before, Marge was on the line, only her tone was not light and admiring.

“Did I not tell you once before not to interfere with my growth? Did I not?”

“You are knotting me up with your nots this morning,” Luther replied.

“Don’t mess with me, Luther. Don’t do it. Stay focused. You commandeer my car. You coerce me to barge in on my girlfriend. You knock down garbage cans with your drunken driving. All this I can forgive. But I don’t forgive you for trying to snatch my happiness from me, and don’t deny that’s exactly what you were doing or I will come down and tear your face off. Remember—I know where you live now.”

“What are you talking about?”

“I am talking about Ned. That’s what I am talking about. You whisked me out because you saw that he and I were beginning to spark.”

“Spark? What is this spark?”

“We were connecting, Luther, and you couldn’t handle it. Ergo, you had to move us apart.”

“Ergo minus the ‘r’ spells ego.”

“Nice try, Luther. Nice try. But here’s what you do. You give me his number and his last name, unless you want me to make the long trip down to East Broadway myself.”

Her threat worked well. Luther gave her Ned's last name. "You'll have to get his number from directory assistance. He hasn't been here long enough to be in the white pages."

"Good boy, Luther. Good boy," Marge said, and hung up.

Now, Celeste, what are we to say about such a development? That Luther G. opened the door to his own destruction when he called Marge the night before and told her to come on down? Or that he opened the door to his own liberation? Luther G. had no insight into his life to offer. He had only his own folly/wisdom and the inevitable remorse that followed.

What Luther didn't say was that while at the party he had called another, and if he did not speak the word love when it came to her, he did speak the word desire. One night some months before he had been at the bar on Spring Street where, after a few drinks, he made eye contact with a young woman seated with her girlfriend in the table area, and so he joined them. She spent her days working at OTB after graduating from the Chicago Institute of Art. She said she was a conceptual artist, explaining, when Luther asked, that ideas had a place in art and that the idea could even be art. Luther nodded as if he understood and said, "Are you by any chance a friend of Gertrude Stein? You don't look like Gertrude Stein but you feel like Gertrude Stein. Do you have any idea what I might mean by that?"

The young woman laughed. Her name was Gillian Brower.

“Gertrude Stein is God. Literally,” Gillian Brower said.

“Then I may be in trouble,” Luther replied, thinking of Melanctha and Gertrude Stein’s understanding of the railroads and the powerless men drawn to them.

“How do you mean?”

“I would need to gather my thoughts and overcome the shiver of fear that went through me when you asked. All I will say for now is that it has to do with Samuel Beckett. ‘I am in my mother’s room. It’s I who live there now.’ Shaping forces are collaborating on my destiny, and those two, from way over yonder in gay Paree, are playing a powerful role.”

The other young woman, her beauty being on a higher level than Gillian’s, maintained her reserve. Beyond her name, Chardonnay Flower, she said little. Luther, in his semi-drunkenness, had a wild beating in his heart for her, as he did for all upper echelon women in whom beauty and intelligence were fused. She too was an artist, a Cooper Union kind, thus verifying for Luther that she was in the realm of the intellectually gifted.

A man approached their table. Luther recognized him as the author of several books of light fiction. Rock Golden’s gray hair testified to his older age and his handlebar mustache and Mr. Green Jeans duds made him right for the Sixties but not the new decade. He was a shy man hungry in the night for flesh but unable to ask for it in other than an oblique manner.

“Are you two young women lesbians?” he inquired, but they did not take the bait. When cold stares didn’t drive him away, they stood and broke into song, drawing on the repertoire of the fat-lipped one, Mick Jagger. Their baby was obsolete. Their old-fashioned baby was out of time. So they sang.

The redness in Rock Golden's face showed he understood the import of their words. He headed back to the bar for a refill of his glass of Scotch. Luther could only wonder what it meant that a published author, even of flimsy works of fiction, should be lonely in the night and not find the companionship he was seeking, and whether he too was scavenging for scraps of affection like that poor man.

But on this night Luther didn't have to scavenge for anything. The table was soon swarmed by Chardonnay's suitors, young and vigorous, and Gillian Brower found herself settling for Luther as a mediocre but acceptable option. They walked west and then north to Houston Street, where Luther's attention was drawn to a small crowd outside a leather bar. Two men were in a faceoff on the street. The men were young and beautiful, but they had gone to the place of impending violence. Perhaps words had been spoken inside the bar after the fifth vodka and tonic. One was in full leather regalia and held an open switchblade of terrifying length. The other had been liquored up into a machismo state. The cool night was no deterrent to the removal of his shirt so gawkers could take in his bronzed and muscled chest. Luther was back in those childhood dreams of Mexican peasants facing off with knives on a dusty village street. Believing his horror to be Gillian's as well, he led her away, every cell in his body braced for the cry of pain that did not come.

"Why did you pull me away?" she asked.

He froze on hearing her question. A crushing dismay threatened to send him to the pavement. "I was pulling myself away."

"Why?"

"Why? I was afraid."

"What were you afraid of?"

"Nothing is more disturbing to me than the thought of a steel blade penetrating flesh. I must not be witness to such a thing, even in my dreams."

"Why are you so focused on that?"

"Because murderers are not human. They have gone to another place. They walk around as humans, but they are not one of us. The truth is that there are many humans who are not humans, not only murderers but many others. And yet our eyes are too often not discerning." They had come to her building at the west end of Broome Street. All the while they had walked he had heard the calculator in her mind assessing whether she should have him over. He could only wonder now if his patter had sunk his chances. But she surprised him.

"I agree," she simply said.

An old woman all in black who wore the affect of disapproval on her wrinkled face had come outside and now dared them to break through the force field of her judgment. Gillian took him by the hand and led him forward through the front door. No maledictions were heard and yet they were acutely felt, like a body blow, by Luther. I must have my own life. I must not be broken by the indictments of the elderly. So Luther thought as he followed Gillian up the three flights of stairs.

Celeste, I made love to her that night, or as much love as a man such as I could muster. She was not just anybody but a young woman of quality and not the kind to become a habitu  of the bar on Spring Street, or any bar for that matter. She had movement in her mind as she fixed you with big appraising eyes. She wore her hair short, extremely short, as Gertrude Stein would have done, and showed herself that first night in the fetching attire of black tights and a skirt. I was still at a point in my relatively young life when I could forgive the blemishes and deformities of the flesh. That her head was bordering on massive for a woman of her modest height I certainly saw, as I did the threat of thickness in her thighs, but I was not yet ruled by the all-encompassing deficits of the physical. I had not come to that place of revulsion with the creaturely nature of our beings that would require me to be bound to my aloneness and constant focus on my breath. Quite the opposite. I was in a riot of desire for the things of the flesh. When she figured out, after our third meeting, that I was living with someone, she called me a bastard, but the word was not spoken without affection. She had measured my deficiencies by then and saw clearly the areas in which I was lacking, including the realm of sexual performance. Progressively, it became more difficult to achieve and maintain an erection. Possibly, guilt was a suppressant, but maybe I simply could not feel at home in her. It is not a good thing when completion cannot be achieved; alternatives are sought, but the cloud of failure hangs heavy, at least it did with me.

Spontaneously I would call her, often from the bar after a few drinks and the awareness that no new adventure awaited me on that night. In that sense, she quickly became an afterthought, as had Susan Plecik, the Sullivan Street girl who scared me with her knowledge of what intaglio meant when I had no idea. Or not exactly an afterthought, but someone I had to go forward from before I could go back, as I continued to be driven by the compulsion for new territory to explore. Some nights she would let me come to her but some nights she would turn me away, no matter how painful my longing was for her after a drunken and futile vigil in the bar for the next one.

She had the honesty thing going in her to a degree that I couldn't possess. "Some people just wait until after midnight to come to the bar so they can pretend they had someplace else to be on New Year's Eve," she said, when I called her some minutes after New Year from that very bar, saying I had just dropped in. What she was saying was that she saw me better than I saw myself and that I could not hide from her the wretched reality that I was one of the unwanted on this earth. So it will come as no surprise to you that Gillian rebuffed me the evening I called her from Ned Fuller's party in the hope that she would be impressed to find that in fact I did have friends and many of them and that I didn't always have to be calling from the bar on Spring Street.

"Would you like something to read?" Luther asked Sarah, when he called her the day following her hospitalization and Ned Fuller's party.

"War and Peace. Samuel Beckett." The emphatic nature of her reply, he slowly came to understand, meant that no reading material was required, war and peace being the condition of her mind and Samuel Beckett the insanity sandwich she had already eaten.

She was kept in the hospital for six weeks. During that time Luther returned to the railroad yard, sometimes during the day with his camera and other times at night, with a pint or half-pint bottle of Old Mr. Boston blackberry-flavored brandy.

One night, on the subway, he had encountered Lance Whiting, his upstairs neighbor in the loft building. Lance had pulled from the pocket of his sweater vest a half-pint bottle of just that brandy and took a nip. And so it struck Luther that if Lance, with so many marbles in his handsome head, could go about openly with alcohol, then so could he, because Lance Whiting had Ivy League credentials, as did Dr. Dressler, who had given him a green light to drink. No one understood better than Luther that not only did excellence have to have its say but that it had to be listened to as well, because what purpose did excellence serve if it couldn't command his ear? Besides, wasn't a green light always a green light, not a red light or an orange light? And since the sighting of Lance Whiting having his subway car taste, he had read of Tom Paine, back in Colonial times, writing his pamphlet Common Sense with brandy as his muse. So there it was. Brandy had turned on the lights in Lance Whiting as it had turned them on in Colonial Tom Paine, and so why wouldn't it do the same for Luther?

The blackberry-flavored brandy tasted like liquid candy. Luther was happy to have this portable new friend and would nip from the bottle as he watched the occasional freight come and go and the rail workers as they went about their tasks with a slow sense of purpose. There was a great drama going on on this earth and it all had to be recorded lest it be swept away by the tides of time. And whatever that drama was, it had its personal element, not only his continuing thievery in the renting office but more centrally, the situation rising to possible tragedy of Sarah's breakdown. A great woman was being brought low by an affliction she hadn't asked for, and it left him weepy that this should be so.

Celeste, in this time two things happened. One, a sense of my own mortality came to me. I saw myself laid out on a mortuary slab. For a full day did this image persist. Evidently, I was fully deceased and naked and lying face up. No autopsy was performed; no implements invaded my person. In fact, my body lay there unattended in a dim light. The constancy of the image wore me down, and yet I would be wandering into the realm of the histrionic were I to claim that the image caused me considerable distress or any distress at all. While it was not comfortable or pleasant to see myself in such a state, someone was delivering a message, not necessarily that the men who walked the path of remorseless violence were approaching and that my demise was imminent but that death is a part of life and this needed to be understood, and so there was a quality of appreciation in my mental state, as if a mysterious benefactor was presenting me with a gift. At no time did I have a sense that malevolence or intimidation was the purpose. What is, is—that was the purpose. And if I experienced no sadness of terror, it may be that at no time did it truly feel like my demise was the end. Somehow it was just an event to be observed and the scene would inevitably have to change. Did I go about my day during this visit? No. I didn't, though I did briefly try to write. For the most part I lay in bed, as I came to feel I was expected to do.

A second message came through the New York Times. A writer contributed a guest editorial to the newspaper on the subject of drinking. Alcohol had become a nuisance in his life, threatening his job and his health and his family relations. A man of strong willpower, he just decided he would stop and quit cold turkey. No more martinis with lunch or wine with meals or after-dinner drinks. Three months into his alcohol-free life, he wished to report that his productivity as a writer had greatly improved, his relations with his wife and children were fully restored, and he was feeling better than he had in years. Did he miss his cocktails and aperitifs and all the rest? Not at all. He was a new man.

Celeste, great emotion welled up in me as I read this account. Liar, this contributor should have signed off as instead of Anonymous, for a liar he truly had to be. Later, I modified my judgment. He was not a liar at all but just a terribly sad man grieving the loss of his best friend and trying to put a brave face on it. More than sad, he would have to be worn down with anxiety, each day a gray horror to be endured. Surely the bright light in his life had grown dull and his moment-to-moment existence had become an agony.

Not a day went by that he didn't visit Sarah. His rigidity, he suspected, was compensation for the comfort he experienced being alone. She was needier now than she had ever been, her talk of Lane notwithstanding. She wouldn't be going anywhere, except back to the loft, when she was released from the hospital. He kept his visits brief. They didn't need much time together to maintain their connection. The facility seemed clean and safe. Cheery pastel colors predominated. And she had her own spare, private room, such as he imagined a nun would live in. It was nothing like the drab institutional confines of the Bellevue Hospital psychiatric ward, where he had visited Rachel, or even Clark 8, at St. Luke's, where Naomi had stayed.

One day he arrived while Dr. Frodkey was visiting Sarah. "This is my new love. I'm so sorry, Luther, but he loves me better than you do and can provide for me in a way you never could," she said.

"I see," Luther could only think to say.

"Luther is a murderer," she said, turning to Dr. Frodkey. "His ambition is to kill me. He will never let me go. He loves me that much."

"Is there any truth to what she says?" Dr. Frodkey set upon Luther with a hard stare, as if to fathom his essence in one gaze.

"No," Luther said.

"Why do you imagine she would say such a thing?"

"It goes back to an article I showed her some years ago."

"An article?"

"Some boy from the other side of the tracks got involved with a girl from a wealthy family. When she tried to leave him, he lost his head and stabbed her to death."

"Luther's from the other side of the tracks. Sometimes Luther is on the tracks. He likes railroads. He goes to them all the time."

"Why did you show her the article?" Dr. Frodkey was intent on continuing with his line of questioning.

"There were similarities between the boy and me."

"Luther is that boy. Don't lie to Dr. Frodkey. He's on to you," Sarah said.

“Have you thought of seeking help?”

“I’ve been in analysis,” he offered, feeling no need to mention the clinic or Dr. Dressler by name. Luther had grown resentful at Dr. Frodkey’s forceful handling of him. He had been intruded on far enough. To be spoken to in such a manner, as if he was dirt, as his mother would say. Whether Luther’s answer sufficed or Dr. Frodkey was using some cheap trick of silence to leave him hanging, Luther couldn’t say and wanted not to care. And yet he did care. He cared painfully.

“His analyst told him to drink, and you give me drugs,” Sarah said to Dr. Frodkey.

“What drugs do you give her?” Luther asked.

The empathic answer that came appeared in Luther’s mind as a long trail of chemical formulae in the shape of a blunt weapon with which the good doctor was smilingly bludgeoning him for his temerity in asking such a question in the first place. The doctor had a bulletproof head. He had soundproof ears. Was it possible there were human beings going about their day who were not in fact human beings but something else? He is showing me his power, Luther thought. He is showing me he is from the land of the big dicks. What am I to do but to lie down and die in the face of such a force?

Though they were not the kind to say it doesn’t grow on trees, money was a source of concern to the Van Dines. It was the basis of their freedom. They had carefully laid aside funds for their children’s college tuition and perhaps more, if the children were frugal, and with the expectation that beyond college they would be off on their own. And yet neither Peter nor Lydia had truly been off on their own. Luther would find himself wondering how Peter would have fared had Lydia's inheritance not rescued him from the world after their marriage, and surely she had to wonder herself, given the sequestered path he proceeded to take. And Lydia, after a brief experiment with teaching, decided that dealing with manipulative school kids five days a week was not the path for her. If they expected the children to choose a different model for living than the one they had shown them, they now had reason to doubt the likeliness of this happening, at least in regard to Sarah. There she was in a Chinatown loft exhausting her trust fund and now they had been presented with a truly staggering bill for her stay in the private mental hospital. Not only that. Dr. Frodkey had proposed that Sarah see him twice a week, and that too was an expense they would have to help her with.

Celeste, I had no sense of responsibility for Sarah where money was concerned. We shared the expense for rent and electricity and the phone and food and all the rest. I did not have the stature of a provider, other than to pay the key money for the right to move into the loft. It came as something of a shock when Dr. Frodkey blithely suggested that Sarah apply for Medicaid as a means for meeting his fee for therapy, as it also came as a shock that he would dismiss the Van Dines' distress over the huge cost of the hospitalization. "They owe you this assistance after the harm they have done," Sarah quoted him as saying.

In this time Peter took me aside and said, "I do not believe in therapy. It is merely a tool of capitalism, meant to mold you as a functioning instrument of the system." And around this same time he also said, in a more emphatic and angry tone, "I will not pay to have my daughter see a man who feels it is his right to sit in judgment of me and to encourage such judgment in her.”

Now Celeste, he may have had a point, as all over Manhattan and the outlying counties and in many of the states of this Union are women and men in their therapists' offices building a case against their parents with the tacit if not spoken approval of these professional men and women. Such a viewpoint surely will sound jaundiced and extreme and shows a lack of gratitude and perspective for those who practice this healing art, but do we not often hear those in the thickness of middle age, childless and alone, inveighing against Mommy and Daddy and laying all their tribulations at their feet? And did I not become one of them, not in middle age but long before?

The sight of poor and needy people filling out lengthy forms and waiting to petition the city for financial aid confirmed for Luther what he had suspected from the start. Dr. Frodkey's idea that Medicaid would come through for someone with Sarah's background was absurd. The rows of steel-gray desks at which sat weary and hardened caseworkers under the harsh fluorescent lighting further disheartened him. The reality the entire scene presented that he and Sarah were on the same plane with these indigent petitioners was more than he could comfortably contemplate. He just wanted to get away from this bureaucratic maze through which she would have to walk.

She was different now, more subdued. Dr. Frodkey had prescribed a medication for her, Mellaril, which she took twice daily. On the subway and on the streets as they made their way to the social services agency on Thirty-fourth Street and Ninth Avenue that morning, she had moved slowly, tentatively, like a frightened and wary child, and in the institutional glare of the agency, she maintained the same posture, cringing in the face of questions from the metallic-voiced representative.

“Why you here when you ain’t got that information available? You got to get your thing together you want to be successful,” the woman said, Sarah having misplaced her social security number. “How I don’t know you not a millionaire without I see that card. Maybe you Rockefeller’s daughter. You look like you could be.”

“No, no, I’m not Rockefeller’s daughter,” Sarah said.

“Did I say you was or did I say you could be?”

“Could be,” Sarah replied, bending submissively to the woman’s urge for domination.

“You come back another day when you got your facts together,” the woman said.

But they didn’t have to come back another day, thanks to a call to Lydia, who had the information virtually at hand.

Luther had been aware of something darker coexisting with his compassionate protectiveness of Sarah that morning and early afternoon at the agency, a feeling of impatience and even fury at the fact of her disability. On the subway, heading home, he snapped at her when she fumbled with her purse and spilled the contents while searching for a subway token. For a moment he felt a surge of the wild anger that could come over him and which inevitably resulted in a torrent of abuse as destructive in its way as physically tearing the loft apart. A desolate section of the subway was not the place to be spilling her bag, virtually beckoning the muggers to come for them. How dare she dog-whistle their arrival? How dare she pull such a sly trick? Did she not know that he needed protection from the marauders, the murderers, the ones who wanted nothing better than to lay hands and knives and bullets on him?

But the worst happened when they had returned to the safety of the loft. Sarah unintentionally tore loose the intercom wire as she entered the door. “You did that on purpose, didn’t you? You did that just to make more work for me. Tell me you did just that,” he demanded. Sarah covered her face with her hands and began to weep, leaving him in the turmoil of a fear-driven rage he hardly knew what to do with. She had not simply destroyed an intercom; she had destroyed his whole world, and he was incapable of fixing it. She had exposed his incompetence, his unmanliness, and she had done it deliberately, so as to humiliate him.

Celeste, my father was alive in me. I could not handle stress. I had a condition. All the things my mother said of my father were true of me. If he was not a man, how could I possibly be? The same brittle temperament I had displayed in Europe was now manifesting. Like my father, I could not take care of a woman.

Spring was now here, and Sarah heard its call. She needed the comfort of nature, the soothing sound of crickets at night, not the horn blasts and the noises of bellicose drunkenness on the street below. She needed the sight of buds on trees and green grass and to walk woodland paths. She wanted to go where she could heal from the fracture in her mind and be whole once more while Dr. Frodkey was away for a week.

“I’m not trying to hurt you. I am not forsaking you. Please believe me,” she said, and though her words were similar to those she had used at the onset of her illness, they did not have the same worrisome effect on Luther. Her father was already at Camp, preparing for the time when spring would fully arrive in earnest and then the glory time of summer, subdued as that brightness would continue to be by the memory of Lenore.

Luther kissed Sarah and hugged her and told her he loved her, as he did many times in the course of most days. Even in his own sickness he could surrender to the call of love. It was not foreign to him in this time. In his secret place he understood it was what he lived for, even if other feelings could seek to intervene.

Then something happened that couldn't have been expected, or even if it had, its arrival date could not possibly be known, except to a savant or some other with a special link to the future. The outside phone rang in the renting office, which he was remaining faithful to, and Luther steeled himself to pick it up, braced for the panic he would inevitably experience should it be Simon Weill laying that tired yet thoroughly commanding voice on him. But that voice did not greet him with its dreaded sound. Rather was it Naomi, her tone mournful and oppressed.

“Brother, can you help me? Can you please, please help me?” Naomi began.

“What is wrong, Naomi?” He had not heard her quite this way before, and sensed that the usual histrionics he often judged her to be indulging in were not in play now.

“My life is what is wrong, Luther. They are threatening to take my life.”

“Who is threatening you?”

“There are men on the ward who hit me. They ask me for cigarettes and money and then they still hit me. They terrify me, Luther. Can you do something? Can you please do something?” She began to cry.

“Where are you?”

“They have put me in Manhattan State Hospital, on Ward’s Island. Luther, it is horrible. The male nurses do not protect us. Everywhere there is violence.”

They. They had gotten tired of her visits to Clark 8, at St. Luke’s. They had decided to dump her in that hellhole in the middle of the East River. They had put her where no one could save her now. What was he to do? Was he to drop the phone and rush out there? This was his sister, after all, and her plea had summoned a feeling of love. Once again he was that boy on the porch of the cabin at the Bible camp in emotional turmoil to get back home and rescue his mother, only now it was his sister in peril.

Suddenly the line went dead. Without a number to call her back, he waited, but the phone didn’t ring. His mother happened by and he told her, with anxiety in his voice, of Naomi’s plight.

“Is that right, Luther? It makes my heart heavy to hear such a thing.”

Her heart was heavy? In that instant he saw what he had been seeing for some time, that she was old and virtually beyond caring. The world ended for her at the front door of the building, if it even extended that far anymore.

“Should Chuck be told?” Luther asked.

“We might want to tell him, but he will only get upset, and it may give him more reason to drink.” She sounded vague, distracted. The matter was not one she could fully give her mind to.

Luther took the elevator upstairs and knocked on Chuck's door. He repeated the knocking several times. It was now approaching 5 pm, roughly the hour when Naomi and Chuck's day began, Luther had long since learned.

"Who the hell is it?" Chuck called out.

"It's me, Luther."

"What the hell do you want?"

"It's about Naomi."

"Since when do you give a good goddamn about your sister?"

"I need to speak with you," Luther said.

The door opened. "All right. I'm here. What is it?" Chuck stood in his socks and boxer shorts. There was redness in his brother-in-law's haunted eyes and broken blood vessels in his nose. How stale the air in the narrow room was. Luther wondered if Naomi saw her stays in these various institutions as a break from the monotony of her days in the cramped, stuffy room.

"I got a worrisome call from Naomi. She said some of the inmates were violent and was pleading with me to get her out of there."

"This is not new. I have had the same report and am right now working on getting her free of that wretched institution. I am using all the power at my command, and that is substantial, as you well know. Now if you will excuse me."

"But Chuck..."

"Never mind but Chuck. Can't you see I am busy?" Chuck said, punctuating his fit of irritation by slamming the door.

He was busy getting ready to drink, Luther sensed, as he headed upstairs to the penthouse.

“She said that?” Luke asked, when Luther gave him the news about Naomi.

“Yes,” Luther said.

“Some of those places can be rough. I had to fight when I was in the Albany lockup,” Luke said, referring to that time when he had been arrested for attempted auto theft for putting a car in gear in someone’s driveway.

“She’s in a psychiatric institution,” Luther said.

“You think those fuckers in that jail who wanted to rape me weren’t crazy?”

“I’m sure they were,” Luther said. It was the way of some in the Garatdjian family, should someone be suffering, to top their accounts of adversity with tales of their own.

“Hey, don’t get smart with me.”

“I’m not getting smart with you. I believe I was agreeing that you have had hard things to overcome in your life.”

“You see, there you fucking go with that smart mouth of yours. Am I right, Brenda? Is my brother being smart-mouthed with me?”

“Your sister could be in trouble,” Brenda said.

“Naomi can exaggerate. Where is this place anyway?”

“Ward’s Island. You can see it from the Triborough Bridge. These big buildings with tiny windows,” Luther said.

“Maybe I’ll go out there. Tomorrow, not tonight.”

“Not tonight?” Luther asked.

“Didn’t I just say that?” Luke said.

“Do you like my top? I just bought it,” Brenda asked Luther.

“Sure. Sure I like it,” Luther said, of the tight silver sleeveless blouse. She didn’t ask for his opinion about her jeans because they were the same old jeans she always wore, unless she had several pairs, which she probably did. Brenda and Marge, the jeans women.

“We’re going out tonight. We’re going to be doing some partying. You and Sarah like to party?” Luke asked.

“I don’t know what the word means,” Luther said.

“Get a load of him. He doesn’t know what the word means. Mr. Innocent here.”

“Luke,” Brenda cautioned, the way she would when he came near discussing their sexual activity.

“Say, how is Sarah. Is she out of that institution yet?” Luke asked.

Luther, usually close-mouthed about Sarah, had been led during his crying fit to tell just about everyone in the family about her difficulty.

“She’s doing fine,” Luther said.

“She likes me. All women like me. Right, Brenda.?”

“I’m not liking you. Not right now,” Brenda said.

Luke laughed.

Luke had made him feel dirty once again, dirtier than the subway car he rode downtown on. His own dirt was bad enough without having Luke’s added to it. And once again he resolved to put some distance between himself and his brother. That boast by Luke that Sarah liked him was a reminder of how appropriating his brother could be. Was Brenda not an example? How close Luther had been to Luke claiming Sarah for his own that night he came to Roberto's apartment while Luther was in bed with Nora from Norway. How many reminders such as this awakening of a primal fear did he need that his family was a danger zone?

Luke had said not tonight, he wouldn't be going out to see Naomi that night, and Luther understood that he too was saying not tonight as he entered the SoHo bar. Not that it felt quite right to be sitting on the barstool drinking beer after beer before switching to scotch and listening to the amped sound of Carole King sing "I Feel the Earth Move" and Freddy Fender with his passionate rendition of "Till the Last Teardrop Falls." Some element of painful reality had tethered him to the earth and prevented him from the drift into bliss.

The thought of calling Gillian came and went as he left the bar and walked home along Canal Street. How gloomy and ugly a stretch of the city it seemed on this night, with its grubby, shuttered stores and the endless truck traffic to and from the Holland Tunnel. Lafayette, Baxter, Mulberry, Mott, he wandered past before coming to the tiny shops along Pell and winding Doyers Street. He was interested in beer, not miniature pagodas or other tourist enticements. At the Chinese grocery on East Broadway, he knelt at the cooler and extracted a six-pack of tallboys. Big bags of rice were stacked nearby and a strong smell he couldn't identify permeated the space. Some sort of food stuff, possibly fermenting. Was it soy sauce? He had no idea. It would remain a mystery, like the life-affirming Chinese he lived among.

In the morning he was woken by the telephone.

“This is really fucked up. You won’t believe what happened,” Luke said, profanity being part of his dishevelment.

“So tell me,” Luther said, staring at the six empty white and red cans of Budweiser by the box spring.

“Naomi’s dead.”

“Dead?”

“A police boat found her floating in the East River near the Fifty-ninth Street Bridge. I had to go down to the morgue to identify her. It was horrible. She was all bloated and her face was badly bruised, like she’d been beaten.”

“Beaten.”

“That’s what I said.”

“Beaten by the men of violence.”

“What?”

“Nothing.”

Chuck was holding forth when Luther arrived at his mother’s apartment.

“I am pressing for an immediate investigation by the district attorney’s office. There is no question but that my beloved Naomi was murdered.”

“Murdered, did you say?” Hannah came alive at the mention of the word.

“That is exactly what I am saying. It has been known to me, as well as to the authorities at that hellhole, that the wolves are placed in with the lambs. Those wolves tore into my Naomi and then dragged her down to the East River. They threw my wife into a river that is nothing but a cesspool.”

There was more such talk, but no investigation followed. No lawyer was retained. No attempt was made to refute the statement that suicide was the cause of Naomi’s death. The question was not asked how Naomi managed to get out of the facility and to the river in the first place or how she had come to receive the bruises Luke had witnessed on her face. Or if these questions were asked, they were asked only among themselves. Nor was the question asked why such passivity greeted what was a horrific event.

But Luther knew. He knew in the knowledge bank on which he drew. The family didn’t press forward because they were, well, the Garatdjians, and had the answer they needed. They had all conspired in Naomi’s death. Only with death came manageability for the Garatdjians, or at least some of them. Let the hole be dug. Let the casket be laid into it. Let the dirt be thrown to cover that casket.

I am very sick that I should think this way, it occurred to Luther in this time. But I am not ashamed, he also thought. Nothing must get in the way of order. Nothing.

Naomi’s daughter Jeanne had resurfaced. Though only eighteen, she had become a fallen woman living in houses of ill repute. Luther applied such dated terminology to his niece as a cover for the horror of where she had been, not houses of ill repute but cheerless rooms in seedy hotels where she lived under the command and control of pimps who became the father her own father could not be with their special brand of brutal caring. She had seen girls beaten and raped and disciplined with broom handles. She had seen what the hatred of a man for a woman can be, and she now had eyes that told him boldly and penetratingly what she knew, brazen eyes that stripped him naked as to the sexual content of his nature and that boldly communicated her understanding of what he and every man wanted from her.

She came to him on the eve of Naomi's funeral as he sat in the renting office. They did not hug or kiss. There were no expressions of sorrow or grief from either of them or any attempt to comfort each other. A sullen butterball of a girl when she had run off back in 1967, she was now tall and thin. The heavy makeup and cheap, provocative attire and high heels were the accouterments of her trade.

"Can I come back there with you?" she said, as she stood at the window.

"No. You can't," he replied.

"What's the matter? You want it all for yourself?" She left him with that question, allowing no ambiguity, in his mind, as to what she meant by "it." She was not after him, but the money in his care. A thief as well as a whore. So her eyes told him. He was relieved when she left. No one should have the power to strip another person naked like that.

Celeste, I was not a caring individual. Jeanne was not what she should have been to me. She was merely part of the horror I could not negotiate with but could only shun. She was just more evidence of the detritus that we were. In her did I see the hideousness of her father, that grotesque sullenness, that pilot light of peeve that was the only light in her., a light that burned, not shone. Go to hell, I thought. Just go to hell. Leave me alone to squirrel away the money I need so I can jump away from this sinking ship and live apart from the work world and continue with White Line, Continue.

In this time, driven by fear, I visited a doctor at a downtown psychotherapy center. That he was not a true doctor with a medical degree but the kind who read paperback books en route to his PhD I tried not to hold against him. I needed to talk, to confess. My drinking had become a source of concern to me with Naomi's death, and I was in urgent need of reassurance that I was not following in the same path. But this doctor I spoke with had toughness in his bones and fortitude in his brow.

"Tell me a little about your family," the doctor said. He had the hush of books in floor to ceiling shelves all around him. He had the comfort of natural light coming in through the white-curtained windows.

"My family is my family," I said, seeing his small beard that purported to signify wisdom in his face.

"That's a beginning. Can you provide a little more?"

And so I told him about Hannah, who wouldn't or couldn't leave home, and about Naomi, who left home only to go to the Chinese restaurant for green pepper steak or the Whelan's Drugstore for prescription refills or to the bar with Chuck or to the institutions that would have her and finally to the one that had the cruel audacity to debase her. I told him about Rachel, who had been my guiding star when she enrolled at Vassar College, and of my dream of walking the railroad tracks starting in the tunnel of my childhood under Riverside Park up along the Hudson River so I could be with her. I told him too of her affliction first with the bottle and then with God. I told him about Luke and get it on Brenda and the multiplicity of their amorousness in the night fueled by alcohol and drugs and the sheer call of hedonism.

“Whoa! Whoa!” he said, as if I were a horse and he were the owner of the bridle reins. Was I to whinny or neigh or snort? I did not understand this man or the contemplative shadow in which he existed.

“Meaning?” I asked.

“Why not tell me about your parents? But briefly, please.”

There is no brief with parents, Celeste. They go back in time and forward in time. You live inside and outside them simultaneously but never apart from them. I told this man, this stranger, whom I had made the arbiter of my fate that my parents were in God and God was in them and that their homes away from home were the different churches they regularly attended, my mother in particular having the conviction, at age thirty-two, of her own sinfulness and that the world had nothing that she wanted. Of my father I said he had been prepared for takeoff to the Big Show, like an airplane that had taxied into position on the runway.

This bearded man had discerning eyes. His whole face was made for appraisal. And when he spoke, it was with all the authority he had casually mustered.

“How far does the apple fall from the tree?” he asked.

“What?” I said.

“I believe you heard me,” he said.

And he was right. I had heard him. He was saying I could take my parents' path of hosannas to the Christ Jesus and of Pastor Cohn and all those pastors who slapped the pages of their guilt-edged Bibles or I could pursue Naomi's path to my early demise. What I heard him saying was that I could go to God or I could go to the bars and an early death like Naomi. God had not come calling on me, as he had to my mother or father, or even to Rachel, who now walked and talked with God all hours of the day and watched for the return of the Christ Jesus in the night sky. But alcohol had come calling on me; I had the experience of alcohol and all it could do for me and no lasting evidence of what it could and was doing to me. And so I heeded its call and went back to the known.

After Naomi's funeral, after dirt had been thrown on her so order could prevail (yes, harsh, Celeste, yes even crazy and unfeeling to speak in such a manner), I traveled up to Camp on the Hudson River Line, needing the companionship of the railroad and all it signified, particularly on that route. Sarah had committed to meeting me in Poughkeepsie with the jeep, and it was with some anxiety that I awaited her arrival outside the train station. Bill Walton was big in my mind as I stared at the road leading down to the parking lot, as UCLA had defeated Memphis State in the NCAA championship game and Walton had been voted MVP for his record-breaking 21 field goals in 22 attempts. In my mind I was the California Golden Boy as I paced back and forth in full-blown fantasy about the total control of the basket area that Walton demonstrated with his agility, a girl approached, and dark beauty was her name.

"I can give you a lift," she said.

Tanned and black-haired and steadfast in her probing gaze she stood before me. Her eyes were pools of danger one could easily drown in. If that sounds dramatic and even silly, so be it. That is how she appeared. Something else. The girl was in the image of Lane. Her eyes, her face, her stare—they were his.

“Do you have a brother, and does he live in Boston?” I asked.

“Should I have a brother who lives in Boston?”

“Everyone who looks like you should have a brother living in Boston.”

“So do you want a lift?”

At that moment rage became my name, or crushing despair, because even as we spoke there came Sarah down the incline in the jeep, and suspicion would be her name should my conversation with the girl continue. And truth to tell, I lacked the wits to gather her to me with a phone number.

“Thank you, but I’ll be all right. My ride is arriving now,” I said.

We must do something with our longings. We must note or analyze or surrender them or do whatever, but we must not let them destroy us. Let it be said that agony was my name for the rest of that day and that Sarah, canny as she could be, smelled my pain.

“Did you leave your heart back there, Dearie? And no, I am not thinking of San Francisco.”

“What do you mean?” I replied.

“What do I mean? What does Lenore mean? What does any black-haired girl mean but that she is the antithesis of blondness?”

A peculiar intensity was operating in her that I could not negotiate my way with through words, and so I fell silent, allowing her wave to break over me and trusting that it would not pull me into a sea of guilt. In any case, another matter was pressing on me, that being my consultation with the therapist.

“I think I may have a drinking problem,” I said to her, as I stood in the living room by a shelf containing those old clothbound books from her mother’s lonely past. But she was not hearing me.

“Why don’t we do it in the road?” she said, and so my admission, rather than tethering me to the reality I had just confessed, vanished like a snowflake in the roaring fire of my illness, and it was to be many years before I could make such an admission again, or even contemplate such a thing. Because it was not subsequently hidden from her or anyone else; it was hidden from me. I would no longer be able to see the thing that was right there in front of me.

But beauty, the world, that I could see in front of me, and the beauty I had seen at the Poughkeepsie train station had tethered me to her reality, which I was as powerless against as my need for the bottle. I simply had to find her and continue our conversation. I had to drink of her. I had to be of her and in her. It is a cruelty of our life that every fiber of our being can be consumed with such longing, Celeste, and whether we pursue it into a bigger life or the bleak, barren space of non-requital or disaster, we must heed its siren call. .

And so every weekend I began riding the rails between Grand Central Station and Poughkeepsie. Oh, Celeste, do not believe for a second that lust has as its sole purpose pursuit of the flesh, for hidden in this raging carnality is the longing for a bigger life.

Once again the bounty of America was calling to me, and if I myself were not in possession of that bounty, then I must find it elsewhere, and that elsewhere now was the girl like glittering obsidian I had glimpsed that painful day. But she was not waiting for me at the Poughkeepsie train station with the offer of a ride. Only emptiness awaited me, the forlorn stretches of town, not a person in sight, and the low tavern in which I drank beer in the presence of the sullen bartender to the modulated patter of broadcasters announcing the Mets game. In that stagnant atmosphere whatever vitality I possessed was being drawn from me. I began to feel sodden from the six beers I had consumed, and wandered down to the railroad tracks, seeking to invigorate myself with the mingled smell of muck and ordure that sometimes attaches to such sites. Lulled by the lapping waters of the Hudson, I lay down on its east bank and dozed off till woken by the highballing intensity of an Amtrak train scornful of the immediate localities and streaking into the greater beyond. I rose and wandered back to the station, all desire for the rails or the river gone in favor of a safe trip home.

But I was not done yet, Celeste. I was not done. The next weekend I once more rode the rails, with no sight of Beauty from one stop to the next. That all changed as the train pulled into Peekskill. There she was on the platform, in jeans and a black sleeveless top, surrounded by other young men and women who had claimed her for their own. When our eyes met, I quickly looked away. Previously I had seen her alone, and so my fantasy could thrive. But her entourage gave her a social context and cast me in the light of a lone and predatory wolf. Worse, I was a City College wolf and my prey and her pals were high board score gifted ones from elite Vassar College, to which I assumed they were all returning after an outing of some kind. Once again I asked how it was I had not been given more in this life to work with as the cold reality of the disparity in our social standing was made clear to me.

The ordeal did not end there, as the group entered my coach car and took the facing seats immediately in front of mine. More than that, the girl sat with her back to me, one thin, tanned arm thrown over her seat. And so, for the next twenty minutes, I was left to stare at her small, perfectly formed wrist and hand and the red polish she had applied to her nails and the flawless texture of her black hair on the top of her perfectly shaped head.

Did she remember me? Was she seeking to tantalize? My mind searched for clues even as I sat in terror, fearing she would turn on me with prosecutorial zeal and enlist her comrades as jurors. We must be careful in the matter of fear. Animals smell it and come running, and we are creatures too with strong powers of detection.

I turned to the novel I had brought along, Edith Wharton's House of Mirth, wishing to give my eyes somewhere to go other than to the few visible physical offerings of my tormentor. Any novel that opened with the protagonist walking through Grand Central Station toward the beginning of the twentieth century had to have some interest for me, and yet that quote from Robert Louis Stevenson, "Books are a mighty bloodless substitute for life," was, at that moment, large in my mind.

Though my ears were pricked for their conversation, they spoke in low, well-modulated voices, as if choosing to be a self-contained unit, and so what I heard were murmurings and muffled snatches. They got up well in advance of the train's arrival in Poughkeepsie. If I was hoping for a look of recognition from Beauty as they filed past my seat, it didn't happen. Whether that was an effort of will or a display of sincere indifference on her part, I will never know. The only clear thing was the choice of her chums over me. I trailed safely behind onto the platform, still alert for a sign, perhaps a provocative stare over her shoulder signifying our tenuous connection hadn't been dissolved, but even this crumb wasn't offered. The execution was complete.

Luther was good at the funeral of his sister Naomi. He did not show up in velvet pants and a size too small Bally shoes, as he had for his father's service. He honored her death with silence, even while his mind was ridiculing of chipmunk-faced Pastor Nyquist, who could be counted on to deliver the same sort of drivel he had served up in reviewing Luther's father's life. But his mother understood what he, Luther, didn't, the power of form over content, the need for ritual, and for closure. She did not allow herself to wander the earth solely unto herself. And Luther, in his own way, took comfort in the order that his mother could bring to the occasion, with the sizable assistance of Vera, who took major responsibility for the arrangements.

Because by now it was apparent to Luther that Vera was becoming the son that his mother had always wanted but never had and that it was not for nothing that Vera had said, following their father's passing, that she felt compelled to carry on the family name. And yet, while she posed a mortal threat to his existence, as Soviet missiles did to the American homeland, he never in his mind asserted that dirt needed to be thrown on her for order to reign, as he did about Naomi. Because, for better or worse—and often it felt worse, much much worse—Vera was among the living and Naomi was not and had not been since the days of her decline had begun. For Naomi to die was for him to still live; he could not say the same should Vera pass away. His history had been lived with her as it had not been with his older sister.

But he had lost the capacity to love his sister Vera. Now he could only fear her. Their coexistence was painful, not peaceful, as her power seemed to rise with each passing day. He suspected the spirit of revenge was the fuel for her progress. She had been slighted and ignored, a virtually invisible presence within the family.

Now and then he would run across her on the City College campus, generally in Finley cafeteria. These chance meetings made him uncomfortable. Her presence supported the notion that she was following him and summoned the old fear that they were in a race and that she would inevitably pull ahead. The confident expression she displayed on such occasions only confirmed the sense that she was right behind him and gaining.

“Susan and I studied together for the GRE,” Vera said one afternoon. He had come into the half-empty cafeteria for coffee to find her with her friend, an equally tall girl.

“I hear that’s a tough exam,” Luther said.

“Nothing is hard for my brother,” Vera said to her friend.

“Have you taken the GRE?” he asked, ignoring his sister’s sarcasm, if that’s what it was. And if it wasn’t, then her remark was even sadder.

“Of course we did. We’re both applying for admission to the doctoral program in English at Columbia. Right, Susan?”

“That’s right,” Susan said.

“No kidding,” Luther said.

“We both have a 4.0 grade point average, so maybe we can get in. But those standardized tests are my downfall. That’s not so for you, is it, Luther?”

Luther shook his head, cringing inwardly as he remembered the fabricated score he had given her when she asked him how he had done on the SAT some years before.

His sister was so in earnest, so determined to erase her depressing past as a bottom-dweller. Once again he was struck by the length she would go—the remedial program that had been required of her to enter college in the first place and now her night school attendance at CCNY. And he was struck by her humility, if in fact her candor about her limitation on standardized tests could be called that. How free she was as a result of her honesty, and how bound he was by the false image he had to maintain because of his lie. She had come clean and so she was clean, but he hadn’t come clean and so he was dirty inside.

Several months passed and he heard no more about Vera’s application. And then one evening, there she was, her face radiant with joy, at the renting office window.

“I got in. I got in,” she exclaimed, living in the wonder of the news she had received as he sat stiff and inwardly stricken at the roll-top desk.

“Got in where?” As if he didn’t know.

“Columbia, of course.”

“Great,” he managed to say, the weak gasp of a man who had been crushed, annihilated. Having seen the devastation she had wrought in his pained face, she tore off up the stairs to shout her glad tidings to his mother and Hannah and everyone else.

He stepped outside the office. Just a few feet beyond the brass mailbox was the alcove where he had hidden her books. It had a severely sloping ceiling, following the path of the stairway above, and narrowed to a small crawl space. Far back, somewhere, in that space, was her loose-leaf binder and the small stack of books, unless the space had been cleaned out. How had he known to fear her back then that he should take such an immoral action, and what had it gained him? Beyond that, what was it to be part of a family where one person’s success was another’s humiliation?

Luther stayed topside in his waking life, but in his dream world his sister Vera now appeared as a colossus bestriding Broadway, and so he had no choice but to take it on the lam down the hill in the lower level of Riverside Park at One Hundred Fifteenth Street and seek shelter in his beloved railroad tunnel from the boom of thunder and flashes of lightning like a jagged dagger ripping open the night sky. It was all right with him if a great swath of territory now had to be ceded so long as he had that one remaining refuge, where in isolation under the dim lights he could inhale the diesel fumes as the trains of power roared back and forth. It was there he wished to return more than anywhere, the world of childhood with its Breyer’s ice cream and Borden’s milk delivered to the door in bottles and Mickey Mantle swinging from both sides of the plate and the 1956 and 1957 Lionel trains catalog. Was that so much to ask for, a world gone by for him to retreat into?

And now the enemy was attacking on another flank. Marge on the line was now Marge on the loose. No longer was he the sole object of her ardor. She had found another student in the writing program to try to claim for her own and in fact to share her bed with, a young black man who radiated power and who wore an effervescent smile. His name was Carson Deal and he won the program's literary award two years in a row and already had a book contract, so it was understood that he was the real thing even as, in his mind, Luther tried to make him something less.

And yet, when Carson Deal planted his seed in Marge's womb, things changed. He accused her of setting a trap and said he would have nothing to do with a woman who connived in such a way. And when she went the abortion route, Carson Deal said he would also have nothing to do with a woman who killed his baby. And so Marge was left bereft, but she had strength her sadness sought to conceal, and so she had her time of pain and weeping and then moved on.

Dov Drosky had founded a literary magazine, A Writher of Friction, under the auspices of the college. His small office was piled high with copies of the magazine and unsolicited manuscripts. In temperament a child in search of mentors, he arranged for established authors to join the editorial board of the magazine. Excerpts from their work regularly appeared in the pages of the oversize magazine, as did excerpts of his own. Dov Drosky asserted that in order to get published, it was necessary for a writer to start his or her own magazine.

Possibly Dov Drosky's point of view was a rationale for his own wheeling and dealing. His prose did seem labored, as if written with a thesaurus at hand and displaying the oppressive muscularity of his own physique. A jaundiced attitude toward his teacher's enterprise began to develop when several of Luther's writing efforts were returned with boilerplate rejections, as were those of a number of other students.

But one student didn't receive boilerplate rejections. In fact, she didn't even submit her work. Dov Drosky did that for her when she read material in front of the class. There was a quality to her writing that Dov Drosky recognized and admired, as did the other board members, and so she was in.

"I don't understand it. They should be taking your work. It's so much better," Marge said to Luther, as if she sensed his resentment. Her pity only worsened matters. If he understood one thing, it was that talent and intelligence were indispensable. All the effort and discipline in the world could not compensate for their lack. Once again it was made clear to him that no matter what head start or other advantage he might appear to have, others would sooner or later surpass him and then turn and place their laughing thing on him, as there was no place in the world for such shameful thinness of body and mind or for his grotesquely flat head. He saw everything in a flash: the preening boy, who with all evidence to the contrary, had written in his seventh grade textbooks, "Luther is great," only to be shown how less than great he was. When would he learn his place in life and simply accept that skinny was as a skinny could always be expected to be: skinny on the Stanford-Binet intelligence test, skinny on the SAT, skinny on the army intelligence test and physical exam. Get to the corner with your skinniness, Luther commanded himself.

But the corner could hold him only so long. Dov Drosky's writing class called him back as he had no other place to go. Now Marge wasn't looking at him helplessly, swivel-heading from across the conference table. She hardly glanced his way at all. If anything, he was the one looking at her, not with desire but with fear and resentment. How cruel that a woman so indifferent to fiction she wrote only briefly once or twice a week should now be published in Dov Drosky's literary magazine. Well, she would pay. She would die. A Broadway bus would flatten her. Illness would cripple her. She would have to suffer, and suffer severely, for such an assault.

But no punishment came, only increased popularity. She invited members of Dov Drosky's class and others to her apartment to read their work. At Marge's literary salon one evening, he met a young woman named Sonia. Afterward she went with him to the West End for drinks. He told her that he wanted to see more of her, and she said they could do that. The next evening he was in her apartment on One Hundred Fifty-fifth Street and Riverside Drive. From the window he could see the George Washington Bridge sparkling over the dark river and hear the mournful whistle of a northbound freight. He told her about the railroad and his connection to it going back in time. He said someday maybe they could go down to the tunnel together, but she said she didn't think so as she didn't care especially for tunnels or railroads. They were smoking grass and drinking beer. Her manner toward him was kind, not rebuffing, so he went on. He said since he was a boy in the lower grades he had wanted to go with a girl to the tunnel and from a hiding place watch the trains of power as they passed, just the two of them in a crawl space drawing closer physically. In the smoke heaven they had entered he was powerless not to touch her.

“You’ve been wanting to do that all night. It’s what most men want to do. Some, like you, are jut shy about making their intentions clear.”

“Shy?”

“Ashamed.”

She was pretty, her features dark. He had a sudden vision of Naomi.

“Oh dear,” he said, and lay back on the sofa.

“Oh dear, what?” she inquired.

“Nothing. Nothing at all,” he said.

She told him things about herself, not smoke haze stuff but things rooted in the specifics of her life. In a field outside Mayaguez, Puerto Rico, where she had been born, two men had made love to her under the bright summer sun and she had not resisted. And Dov Drosky had been to her house, she also said, asking, “Do you know what I even mean when I say ‘my house’?”

He shook his head.

“It means I fucked Dov Drosky,” she replied.

“Oh dear,” he said once again, drawing her ire this time, as if she sensed he was putting up a wall of diffident and quaint objection to the bluntness of her language.

“What is it with your ‘oh dears’?” she demanded, even as a host of more oh dears ballooned in his mind.

“It is not me exactly speaking,” he could only say.

“Have we gone loco?”

The rough tenor of her investigation rendered him silent.

Celeste, fear is a negative form of prayer. That which we are running from we are running toward. So someone was to say to me some years later. And yet, if I had no other lens through which to look than of envy and competitiveness, now was I being given the opportunity, through raw and unremitting pain, for a new perspective. Many times was I to ponder the divide between Vera and me, which only grew, and was asked, some years later, why it was that I could not meet her halfway. But who would build such a bridge or provide the new pair of glasses I was in need of? Not me. The infrastructure for change was missing, and until I could find and avail myself of it, the separation continued.

Things were now happening at the building, Mrs. Garatdjian suggested, when she came to Luther in the renting office one night and said, “Mr. Weill claims that money is missing. We must be careful.” She left those words to hang out there while she studied Luther’s face.

“I see,” Luther said, speaking as she sometimes did.

“What is it you see?” his mother replied.

What he saw was her special powers, her ability to see into his mind as she had when he was a child, getting him to open his hand and show the quarter he had been hiding in his palm and confess that he had been in her pocketbook.

“Only what you tell me,” he said, awaiting the slow and relentless interrogation that would bend him to her will and cause him to divulge everything. Had he taken her for such a fool that she would not realize where he was getting the money to buy expensive cameras and live in a loft? Had he thought she would never grasp the monstrosity of his acquisitiveness?

“Do my words mean nothing, my son? Do they mean nothing?”

“Of course they do not mean nothing,” he replied.

“Do not seek to confuse me with your not and nothing, my son.”

“Of course your words mean something.”

“Then listen as you have never listened before. We must be careful. Have you heard me, my son? I must have a receipt for the words I have just spoken.”

“Yes, I have heard you,” Luther said.

“We are in the last days, my son. The last days. You are here for a reason. Do you understand this?”

“Yes,” he said.

“Do you truly understand?”

“I do,” he said.

He did not ask her what he was to understand and she did not ask him to state his understanding. It was there in her eyes and in what she said and didn't say that she had known all along.

She did not go to Luke with the same line of questioning. She had no need to, as Luke had no guile, no means whatsoever to countenance thievery. He could steal Brenda, if taking a woman from her heroin-debilitated husband could be called stealing, but he could not steal money

And she would not go to Hannah, as Hannah would rise up strong and in her ferocity mode say, “Do you dare to deprive me and my son? Well, do you?” Besides, his mother would find Hannah entirely preoccupied with Watergate. Conflict galvanized Hannah, and this one was on a grand scale, a huge segment of the citizenry versus a stonewalling administration. What was not to like about a president whose lips were sealed? She herself was a repository of state secrets, a woman with a strong kinship with the Cosa Nostra and its code of omerta. In his foolishness, Luther would sometimes imagine his oldest sister singing doo wop on Mulberry Street with Vinnie and Sal and Angelina baby and doing vile things to shady outsiders who penetrated the neighborhood, like those said in horrific newspaper reports to have pitched blacks suspected of being holdup artists off the roofs of five-story buildings.

“They say the liberal media is out to get him, that they want to bring him down because he is so great and they can’t stand his greatness. Do you think that’s true?”

“Who are ‘they’?”

“Don’t pretend you don’t know.”

“But I don’t know. That’s why I’m asking.”

“The American people. The silent majority, just like President Nixon says.”

Lightning would have zapped her had she ever entered a voting booth and pulled a lever for anyone other than the Republican candidate, so fierce was the parental dictate she was programmed to embrace as the first born. But order of birth was not enough to excuse her behavior. Why? Because that smile she sometimes wore was not reserved for delight in political chicanery. That smile was about the whole pattern of abuse she had continued through his growing-up years. It was a smile that said, "I can do anything I want to you, just as the president can do whatever he wants to the country, and there's not a thing you can do about it." It was the smile of the abuser toying with her victim. Was honesty too much to ask for?

Her boy, Moses, was now fourteen and handsome. But he was also fatherless and dependent on a woman who was herself still in a state of dependency, living as she did essentially at home. The boy was not provided food by her but by Luther's mother. She would not have been able to care for herself on her own, let alone for a child. About the boy's father she was closemouthed. From Mrs. Garatdjian Luther learned that Moses' father had been a Greek merchant seaman and that Hannah had only been with him briefly. "You must not tell Hannah I told you this. You must tell no one. Do I have your word that you will not breathe a word?" That fog of secrecy. Things hidden, unexplained. This isolating of one from another with bits of information. This fear, and of what? Of Hannah's wrath?

What his mother didn't say was that Hannah was not set up emotionally to leave home or that the price the family could expect to pay for that bondage was Hannah's anger because someone had to pay for making her as she was, and why not the people who had in fact done so? Nor did Hannah tell Moses that she was in the process of breaking his wings as hers had been broken, that he would be consigned to live in Mommy land, with only the briefest of visits to his absent father's terrain.

None of this was apparent at the time because Moses was tall and lean and crew-cut blond and filled his jeans so well and had been accepted to Stuyvesant High School (could you have gotten into such a school, Luther? Could you have?) and was the star quarterback of the junior varsity football team.

Luther wanted to like the boy. He bought him gifts, like those hardbound editions with four-color illustrations of classics such as Treasure Island and Robinson Crusoe, books Luther had only read the Cliff notes for. Maybe Moses could approximate normalcy, and not simply as an impostor. But Luther wasn't sure. Too much was working against the boy. Hannah was working against him. Moses was her child, after all, and the suspicion lingered that he was her instrument, her weapon. Luther saw how she controlled him, how he had no resistance to her barked commands.

Celeste, probing for the truth is not a crime. If I had a foreboding that Moses might inevitably be at cross-purposes with me and take action for my destruction, such an intimation was only in line with a certain event that did happen. He was, after all, Hannah's son for a reason. But that discussion is for another time. Yes, another time.

Because Simon Weill spoke once did not mean he would not speak again. He was not one, like Mrs. Garatdjian, to simply exclaim, "Do my words mean nothing?" and then cultivate her attitude of weary acceptance of the willful children to whom she had given birth. Simon Weill did not have in his working vocabulary words like acceptance and surrender and God's will. Simon Weill had strategies to devise and levers of power to pull and people to deploy. He was in the world and of the world.

When Simon Weill came to Mrs. Garatdjian and what pressure or enticements he brought to bear she would not reveal, but come he did with a document for her to sign early in the following year. The document was an agreement that effectively terminated the lease that entitled the family to the management of the building as of June of that same year.

Initially Mrs. Garatdjian firmly defended her acquiescence to the agreement.

“If he gives me something to sign, what am I to do but sign it? Do you know who this man is? Let us bring reason to this situation,” she said.

“But we’ll have nothing, not a single thing,” Luke said.

And even Hannah said, “No one is going to deprive me and my son. No one. I’ll cut off the bastard’s nose.”

“Ushtah, Hannah, ushtah,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“Don’t ushtah me,” Hannah retorted.

“To be honest, I do not actually remember signing such an agreement,” Mrs. Garatdjian went on. “It is possible, but I cannot be sure.”

“But Mother, did Mr. Weill tell you that you were signing away our right to manage the building?” Vera asked.

Because they could not accept that she was tired and defeated and primed to let go of responsibility for the wretched building, they persuaded themselves that Simon Weill had tricked her into signing the document or possibly even forged her signature. Only as an afterthought did the question get asked that Luther was afraid would be asked.

“But why is he doing this?” Vera asked.

“Do not try to enter the mind of Simon Weill. It is not a place for a normal person to be,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“There must be a reason,” Hannah said.

“Money is the reason,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“Money? What about money?” Hannah asked.

“He wants more money than he is receiving,” Mrs. Garatdjian simply said.

Luther took deep breaths as his mother spoke, and in the silence that followed.

“The greedy bastard,” Hannah finally said.

Mrs. Garatdjian did not follow with an “ushtah” this time.

“We have some rights, don’t we? We don’t have to let him walk all over us, do we?” Luke asked.

Celeste, I saw myself as I was, sly Jacob stealing his brother Esau’s birthright for a bowl of porridge. You will say that the comparison is inaccurate, and so it may be, but Luke, more than any of us, had the wherewithal to take over the management of the building. Perhaps the responsibility would have pulled him from his slovenly habits. True, he too had once dreamt of getting away, but he did seem like the most likely of the three younger children to succeed my mother. Vera was on her way to an academic career, and though I frankly could imagine no role for me in the workplace, so deteriorated had my self-esteem become, I did have a college degree and would soon have a graduate degree, regardless how flimsy they were. But my thievery had scuttled any chance Luke might have had. Only later, much later, did it occur to me that I may not have been the only one with his hand in the till. Or perhaps I should say his or her hand in the till.

We retained a lawyer. His name was Mr. Harry Ornoff, and he operated out of an old office building down at Columbus Circle. Mr. Ornoff was a tired man about my mother's age, and her loneliness informed the way that she responded to him. I could hear her thinking, here is a man with a fine mind, the way all Jews have fine minds. What would it be like to have someone like him to lean on instead of the willful, greedy, and feckless children I have brought into the world with one who was a feckless child in his own right? We can hear the thoughts of others when they are loud in their minds and shape the contours of their faces. You must not doubt this, Celeste. You must not.

Mr. Ornoff looked on warily, as the aggrieved party entered his dusty little office. And his apprehension was justified, given that Hannah smote him with her standard word blast when she was barely in the door.

"Nobody deprives me and my son. Nobody. No shyster is going to take us for a ride. We'll be watching you, Buster. You can count on that."

"Ushtah, Hannah," my mother said, and perhaps because they were in public Hannah refrained from breathing fire on her.

We presented the situation to Mr. Ornoff as best we could, producing the document with my mother's alleged signature that would end our tenure at the building, and gave him some history that we hoped would cause him to doubt the integrity of Simon Weill. There was the matter of the store rents, which for years Simon Weill had been collecting and keeping when they rightfully weren't his to appropriate. And we brought up the excessive sums, far above what were due him by terms of the lease, that we had been turning over to him. We characterized him as terrifying and manipulative, as a man who could bend steel to his will with merely a glance. We said he had the cartilaginous suppleness and cunning intelligence of a rat. We told him we had been in the power of a great Satan for these many years and now we wanted not deliverance but a modus vivendi. We told him Satan might be Satan, but his power had to be respected as he owned the earth and we were left to bet on the afterlife because we did not know how to live in this one, where all we had was the old rugged cross and a bunch of ancient rocks from Samaria and Canaan and Judea and surrounding territories and the smell of the gilt-edged pages of our King James Bibles.

Celeste, Mr. Ornoff was a practical man. He balanced his checkbook. He provided for his wife. He had a daughter and a son who took the methodical steps toward a profession, one being a CPA and the other a physician. Framed photos of them stood on his desk, the key word being framed, as those of our family were mostly loose in piles in old suitcases stashed in the back of closets. We told him we had no way of organizing ourselves, that we ate out of fast food bags rather than cook and bathed irregularly and had bad teeth. We told him our souls were in mourning that we had not been born Jews, that we were missing the torque and the will to shape our existence rather than be shaped by it.

And though none of the above was expressly said to poor Mr. Ornoff, there are times when revulsion must have its way.

Mr. Ornoff, being old himself, was in sympathetic accord with Mrs. Garatdjian, and understood the vortex of history that had ensnared her strange-looking offspring. And so he took their case. At the same time he was frank, in a gentle way, in his assessment of the situation. The odds were not great of winning a case that had Mrs. Garatdjian's signature on a termination agreement. The family could accuse Mr. Weill of being skullduggery central or Oil Can Harry, but the law was the law.

Celeste, a warning shot was fired across the bow of Simon Weill's pirate ship. We were now resisting him not simply with covert and possibly underhanded action—call it filching or playing the fiddle if you must—but in lawyerly language. Surprised and intimidated by our ire, Simon Weill's attorney called for a powwow that we might reason together. But it did not go as we had hoped or dreamed. For one thing, the attorney, Mr. Jonas Thrustener, had his office in a tower of power, a glass-and-steel structure on Park Avenue. For another, he was young and vigorous, with a gleaming head of hair and a face that killed you dead with its piercing smile and let you understand you were dealing with a man who possessed not only supreme intelligence but a mind with high craftiness content.

We sat at a large conference table of blond wood, and in the bright fluorescent lighting our shabbiness showed. Even Vera, who dressed well and was easily the most presentable, looked worn and out of place. We made the usual noises, Hannah piping up about her son and Luke asserting that Simon Weill had been taking more than his fair share and indulging in underhanded tactics in trying to browbeat our mother into signing a document that would put her out on the street. Impassioned as Luke was, his face betrayed vulnerability and when he had finished, he flinched, as if expecting a blow. Which he did receive, not from lawyer Thrustener in his pinstriped suit and glowing red tie but from Simon Weill himself who, paying no never mind to any environment that temporarily held him, dominated the room with the pitch of his weary voice, saying, "Luke, it used to be that I thought you might be a bit naïve, but now, well, I will just say I am sad to see it could be something else." Because Simon Weill was a master strategist. He understood that Luke wanted his love as much as he wanted the building. You may say that God is God and Weill is Weill, but that distinction did not hold for us. Do not doubt that it was painful to hear Luke's fumbling response. Because Weill had been clever enough to perceive that Luke himself would supply the word or words Simon Weill hadn't, and what could they be but those he had been calling himself all his life: stupid, incompetent, etc.

At this point Lawyer Thrustener circulated the original of the agreement for the family's perusal (yes, that was the word he used, in accord with his expensive suit and the heft of his head). Meanwhile Simon Weill returned to his preternatural stillness. The more quiescent he grew, the more he seemed to dominate the room. There was my mother's signature in black fountain pen ink on the foolscap. And yet, rather than separating us from our senses, it had a depressingly sobering effect. Altogether, the brief meeting seemed to be our introduction to the real world. How shabby and out-of-touch we were, with our conspiracy theory. We were the liars, not Simon Weill. We thought we could run a business by being in the world but not of the world.

"Are we done now?" lawyer Thrustener asked, when the agreement had been returned to him.

"You haven't seen the last of me. I have friends," said Hannah, beaming her fury not at Simon Weill but lawyer Thrustener.

“You have friends?” In his tone was heard slight disbelief.

“Don’t be smart with me, you pinstriped bastard. I’ll tear your face off.”

“This meeting is now over,” Lawyer Thrustener said.

“Nothing is over. Nothing can be over,” Hannah went on, but got no response from either Lawyer Thrustener or Simon Weill.

Celeste, we went from the lawyer’s office to a nearby coffee shop, where we squeezed into a big booth. It was hard for me to sit with my family, as daylight was not kind to us, mercilessly revealing the sorry, tired state of our flesh.

“Do you serve normal food?” my mother asked, as the black-jacketed waiter handed us menus.

“Only the best for you, lady,” the waiter replied, not knowing how close to trouble he was with Hannah. Mother went for a small bowl of rice pudding. The rest of us settled for tea or coffee except for Luke, who ordered a burger.

“When I’m hungry, I’m hungry,” Luke said. “I need my strength. You know what I mean?”

“Of course we know what you mean,” Vera said, not unkindly.

I had not sat in a restaurant of any kind with my mother since my church days and our Sunday evenings at the Horn and Hardart automat on Thirty-third Street and Eighth Avenue, and I could not imagine many more from how tired she looked.

There was one last spasm of resistance in the several months before the termination went into effect. In that time we began to withhold all the rent income from Simon Weill, placing most of it in an account that Luke opened at a bank down the block.

But Simon Weill didn't play. He sent the men who buttoned their knit shirts at the very top and wore pants with sharp creases and sleek shoes of Italian leather; and these men threatened to break Luke's bones one by one in many different places and do the same to get it on Brenda and her boy Benjy. They were the men with the steel vaults in their heads where they could seal away their deeds involving blood and gore. And so Luke had no choice but to submit in the face of their power.

I had been naïve in the matter of Jewishness, having assumed that even the worst of the race lived through his intellect and not with his fists. That the Israelites had brandished swords and caused rivers of blood to flow seemed to have no bearing on my image of the contemporary Jew as entirely pacific except in terms of his own survival, as in the case of modern day Israel. Not that Simon Weill was personally capable of breaking bones in many places, but evidently he was capable of countenancing it should his interests be threatened.

Now Celeste, a man who has nothing must find a way to have something, and you must understand that at this point in my life, with the building taken away, I had zilch. Oh, I had money. I did have that. I was a thief. I had stolen. I had gotten my own back. I had given myself the rich parents the world had not given me and the scholarship it had not provided me with either. But I had not given myself the internal structure and fortitude to deal with life on my own. The task was too scary. How was I to write an epic novel on my own resources? How was I to write any novel on my own resources? And yes, you may say, why didn't I go and take a job? But I had a job by now and that job was to sit at my typewriter writing white line continue or not writing white line continue but just to sit there. The world had not called to me. The world would never call to me. I was a Garatdjian, after all. What job would have me with my minuscule intelligence? I was not fit to work in an office. Surely I would find myself in disfavor and people would talk. And without a job I would daily erode my "savings" and someday, when the bank accounts had been drained, I would experience destitution, because I lacked the wherewithal to take care of myself.

Luther rang the bell and waited on the sidewalk outside the ground floor office. The residential building stood on One Hundred Sixth Street, just east of Broadway.

"What is it you want?" the dark-haired woman asked, holding her crossness in check while letting him know it was there waiting for him should he get out of line.

"Joo," it sounded as if she had said, in pronouncing the second person pronoun.

"I need to see the doctor."

"Why you need to see the doctor? Are you sick? You do not look sick."

"It is not a sickness that you necessarily see," Luther said.

"What you mean, not necessarily see? Do you think I am here for mystery?"

Luther was not about to give up, in spite of the obstacle. His sister Naomi had come to the same doctor. She had said the doctor was in possession of gold, that this doctor had the gift of making her feel good when the whole world wanted her to feel bad. And so Luther could put up with some static from the human obstacle course with the faint mustache and the bulging body wrapped in a white nurse's uniform. No bedside manner for this lady. "I have been having dark thoughts," he finally said.

“You no talk English to me. You talk some other language. You come in now and talk normal to the doctor. You show him some respect so I no have to hurt you. You understand what I say, or you just stand there like a stupido?”

“No, no. I understand perfectly well what you are saying,” Luther said, as he stepped inside.

Misery had found a place to manifest in the waiting room. A young woman sat wheezing, helpless to get more air into her lungs. He could only imagine her terror. Not wishing to be in sight of suffering, and was relieved when she was called into the doctor’s office.

“What can I do for you?” the doctor said, when Luther’s turn came.

“As I was telling your assistant”—

“I am not assistant. I am a nurse. Show respect,” the nurse said.

“As I was telling the nurse, I have been feeling sad. I need something to make me feel better.”

“Why are you sad?” the doctor said.

“There has been death in my family. We lost our business. Things of this nature have been happening.”

“And what would you like me to do for you?”

“Can you give me something to make me feel good?”

“I can prescribe for you a diet pill, but you must understand. You are thin now and if you take this pill and don’t eat, you may be happy but you will dissolve into thin air.”

Dissolve into thin air. Though the phrase stayed in his mind, he struggled to keep his response simple. He did not want to deter the doctor from his largesse with a faux pas. For some reason “I’ve Got My Love to Keep Me Warm” now came loudly into his mind, and it was everything not to sing at least the title, which was the only part he truly remembered.

“That would be so welcome,” Luther said.

“What?” the doctor replied.

“I am saying that a prescription for those pills would make me happy,” Luther said.

“You are wrong,” the nurse said. “Prescription no make you happy. Pill make you happy, Mr. Thin Air Man.” Here she began to chuckle and the doctor quickly joined her for a chuckle duo. Luther did not mind the pugnacious nurse and set aside his reservations about the complaisant doctor. Happiness was no small thing, and he left with the doctor’s prescription as the assurance of it in his hand.

Celeste, everything has its season, as we read in Ecclesiastes, and this applied, painful as it is to admit, to Bill Walton and the UCLA Bruins. Their seasons of unblemished excellence were coming to an end, an agent for this demise being an exceedingly tall center named Tom Burluson. It was he who, wearing the atrocious red and white colors of the North Carolina State Wolfpack, sought to drive Bill Walton down, to punish him exceedingly for his excellence. And let us not forget the stellar wingman David Thompson, he with the astronomical vertical leap, who attacked the basket with methodical ferocity. Into triple overtime the NCAA semifinal game went before NC State went ahead to stay, and the question can be asked, naïve as it may be: did the ugliness of the red and white have the right to drive down the blue and gold on that afternoon in Greensboro, North Carolina?

And so, if Bill Walton had to be driven down and those on suicide prevention watch called upon to see me through as I writhed in agony at the crushing of my hero, should not the old bones of our regime have been broken, pulverized, dispersed to the air that the building might be freed from our administration? Should Simon Weill not have done for us what we could obviously not do for ourselves? Was not an unintended consequence of his Machiavellian method to supply us with the freedom banner? Yes, he smote us with his stick of evil, but it was only what my mother and all of us wanted, if only we could speak the truth.

And so, should it be surprising that Richard Milhous Nixon was too hit with a stick and that the particular stick he was struck with should be the stick of outrage, and that he should be ejected out onto the White House lawn, eighty-sixed like some drunk from a bar, his title broken in half and tossed out with him?

But my mother was not tossed out. Maybe the filthy one would have done so had he been able to. Maybe it was only the reality that the apartment was rent controlled and hers to stay in so long as she wished.

It was quite right that the American standard “I’ve Got My Love to Keep Me Warm” should have entered his mind while he was in delicate negotiation with the doctor for the pills he was seeking because warmth was his and joy as well when he took the first capsule. Now he was well fortified against the forces that would drive him down. He had his Fastin by day to power his white line, continue output and the soothing comfort of alcohol by night. Oh happy day. Oh happy night. Oh happy day and night.

He did not tell Sarah that he was taking the feel-good diet pills. He kept the small amber prescription bottle hidden in the back of his file cabinet, where she had too much integrity to go. He did not want the shame her discovery of the bottle would bring. He did not want her to see that it was not him but the pill whom she was dealing with.

He did not know where the bottle would take him. So much juice was flowing in him when he took a capsule that he sometimes felt he could wait to get down to white line, continue, which was the whole purpose of the prescription in the first place. Sometimes it seemed to him that he needed to clean and reorganize his desk. Sometimes it was the refrigerator that needed tending to. At other times Time magazine or Newsweek pulled him in. Hours would go by and he would not have written a word. By that time the effect of the capsule would begin to wear off. The great store of joy would have dissipated and a frightening soreness would take hold. If Sarah said something, he would have to snap at her, push her back and out of the space of dwindling love she was trying to invade.

In July he said it was time for him to go away. He said he could not breathe the air of New York City anymore. His destination was Key West, Florida. By this time he had seen Key Largo, with Humphrey Bogart and Lauren Bacall and sleazy, insinuating Edward G. Robinson. Luther had known heartbreak that the innocent Osceola brothers, two Seminole Indians, should be shot dead for a crime they had not committed.

But he was not going for the Osceola brothers or Humphrey Bogart or the excellent quality of the film. He was going so he could clear his head of the building and better understand where he was as he continued with his writing project.

He had seen this film and many others from its time and before at a theater on East Eighth Street that had been lovingly restored by the owner, with stills of Greta Garbo and Katherine Hepburn and Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy and other giants of the cinema on the walls. The white-haired owner was of a mind to say that restoration was everything and that time was was better than time present, and he had many like him who didn't believe but had the experience that time was was better than time present, and not all of them were old like him but the young too were drawn to this house of venerable cinema.

Sarah was stronger by now. She was a restoration project herself and one that Dr. Frodkey, who belonged to time present and not time was, gladly undertook. He showed her photos of his country home and the gleaming appliances in his modern kitchen. He said his wife cooked only with the best utensils and that their primary reading matter were the catalogs from retailers they received in staggering quantities. He wanted her to think more in terms of consumption herself. He said it was important that she understand the bounty of the country she was living in, and that if she did not partake of the material feast, then the chances were good that she would deprive herself in the artistic and spiritual realm as well. If she wanted proof, she had only to look at Shakespeare. The bard had a universal palette—it was a well known fact that he would eat a roasted canary as well as broiled snake—which resulted in universal art.

“What about Franz Kafka. He was a hunger artist,” she replied.

“He was confused, as is everyone who lives in Prague. You must understand that the city sits in a basin and is susceptible to air inversions that weaken the mind and lead one to absurd thoughts.”

The man clearly had an answer for everything, thought Luther, who remembered the lengthy chemical formula Dr. Frodkey had laid on him at the mental hospital in answer to the question as to what medication he had prescribed for Sarah. The doctor, with his defiantly cheerful demeanor, might be in possession of some strange power, Luther was beginning to sense.

Whether possessed or not, Dr. Frodkey was intent on mobilizing Sarah’s resources for living. The man wanted her to consolidate her independence from her parents by getting a job. About this proposal Sarah was diffident. She had no marketable skills and besides, viewed the workplace with some disdain, as she had expressed those years before when she stormed out of the design studio after one day. The world was a monolithic entity with no need for her active participation. But she had heard the Yardbirds sing “For Your Love,” and while she had never been a great fan of the British rockers, she now had a new appreciation for the sentiment of the tune if not the mod ones’ singing talent. For Dr. Frodkey’s love she would put aside her antipathy toward the work world and not be bounded by the fear that perhaps informed it.

Such was Luther’s understanding of the situation.

Sarah found employment at Hamburger Heaven, on Thirty-fourth Street and Third Avenue. Luther marveled at the new spirit of willingness she showed as she left the loft each morning. It seemed to give her great joy to have this newfound connection with the world, and though Luther understood he had to be careful about any identification, he was led to recall his own ecstasy as a child delivering flowers for the local florist as a way of earning money for a Christmas gift for his mother, but also that his joy was compromised by the accompanying self-righteous scorn that he should be doing what his lazy sister Naomi couldn't or wouldn't do. And in truth there was a little of that going on with Sarah.

“Dr. Frodkey says my parents do a little bit of work and then reward themselves with long, leisurely vacations,” she remarked, after one of her sessions. Luther did wonder about the doctor's right to sit in judgment of Lydia and Peter, as they were the ones who were footing the bill for their daughter's twice-weekly sessions, Sarah's application for Medicaid having been rejected. Luther understood Dr. Frodkey's advocacy of her employment as a bill of indictment against her parents.

At times, Luther saw Sarah's employment as a kind of degradation and would weep that she had to make up her face and wear a uniform and wait on unfeeling businessmen and women at some burger joint. While he had often been afraid of what her success might mean for them in her glory days at the Boston Museum School, such success, he was finding, was far preferable to having to witness her fall from grace.

And sometimes too, if he was to be honest, joy and sadness over Sarah's new adventure were swept aside by a feeling of arousal seeing her in her black skirt and black tights and tight white blouse, which she wore with a red sash for a bit of panache. That arousal was heightened by her boss's admiration of her breasts in her interview with him.

“What a disgusting old goat,” Sarah had said.

Luther pictured the man with a slack mouth and a gleaming bald head and a grizzled face he wiped with a not very clean handkerchief. And it was not hard to imagine the executives who patronized the place thinking the same thing. A world that so far did not value her for her work but for her body.

“I must go away. I must go where it is warm,” Luther said to her as summer came.

“It's warm right here,” Sarah said, and in truth it was.

“No. I must go where it is really warm,” Luther said. “I must go to Florida, and to the very tip of it. I must go to Key West.”

“What is all this ‘I must’?” Sarah asked.

“A manner of speaking that asserts my earnestness,” he said.

“Are you OK?”

She was looking into him now. It was a dangerous time. No one must be allowed to destroy his diet pill bliss. No one. Minds must not penetrate that realm of secrecy. He had a right to his own happiness. And the pursuit of his own pleasure. Was that not guaranteed him in the Declaration of Independence? And if pleasure was not included, should it not have been?

“I am OK. I am just sad. I need the Florida sun and real Florida orange juice to bring me back.”

“You have been looking sad,” Sarah said.

“How do you mean, sad?”

“I don’t know. Sad, that’s all.”

Sometimes it was an act of courage to just leave a thing in the air and let it die or blow away or do whatever it was going to do rather than give it additional life with a response. He did not have that kind of courage, but he summoned it somehow as a way of informing Sarah Van Dine that she would never possess the power to reach into his mind and explore its contents at her whim as his mother, in the full power of her knowingness, had done. Opacity is a virtue, obfuscation not a vice, he heard that same mind tell him.

When Sarah accompanied him to Penn Station, all the angels of his past were gathered to rejoice at his freedom. In the arcade, over and above the noise of retail commerce, and in the waiting area did he hear those angels singing “Bringing in the Sheaves” and “Amazing Grace” and he saw his mother in her white linen gloves with the ribbed backs and he saw and smelled the gilt-edged pages of the King James Bible held by Pastor Cohn as he spoke his disappearing words. In the blaze of diet pill love, his life was rich with meaning and joy but also a sadness he could not put a name to. Oh, that such holiness should exist, the mix of the railroad in the locus of Pennsylvania Station with his mother and his family in transit to and from the tabernacle where the Christ Jesus was on the tongues and in the souls of one and all except for him. Because he was not going past the trains to the tabernacle, as he had done in all the Sundays of his childhood. He was going to his freedom.

While waiting at the gate to board the overnight to Miami, he had this thought. I must run on my long legs to the liquor store across the waiting area and buy two pints of Old Mr. Boston blackberry-flavored brandy. And so he did.

At Newark he placed a suitcase in the overhead rack for an elderly black woman who had just boarded.

“You are a fine young man. That I can tell,” she said, seeking to place the yoke of her approval on him.

Settled again into his seat, Luther began to read Pale Fire, by Vladimir Nabokov, but the novel, which began with a long poem, confused him. Footnotes were prominent as a device for carrying what seemed to be different story lines. The novel left him cold; it seemed the work of an icebound intellect.

In the dining car a group of teenagers had gathered. Printed on their red T-shirts were the words “Christians for Nixon.” Their adult supervisor, a big and wholesome-looking blond man, wore a T-shirt with the same messaging. Their shining faces suggested sunbeams for Jesus. He could see them holding their hymnals and doing their weeping and wailing thing and exploring the wasteland of Ezekiel and Obadiah. He too had an announcement to make deserving of a T-shirt of its own to the effect that goodness could be a form of captivity more punishing than sin. Oh, he didn’t know what exactly he wanted to say, but surely as RMN and the Christ Jesus were part of his experience he could establish a dialogue.

He began to drink as the train pulled out of Union Station in Washington, D.C., half-filling a waxed cup so he wouldn’t be seen with a pint bottle to his mouth.

Invigorated, he walked back to the lounge car, where American Graffiti was being projected on a big screen. Was that sadness Luther saw in the kids' faces as they watched this film about a high school prom in small-town America? Was it painful for them to be reminded that there was a real life out there beyond the rocks of ancient Judea, a life that included sex and drinking, that they were being excluded from by the preachers drunk on the Christ Jesus and their own disappearing words? Did they too have stirrings in their loins to abandon Christian virtue for the fleshpots of Egypt? And were they not wavering in their political faith—the affirmation on their T-shirts notwithstanding—in the villainous man with the five o'clock shadow blotto in the Oval Office well before noon? Well, he would have the night to pose these questions to the well-scrubbed ones guided in all their ways by holy scripture.

But now he had other work to be about. The slow, coaxing motion of the train had intensified. Now it was balling the jack and with the quickening of the pace came the need for physical expression of joy at the train's full-throttle rush into the realm of ecstasy. Down the aisle of one car after another he staggered, boosted by a pint and a half of brandy, till he came to the impediment of the baggage car, which proved no impediment at all. After pulling an axe from its clamps on the wall, he entered the car, packed with boxes and other cargo, and slid open the wide loading and unloading door. A full moon hovered over the red clay fields of North Carolina, into which he now flung the axe, having no thought of returning it to its rightful place because, in his hands, it had no rightful place but where he had tossed it. In this moment he saw not his drunken craziness but only a necessary expression of his freedom.

Celeste, I could have struck and killed someone. How am I to know I didn't?

Celeste, I could have been arrested and thrown in a North Carolina jail. How is it I wasn't?

When he came to, it was light out. The Florida sun had established its debilitating hegemony. The train sat in the Okeechobee station. The air conditioning had been shut off and the car was sweltering. His head felt like it had received a blow from a polo mallet, his skin was beaded with sweat, and he was suffering from cotton mouth. There was no mystery, no villain to apprehend, unless it was the two pint bottles that lay empty on the seat beside his.

The black woman who had sought to paralyze him with a goodness blessing the day before now showed him eyes wide with fright as she laid on him a sound denouncement, saying, "You got the devil in you, young man. You got him warring for your soul." And here she made a cross of her arms so as to drive him from her sight. And the young Christians for Nixon showed him some trembling fear, including a pretty teenage girl who cowered in her seat when he came up the aisle. He was not of a mind to search for clues as to his nocturnal enterprise following his visit to the baggage car. He could only assume, in a general way, that his communication with the young flock for Nixon had been intense and beyond their perceived bounds of decorum.

But soon the train was in motion again and the air conditioning revived for the last leg of the trip. From the slough of despond was his mind coaxed; now he could regard the sun not as an intimation of the hell to which he was bound but an invitation to the bright light of day. A song came to him, "It's a Big Wide Wonderful World," as it was sung in Sweet Bird of Youth, a poignant song in the context of the film. Such sadness he had felt for Chance Wayne, broken and possibly destroyed by thugs making war on beauty there on the screen in that neighborhood theater when Luther was but a teenager, his square head exposed for all to see in the bare bones of his adolescence.

But what was that, It's a Big Wide Wonderful World but a song of the past, of a different America, a song that could only give him the face of beaten Chance Wayne (aka Paul Newman) in the summer heat of a sleepy southern town? Why should he be in that sorrow gulch for Chance when Dave Loggins could deliver him a good deal of pathos for his own life with his little tune "Please Come to Boston"? The world was full of surprises. You walked into a Kentucky Fried Chicken outlet near the train station to get filled up and got to hear a song that meant more to you than Pale Fire ever could. All Dave Loggins wanted was for his girl to come join him, whether in Boston or Denver or Los Angeles, while he moved ahead with his singing career, but all she wanted was for him to return to Tennessee. I have found the song to have my vacation by, Luther thought, feeling it penetrate and claim ownership of him. The world may think it is a dippy song, but I must have it to live by, he also thought, while trying to find some meat content in the fare that had been served him in the prefab establishment. And he also thought this: no one must know how much this song means to me. No one must know the sweet sadness I live for.

Tears came to his bleary eyes as he thought of Sarah and the warmth of her body and her breath when he would wake next to her in the morning. He worried how she would cope without him and if he had told her often enough that he loved her. I am in the same state of mind as when I was a child at camp and concerned for my mother, Luther thought. I must weather this storm.

Celeste, the bus lacked air conditioning and made many stops along Route 1, and so it was three hours before we arrived in Key West. The midday sun was blazing, causing the road to shimmer in the intolerable heat. A rowdy, drunken man fell backward off the bus and struck his head on the pavement. He had been swigging bourbon out of a wide-mouth bottle that had no label, leading me to suspect he was getting bombed on moonshine. I thought of Lydia's journal entry some years before about how the beast came out in me when I drank, the same beast I had been seeing in that lanky, smelly yahoo. A sudden fear gripped me, in spite of the palm trees and the placidity of the water and the white boats upon it and the big hotels back in Miami Beach; I was in the South and the erotic call of the tropics notwithstanding, violence might have its place here.

I was given refuge at Mama Casals' boarding house, at the other end of Duval Street, away from the marina. Mama Casals, a woman in the thickness of middle age, was there herself to greet me on the front porch and show me to my room on the second floor. Her English was heavy-accented, as she was only here several years on the mainland after emigrating from Cuba with her uncle Pedro, a slight man with a trim gray beard and a manner as light as hers was stern.

"You are a reporter for the New York Times? You have important work you do? You write big story about Cayo Huesto?" she asked, having seen the Olivetti portable typewriter I had brought along for the trip in a carrying case.

“No. Nothing like that,” I said, as she bore down on me with her alertness. How was I to tell her that my interest was restricted to myself alone and so I had no abiding concern with the world beyond, whether it was the manatees or the palmetto bugs that horrifyingly covered the lawns at night or the history of the Keys? How was I to tell her that she was not the first, nor would she be the last, to ascribe to me a larger purpose than I possessed? It will not do to tell people that you are without the resources to cast a wider net than the one which you have cast over yourself. They will have to see that for themselves in time, as Mama Casals inevitably did.

And perhaps Pedro did as well, and right at the start, being possessed of more powers of perception than I initially credited him with. In his broken English, he spoke of standing in Grand Central Station next to an escalator on his one trip to New York City. At the bottom of the escalator sat a man with stumps for legs begging for change from passersby as they stepped off the escalator. Suddenly two policemen arrived and pulled him to his feet because yes, in fact he did have feet and legs as well that attached to those feet, which he had somehow concealed in his baggy trousers. After a warning from the police the man ran off with a sheepish grin to doubtless practice his scam at another underground site.

“This I seed in New York. In New York. Is what the city is, big big fakery.” Pedro laughed, as if life was one big scam and he was a witness to it.

In the room hung a watercolor of a small wooden house on the water's edge in a rural setting. The house was painted a triumphant forest green with red trim. I say 'triumphant' because it defeated my senses, brought me to my knees in longing for its peace and perfection. The world may be full of color, but most structures do not signify at depth, as this house did in its utter simplicity. We all long to go home, Celeste. We all long to be in that place of peace and so I spoke to the house by day and was comforted by its presence at night.

I wrote two pages a day, on onion skin paper, as I had read somewhere that Hemingway's manuscripts were written on the same thin, delicate paper. I worked in the morning and early afternoon. Even then I was suspicious of the sun and its true intention, remembering what it had done to me in Puerto Rico and in the Coney Island days of my childhood. I set 3 pm as a time to appear on the beach, when the sun had spent some of its toxic viciousness.

To be honest, Celeste, when I say "work," I feel that I deserve repeated punches to the face by a big, strong, and remorseless man. I took my feel-good pill first thing in the morning and would sit imprisoned in sweet emotion at my little Olivetti 32 portable. A feeling of synthetically produced love would attach to the people who came into my mind—Sarah, her mother, her father. The spell was often impossible to break free from, and what writing I did was little more than a diary in manuscript form, my subject being mostly the events of the previous day.

The beach was mainly coral, with pockets of sand, facing the Atlantic, and often deserted. Each afternoon I would come to the same spot with half a ham hero, slathered with mustard, so I could feel substantial in my own sight and the sight of others, should they appear and witness me in my black bathing suit. I should say that the shadow I cast on the sand was not as slight and meager as in previous years. I seemed to perceive a subtle hint of substance, and this was important to my confidence.

But such confidence was lacking to show myself as I was on the streets of Key West. Even in the extreme July heat I wore long pants and sneakers, lest those with bodies beautiful see the bulky apparatus of my knees and my irregular toes. We stand naked before God more easily than before our fellow creatures.

At night would my narcissism emerge. With some color added to my flesh and having showered, I could imagine myself as reasonably attractive in that lush darkness, the warm, soft air carrying the cadenced sound of crickets. The alcohol I consumed in the bars along Duval Street grew my appetite for sex. How unappealing that last phrase, and the image it conjures of a devouring creature of the night, a lustful raptor loose in the watering holes of Key West.

Now Celeste, the possibility of being closer to nature in a warm climate made a calling sound to many in the cities of America, with the result that some stayed beyond their scheduled time for departure. Such a one was Alice Glint, burned brown by the sun to a hideous degree. She had left Brooklyn and her marketing job for a one-week vacation twenty years ago never to return and was now living in a tent on a lagoon a short distance from the town. When I asked how she survived, she simply said she had her ways and no, she had not been in touch with family or friends. All of that was dead to her, she said, burned from her consciousness by the sun. "You have to understand that the sun makes you free, it makes you high. It's like a never-ending fuck." In just such a way did she speak, as if she had glimpsed the end of time and was frantic for a party before it came. Celeste, perhaps there is the potential for a radical departure in all of us, and it only requires the right set of circumstances to be activated. And yet, whatever galvanized Alice Glint was not, in my eyes, entirely attractive. I saw sorrow. I saw escape. I saw annihilation. And yet, and yet, do we not all have the desire to rise up against the ties that would bind and walk away?

That same night I met a girl, though she was more than that, being solid in her credentials as an emergency room nurse. Let us say that her name was Margaret Whiting and that the smell of death was strong in her, as it was every night she performed her tour of duty. And let us say that, having been face to face with demise in that environment of blood, her ears ringing with the moans and shrieks of pain from those with ravaged bodies, she saw my invitation to go out on the pier by the strip of beach I daily visited as a call to life from a merciful stranger. Whatever, she decided to place an element of trust in me. The obvious is important to state here, Celeste. She had her own calculation to make and her own needs that had to be met. She too had a right to the freedom path that sex temporarily provided, and so, in the murmuring night, we set forth on that pier.

A young black boy, slight of frame, with a beautifully shaped head and eyes as luminous as the moon above, followed after us, his bare feet feathery on the wooden slats, as if he were on a laid-back mission to reconnoiter our substance. Only heaven and his mysterious heart can say what his relations were to this environs of white folk, or tally the reserves of strength and intelligence he needed to navigate his way. With us he spoke a concise language laden perhaps with hidden meaning.

“Barracudas in that water. Take out a chunk of your leg. Fuck with you halfway to death.”

We didn't dispute his cautionary words but just let him have his say. Sensing he had made his presence felt, he went off, and as he left I removed my clothes and sneakers and climbed down the ladder into the warm and welcoming water. Margaret followed after. Somehow, I had assumed she would. Even that close to shore the bottom was far below my feet, and I struggled to hide my fear as the minutes passed of large fish using me for a meal. Evidently, Margaret experienced no such sense of crisis but was one with the vast and terrifying ocean we had been called to. The butterfly, the crawl, the sidestroke, the backstroke, she put them all on display while, my strength and confidence fading, I was reduced to doggie paddle mode. I wondered, for a time, if she was mocking me with her aquatic prowess, but she was beyond such dinky stuff. It all went back to what I said earlier; having seen death, she chose life. That night, on the pier, she gave herself to me as she had given herself to the water. We made what bed we could of our clothes and lay there less than a minute following the end of our mating when a powerful and blinding light was shone on us, like those footlights that obscured the audience in the play, Major Barbara, I had a part in back in high school. We dressed hurriedly. I cannot speak for Margaret, but for myself I felt no shame, only apprehension. A trooper awaited us outside his patrol car. He did not linger but got back in and drove off slowly, and so I would have to believe he had received what he had been looking for, a glimpse of her naked beauty, and now he wanted to take that memory into the night and savor it. And yet, Celeste, I have to also believe he had a heart bigger than his uniform and understood the gravitational force on the young pulling them to the earth, one on top of the other. I have to believe that he was saying sex in the Key West night was beyond his jurisdiction, and that he would only have to throw stones at himself for his hypocrisy if he had placed the cuffs on us, as he had likely done the same thing when he was young and unrestricted by the demands of time.

Celeste, the question on my mind is whether I will see this Margaret Whiting again and if she remembers me. Do you suppose I have a place in her consciousness or was our skinny dipping venture for her a common occurrence, one such experience blurring with another? We have to take stock of our time on this earth, and find significance where we can. We must reconnoiter the past for those pockets of warmth, and note that the fires we are seeking are mainly generated by connection, no matter how ephemeral. Is it possible that there are too many cold dark spots, Celeste? Is that possible? And then we must acknowledge the error we have just made and say firmly that the fires we are seeking are one fire and that fire is only generated by God.

Suppose we are all destined to meet again and remove our masks and acknowledge the part, if only minor, that we played in each other's lives? We cannot dismiss the possibility that the computer, with its data-synthesizing power, demonstrates, to a small degree, the supreme information-gathering power of God himself, down to the last infinitesimal detail, and that random encounters are not so random after all. And I am not sanguine that God's final tally will be in my favor. Yes, I have prayed daily to be taught how to love, but my judgments remain fierce and my disdain is easily summoned, especially when people crowd in on me. Some discipline is required to refrain from speculating as to what or whom I may encounter on the other side, and sometimes, laughable as it may sound, my fear is that my father will be waiting to have at me for the slanders, big and small, I have uttered about him to those who would listen. As I have told you many times, Celeste, I cannot bear to have photos of my father on the wall. Back into the closet they must go. Why? Because he takes up so much space and I can think of nothing but his fierce countenance when his image is displayed. Even with a wall separating us, he manages to penetrate, as he did in the days of old.

Now Celeste, I understand that I am on the path of digression here, but we cannot hold ourselves to too high a standard. Things are going back and forth more and more and an appropriate dubiousness about the linearity of time is growing. Regardless, let me here recommit to disciplining my mind. Let this be so, dear God. Let this be so.

Celeste, there was another contact I made during my stay in Key West, Florida. A thin girl with anxiety showing in her pretty face entered my path and accompanied me back to my room. Though she forewarned me that she had entered her menstrual cycle, we moved forward with lovemaking. Afterward, she surprised me, not with a denouncement, but with an observation delivered with utter candor in a state of terror: "You are the remotest man I have ever met," Denise Blakely declared, after dressing hurriedly in the cutoff jeans and T-shirt she had quickly shed. She was holding a mirror up to me, but it was a mirror I could not look into after she fled out the door, leaving behind the stark image. Was it any different, Celeste, than that girl I picked up in Central Park some years before who said to me, without elaboration, "You should see yourself"? We all have our own way of processing information, and if Denise Blakely thought I would take her words to heart and weep long into the night over the deformity of my being, the truth is something else. What did happen was that not so long into the night I began to laugh, a loud, uncontrollable crazy laugh that seemed to feed on itself. If I could attach any meaning to her words whatsoever, it was only that I was sufficiently powerful to draw her to me and cause her to flee, and what was wrong with that, a little power in the life of a flat-headed, low IQ thing like me?

Now Celeste, in all this time Mama Casals was watching. Like the woman from Newark on the Amtrak to Miami, she started with a rating of goodness in her estimation of me only so the pendulum could swing and she could have the satisfaction of later uttering a denouncement, as where there is good what else can there be but bad? Had she seen me come in with the girl that night? Had she seen the girl flee into the street after an hour in my room? Had she seen the evidence of menstrual flow I had tried to wash from the sheet with salt and warm water? No final determination of the nature of her fault-finding investigation has as yet been concluded. All we can safely say in the aftermath of the girl's visit is that her expression of disapproval came not as a verbal outburst but in a manner toward me that was decidedly cold. A landlady such as Mama Casals will always seek to place a young man such as myself in her custody, and a young man built along my lines will give the appearance of acquiescing to a surrender of self to her power. And what is that power, but the power of goodness, as I have just stated. And as I have also said, we must seek release from this tendency till it no longer rules us. If all this sounds extreme, we can only reply that freedom is worth the struggle to emerge into our individual self. We are not here to be the sum total of other people's aspirations for us, to be a goodness slave, to live a life along lines laid out for us rather than the path we need to follow for our own full realization. I am not saying this well, Celeste. I recognize that this is so and that you may dismiss it as more of my hazy foolishness, but we have to persevere with the hunches that come to us and see where our intuition leads.

My mother's goodness was a blinding force, as blinding as the light that trooper shone on Margaret Whiting's nakedness. I couldn't see beyond her aura to who she had been before it imposed its hegemonic reign. But suppose God himself hadn't always been God? Suppose he had badness in him before goodness could follow? Because what is the light without the darkness? Does it even exist? Of this earlier life my mother would say that God had not been in her and she had not been in God, but while she freely acknowledged this phase, she presented it in a general way. Without the particulars, I had no real picture of my mother as she had been, and yet, is it possible such a picture might have been improper? Suppose she had given me, with marvelous brevity, all I needed to know? In fact, Celeste, let me accept that I have reached a dangerous dead end and abandon this line of thinking right now lest I forever be perceived as a creature given to total disrespect. Why dangerous? You ask. Because we also put ourselves at risk of a ferocious blow. Do you not hear my mother say, after a hard strike to my face that has sent me to the floor, "Let this be an end to your freshness. Let this be an end. Did you think you could treat me as dirt forever?" So yes, that is the humiliation that awaits us if we do not toe the line.

The sun over Key West midday in July is a punishing thing, as I have noted, Celeste, and summoned to mind the pastor's message of repentance. But by late afternoon that same sun would lose some of its power and maybe there would be cloud cover, and I would stare from the second floor balcony of the rooming house down to the used-car lot across the street, row after row of Fords and Chevrolets and Buicks, and at the banner of brightly colored plastic pennants above them flapping in the gentle breeze and I would think, I have found where I want to be for the rest of my life. Even with my meager body did I want to be a child of the sun in a setting that commingles nature with artifact and the promise of the island warmth of Cuba only ninety miles away.

Now many things happened in this time, there being a tempest in the air. Babies born, people dying at their appointed time, whether young or old. There were the usual gruesome iniquities that made you question your place in this world and also unspeakable acts of kindness. People fell, intentionally or otherwise, on the subway tracks and practiced the sly trick of looking the other way as a train bore down on them and effected their demise. And while it is cruel to attach blame to such victims, the perverse streak still lives in me that would punish those injured or deceased in accidents, so-called. Perhaps it is that some residue of the god of punishment still lives in me along with a belief in individual responsibility and a special loathing for those who would make me bear witness to scenes of gruesome carnage. And yet in some way that I do not pretend to understand, we do consent to our own misfortune, and perhaps it is for that reason that I have always had some reservations about certain grief choruses, the question arising in my mind whether they were in the realm of the histrionic. In any case, like many others I washed my face in the newspapers so I could be abreast of the affairs of the nation and emote with tears of joy and sadness as well, but I was, as that girl Denise Blakely perceived, wrapped in remoteness, wanting, as I did, only the sweetness of life, not its trials and tribulations.

Today, and this is something you may know, Celeste, I say to myself, "Would you like a cup of tea, Luther?" Only that is not me speaking. If I may say, the love of the universe is channeled into that voice. And so I reply, "Oh yes, I really, really would." And that is not me speaking either. Who is it, then, you say? It is the little boy in me, that is who, the little boy who must be comforted, educated, convinced, that he is loved. Because that little boy is used to a brittle tone of voice, a temperamental tone of voice, a voice that says, "Are you trying to aggravate me? Will you make me get up? Because if you make me, I just don't know what I might do." And as for those who would accuse me of the overuse of "really," I can only say the adverbial repetition is essential in order to convey the joy the child is feeling.

She was different when he returned and he was as well. They were strangers to each other. There had been occasional letters back and forth but no phone contact. He couldn't say why. He was in a space that was precious to him and was afraid she would bring him down from his high. He had given himself the proper excuse for leaving in the first place—the termination of his family's management of the building. She had no cause to doubt his departure was for any other reason than to clear his head.

He could see in the weak smile she gave him as he stepped off the train that she hadn't missed him and that she was on the verge of saying their whole relationship had been a mistake based on a preposterous need that was no more now that circumstances had changed.

Driven by fear, he searched for her diary. He found the composition book, the kind with a mottled cover and the multiplication table inside, under the cushion of a chair in her studio. He was a snoop. Disgusting, sneaky, cowardly, morally indefensible—he did not allow such words, even as they came, to shame him into inaction. He had made her his life's work, in a sense. She was his signature achievement, and there was a story to tell. He was living his novel, if that's what it was, as he wrote it, so why should he deprive himself of source material?

Her writing was as colorful as the paints on her palette and served to remind him that even in his chosen area of specialization she far exceeded him. And because he lacked the capacity to emulate the style of a superior mind, there was little for him to do in his account but offer a paltry summary of her days in his absence. His thin sentences lacked all capacity to convey the sexual charge of her chronicle.

A young waiter named Julio had taken to her and she to him. Julio was generously endowed. He had the staying power Luther lacked. He knew how to pleasure a woman. She admired his ambition—a waiter by day and an accounting student by night. But her doubts grew. He began to behave aggressively. He did a lot of drugs. He was fairly coarse and they really didn't have much in common. When another waitress came to Hamburger Heaven and he began to chase after her, she was relieved.

Lane entered the narrative. She flew to Boston to visit the school and be with him. Their time together was less than satisfying. His attitude was one of complaint. With some money he had inherited, he had opened a gallery, but the artists he showcased were ungrateful for his help. Dissatisfaction was a way of life for Lane, she began to sense.

Luther experienced the voyeur's titillation as well as pain at his lover's betrayal. Not that betrayal was the right word, as his own wildness was no secret from her.

Grayness entered the picture as he read about Lane. Was opening a gallery the proper career path for a young man with his prodigious artistic gift? It seemed such a sad misuse of his ability, like a star baseball player suddenly retiring to the front office. Luther wondered if genius Lane might be tainted with the same problem as Sarah. Maybe he wasn't such a star after all. Suppose they could only hit minor league pitching? Suppose major league heat was too much for them? Still, it did not seem right that stars should fall before his own eyes. It did not seem right at all.

Reading in her diary had an aphrodisiacal effect; libidinal frenzy was now causing him inner turmoil. Once again he perceived sex as a competition, a race; he would have to get busy again if he was to gain a healthy distance on Sarah, given her recent activity.

He did not speak of his hurt. He had no right to, given all that he had done. Besides, her thing with Julio had run its course and her trip to Boston had been an unsuccessful attempt to return to the past. He understood that she was with him and he was with her.

But Sarah herself had something to say.

"You have been in my journal. You are a despicable and pathetic snoop. You would steal from me everything you can, but you can't steal my talent, you talentless fool. Do you understand?"

“Why do you talk to me this way?”

“Dr. Frodkey and I are on to you. You are nothing but a hound dog.”

“Yes,” Luther said.

“A drunken hound dog.”

“Of course,” Luther said.

“I am not your life. I am a part of your life.”

“Yes.”

“I am not your field of study. Try botany. Try learning something real.”

“Yes, flowers are nice, and I don’t know too many of them,” Luther said.

“How is it you haven’t asked me how I know you are a snoop?”

“I really couldn’t say,” Luther said.

“I am on to you. That’s how I knew. I have my strategies for detection.”

“Strategies for detection. That is a good one.”

“Don’t start with me, Luther. Don’t start.”

“Start. That is another good one.”

“I said don’t start, not start.”

“Yes.”

It was a new beginning.

Luke also had a new beginning. Simon Weill found a use for him in the new regime he installed at the building.

“I am making you part of the management team. You and I are one. Do you understand? One.” Simon Weill spoke in just this way to Luke, and Luke listened, absorbing every word. For emphasis, Simon Weill raised his right index finger, holding the digit straight before bending it toward Luke for the penetrating emphasis that he was seeking. Thus, Simon Weill was working on Luke with his mind and his words and his gestures, as he had need of healing the divide that mistrust had wrought in the termination fracas. Having knocked Luke down, he was now intent on raising him up.

“Sure. Sure I understand,” Luke said, and he did. He could feel Simon Weill entering through every pore and inflating him so he could assume a stature that had not been his own before. Because Simon Weill had given Luke no reason to hate him. He had not done a search and destroy on Mrs. Garatdjian. He had not bundled her possessions and thrown her and them onto the street. He had not treated her like the dirt she said she was sometimes treated like, the dirt beneath her shoes. No, no, Simon Weill said she could stay right where she was, and Hannah could stay right where she was in room 2C3. And Rachel could continue to look for Jesus from the window of room 7A6. The main thing, of course, was that Luke would be able to stay on in the penthouse with Brenda and Benjy. Never mind that the family’s apartment was rent-controlled and thus Simon Weill had no business proposing that Mrs. Garatdjian move in the first place, Simon Weill having had the notion to place her in a strip mall town in New Jersey where she knew no one so she could experience the ache of loneliness in unfamiliar surroundings connected with no one and die within a year. Because Simon Weill hadn’t known what it was for her to come to America to live in that squalid apartment and to feel in her bones that she needed to die there, and he didn't care to know, nor had he known the aspiration of Hannah and what it meant when she said no one was to deprive her and her son, no one, that she might be camping out in a room on the same floor but that apartment was hers, it was owed her, and that one day she would live there alone with her son. And to take a first step toward making that a reality, she vacated her room and moved into the apartment so Simon Weill could not say she had no claim to it when Mrs. Garatdjian passed on. Because if she had been cheated by life, she wouldn't be cheated by Simon Weill anymore than she had to be.

Celeste, we don't know what it is to be an eldest daughter. We don't know the storm signals in their minds and the caution flags and red and yellow lights they must face on their road of life. We don't know the factors they are weighing and even they may not know. Do you understand? We must not judge. We must not.

So Simon Weill did not throw them out in the street, but now it was for Mrs. Garatdjian to pay Rachel's rent, as she no longer had it at her discretion to assign rooms to the Garatdjian children rent-free. They were simply tenants in the building their aunt had once owned and then managed for many years.

Simon Weill brought in a man named Stavros Stavigos and introduced him to Luke as one of a number of new investors in the property. He said Stavros Stavigos would be providing overall direction from that point on and Luke must work closely with him, as Mr. Stavigos had a proven business record.

"You want my philosophy? I am Greek, and we are big on philosophy. You know that about us, right? Plato? Aristotle?" Mr. Stavigos asked, when Simon Weill had left.

“Oh yes, I have heard about them,” Luke said.

“And would you like to learn about my philosophy?”

“Sure. Sure I would,” Luke said, trying to be respectful of Mr. Stavigros, whose aggressive manner might be a cover for gross insecurity. Mr. Stavigros tilted his head for a different angle of vision into Luke’s eyes, as if to better fathom Luke’s thinking.

“Brown. You understand?”

“I’m not sure,” Luke said.

“You’re not sure?”

“Not exactly.”

“Not exactly.” Mr. Stavigros’s repetition suggested that he was building something, and he delivered right away. “What color is your elimination?”

“What?”

“Your matter.”

“I’m sorry. What is my matter?”

“We are talking philosophy here, are we not?”

“I guess so. Sure,” Luke said.

“Tell me what color is your elimination?”

“My what?”

“Your shit, if we must use such language.”

“Brown, mostly,” Luke replied.

“And that is what we are going to do here. We are going to brown the building.”

“Brown the building?”

“We are going to shit on the building, to use the language you understand, since you really don’t understand philosophy.”

“What kind of philosophy is that?”

“The philosophy of all living things, my friend. From the dung heap grows the rose. So we are going to do a giant shit on the building to make it grow.”

“You’re going to shit on the building?” In spite of himself, Luke began to laugh.

“You make fun of what you don’t understand, my friend, but do you see the clothes I am wearing?”

“Yes,” Luke said.

“Nice clothes, yes? High quality shoes and pants and jacket and shirt. What color are these clothes?”

“Brown,” Luke said.

“Exactly. And because they are brown I have been able to grow.”

Like the rose, Luke thought, but did not say.

“Because sometimes you have to shit on things to make them better. That is philosophy talking now.”

Harry Stavigros should have been named Harry Brown, Luke thought. Brown clothes. Brown skin. Only his hair was black. Still, he wasn’t as crazy as his words; he didn’t literally pull down his pants and poop on things, but he did call in a brigade of workers to coat the lobby walls and ceiling with light brown paint and go from floor to floor applying his signature color to the landings and the hallways. The Rolling Stones could sing "Paint It Black" all they wanted. Harry Stavigros sang "Paint It Brown."

Luther, for his part, was reminded of his Hell's Kitchen apartment and how he had applied brown paint to those walls, though not led to that choice by philosophy, a field beyond the ability of his mind to grasp.

This was a hard time in the life of the country. Along with tears of joy, there were tears of sadness and even grief for the departed Richard Milhous Nixon, who had vacated not the premises of the earth but of the White House, where he would never again be blotto in the Oval Office. RMN would need years of isolation to understand his loss and the reasons for it, and never really acknowledge that it was due to anything more than the maliciousness of the running dogs of savagery.

Was it right to topple a man from the pinnacle of success? Was it not too far to fall? Was it not easier for a poor man to accept his poverty than for a once wealthy man to accept his reduced station in life? But one brake on Luther's sadness for RMN was the ex-president's face. It was, after all, not a visage that suggested greatness. And yet, Luther was more inclined to ascribe criminal intent and fascistic tendencies to messengers Haldeman and Ehrlichman than he was to RMN, for in them the appearance of high peeve content was more apparent than it was in their former boss, who after all had a mind that could inhabit the loftier regions of foreign policy planning, such as rapprochement with China. Haldeman as a boy would have delighted in giving Indian burns while it did not seem a stretch to see Ehrlichman clad in the black leather of the Gestapo.

Hannah had a harder time with RMN's departure, as her love affair had been longer and deeper. "They will pay and pay and pay," Hannah said.

"Who are they?" Luther asked.

"Don't be fresh with me," Hannah replied.

"I'm not being fresh. I'm simply asking who 'they' are."

"Moses," Hannah screamed, there in the family apartment, where they were living now.

And in that moment that Hannah beckoned Moses to her with the command and control power she exercised over him, waves of fear washed through Luther, who was seeing his worst fear confirmed. Moses was indeed Hannah's instrument of revenge to whom she had assigned ultimate responsibility for Luther's demise.

Moses did not disappoint. He arrived from the interior in his full dimension, the word "strapping" having long since come to apply.

"You rang?" Moses asked, in a tone half-bored, half anticipating what the summons might signify, given the cold and ominous look he now gave his uncle.

"This is my son. You are welcome here so long as you don't disrespect me. Is that clear?" Hannah asked, directing herself to Luther.

"A lot is clear," Luther said, seeking to elevate, through ambiguity, above the humiliation his oldest sister would impose on him.

“That’s not showing respect. My mom asks you a question and you talk back to her like that. You know what I’m saying?”

“Do you know what you’re saying?” Luther asked.

“You’re not well, man. I can see into your mind and it’s messed up, it really is. You should get some help. And you’re all bones. If I was to punch you, my fist would go right through, so I’m going to cut you some slack. But don’t come in here disrespecting my mom again unless you want me to mess you up. You hear what I’m saying?”

“Do you hear what you’re saying?” The interrogatory had become his only defense against the onslaught.

“All right. That’s enough,” Hannah said. “Just remember that my son and I are watching you.”

“Of course,” Luther said.

“You see. There you go again with your smart mouth disrespect. Maybe I will just put a hole in your chest,” Moses said, taking a step toward Luther.

“No, Moses, no. We’ve made our point,” Hannah said.

Celeste, some of us are meant only for a life of quiet, given the circumstances we were born into and the conduct of our lives in our earlier years. For some of us there is nothing to do but to sit on a park bench and talk to ourselves under our breath so no one else can overhear and bring harm to our being. Or in the privacy of a bathroom, we tap with one finger five times on a particular wall tile, or maybe on several such tiles, deciding first which one or ones are least likely to be identified by those who are on our trail as the ones we selected, because if they guess right, then we are completely undone, our peaceful world has been invaded and ruined for all time. Or we sit on a public bus facing passengers across the aisle and dare them to notice that we have positioned our feet at an acute angle where the toes are facing inward toward each other or at an obtuse angle so our toes are facing away from each other, each angle unnatural and slightly uncomfortable but not necessarily noticeable as such in the eyes of others. And this too will be a measure of our freedom, that we can position our feet in these ways without consequence to our status as ghosts in witness to this world of pain.

His sickness was with him. If he thought of a drink, he had to have a drink, and the same applied as well to sex. Should the impulse arise in him, he was soon en route to an X-rated movie theater, either in the Times Square area or on east 59th Street. There he would gorge on scenes of men with big things doing it to women who wanted to have it done to them, and the more beautiful and willing the woman seemed to be, the more aroused he would grow, as if the basic question whether women truly enjoyed sex had not been definitively answered for him. In spite of his own experience, there lingered the notion that sex was imposed on women by men and that men lured or coerced them into pornography. If penetration in the smaller orifice appeared to cause the woman pain, or if there was any hint of coercion, or if signs of drug addiction, such as track marks on the arms, were apparent, then he would be downcast. For his spirits to rise and his libido to rev, the porn had to be good. And yet, even when the belief that they enjoyed a large penis in their mouth and between their legs and even in the third orifice grew in him as he sat in the dark theater, it would soon dissipate in daylight.

Gone were the names of award-winning films on the marquees of these theaters fallen from glory; in their place was “Debbie Does Dallas” or simply “X-rated films.” He would wait until pedestrian traffic was slight and have cash in hand to avoid having to linger at the ticket window.

Celeste, I went where my mind took me, to these musty venues where men sat scattered in the mostly empty rows. The signs of degeneracy were not written large on their faces. Some were young, like me, and some were middle-aged and in suits and trench coats, and some were old and grizzled. An X-rated film will not put lewdness into the countenance of the viewer. We were men who had succumbed to a basic desire, and while I cannot speak for the others, for me the success of these films was not dependent solely on the quality of the female performers (there is no need to call them actors). It was also required that the man have a truly big thing, such as legendary Johnny Holmes, and if the male was small or only ordinary in that department, then sadness dispiritedness would reign in me.

We must allow for the possibility that these people in the course of their work were angels of a certain kind. How many of us were saved from AIDS in the next decade by such X-rated films being available for viewing in the privacy of our homes on cassette tapes? How many? Rather than lead us to an engagement with the opposite sex, they moved us farther from them, and so lessened the likelihood of risky encounters with women carrying the virus. Such was my understanding at the time.

Celeste, impropriety was my calling card for many years. I cannot tell you it wasn't. Under the influence of alcohol and other substances I ran naked through the streets of Manhattan, and you yourself were a direct victim of such excess, but we can offend by taking off our clothes on paper as well, and I do fear whether a scrupulous inventory of this kind is not a form of exhibitionism in its own right. Just this minute I hear the chorus of aye-aye sayers seeking to confirm my doubt, those who would meticulously weigh every word for public consumption. We must accept that there are those congenitally and by other circumstance opposed to us. Let us not fear them, let us proceed with the naked truth, as the truth is so aptly described.

There is an old joke, Celeste. A man says to his friend, "Hey, why don't you apply for a Fulbright?" And the friend replies, "A Fulbright for a half-bright?" And yet a mind, whatever its quality, is subject to influences, and mine was trending away from the world of men and deeper into that of women. What I mean is that manly vigor and assertiveness did not attach to me and a degree of cowardice was established early on as part of my makeup. I was the boy who hid, trembling, behind Momma from my father and big bad Simon Weill, the boy afraid to take a beating, afraid of so much in the realm of the real man.

But enough of digression, which in any case cannot explain why I should have placed an ad in the personals section of The Village Voice. Bisexual young man seeks bisexual woman for communication and adventure. Something of this kind was the gist of the ad, which ran for two months. The responses, for a time, were heavy. I had rented a box at the post office down on Canal Street, and several times a week I would enter the pink art deco building and leave with letters from throughout the country written by women who described themselves as having a sexual orientation similar to mine. Some would enclose their photos along with their contact information. Here let me say I was shadowed by a sense that I had completely lost my moral bearings, if ever I had had them, and would, at these times, see my life as a series of subterfuges: the thievery from my mother's pocketbook and then Auntie Eve's apartment; the seeking out of adult men for sexual purposes in childhood; the increase in this sexual activity in my teen years with men while I was seeing Jane Thayer; the renting office chapter; and now this. I was not a psychopath, Celeste. At times I would shudder, thinking of unsuspecting Sarah back in the loft, at having gone so far off course. But then there was the laughing thing within me. Yes, great peals of laughter as if to mock my doubts and scruples away and challenge all those who would hold me within the bounds of their convention.

For a time I gorged on insanity sandwiches, eating them at all hours of the day. What do I mean by such ludicrousness, you say? What does any man mean who brings the filth of the world into his home while believing it is his salvation? I placed these pieces of correspondence at the back of the olive green file cabinet I had picked up for a couple of bucks down on Canal Street. Its color and vintage led me to believe the file cabinet dated from World War II. In my mind formed an association of it with the valorous men who sacrificed themselves for our country in that time. The things of war remind us of the unity fostered by a shared purpose. We all long for that connection, Celeste, and can only ultimately find it in God, who gathers together the disparate strands. Never mind any of this. Never mind, I hear you say, impatient to understand what exactly those letters meant to me. Only this. They were an instance of America singing—Nebraska and Idaho and Kansas and Iowa, as well as hedonistic California, singing their song of love and telling me there was a world out there if only I could reach it, as clearly The Village Voice had?

But there was something other than song I was hearing, something more like shrieking. Did we want my mother all over again willing my hand open so she could shame me over the stolen quarter? More currently, did I need to hear Sarah adapt her statement about my alcohol consumption on seeing me open a pint bottle of Clan MacGregor scotch—“People in my family do not drink like that”—when she discovered the letters and the racy photos that accompanied some of them? Was my peace of mind to be sacrificed to their physical presence in our domicile? The answer was, over the course of two days, an increasingly loud no. This tangible proof of my desire to explore new territories had to go.

Into tiny pieces did he shred these items for deposit not in one garbage can but many, and over a period of days, so not even the most obsessive detective could gather and piece together the paper trail. Further, he conditioned himself so that the drop-offs were performed in the most casual manner, as if he were simply discarding a candy wrapper. Because always the eyes of those ready to inflict a merciless beating were on him, should he step out of line. And what was all this purging but a recognition that he still needed the light of Sarah's love. Should that light go out, he would have to live in darkness.

Only one response contained a phone number, and that he did save, though he destroyed the letter; there had been no accompanying photo. He kept the number on his desk, the first three consecutive digits on one page of a manuscript and the other four on another page in faint pencil. Sarah, who was blessed with a higher character than his own, was not given to sleuthing and snooping, but on the chance that her suspicions were aroused by his behavior, she would have difficulty making headway with such an easily unnoticed lead. It pleased him that his secret was in plain view and yet virtually undetectable.

Celeste, one item did share space in that file cabinet with my manuscripts, and that was the bottle of Fastin. If I had known shame over the Clan MacGregor scotch, how much more devastating would it be should Sarah learn that I was being powered by speed, call the drug what you will? Then would my somber mien and so much more be understandable to her.

A man answered. He was not friendly or unfriendly but simply matter-of-fact.

“My girl and I would like to meet you. Come this Saturday afternoon,” he said, and gave Luther their address. “Don’t be late,” he added, and hung up the phone.

Luther had some concern. Was the man a murderer? Would he cleave Luther’s head with an axe? Did his wife weigh three hundred pounds? Did he weigh three hundred pounds?

That same day Luther found himself staring at Sarah as she stood at the kitchen sink.

“What are you looking at?” Sarah asked, when she turned around.

“Hopelessness,” he said.

“Are you calling me hopeless?”

“No.”

“Who are you calling hopeless, mister?”

“I don’t know. Nobody. Nothing.”

“Don’t call me that again,” Sarah said.

“I wasn’t talking to you.”

“You were talking, right?”

“OK.”

“I don’t see anybody else in the loft.”

“OK. OK.”

“So who else could you be talking to?”

“Don’t ask me hard questions I have no answer to.”

“You’re acting a little strange. Are you OK?”

“Now you’re calling me names. Don’t do that.”

“I asked you a question. That’s not calling you names.”

“Strange isn’t a name?”

“‘Strange’ is an adjective. It’s just a word.”

“So is—oh, never mind.”

“Never mind what?”

“Just please, please, before I go crazy.”

“Don’t use that word around here, mister.”

It went on that way for a while.

Morningside Drive overlooks a park that divides Harlem from the Upper West Side. The small, modest apartment buildings along the drive are shone on by the rising sun; thus, its name. The park itself, though laid out by Frederick Law Olmstead, was more forbidding than beautiful. The incidents of crime gave it a reputation as a hazardous place to take a stroll in, even in daylight. Luther saw it as an arena where the deprived and discriminated against of Harlem could take revenge on the more prosperous and more white community to the west. He often wondered if the city would ever enter a period of calm and safety where he could walk by moonlight along those footpaths. He did not like the thought of a metropolis in which whole areas were off-limits. The longing for some sort of unity was within him, and the park was a painful reminder of a dream as yet unrealized.

Morningside Drive was also the site of the attempted abduction of Luke when he was still a toddler. Two men had tried to put him in their car and drive away. If not for the intercession of passersby, they would have succeeded. It was a strange and chilling story, one that gave him recurring pause about the fragility of life, as did the memory of speeding on Luke's motorcycle toward the retaining wall on the roof some years before. You didn't wake up expecting to die. It just suddenly claimed you.

The other memory, more benign, was of Mr. Gladwell, his seventh and eighth grade math teacher, out in the patch of grass between the hedges and the building with a trowel in hand as he tended to the flowerbed. "Mr. Shaky," the boys at the Claremont School had called Mr. Gladwell, as there were some days when he could barely hold the chalk steady enough to write figures on the blackboard. Some claimed to have seen him drink from a flask. Such unkindness the boys and girls had shown their teacher, and Luther, while he had not participated in their mockery, had not been kind enough. Mr. Gladwell was an old, frail man those years ago, his face scaly and red and rendered stern by pain. Luther was struck, as he stood now outside his former teacher's building, that he was gone, not only from the building but from this life. Chapters began and chapters ended, and then all you had was the memory to draw on.

And where are you, Philip Gallagher, you with the sharp mouth and aggressive manner who stopped by Fatso Scully's stoop but did not linger, because your father owned a bar and grill and that placed you higher on the grid than Scully, whose father put his foot to the heavy pedal of a city bus? Where are you now, you with your madras jackets and penny loafers who aspired to enroll at Columbia University but wound up at Manhattan College, you who brazenly tried to take Jane Thayer away from me? But no answer came, or the answer was the silence that came from the still handsome building, the silence that says that vanishing comes with time passing. You look and you are alone, with only yourself for context.

Luther went inside and rang the bell of Francis Bedin. Such an ugly first name for a man, and as ugly for a woman with the second vowel changed to an "e." Francis. A name with the warmth of cold metal and rich only in Catholic drabness, with a black robe attached to it. And Bedin. A name that wasn't even a name, that screamed for the "ou" and Arab identity. As it was, it was nothing, just nothing, a name you spit out quickly in disgust.

Celeste, he came to the door with an unsmiling face that spoke of internal fire. He had me sit at the kitchen table and had his "girl" serve me tea. When she was slower to respond than he would have liked, he became short with her. The anger that he struggled to hold in check was his means for maintaining control over her. At one point he bragged about writing term papers for her courses at Manhattan Community College. Rather than meet his assertion with shame or embarrassment or displeasure, she beamed and offered her own testimonial, saying those term papers always won her an A from her professors. We can't claim understanding of relationships other than our own, and even there we will fall short. Perhaps they were perfectly matched, abusive as his way of relating to her seemed to be, and a necessary part of each other's journey.

Indira was her name. Indira from India. It was not for me to inquire how a young woman from the subcontinent came to hook up with a man such as Francis Bedin. Such personal questions, given the task at hand, seemed for another time. And yet, her extreme and unhealthy thinness seemed a signal of distress long before I was to become familiar with the underlying causes of such emaciation through my involvement with you. Her words and her smile and her complaisant manner might suggest one thing, but her physical being was a brightly burning flare.

Do not ask me what went on that afternoon, Celeste Please do not. Do not send me to the international court of justice for crimes against humanity. Simply accept that, going forward, it is for me to bring no harm to any living creature, to the best of my ability.

There was a room. He told me to go to it with her and begin. We both understand what begin means, Celeste; it requires no explanation. The gravitational pull of sex never does. Within a half hour Francis Bedin—that name—joined us. He was aggressive. He took over. A wild man. He went where I could not, showed no understanding of her rail-like thinness. We need not talk of orifices. We need not.

I was gone before I was gone. Do you understand?

“I don’t like it. Its size frightens me. It’s completely out of proportion with the rest of the buildings in the community,” Sarah said.

“It is big,” Luther said.

“Is that all you can say?” Sarah asked.

“Scary. It’s scary, too.”

“I just said both those things.”

“Yes. I’m agreeing with you.”

“Where are you?”

“I’m here. Right here.”

“Are you?”

They often took long walks. It relaxed them to wander the streets at night. There was peace in the desolate stretches of lower Manhattan. The old buildings, slowly converting from manufacturing to residential, and the remaining cobblestone streets were comforting, offering a retreat into a past they could imagine as simpler and more tranquil than their own. The World Trade Center had been a destination when it was only a giant hole in the ground. Now, standing before the completed towers, their huge mass seemed like too much for the earth beneath to support. It wasn't merely the towers' star-grazing height but their width. If the Empire State Building was an elongated ballerina, the World Trade Center was a giant sumo wrestler.

"Maybe it will sink the whole island. Do you think it could?" Luther's question hung out there in the night air for a while.

"That doesn't sound quite right," Sarah said.

"There are parts of the world where the earth moves under people's feet. Why should we be different?"

"Earthquakes happen in California."

"That's all the way across the continent. I'm talking about here. And if it does happen, it will all be because of this fatso in front of us."

"I don't think we should be worrying about that," she said, having heard him talk this way before, ignorantly certain.

"We should go," he said. "I'm beginning to hear gunfire."

"Gunfire?"

"It starts about this time of night."

"I don't hear any gunfire."

"Trust me, it's there, wanting to make us an article in the Daily News and a statistic," he said.

"Why would we be any safer anywhere else?" Sarah asked.

“You ever hear that expression ‘sitting ducks’? That’s why we have to start moving.”

He did have her safety in mind, just as he had had Marge’s safety in mind back on the City College campus. He knew what he knew, that there were people who didn’t play out there and that the sudden sense of impending danger had to be acknowledged if he and she were to survive. She didn’t struggle with him, as she had at the door that night at the onset of her breakdown. She didn’t demand to stay out. But it did not make him happy that she walked at a decidedly slower pace.

“We really should walk a little faster,” he said, as they passed Chambers Street.

“What’s wrong with you?” she stopped to ask.

What he couldn’t tell her was that he was not a man who could defend her against the forces that were marshaling in the dark, and he was not eager for an incident where his cowardice would be exposed. Like a man in water too deep, his only thought was for the safety of the shore.

“We are one. One. That’s what Simon Weill said to me the other day. He and Harry Stavigros gave me a raise. And dig this. Weill has found an apartment for me and Brenda.”

Men and their need for a father. It was a puzzle to Luther. Maybe all it meant was that Luke was made of stronger stuff. Again it came to Luther that Luke had absorbed their father’s blows. Having not fled their father’s hand, having not seen it as an annihilating instrument, he was conditioned to receive the more subtle what for Simon Weill dished out. There was no need for Luke to run and hide behind their mother's skirt, as Luther was wont to do.

All this was within Luther's capacity for understanding. But sadness was also within Luther's capacity, that Luke should be broken in this way, because while his family had been nobodies in the day and the night in terms of their business acumen, their bookkeeping done on shopping bags in pencil and the like, that did not mean Simon Weill had the right to drop his pants and take a giant poop on them. And now Luke was wallowing in that poop. Luke was not one with Weill. He was one with his excrement.

Let me set the record straight, Celeste. We were not entirely nobodies in the day and the night. We had a degree of order at the building we managed. We did. Kindness and respect were shown by my mother and aunt. It was a building with God on the wall and God in its being. Who is this person calumniating my family? Shall we break his bones into little pieces? Shall we do that?

And yet, not only had Simon Weill magically transported Luke out of the building but he had arranged for him to be on West End Avenue, and while that avenue existed far more in shadow than Riverside Drive, which the sun had only to shine down on over the trees of the park and not the greater obstacle of tall buildings in a narrow corridor, it had the status of professionals living in its many dwellings. You did not walk down West End Avenue and feel the pall of a moribund spirit in passing any of its buildings, as could be said of some of the streets in Manhattan. You did not have lives destroyed in any of those buildings. You had the children realizing their potential when they grew to adulthood.

Yes, you did. You had an avenue with the stamp of steady quality.

What is more, Luke's new dwelling place had a doorman standing vigil, and if the doorman corps paid no particular respect to Luke in their minds and cast lascivious glances at Brenda as she passed them by, this was not an issue for Luke, as he had a title now and a resource he could count on in Simon Weill. When the building owner asked Luke, as a prospective tenant, his annual salary, Luke could give him a number that more than satisfied the owner. And why had Luke so confidently presented that number? Because Simon Weill said he could. That was why. Luke had a father behind him who did not say, "Do not aggravate me. Do not make me get up."

Celeste, the city offered no escape. You went from one block to another and it was still there.

"You want a beer, Luther? Go get yourself one. There's plenty in the refrigerator," Luke said, when Luther dropped in on him and Brenda. It was evening, and Luke was heading into the shower for the start of a new day. The apartment was under-furnished. There was a sofa but no chairs and the walls were bare. It was as if they had just moved in, though they had been there for two months.

"We've got a thing going on tonight," Brenda said. "You know what a thing is?"

"A thing?"

"We're going to party. Luke likes to party. Do you like to party, Luther?"

"I don't know." He never knew how to answer that question from her.

"All men like to party. You're a man, right, Luther?"

"I don't like to think of myself in those terms."

“You don’t like to think of yourself as a man?”

“The word makes me sad.”

“Why sad?”

“It has dreariness attached to it.”

Benjy, Brenda’s boy, had come from his room and turned to Luther. “You’re funny-looking.”

“Benjy, don’t talk that way. It’s rude.”

“It’s true. He is funny-looking.”

“No, he isn’t. Luther is nice looking.”

“He’s all bones. He looks like he’s going to die.”

“Luther’s not going to die. He’s young and strong.”

“No, he isn’t. He’s all bones.”

Luther accepted the boy’s verdict on his appearance, if not on imminent death. Benjy wore thick, horn-rimmed glasses, far too big for his small, delicate face. His eyes were crossed, and it was hoped the glasses would be a corrective. The case could be made that Benjy was funny looking, but that was nothing for an adult to say to a child. Actually, without the glasses, he was a good-looking boy, though the crossed eyes were a noticeable and peculiar feature. He would grow up strong and fit, like his father, Lenny Cerone, before Lenny’s dissipation days set in. But the boy was wrapped in hardness and already established in an oppositional stance. He would never be a friend to Luther, and Luther would never be able to be a friend to him.

The Schaefer beer tasted good. Every cell in his body was screaming for the contents of the can. He opened another, and then a third and a fourth.

When Luke emerged from the shower, he was presented with a mystery he evidently had no faith he could solve on his own. “Hey, Honey,” he called from the kitchen. “Where’s all the beer?”

“It’s in the refrigerator, where you put it,” she called back. She too had gone off to put on her evening face.

“Holy shit.” Luke exclaimed, having discovered five empties in the trash bag. He returned to the living room to find Luther finishing up the sixth. “You drank all my beer?”

“I did,” Luther said. “I’ll go and get you some more.”

“What are you? Some kind of alcoholic? You drank six beers in less than an hour.” Luke’s mouth hung open.

There was no disputing him, Celeste. The laughing thing came over me, seeing the stupefied expression on my brother’s face. I was laughing at his dawning awareness that I was not as I appeared. I had done something with his goods wholly unexpected. I had drained the six-pack as I had drained the building of income sufficient to raise a red flag in Simon Weill’s mind. I had grown into an immoderate man capable of reaching for more than was good for me.

He headed that night toward the bar on Spring Street, drawn by the thirst still in him and the warm lights. He thought of those days and nights back in high school when the gathering place had been Fatso Scully’s stoop, on Amsterdam Avenue, and how nothing could keep him away. “I love him, I love him, and where he leads I’ll follow, I’ll follow, he’ll always be my true love, my true love”—that song some would dare to call dippy played loud as he walked the dark streets, a choir of love the workings of his mind required him now and then to listen to.

Celeste, once we find that place where belonging takes hold, then we must be faithful to it. We must.

A pair of whores sat at the bar that night. The word was unkind and not in his lexicon, and yet he heard one of the patrons reference them as such. The wide-bodied one wore jeans that were no match for her bulk. The other was slender and drew your attention with her black lace see-through blouse and fishnet stockings. Honesty was their calling card. Men who bought them drinks and were reasonably nice could have them for the night. An oily film coated their made-up faces. They were too naked in their desire to be Luther’s kind, and he was too concealed to be theirs.

Celeste, that night I too sat at the bar, and chatted with a sardonic creature named Gerard. I say sardonic but that may not be the word. Let us say his face showed an attitude of smiling disbelief, particularly when I spoke of my main writing project. He was a man of the earth, tethered to reality, that is, he had a job as a framer at the Castelli Gallery. That means he was an artisan, a man with the skill to make something, a man with the humility to accept his station in life, which is very hard to do in America. He had no calling; he had only his work. And so he could mock those who did have the calling but not the talent, the necessities, for achievement. Why do I say this, Celeste? Why? Because that very night he came out from behind his smile with these words.

“There are a lot of people like you floating around SoHo.”

“What does that mean?”

“What do you think it means?” he snicker-laughed.

Now Celeste, Gerard was not a man to look to his right or to his left. He did not stare at the door with hungry eyes, awaiting the newest arrival in the hope that she would be the one. I am telling you that he was not a swivel head. I am also telling you that no one ever sang to him “you must have been a beautiful baby.” Some of us have the integrity to keep our focus where it truly is, and Gerard was such a creature. He had his love right in front of him in that glass of scotch on the rocks and was fully guided by the understanding as to where his salvation truly lay. But he was not insulated and isolated from the world. He was in it sufficient to recognize the name Bill Walton, whom I gushed about, fighting to be heard over the increasing noise. But the things he had to say about Bill Walton were not kind things. He was like those wolves you hear about encircling their proud and defiant prey, darting in to tear at the poor creature’s flesh and then hanging back as they wait patiently for it to weaken from loss of blood. (Celeste, as an aside, suppose everything we deem important to achieve in life is not important at all? Suppose powering up so our light can shine so much brighter than the next person’s means nothing? Suppose the only important thing is that we love and that one such act of kindness means more than our entire resume? We must iron out our lives, seek to smooth every wrinkle, and if that sounds like an exercise in futility, let us say that we must examine every relationship, however fleeting, as there are no accidents. It is no matter that the review will be succeeded by the ultimate review. We must go forward with this preliminary examination to convey our willingness to look, for who are we but approximations of God himself.

So our friend Gerard tore at the great Bill Walton, calling him a malingerer, a bust, another hopeless great white hope. It is ever this way with our gods who walk this earth that they should have to endure such belittlement. But I have to believe at the same time that it was my faith in Bill Walton that carried him through. Do not misunderstand. I was not alone. There were many such as I seeking to keep hope alive that he would meet and even supersede the superstar expectations of him following his college career at UCLA and his earlier feats at Helix High School. (Yes, I know his high school and the fact that he routinely called his mother and father by their first names, which suggests a certain coldness and even effrontery but also a high intelligence that affords one reasons unavailable to the average mind for doing as he did.)

Now Celeste, I suffered in silence these tearing words of Gerard. I tolerated his smallness as he sought to take a bigger man down. At the same time it is possible he was attacking not only Bill Walton but also me, having seen that my heart was with the great man. Let us surmise that while he had accepted his own station in life, he had not necessarily accepted the higher station of those such as Bill Walton. He was a wounded soul, but let me not do the dinky thing and seek to pretend that his smallness was not my own as well.

As for the so-called whores, let us acknowledge first that there is power, raw power, in that word. It pulls the clothes right off them. All concrete nouns are defining, but not all of them have that word's brutal force. Once again, there is unkindness in us when we resort to such characterizations; such language inflicts a beating on these women for their honesty.

If their road was too open and access too easy, there was another road more suitable for him to go down that night. She gave her name as Mardi Gras, and while Luther suspected it was an alias, he was content to meet her on her own terms, as what alternative did he have other than to be annoyingly inquisitive? A person had a right to be who she or he wanted to be under the soft lights even if he himself could not abdicate his responsibility to his patronymic. In that way, he was a whore too, leaving himself exposed to all the abuse and dismissal such a grotesque name could elicit in segments of the American populace. At the same time he held to the notion that someday there would be compensation, as certainly there must be for all those who showed themselves exactly as they were. Not knowing where to go with that line of thinking, he left it there.

Mardi Gras said she could hear her loneliness in the vast hollows of her bones and in the follicles of her short and frizzy hair.

“What is the sound of this loneliness you are hearing?” Luther asked, in full earnestness, which drew from her laughter bordering on hilarity. “Have I made a funny?” Luther was left to ask.

“You made a funny and you are funny,” Mardi Gras said.

“Where does energy come from, and why do we value it so greatly?” Luther said, sharing his newfound wonderment with her.

“How about the food we eat and the air we breathe and the water we drink, for starters?” Mardi Gras responded, with a challenging firmness that showed she might appear, with that name and her sometime mode of speech, to be in orbit and yet be tethered to reality.

She took him home that night to her apartment in Westbeth, a former telephone company building that now offered subsidized housing for artists. Her hard response suggested a nature not generally tolerant of an ineffectual young man such as himself, a man who mumbled about the writing project he was launched on. Surely it was one of life's wonders that under the influence of alcohol people seemingly so far apart could connect. How magical its effect that it could transport him to an apartment overlooking the lower Hudson River. And now she offered him smoke heaven.

"Don't scratch my face," she said, as they lay on her bed.

"I'm sorry."

"I have to be beautiful in the morning."

"Do not mention the morning here in this darkness that offers us safety. Imagine a train whistle below even as we bounce on the lonely, wistful notes of the saxophone we are hearing." She had turned her radio to an FM jazz station.

"You don't know anything about jazz. Don't pretend that you do."

"I've been to Slug's, in the Far East, as it was called, and the Five Spot, up on Astor Place, where fatso Charlie Mingus played his bass."

"Don't be calling him fatso and don't be stepping on the black man's music with your white interpretation."

"I don't understand. Are you looking to be an enigma or just a modest mystery?"

“I’m looking for my loneliness to be vanquished, just for this one night. Is that too much to ask?”

In his pot haze Luther slotted Mardi Gras as a confusing sound with only the logic of her whims to guide her. It was best to understand that he was now in Westbeth, with all conventions left at the door.

“You are a wounded angel and the world is a dark place,” Luther said.

“Please stop talking,” Mardi Gras said.

And so he did.

Celeste, you could say I was a thief with a conscience, a man who had stolen from the building and who was now stealing from Sarah and from life. There is no defense to be made. We do as we do. I was the beneficiary of a woman’s love. It is no small thing. Many times I would quietly observe her and marvel at this thing we call quality. Her calling card was not betrayal and violation. She had a genuine higher purpose, as I have noted many times, which kept her from roaming the bars at night.

When a man lacks a social context, it is hard for him to connect. He has no friends to recommend him to girls or later, to women. Let us consider the facts, Celeste. How was it I happened to meet Jane Thayer (Riverside 9-7400)? Was it not because she was an outsider in the neighborhood where she would come to visit her grandmother while I was integrated into the group of boys she saw me with there on Fatso Scully’s stoop? And did I not have the cachet of being a private school kid? Did she not come to see that? And is it not possible that these things gave me precertification in her eyes? And was the same not true in regard to Sarah? Were we not brought together through the agency of my sister Vera and Pam Becker, a mutual friend of Sarah and Vera? And was not Luke himself in the mix, given that he and Pam's sister, Nancy Becker, had gone out all through high school before Nancy gave him the clobber all men preparing for the hobo path are destined to be dealt? But that context was lacking when I became a barfly. Did not Miss Broadway Central Bar Woman say to her friend, who was considering going off with me, "Don't go with him. He has only himself." I will get to this later, but could you and I have ever met except through the mediation of a mutual acquaintance, if not exactly a friend?

*A poet lived at Westbeth. His name was Hugh Seidman. In this time he won the Yale Younger Poets Award for a volume titled Collecting Evidence. He had a creative gift that did not require him to hide; he had his self-love to keep him warm as well as all the women he wanted. I tried to love him but failed. He was all the rage and gave a reading at the Tin Palace on the Bowery and other more prestigious venues. There were many such as him, rising to the level of their own ability, but the comparisons I would make, inevitable as they were, did not defeat me. A calling is a calling, Celeste. Beckett himself gave us our marching orders: "I can't go on, I must go on, I will go on," or however he put it.*

By this time I had terminated the ads in the Village Voice. Qualms of conscience and fear of exposure were the main factors, but there was one thing more. Doubtless it will seem absurd, but the fear grew that someone in my immediate circle would respond to the ad. Rather than ask you to guess who that person might be, I will simply tell you that it was none other than my sister Vera. Should that happen, an intimacy too terrible to bear would be revived. Even if I never responded—and how could I?—and she never guessed that I was the one who had placed the ad, the lonely desperation of her life, beyond any pretense she might make to the contrary, would shout itself at me.

I have never told you—I have never told anyone, Celeste—but in my college years, before Vera was in the embrace of the Ivy League, I ran into her as she was leaving a party I was about to drop in on. Whose party it was I could not tell you, but my strong sense is that we had gotten wind of it through the neighborhood grapevine. I may have been with Roberto, in the time before he fully lost his mind. In any case, I was in the company of someone else, and so the appearance of loneliness did not attach to me as it did to my sister. The party had not received her. The women had not befriended her and the men had shown no interest either. Her rejection announced itself in her stricken face as she rushed past us on that Saturday night, proving once again that there is no aloneness like Garatdjian aloneness, whether it is Rachel sitting by herself in Chock Full O' Nuts eating the sugar doughnuts of that fine establishment or Hannah hunkered down in the dark in front of the TV set and working her way through a quart of Breyer's ice cream with a tablespoon or me on my solitary walks to nowhere. Finally must the Garatdjians say something, something, and not resign ourselves to hermetic silence in the face of the annihilating winds that blow. If it is for others to walk this earth, then let it be for us as well.

But the cancellation of the ad does not mean the seeds of destruction had ceased to grow in me. It occurred to me that perhaps the problem was that I had reached outside my relationship without first exploring what was within it, like a man who continuously buys new clothes without first checking the contents of his closet. Suppose Sarah and I, as a team, were to explore new sexual opportunities? Suppose she were to become the context that was lacking in my solo ventures? Celeste, what are we talking about here but swinging, a word more hideous than I can express?

This bondage to the body was a tormenting thing. You must not imagine otherwise. I had been reading the very great Naipaul, and in one of his masterpieces a mentor counsels him to withdraw from the pastime of sexual pursuit and channel his energy into his work. To this day I picture the mentor standing in his book-lined study in his robe and slippers and say to you we must respect such counsel. We must. But we must also resolve not to ensnare ourselves in the world of ideas either, as the book-lined study can become a prison in itself; in the carnal world we are bound by the flesh, and in the intellectual realm our finite minds would find further restriction. Bondage is bondage, and yet our dictate is emancipation. There is altogether too much information coming in; we become hoarders of the irrelevant and the inconsequential. We must empty out rather than accumulate, that we may gain real understanding.

Now Celeste, we can only be where we are in time. We cannot lament the lack of more rapid progress in this journey. We are both familiar with the saying, "Nothing is lost in God's spiritual economy." If we have been in hell, then let us use that experience to win the confidence of others that there is deliverance to be had from it.

There was a Brentano's, on Eighth Street and University Place, when bookstores were still thriving. In a section for lavishly illustrated coffee-table books on beautiful homes and gardens and such was a work of erotica, with vintage sepia-tone photographs in the Cuba of Fulgencio Batista, who reigned before Fidel Castro could chase him from the island and rid it of its whorehouses and gambling casinos and impose a more spartan, if egalitarian, rule. (The vanguard of the proletariat is not a meaningless phrase, Celeste. Far from it.) Men mating with women, women mating with other women, multiple configurations of men and women mating. Most strangely, the cashier was thrown into a state of agitation when I came to make my purchase, as I had decided that this was the book for me. He spoke with sharp conviction, decrying the work as inauthentic.

“Not only is it a fraud, but it is a vicious fraud,” he said, his words flying with razors attached. His whole being, starting at the top with his spiky hair, was honed to a cutting edge. Nothing was to be done, unless I wished to sound the battle cry, with someone prone to this degree of disputatiousness but to nod in tacit agreement and when his fixed stare grew more ominous to say, “Yes, I see,” in the hope that outright verbal capitulation would free me of his intense scrutiny and return him to a pacific state.

“See? See? You see nothing,” he said, finally breaking his frenzied silence and bagging my purchase.

The basis for the young man’s objection to the book remains a mystery, and I do have some regret that I lacked the courage to question him about its cause. Left to speculate about the force behind his animus and being without the spiritual instruction to do otherwise, my thinking led me to believe he could not bear to contemplate the act of creation that all heterosexual coitus ultimately brings about. Now you may say, why couldn’t you just allow the man to be? Why did you have to make note of him? To that I have no answer, Celeste. I can only offer a respectful silence, as if there is anyone who should know by now that he doesn't have all the answers, it is I.

(Several years before, my CCNY friend Efram Ellsberg had worked at this very Brentano's before he was canned for boosting hundreds of those coffee table books. Stealing, Celeste, stealing. This after he was released on five years' probation following his conviction for defacing the United States mail by drawing the peace symbol on letters that passed through the General Post Office on Thirty-third Street. Efram, the rabbi's son, from Midwood, Brooklyn, whose older brothers were all doctors. So when I say Efram was of unimpeachable moral authority, on what basis do I speak? And yet that remains the image I have of him. I do see Efram as a moral and kind man who, through circumstance, sometimes went astray. We can often glean the essence of a person from sight alone. We have established that Efram had no liking for The Man (his intelligence directing him to the use of synecdoche) whether The Man was Mr. Ruggiero at the PO or the bearded and suited book dealer at the Strand who served as his fence. I had seen other Merit Scholarship winners brought to ruin by their intellectual fury—their resistance to the man, and in some cases, their surrender to the woe-man.”)

Let's not pretend we don't know what my motive was in buying this piece of erotica from the time of Fulgencio Batista. What else could it have been but to import his island decadence? Had I purchased Purity of Heart Is to Will One Thing, by the very great Soren Kierkegaard, or the complete works of Thomas Merton? No, no, no. Prurience was doing its lewd victory dance. Even in a bookstore were my thoughts X-rated. But we must have compassion. We must laugh. Forces beyond our control are operating on us. We must remember what Quentin Compson said: "Have you ever had a sister?" And we must accept that we were young and destined to be driven by our lower nature. We must not be dualistic, Celeste. We must not. All is holy, or a pathway to it. Enough with the whip of the flagellating perfectionist.

There was an art quality to the photographs that elevated them above pornography. I had only to place the books on the dinner table. Curious, she would flip through the pages and become aroused. Thereafter we could discuss the possibilities of a lifestyle beyond the conventional. But reality obliterated my vision. The photographs repelled her. The spreads brought a look of dismay to her face.

"If you don't mind, could you please put that book away, Luther?" Guided by a natural sense of propriety, she shamed me about my sexual interests as she had once shamed me about my drinking. And yet it wasn't for me to argue about the need for graphic displays of licentiousness as it had been about the importance of alcohol after she had seen me opening the pint bottle of Clan Macgregor scotch that first week in the loft. Such advocacy was not a road I could go down. Drinking was an activity unto myself; alcohol was my life's blood. But sex, as I was envisioning it, was a cooperative venture that required her approval. It was one thing for me to debilitate myself with alcohol, Celeste, but was it right for me to degrade her by luring her into arrangements she deemed, even in photographs, debasing? When the reality presented itself, I saw that this was a line I could not cross. Men are dogs, Celeste, and can never hope to uncover the mysteries of a woman's sexuality with such clumsy superimposing of their own crude fantasies.

I will tell you a story that illustrates the differences between men and women regarding sex. Sarah had a friend. Her name was Carola Aprile and her brilliance was housed in a petite body and behind an amiable smile. Let it be entered into the record of life that Carola Aprile passed up a full scholarship to Radcliffe to attend Carnegie-Mellon, which was renowned for its art department. Sarah and Carola met while at the High School of Music and Art, as it was then called, and then situated in that gorgeous pale blond building on Convent Avenue, just across the street from the main entrance to the south campus of the City College of New York. The building had an aura of goldenness to it, as befitted an institution that drew to it the musical and artistic excellence of the city, and many were the times I would pass that school and be reminded by the sadness in my bones of the consequence of being outside the circle of the chosen. It was the same aura of goldenness such as I would experience when walking that strip of Claremont Avenue between One Hundred Twentieth Street and One Hundred Sixteenth Street, where many of the men and women of Columbia and Barnard were known to live. Giftedness has a way of presenting itself. It shines through the buildings that would contain it and into the very streets beyond, whether the masonry of those structures itself has a golden hue or not. Do not for a minute believe that I am dwelling solely in the realm of disparagement when I speak this way when in fact I am driven by the simple need for recognition—of excellence, of everything. Things have to be seen, and yet they are not always seen. That is why we sit in meditation, so we may return over and over again to the quiet place, the still place, where the truth of our being can only be found among these ceaseless forms and never-ending tapes.

In the loneliness of her summers, when college was in recess and she was returned to the subtle sadness of family, would Carola Aprile call out to Sarah, as Carola too had an eye out for goldenness and saw it in Sarah and had a need to periodically check where in the ascendant Sarah's star now was. Summer after summer they spoke without meeting, Carola remembering Sarah as bruised and defiant and always initiating the contact because in her mind Sarah had what she wanted. They had more than art in common, however; they were both their fathers' daughters. A father's love for a daughter is all-encompassing, especially when the daughter bears his visage and disposition, and so it was with Mr. Van Dine and Sarah. As for Carola, even as a teenager she sat on her father's lap, and so we can assume that a strong connection existed there as well. But whereas Sarah adopted a moody loner stance, Carola gravitated toward connection and entered the full social life of the school. I heard the word orgies in relation to her, Celeste, all-night parties to which only the vanguard, that is, the socially adept, had been invited. Sarah was astonished that such activity took place without her being aware of it in the least. But that is the thing. There are those who partake fully of the life around them and those who don't, and these others are left with their mouths agape at what they have missed— or avoided. But let us say this as well. We must not assume that Carola Aprile had launched herself on the sybaritic path. It was simply that Carola Aprile, by virtue of her intelligence, had elevated above those love-addicted teenagers who get snagged on one another and do the 'go steady' thing. And yet she left her wildness behind and fell in love with the silkscreen printing star of the art department at Carnegie-Mellon. Hunger Longing was his name, and his orphan status and years in foster care set his pockmarked face in a permanent cast of pain and deprived him of relaxed human interaction. Hunger Longing relied on his intelligence and the fruits of it to speak for him. Sometime after they moved in together, she found a rag he had been using to masturbate in and was shocked by the frequency of his confessed need to bop his bologna, as he put it. Carola could not easily absorb this experience. An image had formed in her mind; she now saw Hunger Longing as a Cro-Magnon specimen with dingus in hand frantically seeking sexual release. Even with her compassionate nature and the understanding that he was desperately seeking to leave behind the trauma that had been inflicted on him, she could not ameliorate this stark image. This reaction of Carola Aprile is what we must seize on, Celeste. A warning bell was now sounding loud in her ears. Who was this creature she had partnered with? Such shock as she registered serves as a reminder of the advantage women have over men. A woman is a house. Guests only are invited in, and they must meet a certain standard. Oh, the gratitude, if not joy, we should feel for mentors such as Carola Aprile who seek to elevate us to higher ground.

But what of Hunger Longing? What was to become of him? Was he to be cast from the only home he had ever known because of an impropriety? Was their love to become a legacy of pain and bitterness? We were to find out, Celeste. We were to find out.

Oh, that love should always be love, Celeste. And it can be. And it is.

Carola Aprile came to them when they were in the loft less than a year and she was still living in Pittsburgh. A young woman with a pretty figure and an oval face that showed the scars of a teenage bout with acne. Time had evidently not frayed their bond, Luther saw, as Sarah and Carola embraced. They talked as if he was not there, though now and then Sarah would remember his presence and try to include him in the conversation. Luther didn't mind that he was being ignored, as an extreme feeling of discomfort had come over him. Carola might have a genuine regard for Sarah, but she could only be feeling sorrow and pity for her friend seeing the old and dreary wicker sofa and chairs and the stove-less kitchen and the crude bathroom. Surely she was wondering what kind of man would offer such poor conditions for a woman to live in? Impaled on this feeling, he could think of nothing else, and prayed for her to be gone so he could be free of those all-seeing eyes.

There had been another who provided moral instruction, that one being a girl named Debbie, a nemesis of Sarah's during her time at the Boston Museum School. Debbie could converse easily and hold her own in groups. She moved to the center, not to the periphery, and Sarah was no match for her in the social arena. Mr. Edmonds, as befit a man in his forties with power over the young, had his annual love; Sarah, last year's infatuation, had been replaced by Debbie. Mr. Edmonds was doing nothing wrong. He did not act on his amour even if he did strain against the bars of his marital cage.

Debbie had found a man to live with, as Carola Aprile had done. Wilbur was big and hulking. He too had star qualities, commensurate with Debbie's gifts, which more than compensated for his lumbering gait and slovenly ways. Then came the discovery, as she was placing freshly laundered underwear in his dresser drawer, of a stash of magazines under his T-shirts. Women in erotic lingerie. Women wearing no lingerie. The shock altered forever her perception of Wilbur and she soon asked him to leave. She could not live with a man who approached life as if was one big booty party.

In that time Luther had his own attachment to smut. He had picked up a copy of The Pearl, a fat Grove Press anthology of erotic tales from the Victorian era, at a convenience store in Harvard Square. The granny smith apples had been very green that day and the store had a smell of freshness to it. That is a Harvard smell, Luther thought, and that is Harvard air, he also thought, experiencing the fall crispness designed for the intelligent and the alert. And so he was introduced to Lady Pokingham and they all do it, to the comings and spendings and gamahuche gardens of those who would shed their corsets and straight-laced manner for the wildness of an unfettered carnal romp. The images sparked by the texts left him in no need of photos of bare-breasted women to get the job done. And what was that job but to gain temporary relief from the tormenting drive for sex that would send him out into the Boston night and onto trolley cars and the Harvard Bickford's and other sites looking for that one, because the SAT was a number but the women he had been with and known was a number too. Sarah might have her work at the easel but he had his work too, as he had had it as a child, wandering out of his family's apartment and into the smelly public bathrooms of Manhattan subway stations looking for the men with big things to make the night complete for him. Because to stay indoors was dangerous. To stay with what was was dangerous.

Luther had been cast out on his own. There would be no orgy teamwork in their future. He would have to represent himself in the multiple partner world. For a time he went back to the Village Voice with his bisexual male ad, but there was only one response, and that from someone who wrote, "I'm a swapper. How's about youse. Lets do a deal."

Swap. The word had filth and fat attached to it. It was like getting hit in the face with a soaking wet towel. The man gave his name as Ed. It was a name to be suspicious of, summoning an image of an oaf masticating egg salad with an open mouth. Still, the phone number that was included called on Luther to call.

Ed answered on the first ring. He had a rough voice. Luther pictured him with an unshaven face and a dirty behind.

"I don't give away my wife cheap. Swaps is what I do. I know your type. You want a freebie, but I don't play that way. You got to ante up. Stop holding out on me. You got an old lady, you got to throw her in the ring. Like I say, a swap is a swap."

In the background could be heard the wail of a baby, probably being held by a woman as heavy as he pictured Ed to be and her hair in curlers, bringing home the horror of the pursuit even more than the experience with the young man with the frighteningly thin wife.

"A swap is a swap and a mop is a mop, except when it isn't," Luther said.

"What?" Ed roared.

"Swap your mop and mop your swap," Luther said.

"How about I punch you in the face? How about I skin your skinny dick and put it in a hot dog bun for your..."

Luther hung up, having the general idea where Ed was going with his retort.

He had bought a bike, a ten-speed, to avoid being at the mercy of traffic. Could a car go on sidewalks? Could a car be carried into one's home? Would a car owner care to compare his fuel bill with Luther's? The bike was an investment. What he had paid for it he would make up for in money saved on transit fares. And yet a bike was a responsibility, particularly one with so many gears. Deraillieur, that formidable French word for the ugly piece of metal hanging by the back wheel. Suppose the chain was too slack for the sprocket when he tried to change gears? Suppose he couldn't fix the grotesque deraillieur the way that real men could? He understood that it was waiting to call his manliness and intelligence into question should a repair be needed. Then he would be forced to destroy the bike and himself.

The bike's frame was white. Not albino white, but white all the same. He had his eye and his mind on its whiteness.

He rode up the Bowery and its continuation, Third Avenue, showing his mettle among the passing cars and buses by whizzing between them so they might grasp the true meaning of agility. He had found a place to go in the night far afield from the bar on Spring Street, and soon was chaining his bike and the detached front wheel to a lamppost just so the thieves of New York City could not ruin his life.

"Luther? Is that you?" Luther looked up, having attached the lock to the chain. Melvin was staring down at him, wide-eyed and innocent as a deer.

"It is I," Luther answered, in his mother's voice. How desolate the street was after dark, how bustling by day when the commerce of the city called to people.

“Are you here for sin, Luther? Is that why you have come? Do you not know the old rugged cross burns red in the night only a block away, seeking to purge the air of its very filth?” Melvin had no relation to the street, to the darkened stores, to the arrogant ascent of the sky-bound Empire State Building just down the block. He stood as a creature devoid of context except for the Christ Jesus.

“What makes you ask?”

“Is strong drink raging in you, Luther? Is that what has brought you here?”

“Melvin, please stop talking. Please go away.” Luther did not want to be unkind to the guileless man. Even drunk he couldn’t act in such a way toward a man so out of touch with the earth he only appeared to live on.

“Luther, are you afraid of your true self?”

“You are an affliction.”

“No, the devil is an affliction, and he is afflicting you, I am afraid.”

“Never mind who or what is afflicting me, Melvin. Leave me to my own devices and I will leave you to yours. You must understand that you are a frail man in a thin shirt in a cool breeze.”

“What are you saying, Luther? Are you saying that God will not provide for me, that I am not one of his lilies of the field?”

“Flowers do not grow in concrete, Melvin. They just don’t.”

“Do not take attack my faith. Do not do that, Luther.”

Celeste, I left him there on that boulevard of retail commerce, the plate-glass windows laughing at the very notion of human kindness and the wind picking up in intensity to let us know the forces that really ruled the earth. Melvin's face had spoken, not as it would over time, as he was not yet the howling wolf in the urban wild he became when he finally saw that the rocks of ancient Judea and Samaria were not making it for him and he reached a level of loneliness and desperation few do and survive to tell about it. I had attacked his lifeline. I had done that, Celeste. He was my brother and I had shunned the holy fool, as he had nothing that I wanted and everything I feared. I went where the world was, where the men paid to be received by the women who received them in a warren of sheet-rocked cubicles. For this pleasure romp you paid ten bucks to the hard and muscled men of the flesh who had broken the bones of many and who would break many more.

Now Celeste, my woman was young and dark and worn by the wanton way of the world. The light of this understanding was in her eyes and governed her tongue. It came as no surprise to her, that having paid, I should seek to assume power in a way I would not do with Sarah in requesting to place my thing where it may not be intended to go.

"It is human. It is part of life," she said afterward, dismissing my attempt to follow my selfishness with contrition. She was on the ground. It was where she lived.

A squat metal cylinder on castors with a set of valves atop it sat on the landing outside the loft. The device was for exterminating cockroaches, and Luther's mother had insisted he take it when Simon Weill ended their management of the building. Luther had seen the device in operation, clouds of toxic spray emitted through the valves, turning the room into a veritable gas chamber for the vermin.

“Why should it go to that man? He has gotten everything, has he not? I do not want that man to have one thing more. Does he not rule the earth? Has he not taken our life? What more is there? So take it. Take it, I say. And take these cans of spray should the tank need to be refilled. Because roaches are everywhere, everywhere, not only in this building.”

Indeed there was an insurgency, and it was growing. The little ones were becoming bold with their increasing numbers, and desperate as well. They feasted on the glue in the bindings of hardbound books and could be found swimming in your cereal bowl if you left it untended for a minute. Now they were incubating their offspring in the warmth of the grill at the back of the refrigerator and crawled over Sarah and him as they lay in bed at night. Had he not read recently of a cockroach penetrating the inner ear of a sleeping woman and entering her brain.

Yes, he was coming home late from his whorehouse experience, and yes, Sarah would be asleep, but what better time to strike at the marauding ones than in the dark? He could fumigate away from the bed, in the far reaches of her studio. He would even open the window to dissipate the fumes.

He swung into action, wheeling the device to the back of the loft, plugged it in by lamplight, and turned it on. A cloud quickly rose, faster than he would have thought, and the breeze blew it inward. Jesus, the fumes really were hard to take. The stuff stung his eyes, his nostrils, his throat. Jesus, he had no idea just a ten-second burst could do all that.

Just a little dab will do you, he had thought, like that old Brylcreem ad promised. What was he to do? He couldn't run out and leave Sarah but he couldn't wake her either.

But there was no dilemma, not anymore. Not with her standing there fully alert in her nightgown.

“Are you out of your mind? Are you?”

I am fumigating but she is fuming, he thought but did not say, as he ran to the windows at the opposite end of the loft to open them as well.

“Relief is on the way. Trust me. While the crisis passes, we can sit outside on the stairs.”

“This can't go on, Luther.”

“What can't go on? What is the ‘this’?” He heard the word elongated to this-ness, and spoken by the men of philosophy, those whose minds could reach far higher than his. This-ness. That-ness. What-ness.

Sarah had no response to make, other than to place her face in her hands and cry.

Now Celeste, I imagine you thinking, as you visit that place of doubt and uncertainty even those most intimately connected must occasionally have about each other; how it is that I remain such a complete and faithful slave to my own experience. Why are there no forays into the remotest regions of the Andes Mountains by characters who bear no resemblance to me? What is this obsession with self? What ails you, I hear you ask, borrowing my mother's words? And what could my answer possibly be but this: a complete and utter lack of imagination. There. You have me. I am a dolt, a creature of abysmally low aptitude, still the boy who had to copy his classmate's design in a third grade drawing class. You have me on the spot, Celeste. You most certainly do. No other answer comes to mind, and so I am left to drown in an ocean of shame, a poor enervated soul, lacking vigor in his body and his mind and his soul, a creature who passes his days staring blankly at the box scores of yesterday's baseball games. And yet, suppose there is something more? Suppose I am, even in a misguided way, committed to the truth and a strict accounting of myself on this earth lest I be severely punished? Can we not consider that a possibility as well?

Now only does it more fully come to me, Celeste, the meaning of that framed verse from Romans 6:23 hanging in the lobby of my family's building: "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. What comes to me?" The anger. You will get yours, you willful, stiff-necked people. You will be brought low, the whole lousy, preening, intellectually haughty bunch of you. Auntie Eve was wagging a warning finger at the citizens of Sodom and Gomorrah. Hot, hot, hot the fires of hell, she herself on fire with self-righteous anger. When did God's wrath become my wrath? When did the infection set in?

“Suppose we were to up and leave behind this loft living for something normal, like the way people should eat normal food, as my mother used to say. A full kitchen and bath, for example. Suppose we were to make normalcy our goal?” he said some days later, as if his betrayal had vanished with the night that had witnessed it.

“Please don’t talk that way. It just sounds odd.”

“Well, OK, but what do you think about changing things up?”

“I like it here.”

“It’s not a place of sadness for you?”

“I said I like it here.”

“Suppose I were to set up a search committee, an exploratory commission, something like that.”

“And who will be on this committee?”

“Me. I will canvass the area. I will scrutinize the possibilities.”

“I thought you weren’t going to talk that way.”

“Right.”

A modern kitchen. A modern bathroom, one in which you could actually soak in a tub. He continued to think of such amenities. But there was more to his desire for change. He saw that his money was running out, as he had known it would, and yet he couldn’t see beyond that eventuality. The future was not exactly a freight train bearing down on him; it was more of a question mark, an anxiety-inducing question mark. He had become convinced of his utter ineffectualness in the world, and a desultory experience at an employment agency seemed to confirm that there was no place for him out there. The secretary had looked at him like a bug when he handed her the completed form and he had not heard from them since. A person needed substance to make his way in the world. What would two flimsy degrees from CCNY, where he had majored in reading paperback novels, gain him? And wasn't failure his identity anyway? Would he not be lost without it? Men in their vanity suck at the bitter weed of failure, or whatever the hell caustic D. H. Lawrence had written. Any threat to that identity could make him psychotic, he feared. After all, an investment was an investment. In any case, selling the loft fixtures would postpone the day of reckoning. He couldn't count on "White Line, Continue" saving him, not the shapeless thing he had created.

Sarah began to come around. Dr. Frodkey liked the idea of a modern kitchen and bathroom, too. "Go appoint your exploratory commission," she said.

"Yes, but logic must be the building block of our new life," Luther replied. "First we must test the waters and see what value the loft will bring us. An ad is called for."

"Do what you have to do," Sarah said, causing him to rejoice at her show of trust.

Celeste, there was an agent in this time, a literary agent, not a secret agent. Her name was Agnes Clouthby. She was a Britisher who had made a name for herself but without developing a heart of stone in doing so, that is, she remained open to young writers who showed promise even after securing a stable of best-selling authors. I sent her a portion of White Line, Continue so I could name myself as a member of the reality-based community rather than forever be consigned to the ranks of those whose words disappeared as soon as they were written never to be seen again. I was afraid I was showing her merely my nakedness when I was at my skinniest, but she saw something different, and wrote me back a kind note that I must continue with "White Line, Continue" and resubmit the work to her when I had completed the novel. A year later, I had not reached the end because that could only happen when I too had reached the end and so at this juncture I bundled my output and sent it to her with a manifesto that failure too should be represented in the marketplace and not only the sly winks at the gallery of those play-acting at failure when genetically or by virtue of their socioeconomic status they could never fail; those who indeed did fail must also be represented, and without the redeeming qualities that could make a reader love them. I wanted to write about those who suffered the affliction of being both unlovely and unlovable, as presented by a writer who perhaps felt the same way about himself. This time Agnes Clouthby gave me hard punch. She was a Britisher, after all, and they had broken the teeth of the formidable Germans after the Germans had tried to break their teeth. You must not imagine they are all cultivation and gentility and picture them solely among their teapots and flowerbeds. No, what I received was a form note with the boilerplate, "Thank you for your submission. We are sorry to say that it is not quite right for us but wish you the best of luck in finding representation with another agency." Agnes Clouthby was summarily dismissing me. A tree must be pruned, and pruned ruthlessly, if it is to grow and remain healthy. A fungus had appeared on mine. Those with a desultory spirit must not be permitted to infect and bring low those who live on a higher plane. Years before I had been repulsed by my roommate Roberto's world view, and now it was Agnes Clouthby's turn to be repulsed by mine. Let me be plain, Celeste. There was a reason Agnes Clouthby had achieved a place of prominence in the world, her life full of success and successful people, and she understood how to keep it that way by staying among her own kind.

Luther returned to the Village Voice classifieds, led there not by his prurience, but with an ad for the loft, in which he set the fixture fee at three thousand dollars. Those drawn by the ad to the loft found it unsuitable either because it was too far from the galleries in SoHo or because it lacked certain amenities or because they didn't relish climbing three long flights of stairs each day. Prospective renters could afford to be selective, as each week an entire page of such ads appeared in the paper.

While the ad ran, Luther was out looking at apartments. Both he and Sarah agreed that they were by now downtown people, and set Fourteenth Street as the line they would not cross. As to why Fourteenth Street had been chosen as a demarcation line, he had some vague idea that people living farther north were more likely to have jobs. Not that people below Fourteenth Street didn't have jobs, though he suspected fewer did. It was more that even if they were employed, they were less likely to be afflicted with a frightening degree of maturity. Luther wanted his dream world to continue. He didn't want smelling salts under his nose or cold water in his face.

He had his eye on St. Mark's Place and one of those modest walk-up buildings along the south side of the street. The sounds of street life generated by the influx of weekend visitors would come muffled to their recessed, spacious apartment. Surely he would only have to inquire of the superintendent and an apartment would be his. But the buildings were rebuffing. They had sealed themselves from him. They only gave the appearance of being yielding. His fear grew as he took note of this subtle coldness; the world beyond the loft might not be as accommodating as he had hoped.

At the same time I had my love to keep me warm, Celeste. You know what I am referring to.

Brooklyn was no different. Though he came armed with the classifieds, the brownstones of Park Slope barked at him. The two apartments he visited cried out their squalor: tarnished wood floors, a grimy kitchen, a bathroom with a tub stained to the point of uselessness. How sad, dispiriting, to contemplate living in such places. They would give up their spacious loft for such rundown lodgings?

He retired to a Zum Zums by Borough Hall, seeking comfort in its white and antiseptic interior. The Germans, even in defeat, were too strong; they ran you over with their vigor, but he needed the stamp of quality they could guarantee. And he needed a Zum Zum special to invigorate him on this cold day, not one of those funny-looking white sausages but something brown and normal, like the steaming knockwurst he ordered and slathered with mustard. That taste sensation would change his sad rags to glad rags, though he was not approving of the metal plate it came on or the sound his silverware made when scraping against it.

Every stool was taken by weekday workers streaming in on their lunch hour. Near him sat two men with the dull thickness of the municipal buildings they had been discharged from in their faces. Men who had been worn down by the daily grind. He wanted to talk to these men, reach across the divide, and show himself as friendly as he felt on the Fastin. Accountants maybe, who had the patience to master tax laws and fill out complex forms, the kind who complained to their wives of thirty years of arthritic pains and gas. Men who had no illusions about the world but took it on its own terms; free of the dictate to be exceptional, they could be as gray as their suits in the mass of humanity. He stared at them across the counter as if across a great divide. He had been unable to join them; he had run from the confinement that responsibility would bring when he dropped his law school dream. You chicked out. You chicked out. So the voice of Dr. Dressler came to him. Now all he was was a skinny man-child high on a prescription diet pill living vicariously through an injury-prone basketball superstar named Bill Walton.

A half-hour later, approaching Chatham Square, he began to cry. The tears seemed spontaneous, the sadness he had experienced at Zum Zum having lifted. The fishmongers had set out their fruits of the sea on beds of ice. Surely they were full of mercury and otherwise contaminated by the filthy waters that encircled the island. I too am a contaminated fish pulled from the waters of life, he thought, and brought his tears with him into the loft.

That afternoon he reached into his past, not knowing why, and called Jane Thayer. She had drifted out to Los Angeles with the idea of becoming famous as a singer, taking voice lessons at night and paying the bills with a day job as a legal secretary.

“Bingle, Ding, Criney, and Schiff,” she answered, and when he said nothing in reply, she stepped into the silence with a question mark hello.

“It is I,” he said.

“Luther?”

“You know who it is when I say it is I?”

“It’s just you trying to be fancy,” she replied. She wasn’t on the ropes the way she had been when she came calling on him in her white go-go boots at his Hell's Kitchen apartment several years before.

“Yes?” he said, unable to affirm or deny. Was expressing yourself through the voice of another person being fancy? He began to cry again, noting the disconnect between the waterworks and any conscious feeling of emotional pain. They were like some heavy shower while the sun was still shining.

“Are you OK, Luther?”

“I am,” he said, before hanging up.

Now Celeste, I wish to say a word about Jane Thayer and how we were in an earlier chapter of our lives. At some point back in high school, we began going to church together. Every Sunday morning, for a period of two months, we would sit in a pew of the Broadway Presbyterian Church, on One Hundred Fourteenth Street, the same block where Arnold knuckle-jabbed Johnny Donatelli in the spine till Johnny Donatelli crumpled to the pavement, causing Raymond Donatelli, Johnny's older brother, to call out the Negroes from the hotel where Arnold was staying down the block so he could break their faces and they could break his. And so much else from my childhood lives on that block. But we are not here for that. We are here for the church, and the order and respectability it brought to us, for to be a Presbyterian was to be an American of a certain kind. When you said the word Presbyterian no one could put the laughing thing on you. No one. Pastor Olmster spoke on the this-ness of love and the that-ness of love as a condition of the soul, which he called the repository of our highest good. And if not all his words had sticking power, they did not have the disappearing quality of the words of Pastor Cohn, down at the tabernacle on Thirty-third Street, where now I longer went. (By the way, Pastor Olmer was not like one of the previous pastors of that church, who was fired for placing a monkey in the trunk of his car, or so I was told. Imagine!) Our attendance at this church came at a time when Jane Thayer and I were trying to save our love, or I was, driven by my anguished fear that I had tarnished Jane Thayer in sleeping with her and that Mary Marie O'Donnell and Cathy Cathleen O'Donnell would have nothing to do with her because she had passed through the gates of sin. As you may recall, this was a period when I was trying to restore Jane Thayer to a pristine state through abstinence from sex so we could be as we had been when we had first met.

This was in the time of Lenny Cerone and the Bonneville with which he ruled the block, but I had begun to look askance at him for being outside the mold of normalcy, given that he did not go to school or, except for odds and ends, hold a job. And there was another of his car kind, who could talk all day about transmissions and carburetors, and his name was Herbie, and he lived down on One Hundred Twelfth Street between Broadway and Riverside Drive in the Arvia House, another SRO. And Herbie too was outside the circle of ambition and order. When Jane and I would encounter them together, I would feel that they were laughing at us, and perhaps they were, for what they perceived as our square and serious ways. I could not follow in the path of Lenny and Herbie. I did not have their genius IQs that would allow me to discourse learnedly on four on the floor and camshafts. Hearing their anarchy calling and their sometimes suggestive remarks to Jane Thayer, I adopted an attitude of moral superiority. If I could not be smarter than them, I could strive to be better, and the Sunday services were part of that plan for betterment and rectitude. And I believe Lenny and Herbie saw how we were trying to elevate above them, the image I was trying to maintain of building for the future, both with my education and the marital plan I had established with Jane. And so Jane and I put our piety on display, sharing a hymnal as we rose in our pew and lifted our voices to God. The grip of goodness claimed us, but it was goodness with a quality of thinness. And, of course, my lower nature had a grip as well, and would drive me in the night to the company of men for sexual release.

Why do I tell you these things, Celeste? Why? Have you heard the word thoroughness? Have you heard the town crier's shrill warning about the penalty for its lack? We must come clean, Celeste. We must.

Now, in the loft, I was seized with the conviction that I had wandered from the path of morality when Jane Thayer and I broke up and that the only possibility of reclaiming that path was to resume our relationship and take the marriage vow. To do so would mean canceling my existing relationship with Sarah, but what had to be done had to be done. For a week or more I held to this belief that salvation required of me this action. The mind takes us where it will. It has all manner of straitjackets custom-tailored for each of us. Let us be free, Celeste. Let us snap the bonds of our imprisoning judgments. Let this be so, dear God. Let this be so.

A man named Danilo came calling. He may have been a count, as he had nobility in his face and bearing and a strong Italian accent that made each of his words go far. He was blond and tall, as Luther assumed many Italians weren't, and had new teeth prominently white in his twenty-three-year-old face, having sustained injuries in a car accident in his native land. He presented himself as a student in the graduate program for architecture at Columbia University, a fact that compelled Luther to kneel down inwardly to him; Danilo was surely a young man riding the powerful wave of his family's lineage and manifesting understated power.

"I'm just curious. Why would you want to live here?" Sarah asked.

"I need space for my vision. And my girlfriend. She come from Switzerland soon. After the New Year." They were in December now.

"Your love is coming to keep you warm," Luther said.

But Danilo raised up on him. He had heard mockery, not playful spontaneity, in Luther's tone. "What do you say?"

"It's an old standard. I heard it recently on the radio," Luther said.

Danilo's ire was not assuaged. He was not Sicilian, but he had an appetite for revenge. He took it deftly, having heard disrespect. "Is possible your boyfriend a drug addict and drinks too much? Why I should think this?"

"Luther is fine," Sarah said.

But Luther was not fine. He was speechless.

Danilo raised his nose to the air with some noisy sniffing. "What is smell? Is gas?"

Sarah looked to Luther, but he was still out of commission. "It's nothing, really. When we came here, there was a garden hose attached to the gas pipe and the water heater. Luther did a wonderful job replacing the hose with piping. He says the lingering odor is not dangerous.”

“Is very romantic, a drug addict and drinker and crazy too,” Danilo said, more in the way of observation than reproach.

It had been a while since a truth bomb had been dropped on Luther, and it took a few days to reassemble the bits and pieces into a viable whole, but come back together he did, as what was the truth against the power of alcohol but a balsa wood breakwater against a tidal wave? Anyway, the day would come that he would be able to put the laughing thing on Danilo. He just had that feeling.

But Luther had another feeling, one that came from his higher, not lower, self, and it was of urgency. Danilo had said his love was flying in to keep him warm, if not in those words, and he wanted very much to accommodate Danilo. Luther, after all, understood the physical need for consummation and how a man could not be himself without it, the dictate of the flesh being utterly dominant. Because she would be arriving right after the New Year, Luther agreed to vacate the premises by January 1. The fact that he and Sarah had not found an apartment was not a major concern, at least to him.

“It will all work out,” he said to Sarah. “You’ll see.”

But the New Year came and Luther’s search had turned up nothing. Sarah’s parents provided a safety net from the street with an offer for them to stay at their apartment. As for their possessions, they could store them in the barn up at Camp.

New Year’s Eve had been bad. A disco, somewhere near Times Square, had been his idea of a good time, as there had, as usual, been no invitations to parties. Strobe lights.

A revolving ball. Expensive drinks. He had imported a pint of blackberry-flavored brandy, which he downed in a stall of the unclean men's room. Thoughts as red as the lights licked at his brain. Orgy thoughts. In the morning he came to, amid the packed boxes, with Sarah giving him not an evil but an assessing eye.

In the U-Haul rental Sarah began to cry. "What have we done? We evicted ourselves from our lovely loft and now we have nothing."

"You'll see," he said.

"What I see is a big mess."

Luther struggled against the same feeling. 'Do you want to beat me? Do you want to beat me like a dog? Is that what you are saying?' The fever of self-destructiveness was coming over him.

"Stop it. Just stop it," Sarah said.

Luther might have let the surging mood carry him away. Instead he parked beside a pizzeria that was said to offer the best slice in New York City, though he would have placed it second to the old V & T on One Hundred Thirteenth Street and Amsterdam Avenue.

"I need some normal food. Do I have your permission?"

"Do you see me stopping you?" Sarah asked.

He had himself two thick, chewy slices, and washed them down with a jumbo cup of Coke, while keeping an eye on the truck.

"Great. Now you will be stopping to pee all the way up the Thruway," Sarah said.

She was saying that he was not like her father, who prided himself on traveling vast distances without any need to make a pit stop. And of course Peter would have some complex theory about his strong bladder that would elevate him into the pantheon of Wagnerian gods.

Someday it will stop, Celeste, it surely will, this borrowing at the margins of the lives of others while ignoring the centrality of their existence, their goodness. And why borrow at all if love is truly to be our guide? Well, in the meantime, let us ask what it proves that a man doesn't need to empty his bladder between point A and point B? Evidently, a great deal, as this criterion for establishing superiority, while perhaps not universal, does cut across nationalities, or so my research reveals about none other than Josip Broz Tito.

Was he content to rest on his military laurels, his leadership of the partisans in WW II, or his preeminence as prime minister and later president of Yugoslavia? No. His manliness rested on his ability to survive a round of drinking without once excusing himself from his comrades to relieve himself. Is it not conceivable that the word dog, when hurled as an epithet, derives from the proclivity of the male of that species for hosing down his environs? And while we are heading east in our discussion, let us not discount the shaping and fortifying influence of Leon Trotsky during this period of displacement of Sarah and me from the loft we had called home for those three and half years. There was a time when I was a reader of biography, this before the great mad tumult of history came to seem an endless avalanche beneath which one would inevitably be buried unless he removed himself from its path, that is, before I slowly sought to withdraw from time the stopped here power of time. I had consumed the trilogy of the great Isaac Deutscher: The Prophet Armed, The Prophet Unarmed, The Prophet Outcast. I had been moved to tears on discovering that Leon got completely lost trying to find his way to the London Museum and that he should extend this humanization process with the endearingly self-deprecating description of himself as suffering from topographical cretinism. And add to this his lifelong love of the French novel. But what are these indices of softness without the requisite hardness to bring them into exquisite relief? What is the single great image of modern cinema but Strelnikov in Doctor Zhivago standing rigid with the Red star ablaze on his military cap. There he is on the platform of the end car of the Bolshevik express tearing across the frozen wastes of the motherland as those huddled by the tracks whisper his name in awe? And who is the model for this revolutionary in Dr. Zhivago but our Leon. Have I told you that for a week I tried and failed to subsist on Levy's rye bread, sprinkled with salt, in homage to this Bolshevik of towering intellect, for whom such meager rations were his daily fare through years of exile in Siberia? Celeste, let me note, on the subject of warmth and softness, that the Fastin delivered me to this place of melting love daily, and that I sought that love's increase in certain passages of a biography by Richard Elman of another great figure, James Joyce, whose life was more easily comprehensible to me than his later works, especially that stew of literary psychosis, Finnegans Wake. For example, Joyce's love of certain arias and his pleas, through emissaries, for Nora to return to him. And, of course, the photojournalistic coverage of the hasty evacuation of American personnel from Saigon drew my sad and drug-inspired compassion, as a bowl of dry cereal calls out for the pouring of milk upon it.

“He’s checking on us,” Luther said, staring out the window the next morning. The trees, except for the pines, stood stark and exposed. Nature looked shabby without greenery.

“Who?” Sarah said. She lay on the living room sofa, the way her mother would.

“Everett. He’s sniffing.”

“He’s the caretaker. He’s supposed to sniff.”

“He’s an intelligence gathering network. He has long and powerful antennae.”

“He’s a good man,” Sarah said.

“Yes. He is that,” Luther said.

They went out to meet Everett. Even in winter he didn’t set foot in the house, at least not when they were home. Which meant what, that he went in when they were gone? Or did his caretaking not include the house?

“That’s a mighty big truck for a small bridge,” Everett said. He’d done a full walk around the vehicle, expecting blood or some other sign of carnage.

“It held pretty good. We didn’t hear any cracking,” Luther said.

“Your father had the bridge reinforced, after the last time.” Turning to Sarah was Everett’s way of saying he had given Luther all the time he was going to give him.

“We should be fine going back out. The truck will be empty,” Sarah said.

“Well now, I hear that city of yours is being burned to the ground. All kinds of talk on the TV. Bombings. Killings. People living in the street.”

“It’s our subway cars. We just need new ones. We get them every ten years or so. New rolling stock. That will do it,” Luther said. He loved Everett as much as he could love any man. For his purity. For being a way he could never be. A gentle man who could strike with deadly force. Ask the trout he pulled from the brook or the buck he dropped with one crack of rifle fire. A man who had his own compact with nature, killing only what he could consume. A man to be somewhat on guard with owing to his heightened, unspoken awareness.

“You take care now,” Everett said, heading back to his pickup. A big man with a slow walk. He had been in the war, World War II. On a ship somewhere in the Pacific. Returned to the states at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Hard to imagine Everett in Brooklyn or anywhere in the city. Hard to imagine him anywhere but where he was. Something of the eternal in him, fitting in right where he stood the way he did. They would have respected him, loved him just the way he was when he was in the navy. They would have seen what he could do with his hands, his mechanical aptitude, but also what he could do if riled to use them for a more destructive purpose. They would have respected his amiability and his silence. They would have seen he was different, but the kind of different they could embrace. They would have given him their hearts without checking that he had given them his. It would have made them proud, made them feel good, to extend themselves to him. And then they would want more of that good feeling that they got from being around him and having him there in their minds, even if he was a way they could not be.

All these things Luther thought on that day, the crusted snow giving way to his sneakered foot, as he melted down in love on the drug Fastin.

And thought something more. What he hadn't thought about. His stuff. Leaving it behind in the garage. His manuscripts there for everybody to see if they had a notion to examine the contents of the boxes. His stringy sentences. Stringy writing like stringy was. Naked. Naked. For all of them to see. Then where would he be? What corner would he have to hide in then? Not only seeing the horror of his emaciation but that he was a thief, that he was stealing from Sarah and from all of them, stealing their experiences and placing it on paper in his dreary, unimaginative way. And his books, those college texts he hadn't let go of—that thick hardbound volume on Roman law, for one. They would laugh and laugh. Because bones were bones and flesh was flesh.

It happened that Luther got into the Van Dines' bourbon, and having drunk several glasses, he went outside. A storm was coming in, but Luther didn't care. He raised up on the storm. He mocked the storm. He walked around the U-Haul, as Everett had done, only he addressed the truck, saying, "Where are your cojones, Mr. Truck? I am not seeing those cojones. Are you possibly hiding them from me?" He had a purpose in speaking to the truck so tauntingly, wanting only that it screw its courage to the sticking post while he did the same.

And he spoke to Sarah too, though in a very different tone. "Let's do it. Let's just do it. Let's fly. I won't be a prisoner of this damn storm." Even as he spoke, a voice told him he had no place to go but was in a hurry to get there. Sarah signed on. She was not of a mind to endure the desolation of the country in winter, not with his drinking.

The snow fell steadily. His bravado fled, and he drove along the Thruway as if on a sheet of slick glass, slowing to avoid having to hit the brakes. They were going to die. But they didn't.

In the loneliness of their empty nester days, the Van Dines took them in. The young, even the foolish and ugly, like Luther, could prove a welcome distraction. Jeffrey was now out of the house. He had gone off to study at an obscure college in England, having inexplicably become an anglophile. He wasn't entirely missed, having developed a sour and caustic manner; his perceived appendage status in the family had given him the right to a comfortable level of self-pity and bitterness. And Claire, too, had vacated the premises, though she had stayed local, renting an apartment several blocks away.

Lenore too, of course, remained the big absence. She was gone with Fresh Cream and "Sunshine of Your Love" and "I Feel Free" and the heartbreak world of "She's Leaving Home." She was gone with those years when she hadn't been gone. She too had vacated the premises, only to inhabit the apartment more than ever.

Peter had moved his office out of the bedroom and into Jeffrey's room, but he continued to sleep in the same room with Lydia and in the same bed with Lydia. He had navigated and negotiated all her changes. He was still part of her world; he had not been consigned to the damp chill of exile.

Peter bought walnut shelving on sale at Macy's for his studio. On these shelves he placed his hardbound volumes on American history so he could have time right in front of him and keep his eye on it. And he bought, also on sale at Macy's, a new tan raincoat so he could look proper in the world when he went out walking. It was not for Luther to forget that Peter first came calling on him in the spring of 1967 wearing such a raincoat. And now he had a new one, making of time a thing of change and sameness, or something like that.

Celeste, a Mexican man with a life of solitary situations came to dinner. His name was Juan Fuentes. He had shown great promise but could not get over the hurdle of his dissertation at Columbia and now was approaching middle age as a man on the skids. He passed out with his face in the salad but not before hurling the epithet cowardly borracho at me.

“Oh, for God’s sake, my life began with drunks and will end with drunks,” Lydia exclaimed.

I wondered if Juan Fuentes lived in a furnished room and peed in the sink. It occurred to me that he was a candidate for such a life given the lost quality of his days and it made me sad, and more, to be in his presence.

Having explored lower Manhattan and Brooklyn, Luther headed north to Washington Heights on a hunch that an apartment to their liking awaited him. Instead, he found streets scorched even in the bleakness of winter by the heat of angry young Dominican toughs ready to break gringo bones and living in buildings in a state of disrepair. Fear was a corrosive. That much he understood. The still center could not be found amid such tumult.

But then it happened, Celeste. A place presented itself to us. One bedroom. We told ourselves the price was right, and how could it not be, at one hundred fifty dollars a month? The low rent gave us the incentive to try to accommodate ourselves to this smaller space. Did it not have a lovely living room with arched windows and a southern exposure? Did it not come with a full bathroom in which you could sit and soak in a tub as well as a modern kitchen in which to prepare real meals, not just ramen noodles? Was there not a small room with a door and a window where Sarah could set up her studio? Could we not sleep in the living room on a convertible sofa? Could I not have a corner in the kitchen in which to sit at my typewriter? Could this not be done, Celeste? Could it not? Sarah, it must be said, had her doubts that I could be content in such tight quarters, but I was in exhortation mode and rallied her spirits. Why such conviction, Celeste? Why? Because one knows when love has come and that we have found what we often don't even realize we were seeking. And there was the matter of our means to live within. High overhead brings the debilitating drumbeat of anxiety and ruins our days. In all ways must we live modestly and not try to be more than we are lest punishment of the severest kind be meted out to us. If the mighty are brought low, then what chance can those less generously endowed have, Celeste? And yet we both know that my pattern was to alternate between extreme frugality and fistfuls of dollars thrown onto the bar.

New insight was provided in an incident I have not mentioned at that disco I dragged Sarah to on New Year's Eve. It was simply this, Celeste. A creature from the nether region approached me in the way those in the abyss are compelled to, with words containing the signature sound of evil on them. Such a soul it was who whispered, "Good shit," going the terse oxymoronic route in making his pitch. It was a different time, Celeste. Zale, the Scale Master, was gone. A harder breed of peddler had arrived with no flower power in his makeup and wearing I-can-see-you-but-you-can't-see-me wraparound sunglasses even in subterranean discos lit by strobe lights. The whisper had a hook attached to it that led me, snagged, into the men's room, where all was not glitter but the stink of feces and puke in stopped up toilets and on the floor. "Good shit. Good shit. Give you happy vibe. Make your thing strong for days. Strong like you wouldn't believe. Understand what I'm saying?" Holding in the palm of his hand a little foil-wrapped packet for which he asked twenty dollars. This was New Year's Eve, Celeste, and a thumping bass was threatening the bathroom walls. I was just a doofus white boy with his mouth hanging open. Driven by my own impulsiveness and perhaps his assurance that happiness and potency would be mine, I made the purchase and, though I had never used cocaine before, began to sniff the white powder. But the promised effect did not occur.

It's possible the whisperer dealt me Arm & Hammer baking soda, but if so, I was not in state of terrible umbrage. Why? Because I quickly saw that I couldn't afford to be hooked on cocaine. I had my love, and my love was alcohol. I needed to stay faithful to the bottles and stay away from the whisperers. If others wanted to powder their noses, that was their affair.

I had placed Sarah ahead of me. She was my shield. I could hide behind her art and not develop an identity of my own. My father had had his corner and now I had my own in the kitchen of our new digs. Soon I put up a wall shelf for my manuscripts, or some of them, so order could reign once more.

Some shift, hard to describe, had occurred, Celeste. Now there was a feeling of exposure, as if the covers had been pulled off and I was naked in the world. In Chinatown we had been under a spell. Perhaps it was the relative isolation of living in a community dominated by another race, as if we were exiles in a foreign country, or the fact that we were younger and just starting out. Now we had come out of hiding, or so it seemed, and the reality of life was plainer if not bleaker, more circumscribed. A peculiar, unsettling daylight had come.

Sarah adapted to our reduced circumstances. She offered no complaints. She was very good to me, very earnest in her love. Beyond my drunkenness and wandering and bouts of bad temper, perhaps she saw that my better nature was to be loving and kind and supportive, and no one should hit me with a stick for saying such a thing. Affirming our true identity is a universal right, is that not so, Celeste? In any case, Dr. Frodkey was the agent of change, offering her an alternative model for a relationship than the one her parents had, a model that required more involvement with the world. Sometimes I would wonder if she was more in relationship with her therapist than with me and if her domestic efforts—cooking and shopping for groceries—were really meant to satisfy him, but this couldn't have been so. The reality was that we had made a sort of life for ourselves, think of it what one might.

Now next door lived Heloise, a woman who appeared to be well into her thirties. When she happened to see Sarah and me together in the naturalness of our connection, a stricken look came over her that we could be a pair while she was on a solo path. I should say that the atmosphere engendered by this woman was charged. It is possible this woman Heloise orbited in my mental universe along the same path as my departed sister Naomi, for whom as yet no grieving had taken place. So if her vibe was negative toward me, so too was mine toward her. This state of affairs continued even when she took unto herself a man named Rex, whose air of conceit may have been fed by his regal name or simply summoned by forces unknown. In any case, Heloise and Rex became an item, and his arrival at her apartment would be heralded by the opening of the elevator door and the sound of footsteps in the hallway, noises well within the range of my hearing from my corner of the kitchen, as were bits and pieces of their conversation within her apartment.

Celeste, please do not cast me in the iniquitous role. I was not rooting for or against them as a pair, but I was sensing that when one is increasingly far afield from youth, matchmaking might encounter certain obstacles, especially should haughtiness infect the combatant in one corner of the ring and fire the combatant in the other. And while the words that sparked the ensuing conflagration went unheard by me and no fact-finding mission was ever launched to attain them, let us speculate that Rex did draw attention to the fact of Heloise's fading beauty and quickly move on to her response. "You think you're something? You think so? Did I tell you that your shit stinks so bad that it is everything not to flee the apartment after one of your craps? Did I tell you that you are going bald and that the shape of your head is grotesque? Did I tell you that your dick is skinny enough to fit in a keyhole?" And so it went, Heloise igniting the very air with her invective. We must learn from this, Celeste. We must learn that the primary purpose of the unhealed mind is to accumulate grievance and to wait for the opportune time to attack. The conditions are not always right for love, not always right.

On another front, Dante the Italian was into the full swing of amore with his Swiss girlfriend, having taken her unto himself in the privacy of the Chinatown loft. But privacy was a relative thing to Dante the Italian and did not exist at all for him in that loft if I was to believe the report he gave me over the phone. "Bogs. All I see are filthy, filthy bogs," Dante exclaimed. "In my eyes, in my hair, in my food they come. What is this thing you have done that I should have such bogs?" All things have their purpose, Celeste, all things, even Dante's "bogs," and if the laughing thing was on me something fierce, now was not the time to surrender to it. A degree of empathy was called for, and that it wasn't there in a greater degree is a failing I must own up to.

"Bogs, Dante? What exactly are bogs? May I hear from you about this? I am eager to learn."

"You are to tell me you don't know what the bogs are when you gave them to me?"

"We need precise information before we can swing into action, Dante."

Celeste, relationships come to an end, or can seem to even though we are all destined to meet again. So it was with Dante. We had given him the loft and the privacy he craved so he could love his Swiss miss good, and not a word of gratitude had we received. Even so did this giving continue.

"I have two words for you," I said to Dante.

"And I have two words for you," he retorted, in clearer English than I would have expected.

"Bug besieger," I said, ignoring the words he had spoken without speaking them.

“What is your trick now, drug addict alcoholic man with your stupid face I want so much to slap?”

Dante’s Italian way was getting the better of him, but I did not perish from his fire, Celeste. I persevered with my constructive course, saying, “Go out now to the landing. You will find your salvation there.”

“What is that you say, Mr. Stink Breath?”

“The bug besieger. The exterminating machine. That’s your weapon against the insurgency. The Domino Theory needn’t become a reality. Hold the line, Dante. Hold the line. Do you get my drift?”

But the phone line, the line I had not been referring to, had gone dead. Dante was now in the hands of fate. Sometimes we have to let go, Celeste. Sometimes we just have no other choice.

And yet, let us be honest here, Celeste. Let us be just that, and not call on the police or other existing powers to defend us against the truth. In this very moment is a face presenting itself to me, that of a boy from my childhood I will simply call Nobody, because a nobody he was in my mind, in my reality. A boy with a foreign accent and a persevering face. A boy somewhat older than me scaling the wall of mica schist from the lower drive of Riverside Park to the top level, where I stood, leaning over and observing his ascent. Did I cheer him on, Celeste? Did I? Did I offer him those words of encouragement that can be a lifeline of sorts to the struggling? No, I did not. Into his straining face, as he sought a new toe- and finger-hold in his ascent, did I drop a blob of spit. Nor did I stop there but followed with another and one more. But as I say, his was a persevering and a straining face full of immigrant determination, and my droppings only added to his resolve to complete the challenge. When finally topside he caught and knocked me to the ground and pummeled me with fists and feet till breathless, he could punch and kick no more. Some dogs need to be beaten, Celeste, and then need to be beaten again.

He grew anxious when she was late arriving home. She would have had a session with Dr. Frodkey after her shift at Hamburger Heaven. Maybe there was a delay on the subway. Or maybe this was the day Dr. Frodkey leveled with her and said she should consider finding another place to live. Though Sarah no longer talked with him about his drinking, Luther suspected it was a topic of conversation in Dr. Frodkey's office.

But no, she hadn't left. The key was in the lock and there she was with a bag of groceries from PriceRite. But her presence alone wasn't enough to fully relieve his anxiety. He watched her while trying not to watch her as she unpacked the bag: the head of lettuce, the tomatoes and cucumbers, the jar of pasta sauce and the box of spaghetti, the milk. Finally, it came out, the six-pack of Miller. Equally important, she didn't slam it down on the counter and fix him with a stare and lay some stinging words on him.

She was a good woman. She was love itself. She was trying to make a go of it in the little life he had provided her with.

There were things he wanted to say, but how? Something was wrong with the quality of the light. It was too intense. It revealed too much. The light in Chinatown hadn't been like that. It had let him be. Down there he had been anonymous in a sea of Chinese. Without the loft he was small and visible in his smallness. And he was old. The illusion had been shredded. But what illusion? That he had time and that he was caught up in something significant.

It was for a man to connect, and not with meaningless distractions like Dante the Italian or Heloise and Rex. The core of his being sat on the shelves and in the few stacked boxes in his corner of the kitchen. He must act. Ann Beattie acted. Robert Stone acted. Many, many writers were acting, and acting all the time. There was no stopping the actions they took. Just when you thought they had mercifully disappeared forever, there they were again, popping up with a short story in The New Yorker or a new novel that received a glowing review in the New York Times.

But his sentences. Jesus, the sentences. They were more malnourished than ever. They needed intravenous feeding. They needed something. And the novel, if that's what it was, was poorly organized. By this time the drafts had merged. Pink and yellow and green sheets were interleaved in a willy-nilly pattern. He lacked the courage to retype the pages with hand-written revisions; it was too hard to face his work by reading what was there. Three years of nothingness, of time frittered away with endless distractions or just staring into space while high on a couple of diet pills. And those parts of the book with the crazy prose, banged out while he was drunk. This from the man who thought he had a story to tell that needed telling.

Some writer, was it William Eastlake, saying writers wrote because they had no alternative to writing, only saying it more elegantly. That word. Elegantly. Jesus. Enough to give you nausea.

But he could not go down, even to suicidal despair, without coming back up. Within a day he had bundled up his misbegotten baby and mailed it off to Houghton Mifflin with a cover letter that read:

I am here. I am really really here. Do you know what that means? Read these pages and find out. Find out, I say. Find out.

Now, Celeste, things had a way of coming clear when I drank. A powerful flare would illuminate the dark in which I had been stumbling around and great truths would be presented to me. That gift, or curse, of illumination manifested in the Sixth Street apartment one evening. Already I had finished off the six-pack Sarah had brought home and gone out for "a little something" while she was in her studio trying to work in what was left of the day. "Do you need anything?" I would call to her through the closed door, and be relieved when she called back that she didn't. Soon I would return with a couple of bottles of wine from the liquor store across the avenue. Because she had risen early to get to work, I could count on her to grow weary soon and retire for the night, and I was anxious until she did. A man needs his freedom, Celeste, and even as I speak I hear you saying a woman does too, and that is equally indisputable. When I was onto the second bottle the truth found me. It was only this. I was a homosexual and I had always been a homosexual.

A bath could be found only a few blocks away. For an admission fee, you were provided with a clean towel and a locker, and it was there I had taken to racing when the truth as to my identity would come calling. Because men were there and only men and they did sex in rooms lighted only by dim colored bulbs and they did sex in rooms with hissing steam and they did sex that required one to lie down and the other to be on top in rooms on an upper floor set aside for such things. Because the men in that bath used their towels not to dry themselves after bathing but to cover their loins until they needed covering no more. So yes, Celeste, there I would run on my long legs, run with the revelation that had me in its grip, for the immediate release the bath promised, the absence of the preliminaries one had to engage in with a woman before she would lie down with you. And on this night, as on any night that I was so led, it did not concern me that Sarah, in her innocence, was sleeping the sleep of the just and that strains of nobility were absent in my mentality given the mask of duplicity I was wearing. As a homosexual I had to live in the truth of my being, at least in the nighttime hours.

(The one truth alcohol could not reveal was that I was a drunk, the mad ruler of my alcoholic realm. Because to be a drunk is to slap the hands of one and all from your person and to fly your freedom flag as you run naked through the streets of Manhattan.)

The urge first came upon him at the bar on Spring Street some months before, when they were still living in Chinatown. There had been nothing happening in the woman department, and so the idea came to him to explore the alternative. And once the idea had come, he had to follow through. That first night the clerk behind the partition showed he had no play in him. He said no when Luther showed him his graduate student ID and Luther pushed back, but without the conviction of the clerk, and so the clerk came back with an even stronger sound, saying “No is no,” and when Luther weakly asked him to explain, the clerk said, “You’re not a student. This ID has expired. See it, mon, see it. Don’t be living in the past, mon. Don’t be younger than you are, mon.”

But on this night, Mr. Meaness was gone, part of the vanishing act of time. Luther did not have to run his gauntlet and had a clear shot at his own life.

It pays to be free, Celeste. It pays. And we must take this freedom where it comes. And we pay to be free. We must not forget that.

There was hissing, the very same hissing he had heard in the steam room at the indoor swimming pool at the St. George Hotel, down at Clark Street, in Brooklyn, only now he was not a child and the men appearing and disappearing in the mist were not the pot-bellied old men with pipe-stem legs and arthritic knees but the sleek, toned gays of lower Manhattan. And yet, if he had arrived determined to engage, the steam had other ideas, saying truth was not the truth because wine and beer said it was the truth or that it wasn't the only truth. Saying further that truth was the real truth or the higher truth. Luther's mind turning to Leroy, the presser, at the dry cleaners of his adolescence, and how back then it was for him to run on his long legs not for his own spirits but for Leroy's vodka at the liquor store across the street and how it was not his time but Leroy's time to drink the pint down and not his time but Leroy's time to have the vodka steamed out of him and how everyone had their time for doing something. And if truth was truth, in whatever shape or form, then he had to live with the dictate of this most recent one and accept that the scene before him was, for him, an empty one he was out of place in.

On that night he walked slowly back uptown. He did not call out to the cars to stop their vicious parade along the wide expanse of First Avenue or for the wailing siren of the speeding ambulance to cease its hysteria. He had his mind on only one thing, a hot dog, heavy with the sauerkraut, heavy with the onions, slathered with mustard. "Make that two,” he said to the counterman at the deli on Second Avenue, confident that the rats could not be in the dogs and had not been on the dogs because the dogs were Hebrew National, and Hebrew National was brand-name goods, as everybody knew. He ate them right there at a table in the deli in the privacy of his thoughts, and when he was done he wiped his mouth with a paper napkin so the visible signs of having eaten would not be there and bused the table with another paper napkin and placed his dirty plate in a gray bin so the deli man would see he was dealing with a man committed to order and respect. He was ready to go home.

Celeste, you ask about Sarah’s room and if she had the privacy and the space she needed. You make a special point of asking if she could close the door, and to this I can only answer yes, yes, though it was for me at times to call through the door to her as, for example, on those runs to the liquor store. Guilt and subterfuge as well as simple consideration would prompt me to ask if there was anything she might need. As for space, she could fit an easel and her printmaking press into the room, but not the canvas sculpture that had snaked along the floor of the loft. And while there was light, it was not the abundant light that poured into the living room. Sarah’s window looked out on the wall of a facing building where direct sunlight never came, but where the voices of the women living below were heard. Triumphant, tell-off voices they were, voices that said, “I just told her, don’t be bringing your big fat self here all liquored up and with your fresh-mouth attitude going. I set her straight right quick, talking her liquor shit to me. That shit don't fly. Understand what I'm saying?" And where the gray pigeons of New York City came, cooing and layering the sill with their poop.

Luther had not lost his faith in Bill Walton, and in appreciation of Luther's unyielding loyalty, Bill Walton made an appearance in his dream one night. There Bill Walton was, his red hair in a ponytail, standing perfectly still in the Whelan's Pharmacy on One Hundred Tenth Street and Broadway, where Naomi had gone to get her prescriptions filled. Bill Walton's presence in his dream only strengthened Luther's resolve to provide maximum assistance to the ailing superstar, because while the end came for everyone, it should not come for a god in the glory of his youth. To be committed, body and soul, was no small thing, nor was it a small thing to abide the filth that those with hearts to smallness bound sought to slime Bill Walton: Bill Walton the malingerer, a slothful countercultural hypochondriac faking his injuries so he did not have to compete at the professional level; Bill Walton the louse, sharing a house with radical activist and Patty Hearst/Cinque/Symbionese Liberation Army aider and abettor Jack Scott. Though it was painful, Luther felt compelled to read the commentary of the cynics, who displayed their degrading mentality in columns and articles that posed the question, in one way or another, "Is this guy ever going to do an honest day's work?"

Luther stayed informed by reading The New York Times, the Daily News, the New York Post. And every two days, to really keep his eye on things in WaltonWorld, he would head to the international newsstand in Times Square to purchase the Portland Oregonian. And when it wasn't enough to read, he would call. The reporters on the sports beat for the Oregonian were respectful of Luther's dedication to Bill Walton. They recognized quality and sincerity in the voice of a caller when they heard it, even if, at first they were wary, fearing he might be a crank or God knows what?

Brad Neff, one of those sports reporters, came through for Luther with what information he had. Bill Walton remained day to day. Medical consultations were ongoing. Luther thanked Brad Neff profusely.

"There's always hope," he said to Brad Neff.

"Always," Brad Neff replied.

"Bill Walton is saving the best for last, for sure," Luther went on.

"Right," Brad Neff said, and because Luther had his sensitivity meter turned to high, he understood that Brad Neff had had enough of him for the night. Brad Neff was signaling that he had a life apart from Bill Walton. While Brad Neff could appreciate Luther's devotion, Brad Neff was more diversified in his interests. A glimmer of understanding came to Luther that what Brad Neff was showing him was health. That's right, health. Brad Neff was showing him what it meant to be a man and that to be a man meant not to give yourself to one thing only but to a range of things. Brad Neff was telling him to grow up, and the more Luther pondered the matter after his conversation with Brad Neff, the sadder and more pained he grew. He was still holding to his respect for Brad Neff, but Brad Neff had done something. Brad Neff had unleashed an unspoken torrent of judgment. Brad Neff had managed to administer hard slap without so much as raising his hand. Brad Neff had thrown him into the cold and lonely place, causing Luther to feel that he and he alone was responsible for helping Walton assume his rightful place in the pantheon.

Celeste, I was not entirely a fool. My support of Bill Walton showed fidelity of the highest order, if misplaced, but was also a manifestation of an extreme emptiness. This world that rules us, that will not allow us to ease free, that snags us with temptations and illusions. Bill Walton was a distraction, Celeste, but he was also a commitment to my own excellence. To breathe life into him was to breathe life into myself. If he could hit the comeback trail, then possibly I could as well, just as Prince Hal did centuries ago, so he, like Harry Hotspur, could be the theme of honor's tongue.

Luther left Brad Neff alone for a few days. Not that Brad Neff wasn't on his mind. How could he not be with that word hook he had inserted? But Luther was determined not to call. Brad Neff had betrayed him. He had disrespected him. Now it was for Luther to show Brad Neff who he was dealing with by not calling him ever again. But his resolve only put Luther in a more tortured place. Ever again. That meant infinity, eternity, forever.

I am not a writer. I am not even a would-be writer. I am a man who sits at home reading newspapers all day long, Luther thought, after a morning spent devouring the sports section of the New York Post and the Daily News. In neither paper a word about Bill Walton. Not one word. I am a man who should tear himself to pieces for being such a bum de la bum. In such a way did he think of himself on that day.

That night he drank his two bottles of wine. Instead of running to the baths so one truth could be steamed out of him and replaced with another, he called The Oregonian.

He needed to speak with Brad Neff right that minute. The desire was burning within him to do just that.

“Sports department,” Brad Neff said, in his terse, all-American way.

“Luther Garatdjian, from New York City,” Luther said.

“What can I do for you, Luther?” Brad Neff said.

“You can start by acknowledging that Bill Walton is the truth and nothing but the truth. Can you do that, Brad Neff? Can you?”

“Sometimes we get calls from gamblers about the injury status of players so they can establish a betting line, but I don’t get that feeling about you,” Brad Neff said.

“Right on, Brad Neff. Right on. I don’t bet on anything,” Luther said, remembering the grocery money he had lost playing bingo at a neighborhood Catholic charity event when he was a kid and then Sean beating him silly after Luther lost all his money to him playing blackjack a few years later.

“But I do get the feeling that you are drunk and need to get some help,” Brad Neff continued.

“You watch your mouth, Brad Neff. You watch your mouth,” Luther shouted, but his words meant nothing, as Brad Neff had hung up, just like Marge on the line had done some years before. Still, the last word did not belong to Brad Neff. One way or another the last word would belong to him, Luther Garatdjian, because if he wasn’t the truth, he still knew where it was to be found.

The days and weeks passed with no word from Houghton Mifflin. Although he would wake in horror that he had sent out into the world his misbegotten baby, the Fastin would serve to ease his apprehension of impending humiliation. And when he turned to alcohol after dark, the fantasy of literary success would bloom in his mind. He too, like Bill Walton, would have his shining hour. Blotted from his consciousness was the anemic prose, as when he was a teenager and the memory of being reduced to wild guessing on the SAT faded with each passing week, in its place coming the conviction that he had guessed right and would receive an astonishingly high score.

But savagery still had its place in the world. His number had not changed. His percentile had not changed. Go to the corner and stare at the wall with your shamed face, the letter from Houghton Mifflin said, in boilerplate response to his opus. Go there now. And if you want more of what I'm giving you, dare to come out and try again.

Celeste, the letter was saying we all have to learn our place in life. We all have to grow up. If we are a skinny bones and our prose is a skinny bones, then let us accept that skinny bones-ness is our fate. The letter was calling on me to call on God's love, as the world's love could not be mine. And was that my mother I heard saying, "Be grateful, foolish child, that you have bones at all"?

A would-be murderer was afflicting the building. He had started at the top floor and was working his way down. The police had a profile of him: strangely quiet, internalized. Nothing more. They were working on it, they said. This information came to Luther in a dream.

In another dream, this one recurrent, a jet plane descended slowly toward the earth. No control tower guiding the giant aircraft toward a landing strip. As the plane lowered toward his family's building, Luther could see, inside the lighted windows, passengers staring out in terror as they braced for a fiery death. How slowly the plane lost altitude. Luther ran in terror, as he ran when the men of violence began their beatings to death of the innocent and unsuspecting. These planes of impending violence. These men of violence. How important it was to be aware of them at all times and to adjust yourself accordingly.

He parked the car curbside. Sarah's session would soon be over. It came to him as he waited that Sarah was like a car, that she too needed to be filled up just as a car did. Not that Dr. Frodkey was gas. That was the thing with analogies, as they came to him. They never quite worked. Besides, it was disrespectful, even creepy, to compare her to a vehicle having its tank filled with fuel. Dehumanizing. He didn't like it. He didn't like it one bit.

The steering wheel had tan padding to improve the driver's grip. He now found himself squeezing that padding with both hands until they hurt. "No," he suddenly and loudly screamed, and in that instant released his hands from the wheel, shunning it as if it were a red hot object.

The tranquility of the afternoon was pleasantly broken by the chatter of children just down the block in their crested blue blazers, the girls wearing plaid skirts and knee socks. Private school kids in a private school neighborhood. Like the twitter of birds, the sound was life affirming and brought a moment of joy. Several of the girls clustered around one boy with a beautifully rounded head. Pretty girls with a handsome boy. Luther stared in a state of wonder and pained admiration. Lingered. It took courage, a courage he hadn't had. Always he would run off after his last class at the Claremont School. They hadn't wanted him. Garbage. Filth. Armenian filth. What's that, Armenian?

Was that a knife he saw hovering horizontally on the other side of the windshield? A bowie knife? It couldn't be. And was that the same knife plunging into Sarah's chest to the hilt? And was that blood turning her white blouse crimson? No, no, this could not be, not on a pacific weekday afternoon. It was not right. It was not normal. His mother speaking now. Someone speaking now.

He got out of the car. That was all the situation required. A little breathing room. The car was small, after all. An economy car. Peter divested of his big black king of the road Chrysler station wagon by the oil embargo and resulting extreme hike in gas prices. The doorman was watching him now, the angry vigil of a thug, a pugilist, a man who spoke with his hands, as Marv Albert, the sportscaster, said of his companion in the radio booth, former Knick standout Richie Guerin. Luther gave the doorman the walk of goodness. He showed him moral probity by averting his eyes from the prettier schoolgirls. A mind was a mind and a thought was contained in the mind and need not always leak out onto the face. You're not my mother, he said to the doorman, without saying a word to him, not breathing a single word. You're not a mind reader. The doorman stared with a gaze of quiet menace, only relenting when a building resident emerged from her car heavy laden with bags, and the doorman was obliged to assist, as he was being paid to be of service, not draw a bead on strangers.

“Arthur is great,” Sarah said, as she sat beside him in the car. The walk had done him some good. No more knife. No more image of a blouse stained red.

“I’m so glad,” Luther said. She had taken to calling Dr. Frodkey by his first name, though he couldn’t imagine she would do so when directly addressing the doctor. She was signaling the progress of their relationship, its growing intimacy. Luther well understood how the doctor’s chest must swell with pride at the evidence of his good work. After all, Sarah was no longer disoriented and paranoid in her ideation. She was back to her fresh-faced self again. And intimacy was a good thing. It was important to share secrets, he was sure. And there was a lot Luther shared with her. Not everything. Some things you didn’t want to say or need to say. And there were some things you couldn’t. The knife, for example. How could he tell her about that, when she had told him repeatedly his sole function in life was to someday kill her? Of course, she never would have made such a prediction if he hadn’t shown her that article about the poor boy who had stabbed to death his rich girlfriend and followed by telling her that he identified with the boy. Wasn’t that proof enough that not everything needed to be shared? He could only imagine her horror if he revealed what he had envisioned minutes before.

And yet, as he drove down Fifth Avenue the knife came back, reappearing just beyond the windshield. He tried to assure himself it would disappear when they approached the hansom cabs at the south end of Central Park and the Plaza Hotel. He couldn’t see the knife standing up to the scene of Cary Grant dashing from the hotel into a taxi in North by Northwest and into the sunlight of America the film captured. And yet the stately hotel proved no defense. Even so Luther found reason for hope. When they had negotiated their way through midtown traffic and the confines of the Lincoln Tunnel and merged with the free flow of fast-moving cars on the New Jersey Turnpike, then surely they would be able to outpace the knife and leave its viciousness behind.

“Luther, are you OK?”

“Why wouldn’t I be?” Luther asked.

“You’re choking the steering wheel.”

“Sorry. Just a little tense. That’s all.”

“Tense about what?”

“Nothing really.”

“Are you worried about that basketball player? I keep forgetting his name.”

“No, no,” he said, vagueness in his voice. A feeling of shyness had come over him hearing her inquiry. Sarah was not sports-minded. She did not spend a portion of each day going through the box scores. She did not use sports heroes as a kind of life support system. Her heroes were artists and writers and singers and actors. She admired them but did not live vicariously through them. She was too intelligent for the event that they were going to this length to attend. She would see another instance of the poverty of his life.

The knife would come and the knife would go; no logic attached to its arrival or departure. The same with the gruesome image, which caused him to audibly groan and Sarah to express concern. And yet, his magical thinking endured.

“HoJo,” he shouted, and repeated the same several times.

“What?” There was befuddlement in Sarah’s query.

“We have to go where we belong. We have to get some normal food, and Howard Johnson, HoJo, can deliver the goods. Orange is everything. It is the color of America. It is the color of childhood. Why? Because it is sweet and completely edible, like the orange creamsicles of the Good Humor truck.”

Sarah let his utterances ride, consigning herself to the flow of his desperation. If the Howard Johnson just ahead on the turnpike was his beacon in whatever storm he was experiencing, so be it.

“I’ll have a hamburger, a normal one, and French fries, and a bottle of ketchup,” Luther said to the waitress, whose skin was as man tanned orange as the HoJo roof. “And a blaze of glory on the side. A Trailblazer of glory, make that.”

“What’s your problem, mister?”

“I’m sorry. I got carried away,” Luther said.

“We have real men here to deal with your kind,” she said.

“Yes, I’m sure,” he said, hearing an echo of the past in the waitress’s threat.

He had been hoping for hope, not an incident.

The Philadelphia 76ers had an arsenal. They had Darryl Dawkins doing the monster mash. They had George “raise up and fire, all with one hand” McGinnis. They had Lloyd Free, from Canarsie, in Brooklyn, to throw out his legs as he delivered his long-range bombs. They had Doug “slick and quick” Collins. They had Billy “I can elevate off the floor like no one’s business” Cunningham, from Erasmus High, in Brooklyn. They had red and white and blue uniforms to tell you they were America, but that was just a lie.

And who, who, did the Portland Trailblazers have? They had Lionel “up and coming” Hollins, a southpaw guard out of Arizona State who could take it to the hole. They had Sidney “swish” Wicks, from UCLA. They had Lloyd “I play to cool jazz” Neal. They had their black road uniforms with a red slash.

“Which one is Bill Walton?” Sarah asked, and so he told her what he hadn’t wanted to say, that probably his doctors had advised against the road trip.

“Oh, you had wanted so much to see him,” Sarah said. Her expression of regret only increased his sense of vulnerability, leaving him as exposed as the players in their shorts and jerseys taking the court for the start of the game. How aberrational his identification with the star suddenly seemed. Who was this gangly giant he had never met or spoken a word with, and with whom he would have nothing in common should they ever chance to meet? Even in Luther’s dream they had not spoken. In a way it was better that Walton hadn’t made the trip. If his hero were there in the flesh, Sarah might come to the same conclusion as to the nonexistence of the connection.

And yet Walton was his missing love, and so he watched with the pain of intolerable longing the spectacle of the big bodies from their center court seats. He was not a fan of the Portland Trailblazers, as such. They were not his blood, and the fine thin drizzle that cast a depressive pall over the city, what was that to embrace? He saw Train Hollins go up tempo with his left-handed dribble and athletic body and Lloyd Neal fill in for Walton in a workmanlike way. He saw Billy Cunningham show off his white man spring and McGinnis turn on the power. But he also heard the Zombies sing, in their insistent, stunned way, “She’s not there. She’s not there,” only it was number 32, Big Red, who was not there.

And both he and Sarah heard something else, the painful coldness that comes when purity of heart is met with cynicism. “The guy can’t even show up to support the team, assuming he is really injured and not faking it,” a young man in the row behind them wearing a University of Pennsylvania slicker said to his male buddy. His buddy replying, “And never mind that he can’t even marry his girlfriend after getting her pregnant. The guy’s a complete jerk.”

“They have no right talking like that,” Sarah said, but Luther shushed her. The coward in him was revealed and active now, the coward who had hidden behind his mother from his father and from Simon Weill and who, in general, sought the protection of women from men who could do him harm. These were not the young men of physical violence, the kind who lived and breathed to break bones and cave in chests. He was among his intellectual betters, the young men of the high SAT scores and the science lab, not the endless subjectivity of the paperback novel, young men who had the fortitude to form relationships with male peers and forego the dinky route of male bondage to a woman. And so a respectful, if cowed, silence was called for lest they lay him waste right there with their cruel objectivity at the Philadelphia Spectrum.

A gray-haired father returned to his seat with refreshments for himself and his teenage son. The fact of their relationship was tormenting, though Luther couldn’t say why, or why the huge pretzel slathered with mustard that the father handed to his son filled him with dread. Or why he wanted to shout, ‘Stop, stop,’ whenever the announcer said, over the public address system, Dawkins or Hollins or whoever “ at the line to shoot two,” his voice going basso profundo with the mention of the number. How was it someone could be a father? How was it anyone could live in a city as foreign to him as Philadelphia and eat jumbo-sized pretzels coated with mustard?

He had abandoned his inept American crawl after a few strokes in a swimming test as a kid. He had quit tenth grade biology because it was too demanding. He had quit or failed at so many things. If only he could stay the course here. But even with the fast-paced action on the court as a distraction, the images began to return shortly after halftime.

“We have to go,” Luther said.

“Why?” Sarah asked.

“It’s getting late and I’m feeling anxious about the drive back,” he said. As they headed for an exit he felt with his fingers the outline of the remaining Fastin in his shirt pocket and stopped in the men’s room and swallowed it.

He turned the car onto an endless bridge, and began to scream when it became clear from the signs that they were headed in the wrong direction. The universe was against him, and viciously so. Such was the gist of his outburst, the same emotional meltdown he had experienced when he couldn’t replicate the pattern the psychologist had shown him with the black and white blocks in the Stanford-Binet IQ test. And why not? Wasn’t driving a kind of intelligence test as well? Peter Van Dine would have visualized a map with all the coordinates, and driven from point A to point B effortlessly. “The fucking bastards. Do you see the way they hide the road signs you need and give you all kinds of totally irrelevant shit just so you can get trapped on this fucking bridge and be unable to get off? Do you see the viciousness?” His anger that of a foulmouthed bitter child sent out into the world with inadequate gifts.

When, toward midnight, they arrived back in New York, he said what he hadn't wanted to say. “I need for you to go home.”

“Go home? I am home,” she said, as they parked in front of their building.

“No. I need for you to go home to your parents.”

“Why?”

“I can't explain.”

“But it's so late.”

“Just go upstairs and call your parents and pack a few things. It's just for tonight.”

Celeste, she did not argue. If understanding is a facet of love, she gave me that without the preliminary of intense questioning. She must have sensed that words would not help with whatever had gone wrong at that hour. Now though you do not ask, I do see the condemnation chorus has gathered to ask what kind of man it is who sends his longtime girlfriend home to her parents as midnight nears rather than vacate the premises himself, but the word manliness has always been abhorrent to my senses and so I will not reply, guided by the wisdom of the one who wrote, “In my defenselessness my safety lies.” That night I secured the premises, removing all knives, including butter knives, from plain sight, by storing them in the cabinet under the kitchen sink. In that way I was less likely to do violence to myself or to others. After Sarah's departure I had brought home the goods, my friends the tallboys and the bottles of red wine. I had some drinking to do, Celeste, being very, very thirsty.

In the morning he drove the VW to the Triangle Garage on One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street, just west of Broadway. This is where it began and this is where it should end, if symbolism is to have any place in my life, Luther thought, as he turned over the keys to the attendant, remembering the drive from this same garage to Camp with Lydia in her Sunbeam Alpine in the spring of 1967. But I am devoid of neat, symbolic endings, Luther further thought. I am not about symbolism or irony or any of that. I cannot neatly package.

He headed further west, drawn once again to the railroad tracks, the memory strong of his childhood explorations of them with Jerry Jones-Nobleonian. The area remained holy. The cobblestone streets. The great steel arches supporting the viaduct. The old and soon to be abandoned meatpacking plants. The garages. The pier off which Luke dived into the sewage-saturated Hudson, reaching the midpoint of the gray river before turning back, Luther staring in terror all the while. The crawlers they would purchase at the bait and tackle store in Harlem and the eels Luke reeled in from the pier and deposited in the kitchen sink, to their mother's horror. The New York Central twin diesels, corporate gray, with the red decal below the headlamp. And yes, somewhere, dimly in his mind, the bus with the rounded front that ran to the river's edge and that he rode on, even if he didn't, in a time and place all his own in the bosom of that childhood. All of that needed preserving, if only in his mind. He must be faithful to something.

Q: But Luther, there are millions of people with lives and memories. Is it not true that to go down the dinky road of remembering in this fashion is to stake a claim to your uniqueness and to forget that others exist?

A: Do not bother me with your meddling when I am busy. Do not bother me, I say.

The tracks ran in both directions, as tracks must, but that didn't mean he was equally amenable to both. He was running in only one direction on this day, and it wasn't toward greenery and Vassar College and mountains and all that north meant in his mind. He was committed to taking up the challenge of the mouth, the orifice, the thing that would consume him. I have gone through it from the south, but the time has come to now approach from the north, Luther thought.

No gang committed to switchblade folly materialized out of the graffiti on the desecrated walls, nor did a train come to tremble the tracks and boast its stiff, unyielding ramrod power. He was the only thing trembling in that tunnel, in anticipation of all that was unseen but which could quickly manifest to extinguish his life, a wave of panic sweeping away the willed bravado. As when he was a child, he climbed in terror through the door-size space in the tunnel wall, scrambled up the silt-covered embankment, and squeezed through the space in the semicircular arch where one of the vertical bars was missing to daylight. They had not gotten him. They had not.

He saw what he saw, the park still in a bare bones state on the raw March day. The leafless plane trees, the balding turf, the broken benches. A park neglected, like the city itself. The life of the city receding, in decline. The vandals taking the handles, just as

Dylan said. And he had been one of them, a disenfranchised child, throwing snowballs at the lamp heads in the park to burst the heated bulbs and turn the park darker than it was. And now there he was at Dead Man's Hill, where he had gone to lie with Jane Thayer in the summer of 1962. A short distance ahead he came to the limestone fountain at the entrance to the lower level of the park at One Hundred Sixteenth Street. And there was the corner building on One Hundred Fourteenth Street where Johnny Lacy and his family had lived, and maybe still did. And now he was standing at the spot where Johnny Lacy, in fury, had run him down and threw him to the ground. And here, over here, was where Edward Macy, whose father walked with one hand in his pocket in the manner of all corporate executives, told him casually that he had lost the Rawlings baseball glove that Luther had just purchased at Davega's, down on Forty-second Street, after begging Luther to let him borrow it. Saying to Luther, with the smile of the mocker, the scerner, that he had left it in the park the day before. Luther not killing him, not making him die and die and die. Not offering a murmur of protest. Not knowing he had a right to. Just putting the smile of amiable stupidity on his face as Johnny Lacy looked on. The statue of the Polish patriot where he had sat and watched as Tall Tommy tapped tobacco from a pouch into thin paper, which he rolled tight and smoked. And the red-brick building on the corner of One Hundred Thirteenth Street and Riverside Drive, with its wrought iron awning, towering over the statue. A building where the people of quality lived, including the Manhattan District attorney, the one who had said Auntie Eve might look like Whistler's mother but she was indeed a crook, this after seeking a grand jury indictment. And the railroad that wasn't a railroad behind it but some kind of conveyance for garbage but why was it he saw only the tracks and not the thing that rode on the tracks, because if he could see the thing then there would be hope, because where there was a railroad, of whatever size, there was always hope. And the building halfway up the hill, the tenement of the Negroes that was now the property of Columbia University so they could make all of Morningside Heights the land of argyle socks and penny loafers and khaki slacks. And there was more and more and more, the old man with the hand cart crying out to those in the other tenement of the Negroes, on the north side of the street and the very top of the hill, "I buy old gold." He hadn't come to the time yet when he would no longer be living in his history, hadn't yet shed the burden of telling what no one needed to hear. Like the graffiti artists at work in the tunnel he had just left behind, he was needing to remember and be remembered.

Celeste, we must not become the slaves of time, given its illusory nature. One begins to stink of self-importance in documenting every minute of one's existence. Seeking to leave our scent, we are, like a dog with its spray. There are one billion Chinese, not so many fewer Indians. If you randomly group me with ten other people, seven will have superior writing skills to mine. What am I doing wandering around in a past that can have no existence if time itself doesn't? But enough. There is work to be done.

From inside the apartment came the sound of her singing. "And he walks with me/and he talks with me/and he tells me I am his own," she sang, stopping only when he knocked.

“Is something ailing you, my son? I can see in your face that you are troubled and that you are searching? But do you know what it is that you are searching for?”

“I need to sit down,” he said.

“I will get you a glass of ginger ale,” she said.

“No. I am fine,” he said.

“Are you drinking, my son? Is that what ails you?”

The question stung him. “No,” he answered.

“Are you developing the thirst, my son?”

“Stop,” he said.

“Have I not told you about my father and the mission my mother gave to me, to go out in the snow and find him before the snow could take him for itself and to smash his bottle against the rocks? Have I not told you that story?”

“You’ve told me.”

“And have I not told you that there is only one who is the way, the truth, and the light?”

“Yes, yes,” he replied, hearing with more weariness than annoyance his mother’s words, and seeing her galvanized by his lostness.

“The world will beat you, my son. It will beat you into a state of senselessness. You must come to Jesus. You must come to the Lord. You must walk in the garden with him.”

“Yes, I hear you,” Luther said. He did not scream at her, as he had as a child, “You have had your life. Allow me to have mine.” She was older now, but not too old to put her chuckle on him, and nothing summoned that chuckle more quickly than him losing his temper.

“Do you not know the story of Rachel, my son, how she was lost and now she is found? Did not her thirst for knowledge come to be replaced by a thirst for the bottle? Did the world give her anything she sought, or did she have to come to Jesus for the peace that passes understanding?”

“How is she?” Luther asked.

“She is fragile in her mind and peculiar in her ways, if you must know.”

“How do you mean?”

“Her intensity for Jesus is beyond the normal. She stands at her window and looks for him in the night sky, as it is written that he will come as a thief in the night.”

“Stands inside the window, not outside, like Naomi used to do?”

“Ushtah, son. Ushtah. Inside.”

“That’s all she does?”

“No, I wouldn’t say so. She takes walks in the park and comes to see me. But lately when she comes she leaves the water running in the bathroom sink. I do not know what is in her mind that she does such a thing, and she cannot be reasoned with.”

“She needs help,” Luther said.

“The doctors are of no use. They give her pills, which she does not take. She says they are trying to poison her.”

It would not do to say to his mother that Rachel belonged in an institution. He did not want his mother, with Naomi’s fate fresh in her mind, to raise up on him for suggesting her third daughter be placed in among the men of violence, those who hit and hit with a sense of impunity. “That is not good,” he simply said.

“There is something else beyond the normal that she will do. She will sometimes from behind place her hands around my neck, and though she does not apply pressure, this is something I cannot have.” His mother spoke with vehemence here, that her daughter would treat her so.

“Have you spoken with her about these things?”

“She goes to a distant place when I try. And if I persist she simply leaves. And here she comes now, so let us hush ourselves.”

Surely his mother had on a special listening device that she could hear Rachel’s approach and he could not. She entered without knocking through the unlocked door in a shapeless floral print dress and green sneakers, with which she wore no socks or stockings to cover the blue veins that showed around her ankles. Consistent with this new religious chapter of her life, she kept her unsmiling face free of makeup and wore her plainness comfortably, as if the world and its opinions had no meaning for her.

“Why, hello, Rachel,” Mrs. Garatdjian said.

“Hello, Mother.”

“Luther has come to visit. Is that not nice?”

“Hello,” she said, and went on her way deeper into the apartment, as if she had some serious business to tend to and mustn’t dally.

“She will not stay. You will see what I mean,” Mrs. Garatdjian whispered, Rachel now dominating the apartment with her silent presence. And in fact it wasn’t long before she reappeared, only now her gait had accelerated, as if she were a train roaring toward its destination.

“Goodbye, Rachel,” Luther said, seeing she had no intention of stopping.

“Bye,” she said, shortening the word to keep communication minimal.

“Your sister has time for God but not for people,” Mrs. Garatdjian said. “Could I ask you to check that the faucets are not running in the bathroom?”

The tap was turned on full force, both hot and cold. He closed the faucets and shuddered at the sight of the unclean sink and toilet before quickly returning. If anything, the apartment was worse than he remembered. His mother was old. It was not for her to scrub and clean. He wondered, not for the first time, that Hannah could live with such conditions.

Celeste, I must stop here and ask what sort of man puts words in his mother's mouth? Furthermore, what is the point of chronicling the failure of her children? Sometimes I am afraid. Sometimes doubt enters in.

“That apartment you lived in before you and Sarah began to live together. Did you tell me it is still yours?”

“A subtenant lives there now.”

“And you said the rent is very low.”

“Yes. But is there a reason you ask?” It was not the first time his mother had asked about the apartment.

“I was just curious,” she said.

Was she looking for someplace to be away from Rachel and all of them? Or was she thinking of more affordable housing for Rachel? Or was it just curiosity?

There had been some developments at that apartment. Roddy Rumble's ex, Luella, had shown up at the door, and after a few days sharing the same space he came close to braining her with the bar of the police lock before fleeing, and Luella had been there with their young daughter ever since.

"May I ask you something? It is about my father." He could no longer call him Daddy.

"Your father had a fine mind," she said.

"Yes, of course. But did he ever have trouble?"

"What kind of trouble do you mean?"

"Mental trouble?"

"I cannot say so, not of the kind that Rachel has experienced."

"He never told you of any dark thoughts?"

"The storm clouds would roll in on him and last for days, he would say. He had his struggles," she said, presenting him with a new dimension of his father.

"I see."

"Do you see, my son? I believe there is much about your father that you don't see. He loved you very much."

She was being unfair, throwing on him the weight of her father's alleged love. But he didn't protest. He just sat silent.

“Is something troubling you, my son? Have the storm clouds rolled in on you as well?”

“I’m OK,” he said.

“Those storm clouds are Jesus’s way of calling you to him. He is your port in the storm.”

“I have no doubt,” he said.

“When you have exhausted your mockery, you will come to him. That is my prayer of all my children, that we all be in heaven together. Have I not told you so?”

“Yes, yes,” he said, finding no energy or enthusiasm for telling her he had a more earthly concern.

When Sarah called, I was no more specific. How could I be? Was I to tell her I was verging on becoming the murderer she had feared I would someday be? But I did say I needed to see someone, a therapist, that I had things going on in my mind that were troubling. Sarah did not hit me with a stick. Instead she took constructive action. Dr. Frodkey gave her the name of a therapist, a certain Nina Kallian, I might wish to see for a consultation. He said Dr. Kallian was a smelly Armenian and as I too was a smelly Armenian, perhaps the two of us would like to combine our smells in a real stink-fest. He added that as I was an effete male incapable of engaging with a therapist who possessed his manly vigor, it was best to consign me to a female. Now, Celeste, you will say that Dr. Frodkey said no such thing, that it would be a vileness beyond description for him to express such contempt, but there are times when truth must give way to TRUTH, and so, if you will permit me, I will give right-of-way to the latter that we may engage on the plane of meaningfulness. Emotional reality means something in this world, Celeste. It means something.

Shortly afterward Lydia called to say I had been so supportive of Sarah through her difficulties and that I deserved a rest. I do believe goodness was Lydia's guide in this instance and throughout her life. In a way, it was sad. She was a woman who herself had not received an abundance of love—her father a suicide when Lydia was still an infant and her mother dying on an iron lung only a few years later—and yet she spent her life trying to give love, and often to those who rejected her offerings. We must bow down to the truth of another person's goodness, Celeste, and acknowledge their importance in our lives. We must honor the dead who are only partially dead, as we will all be among the fully dead soon enough, and only then, perhaps, will we see how it all comes together. Let it be said that she had kindness in her bones and in her heart, and generosity as well.

Dr. Kallian received me in her office. She had the off-white complexion of the Armenian, that dull, defeated skin that is a signature of the race, and the dolor in the eyes and face of all Armenians as well. A mousy woman half in life and half in death, as so many Armenians are, and more than likely pathetically grateful for any scraps, such as me, that Dr. Frodkey threw her way. It is hard being an Armenian in this world, invisible, a nobody. The fact of the Radcliffe degree prominently displayed on the wall did nothing to mitigate this assessment.

“So what has brought you here?”

“I need to know if I am a candidate for violence.”

“A candidate for violence? Can you explain?”

“Do I have the stabbing thing in me?”

“And whom would you stab?”

“My girlfriend.”

“And why would you stab her?”

“She said I would. She said I was a murderer in the making.”

“What would lead her to say such a thing?”

“A newspaper article gave her cause to define me for all time as such a person.”

“A newspaper article?”

“I read in some paper that a boy from the other side of the tracks stabbed his wealthy girlfriend to death when she gave him clobber, the way all women sooner or later give men clobber.”

“Clobber?”

“You know. I love you but I’m not in love with you. I have met someone else. That sort of thing. I showed her the article and said I identified with the boy. As soon as I said those words I realized I had made a terrible mistake. Ever since I have been trying to prove to her that I am not the second coming of Norman Bates.”

Now Celeste, I held one hand in the other as I spoke, to show Dr. Kallian that I meant no harm, to her or anyone, but there were those times when separation was needed and I would then allow my hands to hang, as any normal person would, and now and then, or so it seemed, the good doctor would steal a glance at those twin agents of destruction, possibly fearing for her life even as she maintained the façade of professional composure.

“And has there ever been an instance in which she gave you this clobber?”

“Only this. She told me Bob Dylan was a genius and I was not a genius, that I was ordinary in every area but my sensitivity. Later she told me Lane, a student at her art school, was also a genius and her only love. She told me what I have been told through the centuries, that I do not have the necessities to command a woman’s love. Unless you have greatness or money, a woman will leave you lonely, and that is especially so if you have thinness in your bones and in your prose.”

“I see,” Dr. Kallian said. “But how can the two of you make love when there are these issues?”

“We have no one else. We either stay together or let our families kill us.”

“Your family would kill you?”

“My family is dead.”

“Your whole family is dead?”

“Not entirely. My father died five years ago. And then we threw dirt on my aunt, Auntie Eve. And then we threw dirt on Naomi, an older sister, the one who smiled while she smacked.”

“But have you not experienced grief over their passing?”

“Don’t go histrionic. We cannot permit that,” I said.

“What?”

“Look. My father was old and sick. He was a diabetic and had half of one leg amputated. He needed to have dirt thrown on him. And Naomi was out of control. For order to be restored, she too needed dirt thrown on her.”

“You felt no sense of loss?”

“I felt a sense of triumph at my father’s passing and scorn for those doing the weepy-weep. My sister’s death stunned me, its brutal nature. But there must be order. We order our life or life orders it for us. Something like that. As for Auntie Eve, she had lain dying for years, old and senile. I do what I can with what I’ve got.”

Dr. Kallian paused before speaking. “I will be frank. I think it might benefit you to work with a male therapist. Would you be open to that?”

“If he is like Carl Jung, definitely.”

“Give me a day to think about this and I will get back to you,” Dr. Kallian said.

Q: And now the time has come to inquire, with simplicity and directness, what gives with certain attitudes that you, Luther Garatdjian, have displayed. Do you not wish to touch down on the ground of sanity and be freed from that false sanctuary where you have sought to exist, in your drinking life and thereafter, treating all human emotion and experience as deserving of nothing more than your mocking dismissal? First, why are you so hard on Armenians? What compels you to speak of them in general in such a disrespectful manner?

A: Do not ask me to resurrect the dead. Do not ask me to forsake my life for the annihilated. Do not ask me to believe life is a vale of tears and that I must carry the old rugged cross. Is it for me to bring salvation to the deceased or the living?

Q: That is your answer?

A: Would you have me say that I am not only a coward but disloyal and even treacherous, rejecting of all that is mine and embracing that which is not—e.g., Bill Walton—and in so doing ensuring that I am utterly alone?

Q: Is it not for you to say what is true? Let us move on. Why such mockery of an innocent such as Dr. Kallian?

A: Hard slap is always merited where a pose of sorrow is adopted, whether that pose is conspicuously manifest or more subtle. Is that so hard to understand?"

Q: What sorrow?

A: Dr. Kallian's. She was in love with it. Have I not already noted her dolorous eyes and the total absence of mirth? Clearly a woman who had wrapped herself in the cloak of her tribe's tragic history.

Q: That is how you perceived her?

A: I want to be free, unfettered. I do not wish to be surrounded by smelliness.

Q: Excuse me?

A: Nix to clans, ethnic/racial identifications, the whole shebang. I want to be an American—can you dig it?

Q: What would such ethnic/racial identification mean?

A: My father's big nose. His big feet. His hairiness. The boiling water in which his insulin needle lay in the sterilizer.

Q: What else?

A: Does there need to be anything else?

Q: What else?

A: His hand.

Q: What about it?

A: Its annihilating power.

Q: Is your father not dead?

A: If you say so.

Something new to be concerned about. Not only knives used on Sarah and himself but now the fear of hurling racial epithets and ethnic slurs—in the crowded, tense subway, on the street. The N word shouted in a surly black man's face. The S word offered to an angry-looking Puerto Rican. Prompting them to do for him what he could not do for himself. The fear too that he would jump off the platform as the train roared into the station or step in front of a speeding bus.

A white-brick high-rise at Second Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street, the kind he imagined the nouveau riche living in, those who could not afford Park or Madison or Fifth Avenue. The building set back from the street with a semicircular driveway. A doorman standing guard. In the waiting room one of those white noise machines on the floor. The New Yorker. Scientific American. National Geographic. Ann Beattie everywhere, imposing her cool tyranny. How high were her board scores? How high was her perfection? A goddess of the plainly beautiful kind.

Dr. Kallian saying when she phoned, “Dr. Rosner is not bent and hooked, but I have a hunch you two will work just fine together.” He could call her all the names he wanted to, but he had never been so scared. She was his lifeline. He had anxiously waited to hear from her and expressed his gratitude.

A door opened. A woman emerged. Shortly a man came to stand in the door. He had short red hair and a trim beard and wore a beige mock turtleneck with his brown wool jacket. No introduction. Just a nod, signaling Luther to rise and follow him into his office.

“What’s going on?” Even when he spoke, Dr. Rosner did so from a place of hush.

“Did Dr. Kallian, the Armenian, not tell you? I asked her if I was a candidate for violence.”

“Why would you be a candidate for violence?”

“Because my mind is instigating me to take my girlfriend’s life or my life. That is why.”

“And how would you take her life or your life?”

“The stabbing thing is great in me. Great, I say. Great.”

“Are you on any medications?”

“Only what I need.”

“What is the name of this medication that you need?”

“Fastin. And just so you know, it is from one of the leading doctors in all of New York City.”

“And what is the purpose of this medication?”

“To take me high when I am low so happiness can be not only my birthright but my reality and I can continue with my novel of ultimate truth White Line Continue. Because bad winds blow against me when I approach the typewriter without it and life becomes a fearful, soul-destroying thing.”

“Give me the pills.”

“Excuse me?”

“I said give me the pills.”

For a reason he hadn't examined Luther had taken his bottle of Fastim on the road with him and now, for a reason he also did not examine, he reached inside his pocket and handed he prescription bottle to Dr. Rosner.

“How long have you been on these things?” Dr. Rosner asked, having read the label and put them aside on the small table near his chair.

“Since my sister Naomi went to swim with the fishes and the light flashed green for me to go down the same road and yet achieve a different destination.”

“How long would that be?”

“Coming on three years.”

“Are you working?”

“Did I not mention White Line Continue? The world does its work and I do my own.”

“How are you supporting yourself?”

“Ill-gotten gains, if you must know. I profoundly defeated Simon Weill, who had acquired the habit year after year of defeating my mother and Auntie Eve.

You must understand. I was born to a mother who taught me to look backward to a time when paradise was ours before a snake in human form maneuvered his way into our life, taking away the building that we had owned and placing us in virtual servitude to him. My dream from childhood on was to ride to my mother’s rescue and give that man the hard slap he deserved.”

“That’s a pretty big dream. Are you still involved with the building?”

“I would say not. My business expertise made our daily participation in the operation of the building unnecessary, as Simon Weill saw things. I said I gave Simon Weill hard slap, but I did not say I killed him, and if you don’t kill a snake, even if you have profoundly defeated him, then you get killed. Money that he was accustomed to receiving was no longer coming to him, and so he terminated us.”

“When was this?”

“The year was 1974, and if you believe in synchronicity, then you will note that in the same year the eject was performed on RMN from the Oval Office.”

“And you’re still living on the money that you took?”

“The street is calling louder and louder. I am filth of the first order, and so I cannot show myself in the workplace and have no idea what to do but to sit and wait for the wrecking ball.”

“Do you drink?”

“What is that, drink? Drink what?”

“I said, do you drink?”

“I drink when I can. When I need to.” Dr. Rosner left Luther to the silence and the redness that filled his face. “Sometimes I do.”

Dr. Rosner wrote on a small pad. “Spell your last name.”

“Garatdjian. G-a-r-a-t-d-j-i-a-n. Like Smith.” Dr. Rosner smiled. He had ethnic roots as well, even if he had trimmed them so he could be American in a full-fledged way. If a man could trim his beard and trim his nails, then he could trim his name, without the worry of it ever growing back.

“Here are two prescriptions. Take one of each in the morning and at night, and try not to drink.”

Celeste, he spoke in this manner, shaming me with his words about my drinking. But he was strong and he had red hair as a warning that even though he did not bark and make the other noises of the men afflicted with loudness, a fire burned within. He took control of me that first session and made me his own. He let it be known that I wasn't under the parasol, as it were, and that a degree of urgency was the order of the day in getting me on my feet and functioning in the world. I did not assassinate him for his firm directness. I was only grateful to have him as my lifeline. Only because I asked did he tell me at a follow-up session that he had gone to Harvard, and when I fell on the floor and lay dying from regret that I lacked his mental apparatus, he allowed me to linger there a while and feel my pain.

He was a family man. He had that connecting capability. After a while I understood that the room where we sat was attached to the apartment in which he lived with his wife and young boy, who actually wandered in during one session holding a birthday balloon. This was warming and perplexing to me at the same time, to see such fruits of potency in so introspective a man. I asked him if he was a rabbi's son and if he had grown up in Brooklyn, and was of the same extraordinary gene pool as Norman Mailer and all those who torque up far beyond the station set for them early in life by virtue of their hidden but easily measurable endowment, but he merely laughed.

Celeste, I was dutiful. I ran on my long legs to have the prescriptions filled at the Estroff Pharmacy, on Second Avenue and Eighth Street. Haldol and Artane, the two medications were called, and together, they subdued me, sequestered me in blandness, so I sat in the very quiet spaces of the day alone in the apartment, my life force in seeming abeyance. At times I would cry over the loss of my Fastin, and yet overall I was in the process of making my peace with the possibility that it was an unhealthy relationship, to use the words Rod Steiger spoke to his kid brother, Marlon Brando, in the back of that death trip car in On the Waterfront.

One cold morning I went out to wash my face in the New York Post, and received a gift my mind wanted to savor unto death. There, in the sports section, was a full-page article in which the great Red Auerbach extolled the gifts of the surpassingly great Bill Walton. For the rest of the morning I feasted on the article, Celeste, munching on this or that word or phrase over and over: "dominating," "complete player," "sees the whole court," "unique set of skills." But I wasn't completely useless on that morning, as I also purchased, on sale, a large tube of Colgate toothpaste and three bars of Palmolive soap. Nothing can promote joy more than the laying in of provisions such as these gaily wrapped products. We all need security, the assurance that we have enough and that the day will never come when supplies run out.

Though I was not drinking, my awareness of alcohol grew intense. Every second of every minute of every hour I seemed to note the fact that I was abstaining. That, of course, is the power that alcohol had over me, that the idea of it should live so strongly in my consciousness even when I wasn't downing the tallboys and draining bottles of cheap red wine.

In this time I was reading a biography of Babe Ruth, but even the Sultan of Swat could not take my mind off the alcohol I was not drinking. A friend is a friend, and you miss it when it is not around. That is only natural. As for the Babe, he was described as having "fallen out a tree," and while the image might be regarded as disrespectful, given his facial resemblance to simians, the real meaning of the phrase was that he was larger than life, a man with extraordinary appetites as well as abilities. And we must not assign to him a lack of human feeling, as he wept like a child on hearing that his first wife had perished in a fire. Wept, Celeste. Wept. And I wept too when I read this passage, brought to life by the great man's emotional display.

The second night he couldn't sleep. The blanket was too heavy. Feeling buried alive under its weight, he threw it off. But the problem had shifted to his skin; now his skin was trying to smother him. How viciously tight it was around him, trapping heat within his body so he felt like he was on fire. And now the air was in collusion with his skin. It was hot air, so the fire was both in him and outside.

He frantically dialed Dr. Rosner. “I am burning, Dr. Rosner. Burning. My skin is utterly vicious and crazy. You must help me if I am to live another day,” he shouted, having gotten Dr. Rosner’s answering machine. “Wake up, Dr. Rosner. Wake up to the calamity I am facing.”

For the next ten minutes he knocked about the apartment, making strange noises he hoped would have a talismanic effect. He was still going with his agitated dance when the phone finally rang.

“Dr. Rosner,” Dr. Rosner said, in his inimitable way, coming in at a frequency so low and, in this case, so pissed that you were compelled to hear it.

“Doctor, a while ago I thought I was burning up and that the flames would reach my highest level. Now I will only say that my skin continues to plot against me. Is your skin not supposed to be your friend?”

But Dr. Rosner did not go with Luther’s histrionic current. He had a current all his own, which bound him to the ground on which he lived. He did not embellish, embroider, or fabricate. Thus, he said, “Are you taking the medications as prescribed?”

“The equation is confounding me.”

Dr. Rosner was not thrown off by Luther’s failure to use the correct word, ratio. He was not a doctor of the mind for nothing, with his Harvard BA and a medical degree from the great if not as great Columbia University. Dr. Rosner was astute in his understanding of the excesses of his patient and that words, used rightly or wrongly, were Luther's means for keeping himself alive, his meager currency. He saw the delirious junk stuff hanging out of his patient. "Take one Artane, and one only, now. In the morning resume taking two Artane and one Haldol every six hours."

"I am so sorry to have troubled you with my urgency and will do as you say," Luther said, allowing the dominant feelings of obsequiousness and gratitude to have their way. Already was Dr. Rosner volatile on his psyche, as these pills were on his body. He was in the ring with a better man, and would need all means at his disposal to survive.

Luther took the one Artane, as Dr. Rosner directed him, and within minutes, though night still held its claim to the city, he began to sing "Oh, Happy Day," the light of reason having returned to his skin, which no longer lay siege to his being. He bowed down to the power of the pill and acknowledged its mystery, that one could drive him crazy and the next could open the door to salvation. Oh yes, oh happy day. Like his departed sister Naomi, he did not know all the words, but that did not mean he could not live in the feeling.

Now Celeste, I am feeling a failure of nerve. The quality of the light in my new environs is too exposing. As I have remarked before, I feel like a man who has been flushed out of his hiding place into a world strangely plain and intent on going about its business without any attention to me. Something is over. Something has died. I don't know what to do. I can't seem to add luster to this dreary prose nor can I contain it and make it go where I want it to, in the direction of honesty and truth. It is full of spin, of distortion, of excess. And yet I have to go forward; I don't have the time not to. To the outer edges of despair a man journeys and still remains committed to his mediocrity. "Go your own way.” That is all we can say to those who question us. “Go your own way, and we will go on ours.”

It made Luther uncomfortable that Dr. Rosner should show him any degree of respect. It didn't feel right that when Luther applied the laughing, disparaging thing to his alma mater, CCNY, Dr. Rosner should simply respond, “So what's wrong with CCNY?” Was Luther to ask how Dr. Rosner would feel if he were forced to attend a school with a long fall from grace since its days as the proletarian Harvard, including the more precipitous decline with the introduction of open admissions? No, no, that would be to descend into peeve, to highlight too painfully the difference between Luther's station in life and the doctor's. Such naked comparison would be dangerous, very, very dangerous. The beast of competitiveness would be exposed, and then Luther would have to kill Dr. Rosner for being all that he wasn't or kill himself for being the loser in that particular battle, as years before he had been driven to eliminate Tom Smits from the premises of his life with that note threatening suicide should Tom insist on continuing to make his presence known to him. No, no, he must cling to the notion of himself as a dog in need of severe and daily beating when he wasn't reveling in the fantasy of himself as the prophet armed and dangerous. It would not do to live in the middle, where he shouldn't have been born to be.

Are you listening, God? Are you?

Celeste, may I speak plainly with you and say that to be a Jew is to live with both feet on the earth, wherever else the head is? That it is to read the fine print and not throw up one's hands and say it is all too much to deal with? That it is to take care of business? Or have I maligned myself for all eternity for making such a generalization? Can it be disputed that Simon Weill held to such a sober philosophy and that Dr. Rosner did as well when he said to me, "Feed the face first"? Was he not challenging me to occupy the same ground of reality and to acknowledge that the earth on which I lived was where I had to live?

He had been driving along the alternate road too long, the one free of potholes and toll booths and traffic tie-ups, and on which scantily clad women held up signs saying "Keep going! Pleasure pit five miles ahead." It was not an easy return to make, and one he doubted he could or even wanted to make. What was that to live in this world without a dream?

"We'll see what happens with your drinking after you stabilize on this medication and get a job," Dr. Rosner said.

"Why would anything happen to my drinking? Are you trying to murder it?" Luther was alarmed.

"Maybe it is trying to murder you?"

"We do not talk of friends in that way. I forbid it. Do you understand? Show some respect."

"What respect should I show?" Dr. Rosner asked, with mirth showing on his face.

"Alcohol is a lover as well as a friend. It flings open doors that would otherwise be closed and provides a never-ending hallelujah chorus to keep my spirits high. It promises me a Harvard-caliber mind and prose with the tensile strength and durability of Ken Kesey, Thomas McGuane, and Heinrich Böll combined.”

“That’s a pretty big promise,” Dr. Rosner said, his words accompanied by the little sniffling sound he would sometimes make and which Luther had begun to copy when walking down the street or alone at home because, in his mind, it had the Harvard stamp of excellence on it. But he hadn’t taken to smoking the little brown cigars Dr. Rosner took a shine to. He didn’t have to do every little thing Dr. Rosner did for the doctor to be a living presence in his mind.

“Oh yes,” Luther replied.

“And has the promise been kept?”

Once more Luther rose up on Dr. Rosner. “Do you wish for me to spend the rest of my days in sadness? Do not apply your measuring stick to my life. I am ascending in my own dimensions.”

“Meaning what?”

“Meaning I live below Fourteenth Street.”

“And?”

“There is the continental divide and the New York City divide.”

“And what is that?”

“A state of mind and being. Below Fourteenth Street is where those not fit for society by virtue of their creative drive must live.”

“There are no artists above Fourteen Street?”

“Only the running dogs of capitalism.”

“And Wall Street? Isn’t that below Fourteenth Street?”

“Yes. You have me there. End of conversation.”

“Is it the end?”

“It’s the end for me.”

“Why is that?”

“Because I’m a murderer, and endings are the business of murderers.”

“Have you murdered someone?”

“My family. I willed them unto death so order could be restored, and it happened for some of them. And it is a foregone conclusion that it will happen with Sarah, since that is what she has been telling me.”

“Sarah has been telling you that you will murder her?”

Luther told Dr. Rosner about the newspaper article he had showed Sarah, and his admission to her that he had identified with the boy who stabbed his wealthy girlfriend. But Dr. Rosner did not join the condemnation chorus. It came as a surprise to Luther to hear him say, “Maybe it reassures her about her value to you to believe that.”

Celeste, I allowed Dr. Rosner to have his say. I made no effort to silence him. Nor did I attack him for having the effrontery to appear to be in my corner regarding Sarah’s charge that I was destined to become her murderer. One session after another did I allow him to be part of my life, including my admission of my failure to come out from behind my mother’s skirt and slay Simon Weill on the field of battle. Understanding Simon Weill to be a Jew, and being Jewish himself, Dr. Rosner asked me bluntly if this historical resentment of the building owner would adversely impact our therapy. But I said no, that

I accepted, as did my mother, that Jews had fine minds and conceded to them full superiority in all realms of life. I said there was nothing a Jew could not do, and that the only reason to hate a Jew was because the hate-filled person wasn't one himself, finely wrapped in their traditions and armored with the pedigree of their intelligence. I said l'chaim was the essence of being a Jew, and only those who were at odds with life harbored ill will in their hearts for them. I said I had no time to be an anti-Semite; couldn't he see how busy I was being an anti-Armenian quasi Armenian? Celeste, I was not reduced to saying some of my best friends were Jews, and Dr. Rosner, to his credit, did not place a cloud of suspicion above me. He no more made me prove that I was not the second coming of Heinrich Himmler than he had asked me to prove I was not a murderer. No, Dr. Rosner listened, absorbed every last word I said, and examined it in the light of his formidable powers of reasoning.

Some of this did not happen in the way that I have described. Not exactly. There was no inane repartee. There was only my corrosive, debilitating fear, bringing a great power to heel (there I go again). Abjectly defeated and cowering I sat in that office, having made cigar-smoking Dr. Rosner my god, the only god I could turn to. He was my Big Red now, not Bill Walton. And so, because the universe insists, I will ask the probing questions that are required to solve this small mystery.

Q: Why is it that I choose to mock and distort reality in this fashion? Why do I not stand on firm ground with facts at my command?

A: Because you are not as impressed with Dr. Rosner and his Harvard education and his trappings of success as you say you are.

Q: Why is that?

A: We have been over this terrain before, Luther. Have I not told you that a mind uncoupled from God is not a mind worth bothering yourself about?

Q: Your arrogance astonishes me that you would dismiss a man of such high quality.

A: Am I not here to astonish you, Luther? What other purpose could I have?

Q: How about helping me?

A: What greater help could a man hope for than a shift of perception that enables him to recognize he already has everything he needs?

Q: There you go again.

A: Always, Luther, always, will I go there again. And why wouldn't I? It is where I live, and it is where you live as well if only you will recognize it.

Celeste, I went against this power with words that do not bear repeating, words of the vilest kind, that only a Satan-seized soul would utter. But sometimes we must call God out. We must beat him severely as we believe, in our distorted minds, that he beats us or allows us to be beaten. We must spend that fury preliminary to melting down in surrender and in love. We have no power that is not his, and he has no power that is not ours. We are one, and vigilance must continue to soar if we are to dispel the illusions that would have us believe otherwise.

One day in this time of Haldol and Artane (a Thorazine backup was available should he need complete sedation) Luther walked past a bar on a residential side street, and the bar called to him, saying it wanted to be his friend. So he went inside and sat on a stool and ordered a beer. After a while he saw that others were ordering their beers two at a time, one light and one dark. Oh this was a happy day that such a discovery should be made. Taking instruction where it could be found, Luther followed their lead. He drank the light in its entirety before going to the dark so order could have its way. But on the next round it came to him that perhaps parity should hold sway so long as it wasn't an agent of anarchy. Guided by this thought, he first sipped from one and then the other. But it troubled him that he had possibly shown a preference by starting with the light, and so on the next round he sipped first from the dark. Though was that really the way of the world? Did the world not start in gladness and end in sadness, as had been written of poets? Of course Saul had gone from darkness to blinding light on the road to Damascus, but he was an exception. It was very confusing, and not for a mind such as his to dwell on.

Finn's was old. On the walls were signed photos of famous men who had come by for their pint through the years. In spite of the loudness and the laughter, the place had the feel of sadness, as if it were an enclave holding out against the present. Few women were to be seen, and those who came were older, and so the promise of sex was missing. The men were there for their pint and nothing more, at least in the daylight hours that Luther occupied a stool. He had found a home of a different sort.

Luther was not idle in the time he passed at Finn's. He welcomed the times when he was in urgent need of release and would hurry across the sawdust-strewn floor to the men's room, as he had found a job for himself. Standing over the giant urinal, he would direct the stream of warm urine directly onto the cubes of ice clustered at the bottom.

Now he could not only drink his beer but he could have the satisfaction of melting the ice cubes with his warm piss. Light and dark, warm and cold, it was all there for him.

Q: Who were the ( mostly) men who went to Finn's?

A: He didn't know, as he spoke only to himself, but he thought of them as the Irish remnant, the men with the red noses and white socks, those bound by the Baltimore catechism and Sunday mass and shaped by the hard hands of the brothers and the nuns. Those whose understanding of God was mostly fear of his wrath more than the embrace of his love. Those who had built America and fought for America and loved America in a way they suspected (wrongly) he did not.

Now there was another bar beyond the cube in the middle of Astor Place. On Waverly Place this bar was, and you did not find it by staying street level. As if iniquity were its calling card, you had to go down a flight of stairs for Spice of Life to be a reality, and you had to go at night, as it did not come alive for you in daylight hours. The men with the red noses and white socks did not go to this bar, as it was for the young'uns, those with the spice of life still in them. And while it did not have the double deal of light and dark or giant urinals with ice cubes you could look forward to melting, it did have stools on which he could sit and listen to the great Minnie Ripperton sing Loving You and the great Eagles sing Best of My Love and Elton John, whom he did not quite take to, sing Someone Saved My Life Tonight and many, many others while drinking the beer and hard liquor that Spice of Life had to offer. And though he was among his own kind now in terms of age, he did not fully feel he was among his own kind in other ways and did not repudiate Finn's just because he was there. No, he could hold it in his mind that both could be in his life, just as day and night and light and dark beer and urinals with and without ice cubes could be in his life.

Q: Was the light of reason not in his mind? Had he not been told to avoid alcohol while on these medications?

A: The light of reason was always in Luther's mind, even when he was not aware of its presence. But it was his light and his reason. Had Dr. Rosner specified how much alcohol he was not to drink or for how long he was not to drink alcohol? Did Dr. Rosner adopt a worrywart face each session and anxiously ask Luther if he had mixed alcohol with the medications? No. Not at all. Why? Because he had understood that Luther, being Luther, would drink. Dr. Rosner was merely cautioning Luther not to drink too much. And yes, Luther had heard the story about Karen Ann Quinlan, but while it was heartbreaking and cautionary, it had to be noted that she lived in New Jersey or had been born in New Jersey, and so, to his way of thinking, he needn't be overly concerned.

A thought occurred to me today, Celeste. It is only this. How many times have I interjected myself into a conversation, lacking the confidence and the restraint to stay on the plane of objectivity? For example, I stand before a painting by Van Gogh and instead of speaking from the point of view of the composition, the use of color, the brushstrokes, I simply say, "I was there, in Arles." In noting this, I capture the entire story of my life, which has been to make everything about me, unable or unwilling to lose myself in others. But does the story end there? I think not.

Luther did not lose touch with Sarah in his time of trouble. She was kind to him and showed him the love he needed. He had, surprisingly, a place in Lydia's mind as well. She called and made a proposal that would promote, or at least not adversely impact, his drive toward wellness and at the same time benefit Sarah. Was it not a fact that Sarah had been displaced from the apartment she and Luther had only recently moved into? Lydia did not speak in an accusatory tone but in the manner of someone only stating the obvious. Sarah had indeed been displaced. At the same time she could fully appreciate the suffering such incapacity could inflict on an individual, as she herself had lived through her own time of trouble, had she not? And had Lydia as well not had such trouble, and perhaps to an even greater extent than her daughter? Did she have to recount her several institutionalizations for post-partem psychosis? No, and to her everlasting credit, she did not impose on him or anyone with her instances of incapacity. She was only trying to help, and love was truly her guide. Lydia was calling him to her, saying he should come and stay with her and Peter for several days, during which time Sarah could return to their East Village apartment and reacquaint herself with her permanent abode. Ten days had passed since the trouble had visited him, and Sarah was longing to touch base again with her home and her art. Luther offered no resistance.

Let it be entered in the record of life that neither Sarah nor Lydia nor anyone other than Dr. Rosner and Dr. Kallian, she who stood proudly behind her Armenian heritage, knew the specific nature of Luther's thoughts. Having no frame of reference for his sufferings other than their own, they had no reason for alarm that he might become violent, and so Luther felt like an impostor, receiving as he did compassion from the mother of the woman he imagined himself murdering. If he had any doubts about the need for such secrecy, Sarah dispelled them.

"My God, Luther, all the knives are missing. What happened to them?" She had called him from their apartment her first day back. Her tone of alarmed bafflement led him to believe that within a minute she would fully connect the dots and shout, "Murderer. Murderer. Get out of my family's apartment right now before I call the police." And yet, in spite of the peril he was facing, he managed to suppress the likelihood of impending exposure and rally strong with the simple response, "They're under the sink."

"Under the sink?" Sarah said, faithful to her perplexity.

"Yes," Luther said.

"Why are they under the sink?"

"I put them there," he said, allowing truth, not guile, to be his guide.

"But why?"

"Because they were making noises in the day and in the night."

"Luther," she said. Her questions had come to an end. The mention of his name represented a concise statement of understanding.

“Yes, Luther,” he replied, before the line went dead.

The closed windows of the Van Dine residence were calling to him. They were windows without bars or gates, as where was the need? Only a lunatic rappelling down a rope from the roof or with suction-cup hands and feet would be able to gain entrance. Luther kept his eye on the windows, with their west view of the crowns of the trees of Riverside Park and of the river and the Jersey shore. He also kept his distance, the same alert attention he gave to the third rail when standing on a subway platform or to the treachery of his own mouth when in the vicinity of those he assumed to be men of violence. But what about unconscious time? Suppose he was to sleepwalk to his death? Had he not read in the paper of a man standing in Times Square in the middle of the night in only his underwear when the last he remembered he was lying in bed?

Celeste, the chorus of condemnation has grown loud in my ears. The cruelty of universal dismissal is rampant in regard to Luther. “He is a fake. He is pathetic. We do not believe he is sick in his mind and he is too much of a coward to seriously contemplate jumping from the Van Dines’ window. He is just a neurotic, self-centered bore play-acting at psychosis to gain sympathy and attention. Ditch this loser and ditch him now.” They are right, of course, Celeste. I have no right to go on with this ragged, amorphous sad sack’s tale and the musings of his mediocre mind. But now is the time to screw our courage to the sticking post, to erect a firewall against those who would consign us to oblivion with one casual blast of their fiery breath, and in this moment to reaffirm our right to exist, whether as a hanging string or, indeed, the theme of honor’s tongue. Are you with me on this? Are you?”

Lydia served dinner that evening. She was alive in her deadness, the deadness that comes with the death of a child. Her grief had calcified into a smiling hardness that came over her face as she enacted the ritual of deference to Peter's pronouncements. Death was not her domain, even if suicide had claimed her father and Lenore, but it was Peter's. Had he not confessed to her that he longed for eternal sleep? He was not built as she was to grieve the loss of a child. He had moved on. He had other things on his mind, and for this she could not forgive him.

"I feel like I am in the way," Luther said.

"You're not in the way at all. At all," Lydia replied, with utmost emphasis on those last two words, and he understood in that moment she was really talking to herself. Her whole life a kind of pep talk, an attempt to breathe life into her struggling children but also into herself. No wonder Peter called her a Spartan woman.

"Well, thank you," he said, having no defenses to say more.

"And how is your treatment going? Do you like your doctor?" Lydia asked.

"Oh, I do," Luther said. "He has a red beard and went to Harvard and lives inside himself. He has learned the value of hush the way some embrace the concept of pi."

"What is his name?"

"Rosner. Dr. Frederic Rosner. His first name cries out for a 'k' at the end of it, but he has left it open so he can have the freedom that he needs. And as for his last name, he has likely filed and honed it to a presentable length and acceptable sound."

“There is no need for the filing and honing of any name. All names are presentable. Take your name,” Lydia asserted, seeking to offer reassurance where none had been asked for.

“Thank you,” Luther said, remembering her diary entry in which Claire slotted him with Helja, their madcap Estonian maid.

“How is your family, if I may ask?” Lydia went on.

“You know that my sister Naomi died three years ago.”

“Yes, I heard. How awful.”

“My oldest sister, Hannah, is vigilant against anyone depriving her son and has applied the code of omerta to her life. My third sister, Rachel, walks with God and talks with God where once she drank straight from the bottle and ran naked down Broadway out of love for JFK. My brother Luke has a libertine lifestyle and works for a man who believes you sometimes have to poop on what you have to make it better. My youngest sister, Vera, is trying to kill me, brandishing the Ivy League as a weapon.”

“That is a harsh picture,” Lydia said. “What about your parents?”

“My father is gone. My mother is still here. ‘Have some chicken, my son.’ She says that a lot.”

Enough. Enough. The reality was that I was tongue-tied whenever the Van Dines turned the spotlight onto my family. The burden of explanation was too great. Too little time to say too much, and so an internal logjam. And the often dismissive way I spoke of them. Ashamed of my own flesh and blood. A coward who could not stand up for his own.

“I see,” Lydia said, as a way of placing a cap on the drift of the conversation.

So he needn't hang himself, Luther cleared the table and scraped the plates before placing them in the dishwasher. Dr. Rosner had encouraged him to make himself useful if he was to stay at the Van Dines, and Luther did find satisfaction in restoring order.

He then retired to his room, or Sarah's room, so he could be out of their way. It was not for him to know what they might be saying. Maybe they would say it simply with the looks they exchanged before settling down to an evening in front of the TV. Anyway, he did not need the TV, not then. He would have it later. Bill Walton would be on it, live from Portland, Oregon. WOR-TV, Channel 9, would be telecasting the Knicks in their road game against the Trailblazers. Walton was coming back. He was coming back. He would vanquish the Knicks and vanquish his detractors, all of them. Yes, Luther heard in his mind fat-lipped Mick Jagger singing "That's How Strong My Love Is" and was not ashamed to apply that very same sentiment to his hero who was only hours away from taking the court. Oh, happy, happy night. A night to be savored into eternity.

Sometime later, when he heard their footsteps as they retired to their bedroom, he filled with dread. Because if the thing that kept him alive was not real, then he was not real either. Like Christ on the cross, Luther was now having his moment of grave doubt but he did not call out to his father in heaven. In the pantry he filled his mug with Jack Daniels so his drinking would not be readily detected should either Lydia or Peter surprise him. He did not want them dropping the same sort of truth bomb on him as Sarah had done that first week in the Chinatown loft as he opened that pint bottle of Clan Macgregor scotch. He wanted to be able to drink his whiskey in peace.

The telecaster was properly respectful of Bill Walton during the pregame warmups or at least of his potential, but did use words like “controversial” and “injury prone” as well, and his sidekick went so far as question Walton’s “heart” for the professional game. But Luther did not hear the full sliming of Walton that had come from the more cynical types.

How radiant Big Red looked in the Blazers home white, with the red slash across the jersey. And how quickly he won the telecasters’ praise with his deft passing and control of the boards and shot-blocking. And yet it was hard work watching the game and having to worry that Walton would go down any minute and have to be helped off the court. And there were other things too, a feeling of letdown even as he watched his hero, or if it wasn’t exactly that, there was that question pushing at him as to whether such vicariousness was within the realm of sanity.

Before the first quarter had ended, Luther’s TV viewing was interrupted by the presence of Peter, in his bathrobe, looking haggard and troubled. Sleep had not taken him, in spite of the pill he swallowed nightly as an aid to slumber. He had been relatively subdued at the dinner table, offering low-energy denunciations of both political parties or their candidates in the upcoming election, Gerald “he played football too long without a helmet at Yale” Ford and Jimmy “Peanuts” Carter, from Plains, Georgia.

“Lydia is after me to teach again,” Peter said, as if resuming a conversation that had never begun. “But can you imagine a man of my age coming out of the shadows in which he has lived inviolate into the blinding light among the great unwashed?”

The question, in Luther's ears, was burdensome, not simply for its length and complexity, but for the responsibility it placed on him to respond.

"I have researched the world and found it wanting myself," Luther replied. "But my day of reckoning is coming. Dr. Rosner says feed the face first. He is not pithy by nature, but in this case he has gone and gotten so on me. It may be some sort of rabbinical wisdom passed down through the Hebrew ages. I keep meaning to ask him but our hour is short."

"And who is Dr. Rosner?"

"He is a therapist I am seeing who is structuring me for a landing so my plane doesn't crash. Like Joseph with that pharaoh of old in Egypt, he is an interpreter of dreams, not about kith and kine and famine in the land, but about the passenger aircraft in the skies of New York City that dominated my dream world, planes in imminent danger of crashing to earth in a fiery ball. He says I am in fear of a crash landing as well from the stratosphere I have inhabited these past few years."

"Why on earth would you see a therapist?"

Luther did not want to hear from Peter, as he had before, that therapists were committed to supporting the hegemony of the capitalists and were in fact themselves capitalists. All Luther wanted was to drink the Van Dines' whiskey and give his undivided attention to his idol on the TV screen. "The storm clouds have rolled in on me, and they continue to linger. My boat is unsteady in the water." He did not care that he had mixed his metaphors. He was just trying to get the job done of conveying what needed to be said in a reasonably truthful manner.

“I see no unsteadiness, no instability, in you,” Peter said.

“Really?” Luther replied, muting his astonishment.

Peter did not punish Luther’s night anymore than he had to with his resistance to the world beyond the confines of the Riverside Drive apartment and Camp. The pill, and the dreariness of Luther’s passion—basketball?—was enough to send him back into his own world.

Celeste, not everyone is meant to be together. Not in this world. Later yes.

Forever and ever.

At game’s end Luther sat, in a stupor, not sure what had been given and what had been taken away, but of one thing he was sure, Portland had prevailed. Clyde “heavy legs” Frazier couldn’t do it to them. Earl “the Pearl” Monroe couldn’t do it to them. Spencer “live and die with the jump shot” Haywood couldn’t do it to them. Freaky Phil Jackson couldn’t do it to them. But Walton could do it them, the Knicks. “He just makes everyone on the team better,” the sportscaster said. And maybe that was all Luther needed to hear for a post-midnight mental gnosh. Just lie in Sarah’s canopied bed and savor the miracle of his man on the court winning over the doubters. He had but one twofold question to ask of himself, and he asked it fearfully: “Was what I saw sufficiently nutritive and did it leave me hungry for more?” And the voice from on high answered: “Do not fear, Luther. Do not fear. Walton is like sex. When you think you are done, you are only at the beginning once again.” From this response Luther gained great comfort, as with Walton he wanted always to be able to sing with conviction, “That’s how strong my love is.”

Celeste, the barriers to love must always be removed. Always. That is our work. But we must hold in mind the long-term so as not to be discouraged that further pathways of understanding failed to open up between Peter and me. He was a man depleted and at times invigorated by his own aloneness, a man who stood outside the time he lived in insofar as the confessional draw of psychotherapy. He did not want to fill vinyl notebooks with personal musings, as did Lydia. He saw no profit in dreams, let alone their interpretation. He wanted only facts and figures and mapped coordinates and the trail of crime and treachery and malfeasance and hypocrisy of those who held the levers of power. Was I shocked that he should find no signs of instability in me? Was not the fact that I was living in his home because Sarah and I, temporarily at least, could not cohabit, sufficient evidence that all was not right in my world? But it is possible as well that Peter had come to see me without seeing me. Having taken my measure and found me lacking in the dimensions he valued—a robust physique and a robust mind—he could just tune me out by and large, like Nixon and Kissinger, who had focused on rapprochement with China while leaving domestic affairs to lesser souls.

Do not think that Dr. Rosner was a less than potent force in Luther's life simply because he smoked small cigars and snuffled and spoke with the volume turned down low. Please be aware that he was laying in lines of connection that defied facile reckoning. Do not make the same mistake Luther made. When Dr. Rosner informed Luther that he would be away for a week and asked how Luther felt about his imminent departure, Luther raised up on him, saying he had no feelings about the matter whatsoever, Dr. Rosner being a man and so without a hook that could be sunk in Luther's heart. Luther tried to read Dr. Rosner's face for significant signs of hurt but none were visible. He was appreciative of Dr. Rosner and respectful, but if he had a song for Bill Walton, he also had one for Dr. Rosner, and that was "Heart of Stone," as sung by the fat-lipped one and his cronies.

While Dr. Rosner's absence was noted, it was not felt. Certainly Luther's monitoring devices could detect no signs of distress. But by the weekend Luther found himself in a state of anxiety as severe as any he could remember. The great ball of dread reduced him to the fetal position on Sarah's canopied bed, where he spent hours softly moaning. The intensity and duration and suddenness of the attack left him bewildered; so out of the blue had it come to strike him down.

The morning of his appointment with Dr. Rosner the anxiety went away. Dr. Rosner was not Dr. Rosner for nothing. Harvard had not called him to it for nothing. A Sherlock Holmes of the mind he was; there was no mystery regarding it he could not solve. Such a statement was fully earned when he said, "Your anxiety attack was brought on by the anticipation of my return." The offhand manner in which Dr. Rosner spoke was as startling as the assertion itself. Such matter-of-factness could only be an indicator of an intensely complex mind routinely producing amazing and audacious insights. Only now was Luther made aware of the elaborate infrastructure of connection Dr. Rosner had quietly been creating. Though Dr. Rosner's goal was doubtless to seek hegemony over Luther's mind and emotions, Luther did not show him an accusatory eye. Dr. Rosner read the New York Review of Books and The New Yorker, after all. He had risen from nothingness to the campus of Harvard University and a position of respect in the world.

Luther had faith in Dr. Rosner's nature. Surely Dr. Rosner meant well by him, and if the doctor did not wax emotional, maybe that was a good thing. Not everyone could or should emote. Not everyone could or should be talking about love let alone how it meant never having to say you were sorry.

Dr. Rosner had given Luther other reasons to like him. Dr. Rosner did not share his enthusiasm for Bill Walton, but he did come as close as someone of his nature could to gushing about number 42, Jackie Robinson, who had met the taunts and ridicule of jeering opposing players and racist fans with his bat and speed and base-path bravado and fiery spirit. Dr. Rosner was revealing the moral force and integrity of his race through the identification of Jews with blacks. Celeste, when a man is childless, when there is no offspring from the fire in his loins, he is a child forever. Remember that when you note the key in which this is written. He was speaking to the quotas, the exterminations, all of it. And if Luther had any doubt that Jackie Robinson's fire was Dr. Rosner's fire, the second story the doctor told only confirmed that he and Jackie had much in common. A Harvard professor of the doubting Thomas kind had chastised Dr. Rosner for not taking a rigorous organic chemistry course highly recommended for students seeking to gain acceptance to a top-flight medical school. He went so far as to openly question Dr. Rosner's commitment to excellence beyond the fantasy image in his own mind. Instantly was Dr. Rosner transformed, the fire burning within giving his pale skin a reddish hue and setting his red hair ablaze. Incendiary rays shot from his eyes as he raced off. No one was allowed to speak to him in such a manner. No one. An aptitude for murder was born in him at that moment, but was quickly channeled into sustained rage. He would show that foppish, tweedy goy pacifying himself with his meerschaum pipe the kind of person he was dealing with. And he did, completing that organic chemistry course with full mastery of the subject matter.

Luther was prouder than he could say of Dr. Rosner after hearing these stories. Clearly his doctor had the heart of a champion and a great will to win. But Dr. Rosner's belief that Luther could fire up the same resolve and rise to dispatch with his own doubters and hecklers plunged Luther into sadness because those doubters and hecklers were the standardized tests he had taken and failed, unlike Dr. Rosner; that voice that told him he was nothing more than a hanging string had to be listened to if he didn't want to inhabit the realm of the truly crazy.

Now Celeste, at this time there was a sportswriter for the Daily News named Dick Young. No one ever called him Richard. He did not play that way with his name. He saw to it that it was shaved close so he could have the freedom and the mobility of the monosyllabic. And he kept his prose compact and well-groomed, his trademark being succinctness and directness and a take-no-prisoners style. The knives he slashed with were double-edged and sharp, and seeing his photograph you understood what you were in for, as even his smile was infiltrated by malice. This was not sweet Milton Gross or earnest Maury Allen of the New York Post. He was out to bury a hatchet in the head of his victims. In any case, the idea took hold that Dick Young could provide the direction I lacked and that subjecting myself to his cruel lash could be an aid to my growth.

Sports had meaning in my life, Celeste. Yankee Stadium had been my true house of worship, and having been to see the Dodgers play in Brooklyn only once, Ebbets Field was in my consciousness forever. I was having a recurring dream that I was on the platform of an elevated Brooklyn subway station straining to look beyond the façade of the ballpark (never mind that an elevated line was not nearby. Never mind.) to catch at least a glimpse of Duke patrolling centerfield and Don Newcombe coming strong from the right side, vanquishing one Cincinnati Redleg after another, but nothing, nothing, can convey the delirium I was experiencing that my dream within the dream and in waking life as well should be so close and yet so far because if there is a true nexus between man and woman and God, I was now so maddeningly in proximity to it. The light from the streetlamp shone on the trees, and the sight of their green leaves only increased my painful longing, as here once again were the beauty of what God and humankind had wrought in heartbreaking collaboration. Throughout the dream a ghostly silence reigned; if there were people about, they merely existed as shadows in the softly lighted night. This hunger for what was or should have been is but an intimation of what will be, Celeste, not in its detail but in the appeasing of the longing it inspires. Let us hold onto that.

“What’s with the dipshit meekness? You have a master’s degree in composition,”

Dr. Rosner barked at Luther, when Luther shared the gist of the brief letter he had written to Dick Young. It troubled Luther that Dr. Rosner would adopt a tone of harsh dismissal. It seemed out of character for a therapist to chastise his patient, though Dr. Dressler had been famous for it. Dr. Rosner was revealing a glimpse of the bad temper he was capable of, and that Luther had only heard about through the anecdote about the Harvard professor who had drawn his ire. And that he should go vernacular on Luther with his use of dipshit, a word that reeked of scorn in the context which the doctor had used it and which was not part of Luther's vocabulary. To have his dream exploded by a vulgarity, and one, moreover, which did not seem likely to be mouthed by a regular Joe. Luther imagined a bowl of fecal matter into which someone delicately dipped his cracker; thus the word unforgivably combined the scatological with the alimentary. Equally troublesome was to hear Dr. Rosner state that Luther had a master's degree in composition. Luther wanted to tear the words from his mind and scream out a cease and desist order barring any further assertions of his worthiness by Dr. Rosner.

And yet, these qualms notwithstanding, Luther also understood that Dr. Rosner meant his words as a kind of smelling salts. The doctor was only trying to tell Luther to come out of his stupor and show the vigor worthy of a man rather than languish in the realm of the defeated and half-dead.

Let us tell the truth, Celeste. He was conditioning me for love, seeking, in his methodical, yet urgent, way to prepare me for the world at large. But I balked. I declared I could not participate in office life, that I was not fit for those I would find there; the fluorescent lighting would be mercilessly exposing of my inadequacy. I said I would not have rocks, real or figurative, thrown at my head. "Do you see me wearing a batting helmet? Is that how you would have me show up in the workplace? In a helmet? Do you see others in the workplace sitting at their desks with helmets on their head?"

Lies and exaggeration, all of it, Celeste. Even with you.

"You wouldn't want to explore the possibilities of a job in publishing?" Dr. Rosner asked.

“I am not ready for that level of exposure. My bones are thin. You must understand.”

“What kind of work can you imagine for yourself?”

“I can drive a cab. I can assist people in getting where they need to go.”

“We need good cab drivers,” Dr. Rosner said.

We need good cab drivers. A simple declarative statement with blunt affirmative force, providing a foundation on which to build. We need good doctors. We need good psychiatrists. We need good firemen. We need good cab drivers. We need you, Luther. But who was this “we”? The city? Society? Something like that, Dr. Rosner had meant. Not “I need good cab drivers.” Such a construction would have been haughty. It would have suggested the master and the menial. Then would Luther have had to kill Dr. Rosner dead, in his mind, because the doctor would have laid bare the truth that he had won and Luther had lost.

A great fear came over Luther. Now would the laughing thing of all of Manhattan be directed at him. A cab driver? The lowest of the low? Being a hackie was not good enough, he heard his pride say. He heard it and he said back, “Let them see my bones. Let them laugh and laugh. It will be the test of fire I pass through. And then I will have the laughing thing to perform on them.” And if his conviction was not as strong as his words, he said them anyway.

The garage was the size of an airplane hangar, and housed a fleet of yellow cabs. It was over by the river, in the west fifties, not far from where he had lived. He stood on a desolation row of shiftless men waiting his turn to inquire at the depot.

“Part-time or full time?” the man at the desk asked.

“It may vary.”

“Not here it won’t.”

“Part-time then. It is all I can contemplate for now.”

“Contemplate?”

“That is what I said.”

“Have you ever been arrested?”

“Do I look like the face of crime?”

“Mister, I don’t know what you look like, and even if I did, I wouldn’t say.”

“I have been apprehended twice.”

“I asked if you have been arrested.”

“Yes, I have.”

“How many times?”

“I have been apprehended, that is, arrested, twice. But no blemish appears on my record, thanks to my innocence and expert legal representation.”

“You will need certification of the disposition of the two cases.”

“Certification? Disposition?”

“You heard me, mister. Go down to 100 Centre Street. Next,” he then called.

On Forty-ninth and Broadway, Luther ducked into a porn palace to see the men with the big things do it to the women who wanted to have it done to them, as he was asked to believe. The theater exerted a powerful hook. On the splotchy screen the sight of Johnny Holmes’s huge wand dispelled Luther’s uneasiness with the dingy interior. Soon, unable to contain himself, he went off to the bathroom, where he quickly ejaculated into the smelly urinal, the poison of need gone for the time being.

At 100 Centre Street, wanted posters of fugitives from justice, including the Weather Underground members Bernardine Dohrn and Mark Rudd, hung from the walls. They appeared as strange creatures in the stark black and white photos. What would that mean to live without contact with family and friends? The Weather Underground's embrace of violence had never felt right. Now the two brilliant radicals, and others like them, would have to live on the run with no chance at real happiness. How long would they be able to take comfort in their stupid idea of revolution? The posters were cruel and powerful and effective forms of ostracism. That one word, wanted. The world would pass them by, and they would exist in the hell of intense regret over what they had lost.

"You here telling me you want information about a case that was dismissed? If that case was dismissed, then there won't be no certificate of disposition. Why you want to be telling someone you been arrested when the government don't have any such record? You know what the word expunged means?" the clerk asked, staring out at Luther through the grill, his hard, alert eyes magnified by the lenses of his gold-framed glasses.

"Yes. I believe I do," Luther said.

"Then you got to find a way to apply what you know to what you do. You don't be emptying your pockets for the po-lice if they don't ask you to, and you don't pretend like there is something in those pockets if there ain't. You dig?"

“Oh, I do, I do. I thank you for this. I really do,” Luther said, his heart genuinely opening in gratitude for the wise counsel he had just received. “You have told my whole life story, and so succinctly,” Luther went on.

“Don’t be giving out more than you need to. I be speaking now about your effusiveness. You need to be containing your shit more than you be doing,” the clerk said.

“OK. OK. I will. I will,” Luther said, now in full bondage to subservience.

His day felt done. He had made significant progress in his negotiation with the world. Now something else was calling him, and it was not Johnny Holmes or any of the men with big things on the X-rated movie screens of New York City. He had the thirst, and so he went to the bar on Spring Street for a beer. How easy it was to sit in that bar, with its warm brown walls and the light pouring through a large window bisected with a wooden beam. It really was a bar of quality, and at night those soft lights came on and he could take comfort in the amber glow.

At the other end a man who had been scribbling in his notebook engaged a woman seated two stools away in conversation and soon moved closer to her. It is in the nature of things, Luther thought. No man can resist a woman for long. Always, always are they calling us to them, and we have no power to resist.

Beginning to feel conspicuous in his aloneness, there being no other patrons at the time, he headed to Antelli’s, up on Prince Street, where Frankie the Croak was working the stick. Frankie had been an ‘icer.’ He had demised dozens of men and even some women and possibly children, but he didn’t do that sort of thing anymore. Now he was old and he was nice. Nice was important to Frankie the Croak. His nickname was accurate in a second respect as well. He had lost his voice when he developed throat cancer and his larynx was removed. Now he spoke through a voice box and sounded like a man sounds when he speaks through a mechanical apparatus.

Luther had some of Antelli's beer, and Jesus, it was good beer, with an edge to it, not that soft and creamy stuff but beer that clarified and refreshed his insides. As he upgraded to scotch he heard a young man on the next stool define synergism to his girlfriend. "It's like one plus one equals two and a half. You know what I mean?" The girl's response was muted in the din, leaving Luther to ponder the economical profundity of the man, though when was truth really truth? Why two and half? Why not three or six and a half for that matter? The equation had to be interpreted liberally, he concluded. The man was making a point. That was all.

There was synergism in sex, too. That was the point of it. Each encounter led to the next and built to a great mass of experience, a numerical ranking, if one could be assigned, far in excess of the number of women he had been with. He understood in that moment that synergism was indeed the driving force behind sex. That need to augment was in everyone, and augmentation was the reason men and women came together. The ones who didn't were shriveled hoarders, diminishing their stock day by day by failing to merge it with the stock of others. His fixation on adding to the total of women he had been with, beginning in his college days, now came clear—he had been building for the future.

The things you could learn in a bar.

And the people you could find. The week before he had been at the bar on Spring Street. Near closing time he made eye contact with a woman as she entered. She turned and left soon after only to return and ask him if he would come home with her. He had been chatting with someone when she first arrived and could only wonder if the appearance of social integration had made him seem like a safe choice to her. He remembered the words of the young woman outside the bar on Broadway, up near Houston Street, some years before. "He has only himself," she had said to her girlfriend, in trying to persuade her not to go off with him.

The name of the woman who had come back for him was Constance Sutter. She lived nearby in a loft she shared with another woman. They made love, during which she startled him by bursting into tears, before he rushed home with a cock and bull story as to where he had been to offer Sarah. "I'm warning you. This won't go on," Sarah had said to him, roused from sleep by his clumsy entrance. Perhaps it was the scene following his night with Constance as well as the woman's tears, that caused his resolve to not call her again. But there in Antelli's, as he worked on his third scotch, synergism exerted its compelling force once more, moving him toward the phone. Constance was there to answer. Yes, of course he could come over. On the way he stopped off for a pint of Clan Macgregor scotch, as his thirst remained powerful. He remembered getting into bed with Constance and her sobbing, which ended his sexual interest. Sometime later he came to. The bottle rested on the night table. It was empty. "You drank the whole thing and passed out," Constance said. The clock next to the bottle showed that it had been less than two hours since his arrival. The sight of the drained bottle came as a shock. He was beyond shame and beyond words. He left quickly and she didn't stop him, as she knew what she had on her hands.

He had time to get himself home before Sarah came back from Hamburger Heaven and her session with Dr. Frodkey. When she did arrive, she found him passed out on the bed.

"Sometimes it's hard to sleep next to you," she said, in the morning.

"Why is that?" he asked.

"The smell. It's not great."

The things he was learning.

And learning from Dr. Rosner as well.

"We did better when we were at the loft. All the trouble started when we took the apartment. There isn't enough space," Luther said.

"Space is a metaphor," Dr. Rosner said.

"A metaphor for what?"

"The distance you feel you need."

Luther told him about Constance and the pint bottle of scotch.

"You went out a little into the world, with your pursuit of work as a cab driver, and then you retreated to the bottle."

"And sex. Is sex a metaphor too?"

"Sex is a reality."

"That doesn't tell me anything."

"It doesn't tell you anything that you went to another woman?"

“I was drunk.”

“Your drunkenness allowed you to do what you had wanted to do all along.”

“Someone should arrest you.”

“Arrest me for what?”

“For assault and battery.”

“The truth is assault and battery?”

“I will not have such freshness,” Luther said, speaking in his mother’s tongue.

“The truth is freshness?”

“I love Sarah. I will say that under oath.”

“You came to me some months ago with fantasies of murdering her.”

“And myself. Do not take me where I do not want to go.”

A therapeutic relationship with Dr. Rosner seemed hopeless. The money wasn’t there and Luther had no confidence it ever would be, even at the very reduced fee Dr. Rosner was charging him.

Claire came calling the following day, wanting to see Sarah and the apartment. Luther removed himself from the premises. He thought of his absence as a gift to Sarah and her sister lest Claire raise up on him for being in the way. He wanted to put his goodness on display by showing her what a hanging string he was. And so he went to a bar and drank to pass the time, and Dr. Rosner the next week tried to elicit the reason for his absence. “Because I am just a bum,” Luther said.

And so Dr. Rosner said in turn, “Why would you use such a term to describe yourself? What is this about?” And now the face of Dr. Rosner had reconfigured into a look of perplexed concern, as if he were confronting a mystery of unknown complexity. But Luther was unwilling to shed any further light. He did not tell him that the women, sooner or later, had to be on the hill together with their baked beans.

Celeste, I had taken to expressing this line about the women on the hill with the baked beans in the privacy of my own mind. Only later would I give it to the air to carry to Sarah’s ears. Poor Dr. Rosner. He was simply trying to help, in the way that doctors do, but I could not go where he wanted me to go. I could not admit that issues of anger and self-esteem were causing me to expel the word “Bye,” not as Rachel, my sister with the vigil for Jesus did, but in my own fashion, and that drinking was the biggest “bye” of all.

Though the instances were less frequent, Sarah was not without the element of surprise in her comportment as well. The next week, someone pounded loudly and aggressively on the door of the apartment as Luther was inside only having begun to drink scotch and tap water. Imagining an assailant or the grand annihilator himself, methodical and remorseless in the execution of his function, Luther could only tremble, but when the banging continued and the words “Open up, fucking fag skinny dick weasel” were shouted by an angry female voice, he was compelled to comply, whether death was nigh or not. Though the belligerent party should have been easily identifiable to him, as he had heard such words from her before, only terror reigned in his mind, and this state continued as Sarah pushed through and hurled her bag, clipping two leaves from the giant rubber plant he had recently purchased, before plopping onto the bed for a deep snooze.

“Cowabunga,” Luther could only exclaim, and though it was a word in ironic counterpoint to the occasion, it came rushing forth as his mind struggled for full comprehension. Later he wondered whether the occasion might have been better served by the utterance “Holy shit,” but that was a minor matter. More important was the fact-finding mission that needed to be launched and the vengeful impulse unleashed by her epithets. “Fucking fag” he could live with, as that was the legacy of her father’s affect and the occasional driving on the other side of the road he himself experienced. But “skinny dick.” That was a well-placed knife to the heart, as surely she was personifying him as a less than robust penis. And, in truth, he had expressed his insecurity to her about this feature of his anatomy. Had he not more than once fretted that his thing was less than adequate, only to be vigorously reassured by her that it was far superior to her father’s mammoth appendage? But who was he to find fault with her for finding fault with him when he himself had taken inventory of her body, noting the absence of feminine curves?

Her story, when she came to it, had some degree of vagueness. She downed a few drinks at the Metropolitan Museum prior to seeing Dr. Frodkey and found herself too drunk at the session to communicate effectively. Dr. Frodkey suggested that perhaps he was placing too much pressure on her if she needed to show up inebriated. What pressure that might be Sarah didn’t say.

Celeste, I have found an old notebook. Perhaps I am relying on it too much. Perhaps I am painting by numbers. Perhaps this, perhaps that. Do what you do, Mon. Just do what you do.

Celeste, our super was a crook. He was not a nice man. We left a long, low bookshelf in storage in the basement of the building, and within two days it disappeared. When I asked for an explanation, the super opened his mouth wide, not to show me the ruins within but to signify that he was a devourer of the first order and that what he took in was destined to vanish from sight. In that moment I saw him as a giant snake with a retractable jaw and kept my distance. The ways of a super are not mine to know. They may have some getting back to do. They may prompt us to a long meditation on the words subservience and menial and humble. But not today. Just not today. Not everything can be rushed under the microscope in the moment the need is felt to arise. Patience, I say. Patience.

Dissolution there may have been on my part, but that does not mean the need for order did not reign. When we fly apart and disperse our atoms into the universe, do we not have to call these same atoms to account once more? Some binding up was required, and it took the form of sanding the living room floor so sadness would not have to be ours for the rest of our days. And if you ask why it was that we did not tend to this matter before moving in, I can only tell you that we see what we see when we see it. Floors are like shoes. Nothing can be right unless they are right. We must pay attention to the foundation on which we stand.

Nothing will bring joy to the heart of a worthless man more than a job well done. Let me say that I handled the rented sanding machine with skill and then showed the patience to lay down one coat of polyurethane and allow it to fully dry before applying a second coat to ensure the longevity of the floor's beauty and increase its chances for the hall of fame.

Celeste, we had a standard to maintain. That is what I am trying to say.

Afterward we rewarded ourselves with a stroll over to the café on Broome Street. The place was thronged with tourists with their gallery guides in hand, as well as the neighborhood drunks resting up for another bout with the bottle. We were served by a bleary-eyed waitress grown puffy in her face and thick in her body. I had some idea she was part of a booze and cocaine crew from the café. Where is she today, Celeste? Has she gone into eternity? The menu board, which hung on the wall between the two restrooms, was written in pastel colors. Among its offerings were chili and burgers on pita bread, the only two items I ever ordered. I was still a carnivore, and on this day we both chowed down on the beef of the land.

Outside the casement window, by which we were seated, stood a man smoking his meerschaum pipe. His elegantly coiffed silver-gray hair and tanned, patrician face and custom-tailored tweed jacket gave him the look of someone who had stepped out of an ad for Rolls Royce or Rolex watches. He had half the café staring at him as he calmly puffed on his pipe, and I wondered, for all the time he stood out there, how such a man could be alone. My question was answered shortly when an equally elegant and significantly younger woman joined him and two walked off in a complicated embrace that suggested the affectation of closeness more than the real thing, summoning within me the judgment word “phonies” and the desire that the man be punished severely for his pose of meditative aloneness. This judgment thing, Celeste. It had been building in me for a long time. Where did it start? With Pastor Cohn consigning most of the globe to the fiery depths? And does it matter in the least that I find out? Is it not for us to love phonies as well as to acknowledge that I am one as well, as who is phonier than a drunk with the two lives he attempts to lead?

Though Marge was not on the line to him anymore in the way she had been, he did one day get on the line to her, suggesting that they meet at Finn’s, which he continued to patronize for its light and dark. Even as he spoke with her on the phone, fear gripped him that she had moved on and further, that she now saw that he needed her but she didn’t need him. If she had, she was still amenable to getting together.

“You’re smoking,” Marge noted, when she arrived.

“Yes,” he said.

“When did that happen?”

“I began mooching cigarettes while I was out drinking, and then the day came when I bought a pack of my own.” He did not tell her about Dr. Rosner and the snuffling sound he made as he drew on his thin cigar. He did not tell her that if smoking was OK for Harvard-educated Dr. Rosner, it was OK for him. There was no need to divulge his influences.

“We don’t know each other, do we?”

“Not in the biblical sense,” Luther said.

“I mean, we’re strangers to each other. I’ve moved on. You’re nobody to me now,” Marge said, articulating his fear.

“I’m proud of you,” Luther said.

“My therapist put me on to you. She said you sounded insecure and alcoholic. She said people like you often kill themselves, but you’re still alive.”

“Sort of,” Luther said.

“I really, really hate you,” Marge said.

“That is my impression,” Luther replied.

“You don’t make things easy for a woman.”

“Do you have a specific woman in mind?”

“Me, Luther, me. I’m talking about me.”

“Are you a woman?”

“This is exactly what I mean. This underlying hostility. This contempt.”

“Yes.”

“You can’t be happy unless you bring me down.”

“This is true,” Luther said.

“That’s why you don’t have any friends.”

“You are scoring point after point. You are definitely on a roll.”

He had his light and dark. He couldn’t be put off that by the “A” word she had called him, or that her therapist had called him, though it caused a burning shame. Marge stuck with her ginger ale.

“You’ve become a two-fisted drinker, Luther,” Marge said.

“Aye,” Luther replied. “Sometimes we get to deal with the polarities and bring them together as one.”

“The crap you talk.”

“Aye to that, too,” Luther said.

If he had his stuff, she had her own, as she did not dwell in the land of the humble and the innocent. “Have I told you that I have two, I said two, black lovers, not one, and that both are rising literary stars?”

“How many did you say?” he asked, trying to defend against her boastful assault.

“Go ahead and laugh, Luther, but I know you’re crying inside because I have what you want.”

“I want two black literary stars for lovers?”

“You want my connection to life. All you have is your stupid beer and the insanity it will bring you.”

“Don’t be calling my beer names. It’s very sensitive,” he said, trying to laugh over the wound she had inflicted.

“Did you read that piece in the Village Voice by a black female journalist named Akila Linsley?”

“No,” Luther said.

“She says in her article that black women should speak out about the fact that increasingly black women are having trouble finding black men to mate with because black men are abandoning them to be with white women. Can you imagine, Luther?

Doesn't that sound ridiculous to you?"

"It sounds painful, if what she writes is true."

"Isn't that the point of living in America that we have freedom of choice?"

"I guess."

"Shouldn't a black man have the right to choose a white woman over a black woman?"

"You seem to think so," Luther said.

"Light and dark. It's what makes the world go around and around. Just like that beer you like so much," Marge said.

Why had he called her? Because he had a need to feel important to someone, he told himself. And yet, how desperately he wished, in the moment, to break free of the need for an exalted image of himself and to live free.

"Aye," he said.

And he had more evidence of the trap he had set for himself that weekend when the Van Dines took Sarah and him for dinner at a seafood restaurant on City Island, a spit of land near Pelham Bay that offered a world unto itself, with its marinas and bobbing boats and small-town atmosphere. To be clear, the trap was simply this: if a person says he is something, e.g., a writer, then sooner or later he may be called upon to show others the fruit of his labors. A friend of the family had a neighbor who was a literary agent and could easily arrange a meeting with her. Would Luther be interested? Lydia asked.

Luther's horror was such that he could barely stay at the table. He did not punch himself in the face or call himself the bad names that had claimed their position on his tongue for immediate takeoff, but he did look stricken as he mumbled a courteous thanks, but no, he couldn't possibly.

"Why on earth not? A door opens and you don't walk through it?" Peter asked, his voice amplified by the tone of incredulity he spoke in.

"Maybe he is not ready," Lydia said, coming to Luther's defense, and the exchange ended there, though the aftershocks continued through his night: the countless returns in the manila envelopes; the boilerplate rejection notes; the chaotic tome with sloppily handwritten corrections he had hastily shipped off to Houghton Mifflin and almost as quickly received back. How dare they, Peter and Lydia, take him seriously? How dare they ask him to expose his thin bones?

The conversation turned to films. Luther and Sarah had seen Taxi Driver, with Robert De Niro and Harvey Keitel and Jodie Foster.

"I was an actress myself. I had an actor's equity card," the waitress said, overhearing them as she came with a tray of entrees. "A movie like that one you just mentioned is the reason I quit."

"Why? Because you didn't care for the film?" Lydia asked.

"That's right. I didn't care for the film. That film is indecent."

"But there are other films. And there is theater," Lydia said.

"Calcutta? Hair? The whole world is moving toward indecency," the waitress said. "It is sweeping the globe like a vicious influenza."

“I don’t see many dead bodies,” Lydia said.

“You’re not looking in the right place,” the waitress replied, evidently caring more for her message than a tip. “You have to check the eyes. Then you catch on to the deadness going around. That deadness in the eyes means deadness in the souls. Now check out my eyes. Check them out.” The waitress did some directional pointing with her index fingers toward her orbs after removing her glasses, this to visually support her didacticism. “Tell me what you see. Go on now, tell me.”

“You have very nice eyes,” Lydia said, in a placating voice.

“Damn straight I do. And I plan to keep them that way, and set an example for my daughter so she can keep her eyes alive too. And my husband? He fully supports me. He’s military. Special Forces. Tell me he hasn’t seen a lot of deadness, the lying down kind and also the walking around kind. We’re authorities on deadness. We’ve got PhDs in deadness.”

The outburst was a reminder to Luther of the world the Van Dines lived in and the one most others, like the assertive waitress, didn’t, and how that other world posed the continuing threat of anger and judgment. Polarity was rampant, and the only way to bridge the divide was through silence. Anything less resulted in a rancorous serenade, of the kind they had just heard, or something far worse.

On the ride back to Manhattan Lydia passed around a bag of jellybeans.

“The lower East Side is very Jewish,” Sarah said.

“Not so much anymore,” Luther replied.

“And I suppose Chinatown isn’t so very Chinese,” she shot back.

“I think what Luther means is that there has been some assimilation in the Jewish...” Lydia said.

“I know what he meant. I always know what he means,” Sarah said.

Seeing that it was an unprofitable vein of conversation to continue with, Lydia fell silent. From the confines of the car the lights of the city called to Luther. The night was still young and he had become hungry for freedom from the confines of family, even a family that was not his own.

That night he dreamt that Lydia was lecturing him about his drinking. She said she had his number. It wasn't a dream worth placing much significance on, as he also dreamt that Bill Walton had shaved his head and donned a saffron robe, and how realistic was that?

Now Celeste, it must be understood. Lydia and Peter were guided by love, which they sought to give where it could be received. Instruction had come to them from higher sources that both Sarah and I needed help, and so no mystery or suspicion of an ulterior motive need be attached to their offer to gain me an introduction to a literary agent. And yet, I had spurned that offer. Their love had been in vain as administered to me. But then, in the car, Lydia employed her gift of listening with her inner ear when she heard Sarah abiding in the state of rancor toward me. What she really heard was the discordant sound of jealousy. Balance must be restored so equanimity can once more reign in the lives of Sarah and Luther, she said to herself the following morning, as Peter launched into a monologue. When next we met, she used her resolve to great effect, with Peter's support.

You see, Celeste, they came to visit and truly a shower of blessings they bestowed on the work she showed them—her paintings and her monoprints, greatly influenced by James Ensor and Chaim Soutine, with their embrace of distortion and the dreamscape. Their gift to Sarah she did not rebuff. They could see its workings within her, softening her face and her voice and causing her to talk wildly and extravagantly about her projects and her theories of art, of the difficulty of going on without material success but also her acceptance that the work had to get done regardless.

If all the happy talk and good feeling was making me ill, I did my best to hide it. A love-in can be an uncomfortable thing when one is more conditioned to hard slap and all the rest. But Sarah was parched for parental affection. She had felt deflated, passed by in favor of Claire, whose star had eclipsed her own and shone brighter year by year. Such displacement within the family is not easy to accept. She had been raised to believe she was the sun and the moon to her father, if not her mother, and the shift of attention to Claire, real or imagined, had stung. Sarah's euphoria on that night was compelling proof of the enormous importance of her parents in her life.

Once again, we must allow such displays to have their way and keep our squeamish unease to ourselves. There was grief, genuine heartache, in that family. Let us not be monsters of the deep and the shallow and deprive them of the acceptance we ourselves are in need of. Let us at least pretend to be human beings. Self-exhortation has its place, Celeste. It truly does. We must call on the power of the universe to make us bigger than we could otherwise be. We must be magnified in the Lord, if you will permit me to say. Magnified. Imagine that. In the aloneness places have I sat two and three times daily seeking just such magnification and rejoicing when it came. Oh, that we have such a resource to make us more than we could otherwise hope to be.

Now on that visit with us, Celeste, Lydia was full of the Lord, though she would be aghast should she hear me describe her so. But how else can I explain her saying to me, “We’re very fond of you,” or Peter exclaiming, “We should organize a commune for talented people” as we saw them to their car? In that moment they saw me as giving them back their daughter and thus were full of gratitude, for hadn’t they lost enough? Hadn’t they? How much Lydia’s heart ached for her beloved, Lenore, we cannot pretend to fathom. We can only surmise that it was a wound with a life of its own that made her own life problematic to endure. Let us recognize the pain others carry and meet them with kindness and consideration. Let us do that.

The visit with the Van Dines took its toll. Both Luther and Sarah napped the following afternoon, overwhelmed by the experience and the recognition of their isolation. Twice the phone rang and rang, but neither answered. Later he learned his brother had been calling from a pay phone just down the block. Luke and Brenda had been in the neighborhood. He had called hoping they could drop by. Luther was happy neither Sarah nor he answered. He had sensed something menacingly insistent in the prolonged ringing, causing each call to become a test of wills. The wolves were at the door and we did not answer, he thought but did not say. My brother wants something and it is not me, he also thought but did not say.

“Brenda and I wanted to take you and Sarah out for drinks,” Luke said, when Luther spoke with him later that day.

“Sorry we missed you,” Luther said.

“Don’t worry about it. We’ll hook up another time. Maybe go out dancing.”

Luther was in fear when he got off the phone. Again his brother was coming too close, even if now he was calling from uptown. He didn’t want for his brother to speak Sarah’s name. If Luther had betrayed Sarah by going with Lenore, who was to say his brother would not betray him? Had not Luke gone with Nora from Norway when he said he wouldn’t and claimed her for his own, and could just as easily have gone with Sarah that night, and that was before Luther had gone with Lenore. His brother was an appropriator. What was Luther’s was his. His brother and his big thing. Luther said, to no one but himself, I will wait and this fear will pass. It has come before and it has gone before. The thing I must not do is make any sound that lets Luke know I am fearful. I will be all right if I can just do that.

“Get out of that goddamn chair. You have no business there,” the old woman screamed, as he sat for the photographer in the Atlas Building in Rockefeller Center. He needed the photos to renew his passport. But the photographer spoke up for him, saying he hadn’t cut in line. A memory of a childhood extraction over on Central Park South. The dentist telling him to count backward as the cool nozzle of the gas mask was applied. That rubber smell. Then imagining himself as a bottle from which someone was trying forcefully to remove the cap. Then the kidney-shaped steel receptacle into which he spit blood. On the bus ride home, woozy and nauseated, he had slumped on the horsehair seat.

“Doesn’t the child have the manners to give a lady his seat?” a woman had barked, but his mother had defended him.

“I’m sorry,” the woman in the passport photo line said.

“It’s all right,” Luther said, though it wasn’t. People gave themselves the right to take liberties with him. Outside he lingered. The small airline shops, the glorious marble interior of the Atlas Building, the large flowerbed on the inclined mall that led to the ice rink, with its perimeter of flapping flags—the name itself, Rockefeller, gave the area the stamp of quality and set off a yearning for a life bigger than the one he had. Among the tourists and the pretty office workers swarmed Moonies in ugly white uniforms, the kind you might see maintenance crews wearing on an airport tarmac as they serviced the planes.

“Are you planning to leave the country?” Dr. Rosner asked that afternoon, when Luther told him about the passport renewal.

“I do not want to pass the expiration date in my papers or in my life,” Luther said. He then told him about the visit by the Van Dines and Sarah’s testiness toward him on the car ride back from City Island.

“The question you’re asking is how much you need Sarah and her family.”

Was that the question he was asking? Dr. Rosner’s assertion frightened him. To Luther’s ears, it sounded like Dr. Rosner was trying to separate him from Sarah and the Van Dines. It wasn’t right to do him like that. It just wasn’t right. Did Dr. Rosner want him to fall dead on the floor from fear?

A door opened and a small boy appeared, holding a green balloon by a piece of string.

“Go back inside. I’ll be with you shortly,” Dr. Rosner said. The boy, who had mop-top black hair and big soft eyes, obeyed.

“You’re a family man,” Luther said.

Dr. Rosner nodded but otherwise didn’t respond.

“I feel I saw what I wasn’t supposed to see. Aren’t therapists supposed to keep their lives a mystery to their patients?”

“You, as a patient, are the mystery I am interested in.”

“I’m not much of a mystery, am I?”

“How much of a mystery would you wish to be?” Dr. Rosner asked.

“This verbal fencing. I feel I’m keeping you from something.”

“We have a few minutes.”

A few minutes. For his son Dr. Rosner would have eternity. He would be that kind of father. Or maybe not. His red hair, disappearing though it was, meant fire. A man in whom the thermostat was turned to high. But never the kind to say, “Will you make me get up? Will you?” Not that kind of fire.

“You usually have a way with words. You’ve gone quiet,” Dr. Rosner said.

Luther heard mockery in Dr. Rosner’s voice. He was laughing at him, humoring him. Dr. Rosner knew he was a nobody in the day and in the night, that if he struggled, he could make himself coherent, but that he had no natural articulateness. Dr. Rosner shaming him into a deeper silence. Well, he could say goodbye. Dr. Rosner couldn't put the laughing thing on him for that.

That night Luther dreamt he had been caught down in the freight yards at the south end of Riverside Park and placed in a jail cell by himself. He expressed his anxiety to the red-haired jailer that the other inmates would rape him should they get the chance, but the jailer put the laughing thing on him, just as Dr. Rosner had been doing, and exposed himself. "How about I rape you myself?" the jailer said. Possibly the jailer had a change of heart. He only forced Luther, on threat of a savage beating, to masturbate him.

Luther woke with a happy, relieved heart that dreams were dreams and life was life and that they ran on separate tracks, sometimes parallel but never connecting, unless, of course, a switch got thrown, but Luther promised himself to stay on the lookout for any such thing.

He made love with Sarah that morning, his mind filling with images of other women. Even so, the connection was there. They were happy with each other after lovemaking. At peace. It was always a long way around and with its distractions, but he did come home, even if he did not stay.

That evening Sarah went to the movies at Theatre 80 St. Mark's. Some old Bette Davis film was playing. She adored Bette Davis. Luther stayed back at the apartment and drank and listened to Yankee baseball. The sportscasters were good company. Phil Rizzuto, Bill White, Frank Messer. Messer the only professional radio man among them. Luther had seen White play on the great Cardinal team with Lou Brock and Curt Flood and Curt Gibson. A deft first baseman with a short, powerful left-handed stroke. Rizzuto referring to him curtly as “White,” the word itself so white when White was so very black. The Yankees not so white anymore. Elliot Maddox, not Mickey Mantle, in centerfield. Chris Chambliss, not Moose Skowron, at first base. Brooklyn Willie Randolph, not Bobby “I’m a Southern Christian boy” Richardson at second base. Bobby Bonds they had traded away after Luther had given him all his love, trying so very hard to overcome the doubters who whispered that Bobby was on the bottle and his career on the skids. Bobby Bonds played black. He played National League black, hitting with power and stealing bases to a degree no one else could. A thirty homer, thirty stolen bases guy more than once. And after a slow start, he did the same thing with the Bronx Bombers, Luther pulling for him as he did for Bill Walton. And then the Yankees went and did Bobby Bonds dirty, trading him to the Chisox. Who was Luther supposed to root for now, mean Graig Nettles (what kind of name was that, Graig) or unkempt Thurman Munson? The Yankees were as sad and decaying as the burning borough they played in.

Q: Who was Bobby Bonds to you, Luther?

A: He was the cold lonely nights at Crosley Field, in Cincinnati, the George Crowe and Frank Robinson nights in that town; he was Ebbets Field and Candlestick Park; he was the quality that black added to whiteness.

Q: And who were the radio announcers Messer and White and Rizzuto?

A: They were tranquilizers for my troubled nerves. They were the ones who could help me forget, temporarily, what I was not and never would be because the blocks could not get put together, denying the possibility of order being brought to my writing.

On her return, seeing that he was drunk, Sarah threw the newspapers she had bought at him. He picked them up and read, for the further escape that they could bring, but not before she screamed that she associated his drinking with violence.

The next morning Luther arrived at the taxi depot, where the manager told him to take a seat. He would call Luther when a cab was available for him.

“Hey, Vinnie, Vinnie,” a fat and unshaven middle-aged man called from his chair to the manager, who sat behind a Plexiglas window. Though the manager ignored him, a slight smile appeared on his haggard face. His pursuer gained from him a wider smile when he approached and rolled a crumpled cigarette pack through the opening in the Plexiglas.

“Stop breaking my balls,” the manager said, as he tossed away the gift.

“Balls? Balls? Ain’t none of us got no balls. We motherfucking taxi drivers, man. By the fucking way, where the fuck is my fucking taxi. Motherfucking Luis said he was just going around the block, not across the fucking country.”

Luther stared down at the cracked cement floor. When he looked up, the manager motioned to him. “We ain’t got nothing for you today. Come back next week.”

“But I was told to come back today.”

“Didn’t you just hear what I said?” the manager said.

As Luther was on his way out, the manager’s tormentor approached. “You got to play the game, Jim. You dig what I’m saying? You got to play the game. You a bum like me. You just don’t know it yet. You don’t get to make the rules. You got a lot of sitting in your own shit to do, man. I can tell. You fucked up, Jim. That’s why you here.”

The man had a face that had gone somewhere beyond shame. He was living in a place of freedom with his broken teeth and the broken blood vessels in his face. He was performing like a holy fool.

“I will take your wisdom out into the street with me,” Luther assured the man.

“‘I will take your wisdom out into the street with me.’ I like that. I really do,” the man said. “I could munch on those motherfucking words all motherfucking day. But now I want you to do some munching of your own. Ain’t right that I should be the only one here munching. You dig?”

“Oh yes,” Luther said, willing to say anything to be free of the man.

“Take your own motherfucking wisdom out into the street with you. You dig?” the man now had fire in his face.

“Yes, yes, I will,” Luther said, and began to run, lest the man have other, more dangerous truth bombs for him.

People shouting. People asserting. People declaiming. People orating. People denouncing. People seeking the final word that was never the final word.

Evidently, Dr. Frodkey took his turn at the podium that day as well. “He says ours is a neurotic relationship and that if you continue to drink, I should leave.” Sarah was in tears as she spoke.

Luther had heard the song “The Tracks of My Tears,” as sung by Smokey Robinson and the Miracles, and he had shed his own, but it was not for him to be moved by Sarah’s emotional display when it originated in a pronouncement by her therapist that amounted to an attack on his security and his existence.

“I am a sovereign state,” he said.

“You are a jackass,” Sarah replied.

“I fly my own flag,” he went on, undeterred. “May I read you something?”

“What do you want to read me?”

“The truth, according to Albert Camus.”

“Go ahead.”

“‘I withdrew from the world not because I had enemies but because I had friends. Not because they did me an ill turn, as is customary, but because they thought me better than I am. It was a lie I could not endure.’ End of quote. What do you think?”

“It sounds more true than maybe it is,” Sarah said. “Maybe his reason for withdrawing from the world is more mysterious than he knew. And what does withdraw mean, anyway? He was pretty visible.”

“Exactement. More true than maybe it is. And what is more true than maybe you think it is?”

“What are you trying to say?”

“That maybe Dr. Frodkey was a big fat hot air balloon today.”

“The way you talk. If you continue to drink the way you have been, I will have to leave.”

“And I will have to go to Guatemala.”

“Are you even trying to listen?” Again the tears.

He was listening, and with both ears. And what he was hearing not from her and pronouncement-oriented Dr. Frodkey but from within was that drinking wasn't the real problem. The real problem was life.

"You shouldn't have loaded his gun. If you hadn't given him the ammunition, he couldn't have fired," Luther said.

"So it's my fault for telling him the situation is intolerable?"

"We are going to find our way free of these concerns. You'll see," Luther said.

"I can't stand the distance drinking puts between us," Sarah said, but he understood that she was not speaking to him. She was really addressing Dr. Frodkey and complaining about his unavailability to her. However, he felt no need to set her straight. It was not for him to do such a thing.

Celeste, though I say I am committed to the truth, I do not speak it. I am a small and petty and fearful man and omit from the record certain incidents. For example, in this time Sarah saw a woman on the street and chose to describe her with a precision beyond me to convey. In so doing was she saying that her tanks could easily roll through the feeble barriers I had erected. While she lived in the tower of the fine arts, she could just as easily exercise her option and excel in my domain, should she wish. "I have more word power than you. I have a better mind than you. I have better genes than you. You have nothing but your stringy, underweight sentences." All these things was she saying without saying, gloating in that moment at my meagerness. At certain moments we are laid bare. We see our vulnerability and the defenses we have erected to compensate for them. And that is why words will never hide the nakedness I have sought to use them as a cover for. They are like snow that has no staying power against the pitiless sun. If I am to be beaten severely with a stick, it must be understood that there were reasons for this fear and antipathy her description of the woman summoned. We all have the need for that place that confers a sense of safety and specialness, but Sarah was saying she had not only found my refuge but was now occupying it.

Celeste, that song, "Walk Like a Man"—have you ever listened to it? For some reason it is playing loud in my mind, even if, being a true Garatdjian, all the lyrics don't come to me.

The events of the next day served as confirmation of Luther's perception as to where Sarah's treasure lay. In the morning she was on the phone with Dr. Frodkey pleading for a special session, and gratitude shone in her face when he said he could squeeze her in for fifteen minutes.

Luther felt the call of the outdoors. Seeking inspiration in the streets, he headed west and came to the Bleecker Street Cinema, where a film called Rosemary's Baby was playing. Strange that John Cassavetes, with a face inclined to laughter, should be in a horror film. And Mia Farrow. Hadn't she been married to angry Frank Sinatra and given him clobber for trying to contain her? And that hair, as short as her eyes were big, so aphrodisiacal, like that of Jean Seberg in Breathless many years before, and the ceaseless longing the beauty of her perfectly shaped head induced. She was a danger zone, in radical ferment, more powerful than her frailty would suggest, neither masculine nor feminine but somewhere beyond both. A woman flying the flag of androgyny.

It wasn't right that people weren't who they appeared to be and that smiling John Cassavetes should lead Mia Farrow into sin and that a child should be born from iniquity and that she should then fall victim to an evil scheme. The world worked against innocence, and it wasn't lost on Luther that he had attempted to do the same with his now abandoned drive to lead Sarah into sexually forbidden territory.

The theater was desolate on that afternoon. One of the few patrons took a seat in uncomfortable and unnecessary proximity, virtually breathing on Luther's neck from the next row back. As the film grew creepier, Luther's fear as to the man's intentions led him to move to a seat behind him, but the man showed no evidence of malign intent. Still, Luther had to struggle to resist an urge to do the man in kind, that is, to direct some of his breath to the man's neck and then be able to say, "How does it feel, Mister Stealth Sleaze? How does it feel?"

Luther headed for the bar on Spring Street after the movie with the idea of having a beer or two.

"When are we going to trade T-shirts?" the bartender said to a woman speaking with a German accent. She too was drinking beer.

"When would you like to trade?" she asked.

"The time is coming soon. I will let you know," he said.

She had buck teeth and he had a ruined face. Luther did not begrudge them their incipient connection. He was ex-navy, a real juicer, divorced. "It cost me six hundred dollars to take my kids to the Caribbean," he grouched. A man who showed up day after day in jeans and a blue work shirt, both garments worn from use. A lean man with sad puppy eyes that burned you with the truth of his existence, that he was going down without dreams having been met. You took him on his own terms, his drinking too big to hide. Sometimes Luther would see him late at night staggering toward home or another bar or just a doorway to sleep it off.

I wondered about that man, Celeste, I wondered, but not in a way I could apply to myself.

They didn't go to Camp that Memorial Day weekend. Instead they spent it at her parents' apartment. Hookers in hot pants were all over Broadway, where he had gone to pick up a pizza. The weekend was full of indolence, in an apartment with far more amenities than their own. Hud, with Paul Newman, was playing on the TV. He had never, as teenager, seen a sexier woman than Patricia Neal in a pair of jeans, unless it was Janet Leigh in a white bra in a hotel room in Phoenix in Psycho. And there was Tokyo Destiny, a flick about submarine warfare in World War II, with Cary Grant and John Garfield, and Hell Is for Heroes, with Steve McQueen and Bobby Darin. And the Boston Celtics and Phoenix Suns, with Jo Jo "I'm a cut man" White and John "I can eat a whole stick of butter" Havlicek and Dave "Wild Thing" Cowens doing it up right against Paul "I'm so tanned" Westphal and company so order could prevail until Bill Walton was fully healed. He had come east to join the Celtics and had been playing the last part of the season with a fractured wrist, it was discovered.

Celeste, I snooped in Lydia's journal that weekend. She was still using three-hole punch loose-leaf binders and stood them up straight, with roman numerals on the spine, as if to continue to suggest that they were on a par with the bound volumes on the shelves and didn't need the ritual of print, as Sylvia Plath called it, to make them so. She was rough on Peter, recalling his Austrian lover's advice that Peter should be teaching before the two had a falling out. Not in the journal but from Sarah did I learn that Peter had confessed to Lydia his affair with the German man. Celeste, that may have been a mistake. She was not equipped to handle the news of his love interest in someone else, whether a man or a woman, as Peter may have hoped. The problem was that he had nowhere to turn with his grief and sorrow but to her. By now they were man and wife and Claire and Sarah had already been born. We need to be careful, we do, not to place our desire for relief before consideration of others when the result of such a confession will cause harm. Once again I am reminded of my own indiscretion, or should I not go down that road?

She had something else to say about Peter. His books would never make any money because they explored subjects previously covered by others and with greater skill. Celeste, she was angry with Peter. She was giving Radcliffe clobber to his Rutgers self. She was saying that even Peter, who had survived on only a candy bar some days during the Great Depression and who had witnessed the insanity sandwiches eaten by those driving their primitive cars on dangerous country roads prior to surrendering themselves as carnage and who, as a result, had driven with precision and full vigilance soaring and who had taken a vow that he lived up to to never strike a woman after seeing his father beat his mother and who had bombed Nazi Germany and who had written books and scholarly articles and who had the big thing in his pants that she herself craved—with all this and much much more to attest to his worth did Lydia still render the judgment that he did not walk like a man or talk like a man. These things was she saying as her muffled cry of pain into the void of eternity on the paper on which she wrote, as she was in the wasteland of her days, that time well into her forties when her body was no longer a draw, not to Peter or to most men, and her hunger had to go unsatisfied on many levels and consolation was not near. We must elevate, Celeste. We must put aside the paperback books and sit and focus on the breath several times each day so we may discover and rediscover that which is great within us. We must go where peace and understanding are to be found and where joy and vision have their source.

They left early that Monday morning, so as not to be surprised by the Van Dines. He wondered if they hadn't exhausted their free access to the apartment, though it was not a concern shared by Sarah.

The men who had been to war were gathered on the terrace in front of the Soldiers and Sailors Monument. Some wore their medals and caps and hats from their time of service. A brass band played for the small gathering. He thought of Maura, the girl he had been seeing before he met Sarah, and of the legionnaire's cap that fell from her father's head the night he stormed into Luther's room and tried to pound him into senselessness. A sad, forlorn bunch these men and their loved ones were. The world had gone shopping. It was at the beach. It didn't have time for memorializing. But they did. They were still back there in those war years, when they had been part of something bigger than themselves, which he could only experience vicariously through watching Tokyo Destiny and Hell Is for Heroes. 4-F, low IQ. This too he thought staring at these one-time men of strength. And yes, he recalled the photograph of Sarah posed in front of the marble cylinder that had appeared in the New York Times some years before, his presence deleted by the photo editors, who had no use for drabness and boniness of that degree. The memorial service for himself as much as for them, as his mind would have it.

Later that day, like storm water, brackish, foul, pestilence-breeding, surging against the flimsy dam Luther had erected, Luke and “get it on” Brenda called from a pay phone down the block again. It was no way to talk of his brother or characterize Brenda, but he could feel that way. Minutes later they were at the door.

“Someone tried to call me filth. You know who that might be?” Luke asked. His shirt tail hung out of his loose-fitting jeans.

“I don’t,” Luther said.

“Our Bible-quoting sister, Rachel, that is who. ‘You stole some man’s wife and child. God will deal with you. You are living in sin and His judgment has been passed.’ So I tell her to take her Bible and go fuck herself. She’s ubazz,” Luke said, going Godfather on their sister.

“That’s too bad. She’s not well,” Luther said.

Brenda spoke up. “Your sister didn’t have her facts straight. That’s all it was. The aggravation Lenny put me through with his drug addiction and all-around smelliness. He was disintegrating right in front of me. Trying to take away my freedom. Trying to take away my natural high. I don’t let anyone play with me like that. I have the right to ask for respect.”

“Yes,” Luther said, hoping neither of them would discern that he had passed the same sort of judgment on Luke, in his mind if not with his mouth. But Brenda did not stay in outrage mode. She had more sensual delights to propose when Luther suggested they head for a nearby café.

“Why don’t we head for a topless bar instead? They have a fine one down on Canal Street. We could get our thing going watching the girls work the pole. You see what I’m saying?”

Neither Luther nor Sarah asked what this thing was.

“You’ve got to admit that she says what you both are thinking. Am I right?” Luke asked.

“Finn’s. We’re going to Finn’s for a little bit of light and a little bit of dark,” Luther said, decisively.

“What’s this crap about light and dark?” Luke asked.

“Sometimes it’s in people. Sometimes it’s in beer. Follow me and I will show you,” Luther said.

“My fucking brother with his light and dark. Don’t be weirder than you are. Tell me, Sarah, is he writing bad shit about us? Is that what he spends his days doing?”

“Luther writes bad shit about everyone,” Sarah said. “That’s all he knows how to do.”

“What the fuck you want to be doing that for?” Luke asked.

“First, I don’t write bad shit about everyone. Sarah is only joking. Second, you do what you do so white line can continue.”

“White line can continue? What that’s supposed to mean?”

“You’ve never been on one of those country roads where sometimes there’s a single white line so you don’t try to pass and then there are times when there’s a broken white line so you can pass at your own risk? That doesn’t mean something to you that there is a virtually endless succession of such roads? ‘Country Road, Take Me Home,’ that doesn’t mean anything to you?”

“Why do you have to be talking to me like I’m some sort of fucking moron in front of Brenda and Sarah when it’s you who’s maybe the fucking moron. It’s not like you went to some great college and got a great education. Just don’t be talking down,” Luke went on, moving in the direction of high dudgeon but not quite there yet.

“There’s this song I heard, ‘A Woman Can’t Find a Man Who Won’t Blow Her Brother.’ You ever hear that song?” Provocative and unnerving as the question was, there was cause for gratitude that Brenda was trying to change the subject.

“I haven’t heard the song but the title is a definite truth bomb,” Sarah said.

Hearing Sarah gave Luke a charge. “You hear that? My brother here, let me just say it this way. My mother was relieved when she learned he had a girlfriend back in high school.”

“That’s an old story, I believe,” Luther said.

“Some stories have staying power,” Luke replied.

The pungent smell of beer as they entered, the bits of overheard conversation, the energy of the burly bartender in his white apron working the stick, all of it was welcome to Luther, meaning as it did freedom from the confines of the apartment. In the bigger space of Finn's, the sexual energy of Luke and Brenda became diffuse, less threatening.

"It's a nice place, isn't it?" Luther said, his light and dark before him and Luke having the same, while Brenda went for only the light and Sarah had a seltzer.

But the change of scene did not mean for Luke a shift of focus. "You know you're living with an alcoholic. Did he tell you about the time he came to visit and within half an hour had drunk the entire six-pack in the refrigerator?"

"He's trying," Sarah said.

"He hasn't learned how to drink like a man yet. When he learns that, he won't be alcoholic anymore," Luke said.

"Ic," Luther said.

"What?" Luke replied.

"Short for alcoholic. It saves you some breath."

"You'll see. It won't be so funny you keep this up," Luke said.

Luther couldn't tell if his brother was trying to save him or destroy him.

Albert Camus wrote: "Not doing is acceptance of the future—but with grief in regard to the past. It's a dead man's philosophy."

Luther had no idea what Albert Camus meant.

Dr. Rosner said, "You seem forlorn and apathetic." Luther understood every word that Dr. Rosner said.

Seeing Luther flat on his back, Sarah said, “I think you miss Dr. Rosner,” because Dr. Rosner had gone away for a week. This too he heard with comprehension, even if he did not like the sound of it.

Free of Luke and Brenda, Luther made an effort at moral probity while out drinking at the Waverly Place Watering Hole. He would stay focused on the Suns-Celtics game in the championship series and not do the swivel head thing. But three drinks later a woman took the stool next to him and ordered him to smile. She said that his eyes showed such pain and she was sorry she could not help him. He asked her where she lived. Would it really help him to know? She asked. Possibly it would, he said. Would he like her to show him where she lived? Oh yes, he would like that very much, he said.

Her place was nearby. A nice building with a locked front door. She offered him a joint, which they shared. When he was about to come he pulled out and put his penis in her mouth and she swallowed everything that tore from him, swallowed his seed, and said, as if she were a prophet, “I knew you were going to do that.” He took the image of her away with him back into the street—her frizzy hair, her wide mouth, her bleary eyes.

Two bums were huddled in a doorway, it being a cold night even if it was June. Luther didn’t ask them if they were bums. He said they were bums. He said it in his mind. One had a beard. One was clean shaven. Luther left them there and headed home, wondering what the city would look like to them in the morning and whether, if the street was truly their home, that constituted a kind of freedom.

“Where were you, Mr. Ic?” Sarah said, in the morning, having been asleep when he came through the door in the wee hours.

“Ambush. Deadly crossfire. Managed to crawl into the bush, where I lay for hours.”

“Where were you, I asked?”

“I was—you know where I was.”

“This has got to stop, Luther. It has to.” She turned away so he might feel the dark weight of his remorse.

Reservations were growing in him about the apartment. The cramped quarters. The lack of privacy. What kind of writing area was that, a corner of the kitchen and close enough to the refrigerator to touch it? How nice it might be to have a room of his own, with a door he could close, like Sarah had. But it wasn't only about him. The Chinatown loft had helped to alleviate his guilt; it had been his gift to Sarah, constituting proof that he was for her, not against her, and that he wanted her to succeed as an artist. Her room, however perfect it might be for him, was a real comedown from the space she had enjoyed previously. The loft had been the ideal environment; it drove them to work. It was built for work. The light manufacturing, the sweatshops, that were probably part of its history. The apartment, with its modern bathroom and kitchen, now seemed too domesticating; it was putting their dreams to sleep.

Dr. Rosner had one thing to say. “A larger place is a metaphor for distance from Sarah.”

Always with the troublemaking, that man. Always with the need to create anxiety Luther couldn't tolerate.

“Could you not comfort him? Are there not words of reassurance that you can offer that he will not lose his job?”

Luther's mother was on the line. Harry Stavigros, one of Simon Weill's partners, had brought in a college student to evaluate the building operation and placed him in charge while Harry was in the hospital for surgery.

“What can I say or do? I have no idea what Harry Stavigros has in mind.”

“He is your brother. I need you to talk to him. He is not a hanging string but neither is he a sturdy oak.”

“Of course he's not a hanging string. I'm the hanging string,” Luther said, only claiming the designation she had given him.

“You have moved away, while he is still here. Do you not remember that hymn, ‘Rescue the Perishing’? Must I sing it for you?”

He did, most certainly. It brought the cold mountain air of the Catskills to him and the cricket chorus in the night and the rough pine benches on which he had sat through the fiery sermons and of the young female counselor he worshiped who was soon sent away for reasons unspecified.

She was telling him to love his brother, something she didn't need to do. Luther only resented Luke when he came too close and where Sarah was involved, like just the other day when he showed up with get it on Brenda.

And so he went calling on Luke. “Are you all right? Is Harry Stavigros doing right by you?” as if he was the godfather and could make things right if they weren’t.

And Luke said, “Harry Stavigros is not right in his head. They should be operating on his fucking brain, not removing his gall bladder.”

“Is he dropping more poop? Is he conducting aerial bombardments with the fecal matter?” Luther asked, remembering the credo of Harry Stavigros that sometimes you had to shit on a business to improve it.

“I don’t know what he’s doing,” Luke said.

“Mother says he brought in a college student.”

“Not college. A PhD. Some kind of hotel management consultant. It’s all right. He won’t last a month.”

“Why do you say that?”

“Because no one in his right mind wants to work in a shit hole like that.”

“You’re probably right. Anyway, I’m sure Stavigros needs you.” Luke was on a wine drunk. Luther’s own hadn’t yet begun.

“He’s an idiot. All those Greeks that invested in the building? Weill bamboozled them. They thought they were getting some great piece of real estate, like they were buying into the Plaza. What they got was roach-infested rooms and major headaches. The boiler needs to be replaced and the whole building needs new wiring.”

“That doesn’t sound good.”

“Oh, they have tons of money, but I don’t see them sinking it endlessly in that place. But that’s enough about me. What about you?” Luke made a surprising turn.

“What about me?”

“Like what do you do? Do you do anything?”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean I know you breathe but what do you really do?”

“I told you before. I’m trying to write. White Line Continue.”

“You told us that before. But when are we going to see this White Line Continue shit?”

“It’s not shit. I mean, it’s not very good, but it’s not shit. It just needs some more meat on its bones. That’s all.”

“Meat on its bones. Let me tell you. Sometimes I think I have more brains in my pinky than you have in that big block head of yours.”

“Yes. I imagine you do,” Luther said.

“I’m just kidding with you,” Luke said.

“I know,” Luther replied.

The emotional temperature of the city had to be taken and the current reading was hot for early June. A man threatened to jump from the roof of a building as the onlookers below egged him on. When the fire engines and the police cars wailed their approach, the crowd was prepared with bottles and rocks to hurl at the uniformed would-be saviors who would rob them of the spectacle of death. And if perplexity squadrons were required to fathom the logic of such a hostile response, then they were also needed over by the Hudson River, where an old black man clad only in a bright blue bathing suit and one gray sock dove into the scummy water. Soon people were calling for someone to rescue the swimmer, as he was visibly struggling, flailing his arms, and began to go under. But the swimmer had a companion, a younger man, who saw things differently and threatened violence against anyone who tried to offer assistance. When the police arrived and threw a line to the bather, the man fought fiercely with them, seeking to obstruct their attempt to give aid. Finally handcuffed, he filled the air with profanity, spewing his rage at the motherfucking white devils with their evil shit, always fucking with the black man and trying to hold him down.

Present at both events, Luther was left shaken, and could only wonder at a world in which people who were expected to show love didn't, and could only further wonder if he too, in his own way, was an advocate for death, that of others if not yet himself.

South from the commissary, he stared out at a vista of blighted buildings, the once brightly painted advertisements on the walls faded by the sun and the elements. The same picture of decline had presented itself in the short walk from the subway to the Times building. The theaters along Forty-second Street had been turned into porn palaces. Marquee titles like Debbie Does Dallas and Young Sluts where once feature films like The Days of Wine and Roses and Lawrence of Arabia had played. All industry on the West Side seemed to have fled and whitewashed windows were everywhere as decay set in and spread. Soon he would be left behind with the poor and people too old to run.

The commissary itself was like a geriatric ward. “I could die any minute, right on the street. The doctors took everything out. There’s nothing left in there. No veins, no nothing,” said a shriveled old man.

“I gave my doctor hell,” a peroxide blonde up in years replied.

They came in off the street, this brigade of the elderly, taking advantage of public access to the commissary and its low prices. A kind of Horn and Hardart’s crowd they were.

Luther had gotten his job through the New York Times, as the advertisement said, only it wasn’t the sort of job you would put on a resume. An unsalaried job. Working from a well used list, he made calls to apartment dwellers throughout the city hoping to interest them in a subscription to the paper and thus earn himself a small commission. The majority of people hung up quickly, a few expressing annoyance, having received such a call only days before. No one bit at the offer.

His one companion in the two weeks he lasted was a man named Bill Jones, who showed up each day in a suit and tie. Luther had some idea his life had become as plain as his name since his separation from his wife, who lived in Suffolk County with their two children. It was an idea he slowly became separated from as they began to talk.

“My friend, who is studying to be a psychiatrist, says nine- and ten-year-old boys are selling themselves on the street near here,” Bill Jones said, in the commissary during a break.

“Is that right” Luther asked. “How about 11- and 12-year-olds?”

“That my friend has collected no data on,” Bill Jones said.

“Your friend collects data?” Luther asked.

“Oh yes. He’s very scientific. Very thorough. Those scientists need to be. Our lives depend on that,” Bill Jones said.

“And how does he collect this data?” Luther asked.

“Oh, I’m not at liberty to say.”

“Why is that?”

“Because science is very competitive. Dog eat dog. And I would hate for anyone to steal my friend’s secret, as he has a unique methodology.”

“And has he told you what this methodology is?”

“Again, I am not at liberty to say,” Bill Jones said.

“What a strange business,” Luther said.

“What is a strange business?” said another member of the sales force, a woman named Ruth Solgar.

“Bill was saying that nine- and ten-year old boys are selling themselves on the street near here,” Luther said.

“Probably even younger. They’re ubiquitous,” Ruth Solgar said.

“What does that mean, ubiquitous? That they are evil?” Bill Jones asked.

“No. You’re thinking of iniquitous. Ubiquitous means they are everywhere,” Ruth Solgar explained. She did not get didactic on Bill Jones. She had too much of herself for that. She just was matter-of-fact in her tone.

Luther noted the fact that Bill Jones had sought him out of all the transients arriving and departing this unfruitful sales effort and wondered what that said about him that Bill Jones would do that. But what he really began to wonder was if there was no scientist and that the trumpeted yet secret methodology was little more than the personal experience Bill Jones himself had accumulated cruising for little boys. And if so, then the word iniquitous would apply, though not to the little boys but to Bill Jones himself.

After their shift the following day, Bill Jones asked, "How do you get home?"

"I get home on the subway. Sometimes I take the bus or just walk," Luther said.

He did not ask Bill Jones why he had made the inquiry. He did not want to go toward Bill Jones in any way on this day, unless it was in answer to a question such as the one Bill Jones had just asked, and then he would tell him only as much as he had to. His responses would be as clean shaven as Bill Jones's name. He was not trying to be mean to Bill Jones, but fear had grown in him of the man since their talk with Ruth Solgar the previous day. Besides, Luther had the feeling Bill Jones would come toward him with a follow-up question whether he leaned in toward him with his response or not because Bill Jones wanted something from him and he wanted nothing from Bill Jones.

"I ask because I take a delicious walk each night to my apartment on Thirtieth Street just off Lexington Avenue and I would be happy to have you accompany me."

Delicious. Bill Jones had used the word as bait so Luther would lean in toward him, but he was not biting. "Sorry. I'm heading uptown," he said, refraining from adding that perhaps another time they could walk together.

"Then I will walk out with you. We can at least do that." Bill Jones's face shone with a smile of confidence in which Luther also saw aggression and even menace, as if it were only a matter of time before Luther succumbed to his will, as a newspaper to which a match has been set must soon succumb to the flames.

Luther did not acquiesce verbally. He did want to slide down the surrender slope. He simply headed for the elevator, and the fact that Bill Jones followed after was nothing to do with him. Nor did he sing, when they reached the corner of Broadway, “Most Likely You Go Your Way and I’ll Go Mine.” He had no need of an avowal of dismissal of Bill Jones, though later he was struck by the thought that his silence might have been taken by Bill Jones as a tacit admission of the man’s inevitable hegemony over him.

Celeste, it is for me to tell you what you already know, that in Times Square one must be alert with all his senses reporting to him, as I wasn’t when a child that time the man approached and led me into the subway phone booth and had me touch his thing and touch it some more until he splattered the black phone. Vigilance must soar, Celeste. It must soar.

He dreamt of a little league ballpark on One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street and Broadway. The projects were gone. The elevated subway line was gone, but the field was there, neglected and unused. The discovery of it brought Luther to tears for all that had been lost and now had been found, if only in its dying form. He then found himself in the office of Dr. Frodkey, who now wore a beard and resembled Trotsky. Dr. Frodkey was surprisingly erudite, making allusions to people and things Luther knew nothing about. Luther informed him that Sarah had gone to a reading at CCNY and was, even as they spoke, making love with a woman.

Luther recorded the dream the next morning in his notebook, having some idea that it might hold clues to where he had been and where he was going and of what he could hope for in another world, with the elements rearranged.

In this world there was a big rearrangement. The Van Dines sold their magnificent apartment and moved to a smaller one on a lower floor in the same building. The logic of the change was apparent. The children were out of the nest and the smaller apartment would send the message that they couldn't return. Luther enjoyed helping them with the transfer of boxes. The small amount of manual assistance made his relationship with them more substantial and real. He saw, not for the first time, that the gifts they had lavished were so many as to lose their meaning.

Not that they were endlessly lavishing.

"Did you happen to see our pair of binoculars during the move?" Lydia called to ask, after they had settled in their new dwelling.

"Binoculars? No," Luther said.

"They were Canon binoculars," Lydia said, as if the brand name might refresh his memory.

"Canon binoculars. Are they on a par with Nikon binoculars? I know they have been trying very hard to be with their cameras. A brand name is very important. My mother always said as much. She always stressed that I was to get Crosse & Blackwell jam when she sent me to buy groceries."

"Have you seen them, Luther?" She was pressing in on him with the weight of her contained indignation.

“Am I trying your patience? Is that it?”

“You could say so.”

“May I note that of all the qualities a person might have, only one, patience, is used with the verb to try. Do you find that interesting?”

“I find nothing that you are saying very interesting, only borderline insolent. What is interesting is that in spite of all our efforts, Peter and I are left to feel that we must start all over again with you each time we meet or speak. There is this undercurrent of hostility. Why should such a thing be?”

“I have not taken your Canon binoculars,” Luther said. “I am not a thief of that order.”

“Oh, for God’s sake, Luther. Did I say you had taken them?”

“Were you casting asparagus or aspersions at me?”

“Luther, what is wrong with you? I was asking you a question.”

“Yes, a question. With the full weight of the law behind you and a posse of thousands.”

“Are you not well, Luther? Should you be speaking with your doctor?”

“This conversation is making me very sad.”

“And me as well. We will do better the next time.”

“Will there be a next time?”

“Of course there will be a next time.”

“For your love.”

“What?”

“The Yardbirds. 1965. Would you care for me to sing it?”

“That won’t be necessary, Luther.”

“Just as well, as I don’t really know the lyrics. That’s part of being a Garatdjian, as I have thought or said many times.”

Celeste, must I ask for forgiveness that a complete fiction unfolds where I command truth to hold sway? Does truth not have dominion where fiction wills to go? I am in over my head when I go down such a road. What can be said is that if I was trouble for the Van Dines in the year 1976, there was more to come.

Years before a girl small for her age came to me outside the school where we were sixth grade classmates. A child toad-like in appearance; already you could see her as an old and shriveled woman. As if she were a tugboat, she had in tow her huge and imposing father. The incongruity of a man so massive producing such tiny offspring presented itself strongly as they stood before me.

“My daughter tells me you have taken her pencil case. If that is so, I must ask that you return it.” The girl’s father had an English accent, and even as an eleven-year-old I had the sense that he must possess a formidable intellect to go with his great size. He was not a threatening man, Celeste. His voice suggested innate gentleness and a sense of fairness as well. The phrase if that is so told me as much. I replied emphatically that I had not taken his daughter’s pencil case, but she insisted that I had.

“That is not true. How can you say such a thing?” I said, with full astonishment, to this girl with whom I had had little prior contact.

“I say it because it is true. I say it because I know you,” the girl said.

I could only deny the accusation once again, and heatedly, as I was stung by the unfairness. But it was her unfairness, not her father's. He did not press the matter. He had a philosopher's mind and was governed by principles that his daughter had not yet embraced. I sensed that then and see it more clearly now, Celeste. It was a quality that my own father, with his summary judgments, lacked. We all want to be seen and heard. We all want the sense that justice has been done.

Because I know you. A girl I had hardly noticed had me pegged as a thief. While I stole from my mother and my aunt and stole, or attempted to steal, pens from stores, and was caught trying to clip a coin from a classmate's collection, which earned me eviction from his family's apartment, I had never stolen from my classmates at school.

I could only wonder, these years later, what it was that Lydia knew that led her to ask me, not Sarah, about the missing pair of binoculars. There had been that moment of decision, on first setting foot in the Van Dine apartment years before, when I held in my hand a first edition of one of Melville's early and lesser novels, Typee or Omoo, and with great effort resisted the impulse to filch it with the intention of selling the volume for a high price. As the years passed, I looked back with great relief that I had not succumbed to that impulse, and that it had not visited me again. If I had their love, Celeste, and in some measure I felt I did, then what need was there for such larceny? But perhaps it was a thief of a different kind that I had become and which Lydia sensed, a thief intent on appropriating their experience.

Because love was in his heart for some of the places he had been, Luther continued to hold onto the Hell's Kitchen apartment. Four years had passed since he had given it to Roddy Rumble, in the hope that the low-priced rental would provide him with a basis for his life and stem his wandering ways and possibly even put him in the matrimonial mindset. Luther was thinking of that hellion also hailing from the Deep South, Luella the Late Night Caller and champion of the interrogative over the declarative in her oral communications, even when the latter was called for. But two into one didn't go, and three into one didn't go even more. When Luella, with her monitoring devices, learned that Roddy Rumble had a place of his own, she caught the first Greyhound out of Baton Rouge with Ambrosia, the seven-year-old Roddy had fathered, and showed up at his door the next day. If love was love, hate was also hate, and the two-room sublet soon became a cauldron of fury. Roddy Rumble had feelings for his daughter, but the prevailing feeling for Luella, after three days sharing the same space with her, was of homicidal rage, which led him to threaten to end her existence with the iron bar of the police lock he brandished in his hand, a threat he mercifully didn't follow through on. That same day he vanished and had not since returned.

Ever since Luella had lived alone in the apartment. Luther arranged with her to send him the rent money, which he then paid to the realtor. The subterfuge was, in his mind, a necessary one, as periodically in his time in the apartment a man would come to his door. He assumed the man to be an orthodox Jew, given his black suit and big black hat and the curls hanging down the sides of his face. The visitor would remind Luther that he was eligible for relocation money should he decide to move. How much money the man couldn't say. There would have to be some discussion. In any case, Luther didn't want to jeopardize the possibility of a payout from the city by having Luella send the rent directly to the realtor. He didn't want her to become, de facto, the prime tenant, which could easily happen as he had never been issued a lease. While it occurred to Luther that the possibility was great the same man would, in the course of the four years since Luther had moved, knock on the door and find Luella living there, the likelihood did not deter him from wishing to maintain the charade. But there was something else. For a couple of years Luella remained grateful to Luther and cooperative with him. Then the change occurred. He no longer received the rent money directly from her, and when he called she would simply say, "I'm not here? Can you understand? Or do you always talk to people who are not present?" In such a manner would she address him. Luther came to suspect that Luella had built a case against him and perhaps all men. Her anger was transferable from Roddy Rumble to whomever. They were all fucking pricks, as Sarah might say in one of her vitriolic moments, thinking of the father who had not loved her enough to continue to protect her in the way a father should and who did not appreciate women in the way a father should. An insurrection was taking place. Luella was flying her freedom flag.

Celeste, I stole a life when I extracted those sums from the renting office. Till then I had been a struggling, anxious, woefully insecure college student. The money provided a buffer from the world, as Lydia's money enabled Peter to keep his distance from the workplace. And I have little doubt that I was seeking to emulate Peter by gaining the means to have his lifestyle. This I have acknowledged previously. But what I also see is that I lost the quality of empathy. With financial insecurity behind me, I had insufficient capacity or willingness to place myself in the shoes of those who were struggling, such as Luella. Otherwise I would have withdrawn my claim on the apartment and simply left her to try to hold onto it. Even now, when the nest egg I had built up was being fast depleted and I should been more understanding of this woman who was trying to make ends meet for her and her young daughter, there I was, returning to the scene, walking through the long corridor of the front building to the courtyard and on into the farther west of the two identical rear buildings. And yet, prepared as I was to speak with Luella, a sign on her front door gave me pause:

Luther, whatever your last name is, you're not wanted here. You go on and git before I sic the dogs of my imagination on you, and you can trust me that they are more ferocious than any hounds in the flesh.

He lingered outside, staring at the curtained windows of the apartment where he had spent four years of his life. Memories, sounds, smells came to him. That stereo set Luke had given him, on which he had listened to Alison Steele, the night bird, on WNEW-FM. The smell of incense as he listened to Nashville Skyline. Some burning pain driven by promise unfulfilled rose in him. If he wondered why he didn't simply leave, the answer came in the image of Nadia that formed in his mind. That wounded face full of repression, the skin pulled tight as a drumhead. And soon there she was, emerging from the long corridor, as he had done only a while before, a brown-bagged bottle in hand.

"Stranger," she said, a smile forcing its way through the complex of emotions his presence aroused.

“Persona non grata is more like it,” he said.

“Why do you say that? Oh right, the note on Luella’s door. Don’t worry about it. She’s not too friendly with anyone. What are you doing here?”

“Good question.” He followed her up the stairs and into her apartment. It was darker than he had remembered.

“I am the same way,” he said.

“What?”

“The same way as you with your apartment. I don’t let much light in. I am wedded to the dark. My therapist says I am an enigma.”

“What does being an enigma have to do with liking the dark?”

“Actually, he hurt my feelings. He has been pressing me to get a job. When I told him I was having difficulty imagining myself as part of the workforce, he applied the word, and with some scorn, I have to believe.”

“How did you get by when you were living here? You always seemed able to buy whatever you pleased.”

“I was on a secret mission and still am, although now too much light is being applied to my life. There is more exposure, as if I have been flushed out of my hiding place.”

“Why did you want to hide?”

“I need the dark to complete my secret mission, which is not so secret anymore.”

“And what is that?”

“White Line Continue. It will contain the beginning and the end and all the points in between, so people can see where I have been and remember me when it comes time for the dirt to be thrown on me. It is my book of life but also of death.”

“You’re still sad,” she said.

“Yes, and so are you,” he said. “Are you still dancing?”

“Yes, but I don’t have the same energy or enthusiasm. There will have to be a change.”

“A change, yes. My old life won’t sustain itself. Things have happened that require me to go in another direction, only I don’t know how.”

“Why did you really come here?”

“Well, I felt the need to tie up this loose end with Luella. But then I saw her very public note to me and I realized I am done here if I know what is good for me. But then you came along, and just before you did I imagined your arrival. So maybe I came back to see you. I feel I wasn’t nice to you.”

“I didn’t feel you so how can it matter?”

“You didn’t feel me?”

“Didn’t I tell you that at the time? I felt nothing. Nothing.”

“Do you want to try again?”

“I don’t think so, Luther.”

Luther went to the window. “Are they new?” he said, seeing the ugly, crisp-crossing silver gates that had been placed on it.

“I don’t want any more unannounced visitors,” Nadia said “Sometimes I don’t even want announced visitors.”

“Yes,” Luther said. The wall she was putting up was making him anxious.

“I have a friend. She will be here in a few minutes, in fact. She would not approve.”

“Approve of what?”

“You and me.”

“Why is that?”

“She is my lady friend.”

“Your lady friend?”

“Yes, my lady friend.”

The repetition and the tone brought home the meaning. He wondered whom he was talking to. She was stronger, colder than he had remembered her. Maybe it was the bitterness of thwarted dreams and limited horizons and such prolonged exploitation. Her attic life back in the Midwest. She had been a refuge for him, and now she wasn’t. She had invited him, but really, she was barring the door.

A lady friend. He sat with the rejection for a while. She had gone over to the other side, leaving him alone with the ugly men. It was OK. She was releasing him, telling him he had no need to be concerned for her. She was doing quite well for herself in her small world. It wasn’t her fault if he was bent in a penitential bow.

“I see,” he said.

“You make yourself more important than you are. You are not alone in doing this.”

Now she was hitting him with the flat of her hand. In his mind's eye, she was doing this. The change was there in her emphatic declaration. Her coldness. She wanted no pity. wanted to be pitied. She had no need of a galoot on an unsolicited mission of mercy.

“Do you still smoke?” he asked.

“No,” she said,

On the table was a box of Parliament cigarettes. She had misunderstood. She had perhaps thought he was asking her to enter smoke heaven with him.

A key turned in the lock and a woman entered. She was massive and she was old, a lot older than Nadia, and offered bluntness with her bulk. “This is a small apartment and I am a large woman,” she said.

He felt himself to be in a court of justice, facing an angry prosecutor and an unsympathetic jury of one.

“You are having your day, and the only question is will I ever have mine?” Luther said.

“You've had your day,” the woman said, rising to a new level of bellicosity.

The words just deserts blazed forth in his mind. “I will see you, Nadia,” Luther said. She did not respond.

Downstairs, in the courtyard, he encountered Jackson Holyoke. Though he was not singing “Country Road,” he did show the same fidelity to his denim duds as the bearded Cuban did to his army fatigues and seemed not to care that his tight apparel revealed a ballooning gut. A film of sweat caused Jackson Holyoke's moon face to shine and Luther noted that baldness was making steady progress on his former neighbor's dome.

"I haven't forgotten your name or what you did. You cost me my best friend and opened the door to the she-devil herself," Jackson Holyoke said.

"Say again," Luther said.

"Don't give me your say again shit. You know exactly what you did with your do-good crap."

"So you are saying I am a do-right man?"

"I'm saying you're a piece of shit. You cost me my best friend. Roddy Rumble will not come within fifty miles of this place with lunatic Luella ensconced in the apartment you gave her."

Enskonced was not a word that was supposed to come from the rat hole of Jackson Holyoke, and diverted Luther from giving his nemesis some fire of his own. All he could think to do was hew to the line of the factual. "As I remember, I sublet the apartment to my friend Roddy Rumble," he said, resisting the impulse to say more.

"Let me tell you something, dick up your ass. First, Roddy Rumble was not your friend. The best he could say about you was that you were peculiar and that you bought expensive books you never read. You don't want to know the worst he had to say. Second, there are those committed to the single path not from weakness but from strength. They have a higher calling than the marriage bed. And yet there you went trying to make Roddy Rumble something he is not.”

“And this higher calling. It is to sing the great ‘Country Road’ in the confines of your apartment over and over?”

“You listen to me, you ugly shit, with the snideness all over your face that you try to conceal. Just get out of here and take all your troublemaking shit with you.”

As Luther and Jackson Holyoke were reasoning together, a woman entered the building carrying a sketchpad under her arm. This is a woman who can receive a man well, Luther couldn’t help but think, seeing the look of love on her, before he turned his attention back to the matter at hand. But now here she was again, exiting the very building she had entered only a minute before, creating a sense of mystery and summoning in Luther a desire to help her in any way that he could. As she walked on by, he wanted to sing not the hideous “Country Road” but “Pretty Woman” with all the octave power and earnestness of Roy Orbison. He wanted to lay it on the line to this woman with her blond hair in a ponytail and her pert, troubled face that in that moment she was his everything, the very balm for the wounds of rebuff he had been receiving. The realm of art was the realm of childhood, and he was good at the latter, if not the former, and so there was the potential for affinity.

“Can I help you?” Jackson Holyoke called to the woman, having seen the same look of disappointment, even distress, on her face. He himself wore an expression of smiling treachery worthy of a snake.

“I was looking for my friend Edie. We were supposed to meet.”

“Hey, look, you can stay with me until she comes. Edie and I are neighbors,” Jackson Holyoke said.

“Great.” The woman smiled. Just like that Jackson Holyoke had managed to change her sad rags to glad rags.

“You and I are done,” Jackson Holyoke said to Luther, then whisked the woman upstairs before she could change her mind.

The long, narrow corridor should have been easy to traverse. It was a thoroughfare not of pleasure but of expectation, promising at the other end the freedom of the street where he could perhaps begin to treat his pain. But he was not several steps into that corridor when from the street side a girl of perhaps no more than eight entered and fixed him with her dark eyes. Behind her came a pear-shaped woman with a more malignant gaze carrying an A & P bag.

“It’s him, our torturer, Abigail Sue. Just let him walk on through and out of our life. Just let him pass on by. He got our message and he got it good. Ain’t no man messes with Luella who don’t pay a price. A man who thinks he has answers for others when he don’t even have answers for himself. Let’s just step aside so he can ease his filth out of here.”

The passing was not an easy one, and in proximity to basilisk Luella, he found no words to speak in reply. He was willing to let her verdict stand in the courtroom she had fashioned, and to take guidance from the name of the signature song of the very great Dionne Warwick. Walk on by, he said to himself. Just walk on by.

Now Celeste, I won't go so far as to say that monitoring devices had been installed in my mind, but the experience with Nadia and Jackson Holyoke and Luella were sufficiently jarring as to leave me in a state of acute self-consciousness. At some point we must allow the principle of full candor to be our guide and acknowledge the role of inanimate objects in our lives, calling them what they are, our enduring and faithful friends. Quickly I metamorphosed into a train, a New York Central switcher, and ever so softly whispered "Who! Who!" that alert stragglers might not find themselves in harm's way. At the Chase Manhattan Bank I stopped to pay my respects to an old and dying institution, remembering my mother's instruction about the importance of brand-name goods. While the bank was certainly not edible, it existed within the realm of quality and so I subtly paid homage, not daring to risk so much as one spoken word but held my index finger out in the otherwise closed fist I had made with my hand. I then gave a nod of my head to the cloud formation above.

Is it not true, Celeste, that often we must be beaten with the stick reserved for savaging if we are ever to learn where we should not go and where we must if salvation is to be ours?

On the next corner a bar, painted bright green, called to him. The lone patron was a stout woman of middle age packing away a burger with French fries. A piece of onion dropped from the seeded bun but she had no mercy on it. After devouring her platter she gave her mouth a good long wipe before applying lipstick to restore it to its previous luster.

“Give me a smoke,” she said to Luther. “And don’t tell me you don’t have any, because I see the outline of the pack in your shirt pocket and can estimate the contents of the rest of you sight unseen. A woman has her way of knowing by the size of a man’s thumb and the thickness of his neck, if you catch my drift.”

“Yes, your drift,” he said, offering her a Marlboro and a light. Her innuendo was worrisome and hurtful, but somehow acceding to her command did not feel like a capitulation. He told himself she was just another lonely voyager blowing smoke.

“Bill, give me a rob roy, will you?” she called to the bartender. He was not a pretty young thing bartender going with his hands to his long hair like a girl. He was in his mid-forties, like the woman, and combed his thinning locks back in a power sweep and had the red, scarred face and mashed nose of a man who fought with people as well as the bottle. He put down the cloth with which he had been drying the washed glasses to tend to her. “And he’ll have one, too.”

“No, I...”

“It’s on me,” she said, putting her hand on his as if to claim him for her own.

“Well, thank you,” Luther said, checking the distance between himself and the door.

The drinks came in stemmed glasses. Fancy drinks, like martinis, but without the olive.

“You don’t even know what’s in a rob roy, do you?” she asked.

Though the idea was fully formed in his mind that she was intent on crushing him with her mental as well as physical bulk, the smell of the drink alone placed him in its power. “No, I really don’t,” Luther said. “Is Rob Roy someone famous, like Roy Rogers? Only I can’t imagine anyone naming a drink after Roy Rogers. He was too clean for that.”

“No one’s too clean for a good drink, and if they are, that’s their problem,” the woman said. “You need to improve your mind, study a bit. A rob roy is scotch and vermouth and a touch of bitters. And you don’t have to tell me. I can see you don’t know what bitters are either.”

“This is true,” Luther said, “but I do have a dictionary, and I will be making use of it to incorporate these two things into my working vocabulary.”

“It must be hard for you to look the way you do.”

“How is that?” he asked.

“More intelligent than you are. People thinking you’re having deep thoughts because you’re quiet when nothing is going on.”

“Things are going on,” Luther said, taking a big swallow of the drink and hoping to regain his bearings.

“What’s going on?” she challenged.

“White Line, Continue,” Luther said. “In fact, I may incorporate those two terms, rob roy and bitters. I may even incorporate you. Of course, that would be a job, as you do take up a bit of space. But while a novel is not a warehouse, we will see.”

“You’ve got a mouth on you, don’t you? You some kind of writer?”

“Writher, not writer.”

“What?”

“Writher.”

“You’re a writher? What’s that? You writhe instead of write?”

“A writher of friction.”

“Shut up and drink,” the woman said. “Bill, another round,” she called to the bartender.

More drinks followed.

Sometime later he woke. He was in a bed and naked. Someone was snoring loudly. His head hurt. He found the edge of the bed and stood up. There was a smell, of vomit. He felt for a lamp and turned it on. The woman was face down and naked. The cellulite horror of her legs. On the floor lay his clothes and his sneakers. The ticking clock said 3:30. From the window he saw far down streetlights compromising the darkness.

At home he talked crazy talk, relying on extravagant bullshit. Bullets had been flying. He had lain face down in the gutter for hours to avoid death.

Sarah said she was leaving but she didn’t.

Things came back to him. The woman giving him her name but not her identity. Ida. As in Idaho potato, he had said, trying to resist her continuing effort at hegemony and three-hundred pound omniscience. He remembered speculating drunkenly about West Fifty-seventh Street and how it sloped gently toward the river, the Hudson River, and how that connection to the river and the old Swedish-American line gave him hope because all roads, all bodies of water, led to his mother and how farther to the west the Holiday Inn gave him added hope because it represented the bounty of America.

Something about aspiration. Yearning for new and exotic things, a life bigger than the one he had. His aching love for America, the orange in the HoJO sign, and how he thought this feeling could drive him mad, as he had almost been driven mad by the Chevrolet sign up near One Hundred Twenty-Fifth Street above the West Side Highway he had seen back in childhood. Then saying neither an ocean liner nor a Holiday Inn nor a billboard would satisfy him, just as the biggest male apparatus would not save her. The pain of remembering.

He tried to convince himself it didn't matter what he did or didn't do. Sarah's therapy with Dr. Frodkey was only intensifying. She was having to face the other part of the incest tangle—her attraction to her father and the possibility that Peter found his children more attractive than his wife: Lenore, the pagan (so-called by Lydia); Sarah, the true Van Dine (so said by Peter); and Claire, the intellectual soul mate (so said by Lydia).

“I need to go back to Boston, just for a visit. I need to see Mr. Edmonds. Can you live with that if I do?” They had gone to the Museum of Modern Art for the afternoon.

She still called her former teacher Mr. Edmonds. That meant he was old to her, that she saw Mr. Edmonds in a different way than he could ever see her. A quasi parent, a mentor. The sexual line could not be crossed in such a case without consequence.

“Would you prefer to go alone?” Luther heard himself speaking to her as to a friend seeking to claim her independence, and sensed she was seeing him the same way. They were trying out a new way of being, and it brought a feeling of shyness, at least in him.

A man seated nearby suddenly brought his clenched fists down on the table, rattling the cups and plates. Only seconds later two women with trays, oblivious of what had happened, asked if they could join his table in the crowded café.

“They don’t know what they’re getting into anymore than I did when I met you,” Sarah said.

“Are you calling me Vesuvius? Is that it?”

“I’m not calling you anything. I’m just saying,” she said.

“Right,” he said.

The unbalanced man pulled out a book, not a gun, and began reading. Every minute he would look up from the printed page, called back to life by his loneliness.

I’m a bum, Luther thought, staring out the window. I have been drawn to the museum by Sarah to see works by Monet and Manet and Degas and Pissaro and Van Gogh and Matisse and Picasso, but I am a bum. Still, as long as she only calls me Vesuvius, I will be all right.

Because the sun was hot that day and called for lighter clothes than the jeans he wore, he thought, when alone, I want to be on Fire Island in only a bathing suit. I do not want to be a skinny bones.

And also thought, when alone, seeing pretty girls on the street, I am like a dog in heat here in the heat.

There were more drunken nights, as there had to be, and the fragments he took away, everything else lost to him. “Why are you so disparaging?” a woman at a nearby bar had said, all context lost for the question she had posed, as well as the answer. He wouldn't have had one. She had been the voice of reason, of equanimity, of moderate, intelligent responses to life that allowed her to negotiate her way into an existence with depth and meaning. Fueled by alcohol, he was a crazy man spewing darkness. A man with answers formed in isolation.

But he had his dreams, and he was worthy of them and they of him. Bill Walton had taken the court in a small gym where only Luther could have eyes for him. Great fear gripped Luther as he watched his hero run laps and shoot turnaround jumpers that he would injure himself again. Luther's mother came and sat by his side and listened as Luther lavished praise on Walton and spoke rhapsodically of the superstar's great gifts and the greater things he would do if only he could stay healthy.

"Yes, my son. I think you are right," his mother said.

Her response seemed earnest. It pleased Luther that he had gotten through to her. They walked together down a slate path bordered by hedges on the grounds of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. Then Luther was once more at the Claremont School. He was beginning his senior year. How clear the dream made things. Instead of holding out, he would play basketball and please the coach, Mr. Sadowski. Some weight had lifted. His problems with Jane Thayer had been resolved. He no longer felt compelled to give up athletics because of anxiety about his relationship. He could be fully present for school activities. In his dream he was getting a do-over, as in real life he was pulling for Bill Walton to get his do-over. That's why it was so important that he stay focused on Bill Walton. Luther was sure Bill Walton needed his attention on him if he was ever to move forward on the comeback trail.

He grew more attentive to Sarah and slept with her twice in one afternoon. For a time there was peace in the valley. But Sarah did not have the things on her mind that he had on his. She went afterward to Theater 80 St. Marks to see two Joan Crawford movies while he stayed back to pore over the Times classifieds and circled a possibility for the next morning as he listened to a radio program on American musicals. Something about the host's voice grated. A know-it-all. This musical, that musical. This song. That song. This singer. That singer. Describing the quality of their voices and pausing for just the right word. A phony. Just a total goddamn phony. Another one of those with a malicious format and the ability to schmooze and fall in with the right crowd so doors would open for him easily. How was it others didn't see the malice informing the smiles or hear it in their voices? All these goddam phonies manning their positions in life and leaving him with not one, not one, and why? Because he didn't play their games. Because he was a hanging string. Because he was a skinny bones. Because he was a flat head. Because he was beset with the filthy condition of being partly Armenian. All of the above? Some of the above?

He started on the six-pack of tallboys. It would be a couple of hours before Sarah returned. Plenty of time to finish them off. Yankee baseball. That was more like it. Earnest Frank Messer and antic Phil Rizzuto and buttoned-down but mirthful Bill White in the broadcast booth. Enough of classifieds. Enough of all that crap. Men hitting, men running, men catching. Nice. Everything nice. Order maintained. Bases a luminous white, at least at the start of the game. The infield turned a rich brown by the groundskeepers' hosing.

Doubts are assailing me, Celeste. I have been calling myself names: lazy, slothful, Mr. Easy-Way-Out, Mr. Disregarder of the Reader. And I am remembering the counselor who said, "We've got your number, Buster. And don't think we don't." We've got your number. Imagine that. I didn't have to ask her what number that was. Luke and I were at a camp for Jesus where the summer air was filled with penitential sighs. Somewhere in the distance a Buick cruised down a two-lane road. Somewhere closer a static-filled radio broadcast of a Brooklyn Dodgers game. Somewhere nearby a screen on a window seen from below on a curving path. Somewhere nearby the basis for laughing at injustice was being bred in my bones. I had fallen in love with badminton and whiffle ball and could not get enough. Luke had tried to pierce me with an arrow from his mighty bow on the archery range. Crazy was in the air when I smashed him in the face with my two fists. The delirium of brotherhood was intense at close quarters. Nothing can get ironed out without a master plan. All is the bedlam of scurrying roaches without such. I want you to know this. I need you to know this.

She had my number? She had my number? Suppose I were to say hah to that and start up my laughing thing and declare I had her number and could snatch from the air the words with malice aforethought and stamp them on her fretted brow?

Jesus, the beer was good. It was more than good. Having a cold can in hand was needed to check the ads. Looking for a decent job, one that Dr. Rosner would not sneer at, wasn't easy. Seeking to be a part of a world you did not want and that did not want you wasn't easy. You needed flesh on your bones for these positions. On his second can he put the paper away. He would come back to it fresh in the morning. Right now he needed a clear space. He needed to concentrate on keeping the walls, everything, at bay. The days were all right. It was the evening that brought trouble. Suddenly everything, his ugly manuscripts, just everything, crowding in on him so he couldn't breathe. Drinking gave him the space that he needed and otherwise couldn't find. It made things nice again, the way they were supposed to be.

At 9 pm he took a Sleep-Eze, an over-the-counter sleep aid. Sometimes now he would use them to knock himself out when the alcohol wasn't doing the job fast enough. The two horse pills just gave him the added assurance he needed that he could have the peace, the quiet place, that he was seeking.

"I would like to be a customer service representative for the company you yourself are employed by. I am responding to your ad in the New York Times," Luther said to the woman at the desk in the small office the next morning. He had traveled to midtown buoyed by the freshness in the air and trying to believe he was worthy of hire, in spite of the prominence his mind was giving to the initials CCNY. "At the same time I have to tell you, in all honesty, that in my heart of hearts I remain faithful to the railroads. Love is love, and the kind I practice cannot be easily shaken."

Given the big engagement ring she wore, it seemed fair to assume the woman had herself been claimed by love. "Take a seat and fill this out," she said, handing him a form the size of an index card.

"I will do that, and with dispatch." He noted that the woman had regarded him first with discomfort and then with annoyance. People had their affinities. They may have been born with them, for all he knew. Whatever the case, you couldn't win over people who didn't want to be won over. And yet the song "For Your Love" came bursting into his consciousness, and the admonition from E. M. Forster, "Only connect."

He tried to apply himself to the challenge before him, that being to write in a legible and attractive hand. He decided that block letters were the way to go, and he remained faithful to his intention through the spelling of his first and last name. But when he came to his address, he slipped into lowercase in spelling "east" and a similar inconsistency showed in listing his previous employment as executive manager with full financial management responsibilities for Hedberg Inc., the family rooming house operation. As he wrote his hunger for the job seemed to grow, as it promised travel benefits to the big and waiting world. He would not have to go back to cold calling people who didn't want to hear from him for the New York Times.

"Can you type?" the interviewer said, when he was finally called in. His nameplate read "Carl Finano." His tie was on the skinny side, his suit was made of meager fabric, and his white shirt was wrinkled.

"I have been typing for at least a few years, and have two typewriters, as a matter of fact," Luther said. "One is an old L.C. Smith office machine with elite type to save space. Then I have a portable, which produces pica type. It is a little like having 'O' gauge and '027' track, if you get my drift. Compatibility is lacking, but this will be rectified. There will come the day when unity is achieved. Its absence is the source of my current pain; its resolution is my goal."

Mr. Finano stared at Luther. Luther stared at Mr. Finano. After an uncomfortable passage of time, in which the makings of a judgment appeared to be forming in Mr. Finano's redoubt of a head, he said, "We have nothing for you."

"But what about the airlines position you advertised?"

"That drew more than five thousand applicants, many with doctorates from the finest universities in the country and the world, including several hundred in astrophysics."

"Astrophysics? Do you know what you are saying?" Luther asked.

"Other applicants included chemists and Rhodes scholars and the top ten percent of the most recent graduating classes of Harvard and Yale Law Schools."

"Stop. This is preposterous."

"Do you wish to save your life?" Mr. Finano said.

"Only if I am in danger of losing it. Are you threatening me, Mr. Finano?" Luther cried out.

"Rather do I wish to enlighten you."

"Rather do I? What kind of words are you speaking at me, Mr. Finano?"

"Speaking of words, here is what you must do. You used the word preposterous. Imagine it as a small block of wood as you leave here, and in the privacy of your home meditate on it."

"Meditate on what, Mr. Finano. The word? The block of wood? What are you talking about?"

“Exactly. What am I talking about and what are you talking about and what are we both talking about?”

“I don’t understand you, Mr. Finano.”

“And I don’t understand you, Mr. whatever your last name is. And that in itself is an understanding. Now you must leave, Mr. whateve. You must leave or I will have no choice but to call the police. Is that clear?”

The conversation having turned into a cul-de-sac, Luther put aside his defiance and walked out of the office.

An obese woman sat alone at a downtown bar sipping red wine. She had come in to beat the summer heat. Her sweaty face shouted her vulnerability. Soon she disappeared from Luther’s life forever.

That day the Cincinnati Reds beat the Dodgers 3-1. George Foster hit a home run with his big black bat. Ken Griffey hit a home run with his big black bat.

When it was too much, Luther called on dreams and entered, with Sarah, a house associated with their youth and wept, but then moved on to feel a black-haired woman’s bottom through the flimsy fabric of her black panties.

Marge had not been on the line to him since dropping those truth bombs on him in Finn’s several months before.. It had been for him to get on the line to her, but his pride wouldn’t allow him to go there, as it would have been like running for a train that has already begun to leave the station. Now there she was on the front steps of the Met, slimmed down and wearing a loose white blouse and the jeans she was wedded to, even in the high heat of early summer. She showed him, in the first few minutes of their time together, that context was not lacking in her life with her mention of the writing class she was part of. In a flash of insight he understood that he was not and never would be Quentin Compson but only his evil older brother Jason, seeking to drive down all those around him because he had no power to raise himself beyond what he was. It was a meanness in his heart toward her that he had possessed toward his deceased sister Naomi for contributing to the defacement of his life before it could really begin.

Marge said silly things, but she said them with an air of serenity and self-possession she had not previously shown. "I want to sleep with Susan Sontag," she said, giving her writing instructor a name. Her stated aspiration caused no spark of titillation in Luther, only a tremor of horror. He did not care to contemplate Marge in the sexual act, whether with a man or a woman, given not only her age or the even older age of her heart's desire but something about the quality of her being. The desire sounded, from her lips (again a shiver of revulsion) immature and insincere.

"Good luck with that," Luther said.

"She is a light-giver. She has such power to do good, and she is doing good. She gave my lover's manuscript to Ned Molatoff, over at Viking, and now Viking is going to publish it and has already sold the paperback rights. Can you believe it? Do you know what that must feel like to have such power and influence and to use it for good?"

Luther saw the light in Marge's hero, Susan Sontag, and he saw the light in Marge herself, saw, that is, that she was a vessel for her mentor's light. But he saw also that it was an intolerable light, a light that destroyed the likes of him and once again raised the question who the filthy one might be who had put him on the planet to endure such indignities.

He suggested they skip the Met and so he led her to a bar farther east.

“We always start off happy to see each other and then something happens. You’ve changed. You’re not eccentric and funny the way you used to be. Now you’re as dark as this bar we’re sitting in,” she said.

“Why are you telling me this?”

“It’s only what I told you the last time we met. I don’t feel comfortable with you. That is why. Something is wrong.”

“Wrong?”

“I see hatred and envy all over your face. I didn’t tell you about my lover’s breakthrough to incite jealousy. I told you so you could have a sense of hope about your own work. And now we’re in this dingy place where you’re trying to drink away your pain.”

“What’s wrong with that?”

“I’ve got to go, Luther. Good-bye. Please don’t call me anymore.”

Marge left efficiently and with resolution, and though instinct cautioned him not to look around, he reflexively turned in the direction of the waiter, who was ready for him, all the scorn of the universe beaming from his eyes. Let it be what it is, I have been here before, Luther told himself, leaving a bill larger than the one he owed to avoid any further communication with the witness to his shame.

On Eighth Avenue, en route to the Times Building, he was diverted into a Blarney Stone, drawn by the commingled smell of food and booze and piss. No warm amber glow. The place was as brightly lit as a Chock Full o' Nuts, and dispelled any illusion that women were the draw. The few perched on stools at the long bar were older, like most of the men, and focused on the glass in front of them.

Marge had landed a heavy blow. There could be no question about that, Luther thought, as one drink followed another. Her revelation about her lover's success had been like a shrapnel bomb, making his meaningless telephone sales job unbearable.

You have no friends, only yourself, and you've just been left by a woman you don't even want who has all the power and all the connections. You will go berserk, and if you do, the police will shoot you like a dog. So his thoughts continued. He remembered that time that was no more when Marge looked at him with helpless, hopelessly hungry eyes. He saw with sharper awareness what he had seen before, that the only way for him to stay on top was to stay apart, unless he wanted to be wrestled to the ground, even by the likes of Marge.

Now Celeste, why document a man's decline? Sots are dime a dozen Louies, whether young or in middle or advanced age. And a fleshless and mindless lost soul infected with lust and envy and ill will and with a likability quotient of zero—this is anyone to spend time on or with? Should we not cudgel him well into death? I am leaving that question out there.

Outside the Blarney Stone an animated man with a Jamaican accent was on fire for the Lord. "Jesus saves, brother. Have you received the word? Have you felt his living, loving presence? Has he delivered you from the fleshpots all around and brought you to the place of peace through tears of joy? Tell me you hear my ministry of love, brother. Tell me.”

“How about I tell you to get out of my motherfucking face?” replied the black man he was calling to Jesus. The black man’s bark was vanquishing. The messenger of God ran off down the street, casting a glance over his shoulder in fear that baleful darkness might be following him.

Luther arrived at work and entered his cubicle and got down to business.

“Why you want that I should have the New York Times. I no read the New York Times. I no even read English. I no want to read English.”

“Did I say you should read English?”

“Who you talking to, mister? Do you know who you are talking to?”

“You are Isabel Santiago. That is who you are.”

“Is not the correct answer to my question. I ask you again, mister. Do you know who you are talking to?”

“Maybe you will tell me who I am talking to,” Luther said.

“Is not me, mister. Is not me. So if it is not me, then who can it be?”

“You’ve got me. Who is it?”

“Why you want to make mystery where no mystery exist? Why you want to do that, mister?”

“As I said, I’m stumped.”

“What is that, stumped? That is your English you be speaking to me? I am Spanish woman. I am proud. And you? You are loco. Now ask me why you are loco and I tell you why.”

“Why am I loco?”

“Because you be talking to yourself and don’t even know it.”

“I’m talking to myself?”

“Who else you be talking to, mister? You no talking to me. You telling yourself you need your New York Times. Why you no buy what you need, mister? Why you come bothering me when you better to be bothering yourself. I have no more time for you, mister. Vaminos.”

He was not sorry when she hung up, though he had been left in a state of puzzlement. Was she merely saying fuck you, or was there some deeper meaning to her rejecting words?

In the next cubicle sat old Mr. Onifieri. “What do you mean, you don’t want a subscription? How about I sell you two or three or four? Would that make you happy Or do you plan to go through life as a malcontent?”

On the other side sat Mr. Califras, who more gently inquired of those on the other end of the line whether they might be interested in a home delivery suscription.

I am where I am supposed to be, Luther thought, in a moment of sweet surrender. He felt a measure of relief from the beating that Marge had given him. “It is OK with me if my number is never called, my exceedingly low number,” he heard himself say, with sufficient emphasis on his words that Bill Jones was drawn to his space.

“Is your ship going down? Is that what I just heard you to say?” Bill Jones inquired. “I was a speech major, and so I should know a thing or two about cries for help.”

“I thought therapists and psychiatrists and social workers and such were attuned to cries for help.”

“Yes, but I am a master of the word and all the emotions that drive them forth, and I think from what I hear you are in need of assistance.”

“Bill, leave me to my devices and I will leave you to yours.”

“As a speech master, I like what you just said. It came out clear and strong.”

“Am I supposed to say thank you?”

“That too, Luther. You are allowing yourself to show.”

“Thank you, I guess.” Not that Bill Jones was one to talk about people letting themselves show, given his own hidden way.

“That, too. You see. You’re blossoming. You’re beginning to maximize your potential.”

“Enough. Please. You’re killing me with this shit.”

“That’s it. That’s it. You’re home free now,” but shit Bill Jones said. “I feel the urge coming on to celebrate by really tying one on. Frankly, Luther, you smell like you know a thing or two about drinking. Does the urge come over you to tie one on regularly?”

“I don’t know what to say,” Luther said.

“You just said it, Luther. You just said it. Tell me. Would you care to join me?”

“I don’t think so, Bill. I need to go directly home.”

“That is very sensible, Luther. Very sensible. My girlfriend will have my head if I am a minute late.”

“You don’t want that to happen, I imagine,” Luther said. For some reason it had not entered Luther’s mind that Bill Jones might have a girlfriend.

“Has the element of surprise been mine?” Bill Jones asked, smiling as if he had the answer.

Now Celeste, all was not right in Dr. Rosner’s world, or it was in the process of being set right. Who were once one were soon to be two. Cloven. How did I learn this? His office was at a different location. When I remarked on the change, he explained that he and his wife had separated. It must be noted that my response was bland, as all I could think to say was “Oh.” It did not occur to me to say “I am sorry” or “That must be hard” or in some other way commiserate with him. I came prepared to talk about myself and was unable to make the adjustment. This would be an insignificant matter were it not for his response. “That is all you have to say?” Let us make no mistake. Can there be any doubt he was channeling the reproach of the universe with those words? Was he not seeking to castigate me to death for what he perceived as my indifference to his pain? Was he not raising up on me with loathing for such a blatant display of self-centeredness? Oh do get out the stick and beat me so very good for this shortcoming. Punish me until the ends of death and then extend its boundaries so more beating can be administered. Dr. Rosner was a perceptive man. In that moment he discerned my incapacity to feel his sorrow or pain. Or maybe not. After all, he did not ask me directly why my reaction was so cool. If instead of “That is all you have to say?” with the implied judgment that the question rendered, he had posed a question or series of questions to draw me out, I might have been able to respond with the truth rather than an exclamation. And what would that truth have been? That it was difficult for me to accept that someone blessed to have been born a Jew and with the genes of brilliance that went with being a Jew and the Harvard education to prove his brilliance and a thriving practice and East Side luxury high-rise residence/office neither needed nor merited my sympathy and, if anything, it served him right to have any pain he might be experiencing for having dared to succeed to the degree that he had. He would have been made to see that the laughing thing was alive and well in me and that he was not exactly dealing with a human being and that the whole universe deserved my laughing thing upon it. Do you know what it means to have a mother who says, “We are living in the last days” or that “He will come as a thief in the night” or that “I came to the conviction that the world has nothing that I want”? Do you understand, Celeste, that it is in my bones that this world and all those who embrace it must be repudiated and punished and that I must be the agent of its and their pain?

And this. You know who your mother is supposed to be, but that doesn't mean you know who she is.

In the dream Sarah had returned to Boston. Luther did not care for her rundown apartment but Sarah did not care for him and suggested he consider returning to New York. They would both be better off, she said. Luther was not fully comprehending, but as the minutes passed, he realized a significant moment in his life had arrived. Sensing the merit in her proposal, he wondered if he would have the strength to follow through.

“Claire says Anais Nin is a nincompoop, that all she can write about is herself. She says Anais Nin lacks the intelligence and creativity to develop a fictional world and so has to be content to record her every feeling and thought and incident in her small and narrow life,” Sarah said that morning.

“Your sister sounds like a vicious male critic,” Luther said, withholding from her his dream of the night before.

“Why male?” Sarah asked.

“Didn’t Gore Vidal mockingly characterize Anais Nin’s writing as ‘the flow, the flow’? Didn’t I read that somewhere?”

“I think Anais Nin is a great writer. I love her diaries,” Sarah said.

“Claire pees on anything subjective. She’s a prisoner of her muscle-bound intellect. She should eat garbanzo beans or rich fruit or both.”

“Are you saying she’s constipated?”

“I’m saying she has a license to kill. She’s an agent of death with that overly critical faculty of hers. She is always measuring and assessing and weighing. I know about that sort of thing. Many, many times has she tried to kill me with her assassin’s bullets.”

“Stop. Why do you have to go overboard?”

He did not tell Sarah that Claire was talking about him as well in calling Anais Nin a nincompoop. Nor did he tell her that Claire had leveled him previously by grouping him with the Van Dines' Estonian maid.

That morning he stared through the south-exposure window at the complex across the street. The modern high-rise buildings dwarfed his own. All those tenants, many old and materially well off, possibly looking down at him and Sarah in their cramped apartment. Once again he yearned for some privacy, a room of his own.

On a city bus he heard the driver say, "You don't own me. You don't own me," in a squabble over the fare with the father of a teenage girl, who looked on, embarrassed. But that was the point, wasn't it? The passenger did own him. All the passengers did. And the route. The route owned him as well. The bus and all who came on to it had claimed ownership of him. The driver was their beast of burden. He has given me a window into his life, Luther thought.

And that afternoon he heard Bill Jones say, "Are you thirty? Tell me you are thirty. Or tell me you aren't. But tell me."

"Why would you want to know?" Luther asked.

"I am trying to determine your eligibility for my life."

"I don't reveal my age to strangers, unless there is a compelling reason."

"Haven't I given you one?"

"No, you haven't."

"Well, how is this for a compelling reason? I am so depressed after visiting with my wife and children."

“Why would that be depressing?”

“Because my wife won’t tell me why she asked me to leave, just as you won’t give me your age. What is the matter with this world that people are so little forthcoming?”

“I don’t know. Maybe it’s the questions you ask.”

“Well, let me ask another then,” Bill Jones said, putting aside perplexity for anger. “How about coming over tonight?”

“I can’t,” Luther said.

“Well, let me ask another. Why not?”

“I just can’t.”

“There you go again, stonewalling me,” Bill Jones said. “You and the entire world.”

Stalling me, Luther would have said, remembering his battles with his mother. You’re stalling me. Quit stalling me.

Celeste, what is this that my dialogue turns in on itself and results in little more than a mincing of words? Why can my characters not speak from the heart with sincerity abounding? Why can they not show respect for themselves and each other?

Luther and Sarah frequented a restaurant on the Bowery that served food normal enough that Luther needn’t cast a suspicious eye on the hamburger and French fries that he generally ordered. Some places made him happy, and some brought him down, and Robin's was decidedly the former, with a cool, modern décor and cool young waiters and waitresses. Whatever cool was, he could only admire the staff's trendsetting style. And if they were cool, then the food would have to be cool, because their coolness would not permit for dirty hands or bad meat or vermin running free.

The only thing that was not cool on this night was Luther himself. Sarah mentioned her diminutive friend Carola Aprile, who had visited with them at the East Broadway loft and with whom Sarah went back as far as high school. Since that visit, Carola Aprile had vacated the premises of Pittsburgh, the city she had lived in since her college days. That visit to Sarah had lit Carola's fire. She had returned to the City of Steel wanting to light the night on fire and knowing she never could, that a city of steel could not burn incandescent in the dark. She had to come to New York. She had to step up if she did not wish to be consigned forever to a city with a past but no future. Pittsburgh was dying, and she was dying, too. Sarah was ahead of her, and she could not let that be. She clamped the fat cheeks of her boyfriend, Hunger Longing, between her small hands and gave him with full intensity the imperative that she had given herself. They must to the Big Apple. Avanti, avanti, she said, English proving inadequate to express her sense of urgency. In this manner did she galvanize them both into action, and soon they had rented a loft in the tough Fort Greene section of Brooklyn, near Pratt University. "I Will Follow Her," not him, was Hunger Longing's theme song, as he had no self to stay home alone with. (This was not his fault. Do not begin to think that it was. Do you know what it is to be an orphan, with no direction home? Well, do you?)

“How is Carola?” Luther asked, on this night, as he had some concern that Sarah was adrift, with only Hamburger Heaven and Dr. Frodkey and the loneliness of her artist’s calling. Suddenly Carola Aprile was the bright light who would add radiance to her life. No longer was she mired on the banks of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers, and even when she had been, there had been the luster of her fine mind visible far beyond the borders of that state.

“I haven’t spoken to her recently,” Sarah said.

“How long ago is recently?” Luther asked.

“I don’t know. A few months. She said I was more advanced with my painting than she was.”

“Don’t you want to keep tabs on her? Don’t you want to be sure you continue to beat her?”

“What kind of talk is that?”

“Lonely talk, I guess,” Luther said.

“Well, cut it out.”

“What I really mean is that you should be going toward the sun, not away from it. But the trick is not to get your wings burned off so then you have to fall dead to the earth.”

“Luther, just tell me what you are trying to say.”

“Some feeling of coldness came over me. That’s all. Like we’re not anywhere near the sun but on a desolate plain and the wind is whipping and the fire has gone out.

Maybe the kind of feeling you have on a Sunday night and none of your homework has gotten done.”

“My homework never got done.”

“That’s because you didn’t know anything about order.”

“I know a lot more about it than you, Mr. Crazy Man.”

“The way you talk,” Luther said, the anger throttle beginning to turn. “I just thought you might like to connect with her. That’s all. Maybe expand a little. Have a friend.”

“Where are your friends? In some bar?”

“So don’t see her. Do whatever you want to do.”

“Did I say I wouldn’t see her?”

“I don’t know what you said.”

“Why don’t you ask Doctor Rosner what I said? He could be my interpreter.”

“I’m tired of Dr. Rosner. I want to be rid of him. There’s something wrong with such a relationship, even if I can’t articulate it.”

“But you were having so much trouble. That’s why you went to him in the first place.”

“That was then. These shrinks. All they ever do is talk.”

“And you don’t?”

“Sure. Sure I do.”

“Isn’t that the point?”

“I don’t know. It’s money. Always with the money. They should have a meter running, like taxi drivers, while you sit there with them.”

“What else would you do with the money? Drink?”

“Hey.”

“Dr. Frodkey says you could become dangerous.”

“Don’t be using Dr. Frodkey against me. I don’t need that kind of talk.”

“What’s happening with your Times job?”

“Shit. Shit is happening. It’s a mental ward. All the misfits of Manhattan calling people to ask if they would like a suscription.”

“A what?”

“Never mind.”

“Well, I’ll call Carola. She has been on my mind,” Sarah said.

Luther did not clap his hands, Sarah having mauled him pretty good, practically calling him, not for the first time, a drunk and a potential murderer. And he particularly didn’t like that crack about his friends being in the bars. He didn’t want her there, in his place of freedom, with her words or in any way. A man needed a place he could escape to without someone’s hand reaching in for him, as if his world was nothing more than a doll’s house for her to do with as she would.

The next day Sarah swung into action and spoke with Carola Aprile. Evidently, Carola’s situation with Hunger Longing was not as Luther had established it in his mind. Carola Aprile did not live in a loft with Hunger Longing and she did not live with Hunger Longing anywhere. What they had was two separate apartments in the same building, and each day Carola Aprile went off to the loft where she painted but did not live. Sarah set Luther straight about the arrangement Carola Aprile and Hunger Longing had worked out.

How? Because when she called Carola Aprile at her apartment, she did not get her friend. Instead she got Hunger Longing, who told her Carola Aprile was at the loft doing her painting. Sarah then called Carola Aprile at the loft and mentioned Hunger Longing's presence in her apartment, at which point Carola Aprile did not raise up on Hunger Longing; however, she did remark that she wished Hunger Longing could stay in his own apartment when she was not in hers but she had come to accept that Hunger Longing had needs and restraint was more than he could be expected to summon. And in that moment did Luther fall down on the floor in his mind's eye, brought to that place by the realization that he and Hunger Longing were alike in their fundamental neediness.

Carola Aprile lunged at the chance to be with Sarah. It did not matter that Carola Aprile was now the one with the loft while Sarah was consigned to an East Village apartment and a cramped studio with a windowsill caked with pigeon poop. Beacons of hope exist where they are, and Carola Aprile had a honing device on high alert for them.

"You don't have to worry. I'm not going to talk about anything personal. I'm going to keep it to my work," Sarah said to Luther before her meeting with Carola Aprile.

"What things personal are you talking about?" Luther asked.

"I'm not going to spill the beans. Is that clearer?"

Luther had no answer for Sarah, not one, given the crushing weight of anxiety that her words had suddenly summoned. He had only wanted for Sarah and Carola Aprile to get together on a friendly and mutually supportive basis, regardless of the silly way he had expressed himself in the restaurant. He had heard the Young Rascals' song, "I've Been Lonely Too Long," and he did not want for Sarah to perish of that loneliness in their East Village apartment. She was his personal Bill Walton. He wanted her among the living so he too could live. He needed now to vacate the premises so Sarah could be alone with Carola Aprile so they could have their powwow, their heart-to-heart, with everything on the table. They would bond and Carola Aprile would tell Sarah to get out while she could. And so the city, even as he wandered through it, became his detention center, like the schoolroom he had been quarantined in back in sixth grade after tossing the rolls of toilet paper from the second floor bathroom at the nuns as they walked double file down the street. Only now his mother wouldn't be coming to take him home after her consultation with the reverend mother, having been informed that the school had no choice but to expel him. Now he would be all on his own.

And that word beans. She would spill the beans. That was it. Female power equaled the women on the hills with the baked beans.

"So?" he said, when he returned that night, relieved that Carola Aprile had not overdone her stay.

"So what?" Sarah replied, as she washed some dishes and placed them in the rack.

"So how was the powwow? Did the beans get spilled?"

"What beans are you talking about, Luther? She came over for a nice visit and went back home to Brooklyn."

“What beans? The beans you were talking about to me. That’s what beans I’m talking about.”

“We had a nice time. That’s all that happened. OK?”

“We’ll see,” Luther said. “We’ll see if it’s OK. I’m stepping out. Is that OK? Or are you going to have me arrested?”

“You just got here,” Sarah said.

“I just need some air. Don’t be policing me. Don’t be doing that.”

“Do what you have to do,” Sarah said.

Now Celeste, Courvoisier is a four-syllable word that reeks of false elegance, and yet I called its name several times that night, after prepping myself with beer and scotch and so spent money I no longer had the deep pockets to throw around in that bar on Waverly Place. But freedom requires effort, and if we cannot race to the ends of the earth, we can at least descend to the bottom of the bottle, and if we are contained within it in the process, so be it, as it feels like we are flying the flag of liberation. And that freedom is what our country has always been about. The unexplored wilderness. Don’t fence me in. All of which, I hear you and countless others saying, is nothing more than a lot of blather in defense of drunkenness. But I was not done with alcohol, and alcohol was not done with me.

On this night in which I cast myself to the winds of oblivion, a story idea came to me in which a man tries to make a prostitute respond to him while her pimp sits in the next room. No, it has not been written, but that doesn’t mean it won’t be. Freedom cannot be a finite thing, and death cannot be love.

Now Celeste, I understand that the above does not cut the mustard. I hear the universe's reproach. I hear the angry, demanding voice it raises to me. "What is this fuss about Courvoisier? Why not let things and people be? Why not tend to your own business, cultivate your own garden, you hyperbolic, self-pitying wretch? Why must you molest everything and everyone, including yourself?" And hear it further say, "What's that you say? You were born as you were born, and must go in the direction your nature takes you? Is your defense of calumny, of lies, that you are merely a flower bending toward the sun? Spare us your heliotrope bullshit, mister." But hear me out, Celeste. Hear me out. I let neither man nor universe raise up on me, nor those mysterious presences that take up residence within my being. I do what I do and go where I go, and let that be the final word, or let me say that it is, even if it isn't.

Now Celeste, we spent that weekend at Camp. Maggio Capici and his wife, Sally, also came up from the city. Though they were welcome to stay over, they rented a room in town. Claire was also there for the weekend, and the attraction Maggio and she had for each other remained palpable. Maggio, as was noted at the time of Lenore's death, was a man who enjoyed earthly pleasures. He was a man of much natural power whose role in life as a penal guard was less than his aptitudes qualified him for and, as discussed, a man with great insecurities. Though by this time he had revealed how he made his living, he still came to the Van Dines as a child seeking their approval. Conflict will always exist between our higher and lower natures, and there was a fair amount of break-your-bones violence in Maggio's world. In the confines of Riker's Island he was sometimes called upon to beat and beat on what he perceived as a criminal underclass. He operated far from the ivory tower .

We have noted before that Claire was, like mainland China, a rising power, and that she was seeking hegemony over Maggio Capici with the full capture of his sybaritic heart. She was warmed by his satyr's gleam and wanted his full and sensual lips and the hidden apparatus that she intuited was commensurate with his bulk and brawn. She also saw that Sally was a woman with the look of the downtrodden in her sad, cocaine-blitzed eyes—the orgies, the serial husbands, the teenage son she shared responsibility for with her ex. Sally's sense of herself as a potential discard only worsened in the presence of radiant and much younger Claire.

And yet something happened that weekend. The subject of rape came up in an evening discussion. A young man had been alleged to have violated a woman on a first date. After dinner at a restaurant, he had walked her home and asked if he could come in to use her bathroom. Having gained access with this subterfuge, he then made advances that she resisted and forcibly had his way, according to the testimony of the woman in the trial that followed. The man professed his innocence and suggested that the plaintiff was either delusional or simply lying. He added that in fact it was she who had shown herself to be of lascivious intent and to possess an insatiable sexual appetite. If anyone had been attacked, it had been him—not that he was complaining, mind you, he said, with a smile on his face. But the smile did not remain when the jury delivered a verdict of guilty. A cry of protest and of outrage was now his offering to the courtroom as officers of the court led him away.

“Frankly, I’m glad the jury socked it to the creep,” Claire declared. Perhaps it was the adamancy of her expression that raised the hackles of Maggio Capici and dimmed the love light in his eyes.

“Hold on. Just hold on,” Maggio Capici said, but as further words were slow to come, it was not entirely clear to the gathered what they were holding on for. All that could be perceived was that a drastic alteration in Maggio Capici’s demeanor had occurred. But Celeste, my listening devices were keenly tuned in. Claire had hit him in his vitals and the beast in him was rising. The thing to note about Maggio Capici is that he was a he-man, not a she-man. Now listen, Celeste, listen. At the same time Maggio Capici was no fool. Maggio Capici did not wear his hair like heaven; in fact, by his early twenties, he was balding. But he understood that times had changed. He had a finger to put to the wind and knew, like all who weren’t Cro-Magnon in their persuasion, that sensitivity was in and brute force was out. But some things hadn’t changed. The fine line between consensual sex and forced sex was one of them. The truth was that he identified with the convicted man. Sex being his domain, what he heard were the jury and Claire rendering a verdict on his whole way of life. “I’ve been in a similar situation dozens, maybe hundreds, of times. Why should that jury have believed one person and not the other? Where were the witnesses?”

“Rape is not generally a public act. It’s not like stealing off with a woman’s handbag in public,” Claire replied.

“What about other evidence? Where were the bruise marks or other signs of coercion?”

It was too late for Maggio Capici to pull back. His fear and anger had gained momentum and compelled him forward. He had tried so hard to be suave and charming and subtly flirtatious with Claire. Still, being sensitive didn't mean he had to cut off his balls, did it?

"There was medical testimony by the doctor who examined her in the emergency room that night," Claire said coolly.

Sometimes we lose face, Celeste. Sometimes it happens. Maggio Capici was not a lout. He was trying to grow. But he became defensive and reacted as if he were on trial himself. Resentment took him over. Who were the Van Dines, with their cushy lives, to judge a man like him, on the front lines doing their dirty work to keep the criminals from murdering them in their beds? Because they weren't sitting back in silent judgment of him for the rape thing only but for his whole life. They were connecting the dots. A man of physical force and persuasion was in their midst.

Now we must go elsewhere, Celeste, with our listening devices. We must return to Manhattan, where Luke was in a state of distress. More, he was exceeding wrath. He had put in for a raise with Harry Stavigros, who now oversaw the management of the building, but my mother told him to stop his foolishness and to be grateful for what he was being given. She told him Harry Stavigros could have him out on the street just like that, and snapped her fingers to drive home the point. It didn't sit right with Luke that she should speak in such a manner. All his life she had sought to infect him with a meekness that would take him nowhere in a world she might not want but in which he had to live. That he should have a father involved with God but not with him and a mother who too had her eyes on heaven rather than earth, that neither of them had commanded him to embrace this life and take what he wanted and what he needed. He saw in that moment that he had been conditioned to remain a boy with no clear means of becoming a man.

Men wanting to be more than they were. Is that in itself so bad, Celeste? Is it?

“The sun was killing me,” the woman on the bus said, explaining her move to the man she now sat next to.

“In that case I’m sorry you didn’t remain,” the man said.

“Aren’t you something?” she replied.

A heavysset man boarded the bus and stood over the irascible passenger.

“You after my seat, Fatso?” the man asked.

“Don’t call me Fatso.”

“You are a fat Fatso,” the man said. “What should I call you, Slim?”

“You’re lucky I don’t punch you in the face,” the man who was standing said as he moved away.

A man carrying a big manila envelope boarded at the next stop and sat next to the insulting man. His pants were soiled and he had liquor on his breath.

The man with the mouth started sniffing the air in an ostentatious way.

“What is that stink?” he asked, with feigned perplexity. “Could it be the rose of Sharon?” He cast a sideways glance. “Oh, surprise. It’s El Blotto, the town drunk, himself.”

“What’s up, Pops? You got yourself one of those death wishes or something? Least you could do, if you gonna shit out your mouth, is wipe it afterward.”

“Is that so?” the mouth asked.

“It’s so if I say it’s so. Now why you don’t just shut it down while I catch me some serious winks unless you want me to check you out on the express line?”

Either the mouth was going to get off or Luther was going to get off, as he could not deal with bearing witness to slashing and gashing. When the mouth showed no sign of relocating, Luther bolted, and walked the last ten blocks to Dr. Rosner’s office, his ears alert for the wail of police and ambulance sirens.

Minutes later he was in the tiny waiting room of Dr. Rosner’s office. A feeling of comfort, even happiness, came over him, as when he was a child he would cross the street and enter the building of order and sit flip through the National Geographic’s in Dr. Edelbaum’s office waiting for the French doors to open and the doctor, stethoscope dangling from his neck, to invite him in. The Jews were who you turned to for care and protection in a threatening and violent world. They did not sit on buses making rude, provocative remarks, nor did they threaten to carve you like a turkey. Once again it struck him what a gift intelligence was in its power to elevate the mind to a higher purpose.

A woman emerged, carrying a Capezio bag. The previous week it had been a Bloomingdale’s bag.

“She has shopping prowess,” Luther said, to begin the session.

“What does that mean?” Dr. Rosner said.

“It means she has money to walk around with big bags.”

“How is your money situation?”

“Not good.”

“What are you doing about it?”

“I’m trying to sell the New York Times to people who don’t want it,” Luther said.

“Are you looking for work?”

“Didn’t I just say that I have a job?”

“I believe you know what I mean by a job. What’s behind this feigned obtuseness?”

“Are you saying the Times is mendacious in offering me a job that is not really a job?”

““Look, what’s really going on here?” Dr. Rosner queried. Steam was coming from his ears.

“You tell me. You’re the doctor.”

“Do you want help or not?”

“Do I want help or not.” Luther repeated the words as if he was actually considering them.

“You’re not an enigma.”

“Haven’t you told me that previously?”

“It bears repeating.”

“Do you want to beat me? Is that it? Do you wish to break my bones in different places?”

“What is it with this peculiar speech? What is driving it?”

“I’m waiting.”

“Waiting?”

“Waiting for you to tell me.”

Dr. Rosner held his silence. So too did Luther. Finally, Dr. Rosner said, “Do you want me to tell you that you are beyond human help? Is that it?”

“It hadn’t occurred to me,” Luther replied.

“You have a master’s degree. You have your ticket. Why don’t you apply for a job in publishing?” Dr. Rosner asked, not for the first time.

“I don’t know,” Luther said.

“Is it fear?”

“I suppose it is. How would I possibly fit in? Who would want me?”

“How can you find out unless you ask?”

“Power. It’s associated in my mind with power.”

“How so?”

“They beat me down. They hit me with their stick. Hit my ‘White Line, Continue’ manuscript. Threw it out on the street. Wiped their butts with its pages. How can I go to such people?”

“Maybe by looking at things a different way.”

“A different way?”

“What do you have to lose?”

“Something.”

“Something?”

“Right. Maybe that something is your isolation?”

“Don’t call my domain my isolation. Don’t do that.”

“Domain?”

“I. Me. I am my domain. I exist where I am.”

“Not if you don’t have the means to feed yourself.”

“Yes, yes, feed the face first. So you have instructed me.”

“Are you afraid? Is that it?”

“What would I be afraid of?”

“People?”

“The way you talk.”

Now Celeste, I was more compliant than this account would lead you to believe. It was not my way to belch fire, even a short burst of flame, at Dr. Rosner. I was far too timid and scared. He was, at this point, my lifeline, and so I could not afford to alienate him. If there was volatility beneath the surface and even murderous intent, such feelings had to be suppressed. Do not ask me why I exaggerate. We all have a need to feel good, to see ourselves as we are not. Is this a sufficiently candid explanation to ward off the mendacity police?

He called home after the session. Sarah was in tears. She was losing her hair. Her doctor had said as much.

“It’s just as you dreamt. Why did you have to go and have that dream?” Sarah asked.

“What dream?”

“You dreamt I was bald. You said that in the dream you woke and I was sitting up in bed and my head was completely bald and luminous.”

It was true. There had been such a dream, and it had unnerved him. In fact her hair had changed. It had become stiffer, more coarse, dull, like straw, in the way it looked if not felt. And so a sense of prophecy attached to the dream. Not that he presented the dream in prophetic terms when he shared it with her on waking but just as an image she might find interesting.

“Oh, that,” he said. “A dream is a dream. You have your hair.”

“Not for long I won’t.” She continued to cry.

“Please, Sarah. Don’t.” It was hard for him to hear her cry. It sent him back to a place he didn’t want to be. His mother weeping, asking through her tears what she had done to deserve such children as she had tried to raise. Feelings that made him want to die and then die some more came over him. The crushing weight of the responsibility for Sarah’s happiness. The same weight he had felt applied to him when he saw his mother so sad and hurt. He loved Sarah. He really did, with his better self. No, with his whole self he loved her. Her unhappiness wouldn’t affect him so deeply were it otherwise.

“I need you to pick up a vitamin he recommended. Can you do that? And we need a quart of milk. I ran out of money.”

That too sounded sad. The idea of Sarah with empty pockets. “What kind of vitamin?” he asked.

“He wants me to take a B-complex vitamin, but be sure it has biotin.”

Biotin. He would get her her vitamins and her milk. He would get her the things she needed. He had to. He couldn't allow a dream to become a reality—that word again.

He got her the things she needed, but if she needed him for anything more, he was, as the Zombies had sung, not there. He went to the bar on Spring Street, where he drank with abandon and walked out with a woman more beautiful than any he had a right to engage with, even as her female companion shrieked in protest and offered a warning about his kind, the kind of reaction he had, of course, heard before.

They wandered down toward the river and climbed the grade to an abandoned and elevated stretch of weedy, garbage-strewn highway. Nesting on the cobblestones with their bundled possessions, hobos stared up at them. Even drunk, the nostalgic tug of the old and forsaken lifted. A rising sense of panic gripped him. He saw that he had placed himself and the girl, beautiful but even more drunk and drugged than he was, in danger, and visualized them as a page four item in the Daily News. The men, some of them, might have lost their way in the world, but not their libidos.

Luther took her arm and led her down the first exit ramp, even as looking back, he saw two of the men following after. They weren't hot-footing it, at least not yet. At street level a cab with its light on happened by. From the back seat he looked out the rear window. "I'm sorry. I placed you in harm's way," he said.

"Don't talk to me in clichés," she said, and gave the driver directions, showing a capacity for clarity in the fog of her own making.

"Sorry," Luther said.

The ride was a short one, to the West Village. “You can come up. I feel safe with you.”

“But I placed you in danger,” Luther said.

“Please,” she said.

The apartment was lined with shelves holding books arranged in alphabetical order.

“Are these books yours?”

“They’re his.”

“His? Where is this his?”

“He’s away. That’s where he is. A place where he can’t get back here from tonight.”

“Who are you in relation to him?”

“I’m his lover until I say I’m not.”

He should have known she lived with a man. She was too beautiful and irresponsible not to.

“What do you do?”

“Whatever I please.”

“No. I mean, what do you do do?”

“Is that English?”

She had been busying herself with some white powder, separating it into two thin lines on a hand mirror. She snorted a line up her nostril.

“Here you go,” she said, lifting the mirror to him.

“What is this?”

“Where have you been? What do you think it is?”

“Is it heroin?”

“It’s cocaine.”

“Will it do me death to do it?”

“Has it done me death?”

“No, no. You are very much among the living.”

He remembered getting burned at the disco and being relieved that the powder was nothing more than baking soda. “I’d better not,” he said.

She took the mirror back from him and snorted the line herself. But there were other aids for his comfort. There was bourbon and there was grass, and if he had been unable to touch the cocaine, after a time he was unable not to touch her.

She showed no resistance to his hands. How silky her hair, how smooth and responsive her body. On one side of the bed hung a garter belt, on the other a whip. And yet, the feast was too much for him.

He wandered, stoned and drunk, to the window, drawn by the fire escape.

“Are you crazy? This is a Mafia-controlled block. They’ll kill you if you go out there naked.” She brought him back to earth, made him see he would be disrespecting the men of the Mafia and their families if he showed himself in the buff. Sal and Vinnie and Guido and all those who had only the hardness of their Italian ways would drag him to a rooftop and throw him off or slowly drain him of his life’s blood. In one way or another would they bring him to a painful end. Twice in one night he had gone toward death and been spared. It was something to ponder, even if he was now in smoke and bourbon heaven and such musing might bring him down.

But Diane De Angelo—that was her name—had darkness of her own. Her brother was no more, lost to heroin. She could not forgive herself for not saving him on the night it happened, or forgive Albertini, Frankie’s supposedly best friend, for hitting on her that same night and she to her horror, letting him have his wanton way, Albertini saying to her over and over that he loved her and would take care of her.

Diane De Angelo had fallen weeping to the floor, and now Luther felt himself becoming the repugnant Albertini as he stood over her, saying he wanted to save her and that they were meant to be together because he had a sister of his own who had been deceased from the earth and others who were not long for it. He did not say that he loved her because she wore sunglasses in the dark or had a head-to-toe tan or that the curve of her hips and the round firmness of her butt and the small red heart-shaped tattoo on it that served as a beacon were riveting. He would prove his love and that he was not exploitative Albertini. A door had opened into a new life, and he didn’t want it to close, even as he understood that it would, because a woman with her endowment, how was he to hold on to her, even in the best of times?

The lights were on, the clock said 3:30 am, and Sarah was sitting up in bed when he returned home that night.

“Where have you been, bastard? Who’d you screw tonight, skinny dick?”

Bastard. Skinny dick. He had no energy to take issue with her words. But there were eggs, six of them, which he took from the refrigerator in their cardboard carton. One by one, he lobbed the eggs against the wall, as her interrogation continued, until the eggs were gone and so were her words and only tears remained.

Now Celeste, you may say all was lost and I really deserved to be dismissed for such wanton betrayal, but sometimes we have to descend to the bottom to arrive at the top and so, from that perspective, the work I was engaged in was totally meaningful and part of the master plan to get me to the place of peace. It happened in this year that America was going crazy in the sunlight of its own spirit and called on the nations of the world to order its tall ships to set sail and enter our waterways in acknowledgment and admiration of all that we have achieved in our two centuries of existence. And so that Fourth of July by the thousands did people come to greet and marvel at these ships of old with masts and in celebrating them celebrate themselves, and no one was more eager to be part of this landmark event than Peter Van Dine, having it in his awareness as he did that history was in the making in the present moment and that it was imperative he be on the lookout for this history at all times so it didn't slip past him and he be drowned in the currents of his own forgetfulness.

But Luther was not drawn to Op Sail. He did not much care about the waters of the earth or the ships that sailed on them. He had his personal history to tend to, and that day he woke feeling sullen and sorry for himself. The Van Dines had called to Sarah and him to join them for the spectacle of the vessels with their many masts, but he wanted to meet their good cheer with withdrawal, as when he holed up in the renovated barn at Camp that first summer. Besides, after the holiday Sarah would tell Dr. Frodkey about his disappearance and tossing the eggs and he would put his foot down and virtually order her to leave. The committee of the righteous would have their say and justice would be served, as truly it needed to be, as there was only one way to deal with his type, Luther understood.

As the morning progressed Luther rallied and stepped with Sarah into the bright light of day and met with the Van Dines, but the cars of America were too many and the tourists on foot were too many for Peter to remain in Manhattan. He declared the hulls of modern vessels rather prosaic as he drove up the river to Tarrytown, in flight from the mob. Prosaic. What an amazing word to apply to the hull of a ship. How literary. Not the sort of word Luther could ever summon.

Beastly heat, endless driving, tall ships arriving in a new world that seemed to be ending, not beginning, and pangs of hunger and an urgent need for a bathroom as Peter tried for an hour to find a restaurant he had his heart set on. No, no, better for Luther to stay home than venture where he had no true desire to go.

Over a late lunch, Peter took them into his personal history. “When I was a boy there were two things I wanted: a lamb and a pair of overalls. Parents don’t know what psychological effect the failure to deliver on gifts promised has on their children.”

“You should tell all, everything,” Luther said. “You should let us know.”

“What? The things you say, Luther.” Peter cried out.

“No, no, it’s true. Where you’ve been, what happened, and where you are now.”

“Writing is as much about leaving out than putting in if it is to be effective,” Peter said, “and facts must rule the day.”

“Must you be so dogmatic, dear? Luther is offering something thoughtful and you come down with a sledgehammer,” Lydia said.

“I would like to build a wall of facts around anarchy, so the worms can’t get out, but then, worms have a purpose too,” Luther said.

“How is your own writing going, dear?” Lydia asked.

“All of this will be in my book. You can be sure of that.”

“The naked transcription of event?” Lydia asked.

“We have to go where death cannot find us,” Luther said.

“What a strange thing to say,” Lydia replied, with more surprise than judgment.

“All my life I have wanted to go north. I have felt an almost physical pull,” Luther said. “Not that I have gotten very far. But when my journey begins, it will take me through these parts, and then I hope I will have the courage to lay my head down next to but not on the railroad tracks that run along the river.”

In an obvious attempt to change the subject, Lydia said, “Claire has a new boyfriend. He’s very bright as well as combative, but that is to be expected, I suppose, as he is a lawyer.”

“He definitely embraces the system,” Peter said.

“What does that mean?” Sarah asked.

“He’s a federal prosecutor,” Lydia said.

“He should prosecute Maggio for his bad behavior last weekend,” Sarah said.

“What bad behavior?” Lydia asked.

“His dumb comments about rape not being rape. The man was just horny for Claire. Don’t you see the way he moons over her whenever he and Sally come to visit.”

“Maggio and Sally are good friends of ours. He has a sensitive side and took what Claire said personally. He wants to be seen in a good light by us. We represent something to him,” Lydia said.

How confident she was of her power, Luther thought, seeing, as she did, guests trying to win the favor of the Van Dines. And yet, with her heated observation, Sarah had entered a sensitive area. Lydia had a secret that wasn’t so secret. The marriage bed had become a place of frustration, not pleasure. It could not be easy for her to hear that Maggio, a contemporary, was forsaking her for a younger woman, especially when that younger woman was her daughter. Not that she didn’t know. She knew everything. But to be reminded in such a bald, crude way. Was it not just like Sarah to crash into her world with the same emphatic tone that Peter employed when he was in denunciation of the world he could not be a part of? What was it to have a child, Jung’s shadow self, so irrevocably turned against her?

The next evening Peter was calling them out for more, and so they came with blankets and binoculars to the landfill near the World Trade Center to witness the fireworks extravaganza. But again the overwhelming crowd, and with it, the fear of violence. Luther could only hope that the rockets bursting overhead into multicolored showers would serve as a pacifier, not a goad to mayhem. Peter was not used to the give and take of a jostling crowd. Already he had shown annoyance that a Puerto Rican family had been wanting to share the loud Latin sounds pouring from their portable radio.

By the end of the spectacle, Luther had begun to experience some internal agitation, a stirring in his bowels he was desperate to repress, unless he wished to go potty in front of the multitudes. In desperation, he burst forward in a broken field run into a thronged restaurant. Seeing the viciousness of the universe on display in the form of a maliciously dawdling occupier of the only stall, he had no choice but to drop his drawers and treat the two men coming in behind him to a fireworks display of his own. A real stink bomb he let loose into the garbage can before the astonished witnesses and ran out, holding his unclasped pants as he went, but not before shouting, “That’s all I’ve got. I give what I can.”

On the streets of Little Italy ash cans, rockets, cherry bombs, Roman candles—more modest eruptions of color and sound, the community having its own private celebration in competition with the bigger show and unwilling, like the Mafia, to blend into the larger entity. In his mind’s eye he walked like a little girl so all those inclined toward savagery would place their instinct for brutality on hold as he passed them by.

“What happened to you? You just ran off,” Sarah said, when he arrived home.

‘I went where my bowels took me. Your father had his bombing runs over Germany and I had mine over a garbage can in the crowded bathroom of a crowded restaurant.’

“Speak to me, Luther.”

“There was a high degree of maliciousness in the occupant of the one stall, who had installed himself. There are consequences for such dawdling viciousness, and so I let loose. Sometimes we must let the other end speak for us.”

“Good thinking, Luther. Good thinking.”

That night he dreamt that Bill Walton was wearing pancake makeup and little red and orange stars on his face. The stars and the state of California they represented evoked sadness. Luther's spirits rallied when he became part of a basketball team. However, Mr. Sadowski, his high school coach, had been replaced by a woman. When Luther got to the locker room he found that his uniform had been confiscated. He went to the new coach, who told him he was being penalized for unspecified infractions. As they spoke, she had a change of heart. And so he suited up, only to realize that he had left his sneakers at home. Still, all was not lost. The woman presented him with a pair of high-top black sneakers, saying the color would keep it clear in everyone's mind who he was.

It happened that the following day he got to meet Claire's new beau at the apartment of the Van Dines. Cedric Shoalton was his name, and Luther saw that he was strong in body as well as mind, with muscular arms and legs that bent the fabric of his clothes to their will and a handshake capable of breaking bones. Luther also saw that the two kept themselves apart from the others and were sick with the sickness of love, though to his eye Cedric appeared to be the more seriously ailing. He wanted to warn Cedric that Claire would put the hurt on him. Already it had been established in her mind that he needed her more than she needed him. She would never, ever, take the marriage vow, as she was not built to surrender to a man but to swing him over her head like a towel.

Luther could say these things because by now, Claire had a history he could use for reference. He had seen how she had put the clobber on Brian, her longtime boyfriend, moving him out of the way in order to give herself to someone named Dolph, who complimented her frequently on her bush (this according to Sarah). She downgraded Brian to standby status, kept him close, made him her lapdog. Without a father present in his life, he had no power source.

After a few days Luther called to Diane De Angelo because he had to see more clearly what it was he had found and whether it was still there. He could not let go of a woman with a golden tan and a cherry red tattoo on her butt who had done all the things she had done for him that night, biting his ear lobes and sucking on his nipples and his meager apparatus, not letting go until the job was done. Her resolute way stayed in his mind and fueled a burning desire.

I am drowning in sex, Luther thought. I have grown even softer and more sentimental. I sing along with Jackson Browne and Linda Ronstadt. All meanness exorcised, sucked from my bones. I want to live and die for this woman who goes without underwear through the streets of Manhattan and lives with a man who is never home.

She answered his call. She did not dodge him or present herself behind a wall of indifference. But she did warn him that complexity was building. The woman friend of hers who had cried out that Luther was, essentially, nothing more than a hanging string turned out to have her own designs on Diane's body.

“How do you mean?” Luther asked.

“She came over the day after I saw you, and as I was taking a bath she took off her clothes and joined me, and it didn't stop there. She says she loves me and I mustn't see you anymore, that whatever affliction of the spirit grips you I will catch as well if we continue to see each other. She says you are insufferable and insulting.”

“But I can help you. I am more than my face. I am worlds unknown even to myself.”

“I don’t know, Luther. You talk so much, like you are trying to lasso me with your words. Besides, I am going out to the Hamptons with Gwen to stay at her weekend home. You are very pale. You should think of the sun as well.”

“Gwen? Gwen? The name itself raises serious concern. It has the sound of cold porridge on it.”

“She works with Andy Warhol and says she wants to photograph you. She says your gaunt face would fit in nicely in the album of maniacs she is putting together.”

“Mlle. Gamahuche says that, does she?”

“Mlle. who?”

“Never mind. What is this place of viciousness from which she speaks?”

“She’s not being vicious. She has a vision.”

“When are you going? How can I save you if you are not here?”

But his talk availed him nothing. His lasso missed the mark. And to think that he had stroked her hair and been tender with her in his way. Still, he could not find fault. Her beauty was the ticket she had been born with. If the number of rides on that ticket had their limit, it had not been reached yet.

Celeste, it is not overnight that we become bodhisattvas. Pain must have its way before we see that we are not a body and we are free.

The apartment was no longer tolerable. It was imperative that they elevate above the station they now occupied. This ordinariness is too much abounding, Luther said to himself. It is in me and around me. I am being flattened to the dimensions of death, with no hope for revival. In this he took to heart the soulful sound of the Righteous Brothers' "You've Lost That Loving Feeling." He had lost that loving feeling for himself, the sense that he was involved in a mystery with new doors opening all the time, or was he only idealizing his time with Sarah at the Chinatown loft?

I will go where I can go, and do what I can do. I will let money be my agent of magic, the little I have left, and buy myself back to the place of happiness I have regretfully forsaken. I will be a prosperous nation in my own estimation once again. I will be America with its manifest destiny intact. I will not be broken down to a backwater status. I will not lie down in this coffin posing as an apartment any longer, nor will Sarah, my beloved Sarah. This too Luther thought, with the power available to his struggling mind.

On a sun-filled day he headed west onto the Bowery and bought a loft, that is, for three thousand dollars he bought the fixtures and with them, the right to rent the space. Love was love. It needed no other name, he understood, standing in the 1500-foot square space on the second floor of a small walkup building with a peaked roof just half a block north of Houston Street. The loft was sectioned into three main areas: fully one-third was a studio, with an east light pouring in through two large windows; a carpeted living area, and toward the rear, a dining and kitchen area, where a loft bed had been built. The best of both worlds would be available to Sarah: ample studio space plus domestic amenities, such as a stove and a bathroom with a door. As for Luther, he could set up a little office for himself right under the loft bed. Oh boy, he could not wait.

The man selling the loft was Marc Gitall, and he had clearly powered up for his life. One year after divesting himself of his lucrative Wall Street investment firm to heed the call of art, he was showing simultaneously in three prestigious galleries around town while also exhibiting in London, Rome, and Paris. Marc Gitall, by his own admission, was flying. That was the very word he used. He had already committed to a loft in SoHo three times the size of the one he was now leaving so he could bring in assistants to help him process his work, citing the need to move things along and get pieces out. “Got to move that freight. Got to move it,” Marc Gitall said.

“That is so wonderful.”

“How about you, Luther? Are you off-loading your cargo, too?” When Luther stared at him blankly, Marc Gitall said, “What kind of art do you do, anyway?” To this point he had chosen to regard Luther as an equal, but now doubt was casting a sudden shadow.

“I do white line continue art, only it is not art as such,” Luther said. “It is more the transcription of event each day till I don’t have to do it anymore and can walk around in peace and with a studied air of innocence so a beating is not inflicted on my person.”

“Who would want to beat you?”

“That is the question, is it not? Who indeed? Perhaps these monsters will show their faces within the timeframe of eternity.”

“Well, look, Luther, you seem like an aboveboard chap. I think we should be able to do a deal. Will you be living here by yourself?”

“Not at all. There is one whose art has been calling her forward since long before art began to call to me. In fact, the calling of her art to her was what called my art to me when we met, if I am making myself clear.”

Luther returned with Sarah the next day.

“The bounty of America, Sarah. The bounty of America,” he said en route, and when she saw the loft for herself she did not disagree. It was something for him to make her happy, when he had made her so sad.

Next it was for them to meet with the owner of the building, a Mr. Ben Leponowitz, so he could give them his seal of approval. They had only to head three blocks south on the Bowery, to a restaurant supply store that Mr. Leponowitz had been the owner of for over thirty years.

“The Bowery really does remind me of Paris,” Sarah said, en route.

“What part of Paris would that be?” Luther asked. “Are the sozzled in great numbers to be found sprawled and caked in their own filth on the Champs Elysee and under the Arc de Triomphe?” Because the fallen were all about, not only those who were slumped to the hot pavement but those stumbling about. And then there were the cleaned up drunks standing idle in ill-fitting clothes outside the Salvation Army building.

“I meant the wideness of the boulevard reminds me of Paris,” Sarah said.

Industrial size cooking ranges and food storage units, double urns such as you saw behind the counters of restaurants, giant pots and pans, durable dinnerware—there was nothing Ben Leponiwitz didn't know about the business to which he had given his life. But he was old now and tired. The winter months he was spending in Florida he was looking to extend. God's waiting room, Mr. Leponowitz called it, a startling term new to Luther's ears. Who would want to live in the anteroom of death? Or was the question, who wouldn't? Wasn't the Bowery the anteroom of death as well?

"Mark Rothko lived down here in one of my buildings. Can you believe it? I have a big room full of his discards, paintings he would throw out the window and into the backyard," Ben Leponowitz said.

"They could be valuable," Luther said. "You could have a room full of gold," Luther said.

"The art world don't work that way," Ben Leponowitz replied. "You either hit the ball into the seats or you head back to the dugout."

Luther heard Ben Leponowitz to be saying that he knew a lot and that he had come by his knowledge the hard way, without the benefit of school or any of that, with his insertion of a plural contraction where the singular was supposed to go, and by complementing his war on the grammatical with a gruffness of tone to signify the harsh reality of the world.

"But he was his severest critic. Maybe the art world will be more generous in its assessment than he was," Sarah said.

"You never know," Ben Leponowitz said, taking a softer tone with Sarah than he had with Luther.

“I like his bands of color,” Luther said. “They nurture me. I feel like I receive them or they receive me, or something like that. They change. I see that there is more to them than I first thought. They open doors of possibility in a cloud of mystery. As they change, I change too, moving inward as well as outward. A feeling of great joy overcomes me, despite the muted, somber quality of the paintings.”

If Ben Leponowitz heard him, it was with severity showing in his thin, birdlike face.

“You must be the artist,” Ben Leponowitz said, turning to Sarah. ”I can tell by your hands.”

“We are both artists,” Sarah said, allowing unity to be her guide.

“What she means is that—” Luther began but was stopped by the look of disapproval from Sarah. He had wanted to say a few more words about “White Line Continue” but deferred to her unspoken wisdom.

Diane De Angelo was not finished with him, or he was not finished with her. In the bar on Spring Street he joined her at the table where she was seated with her woman friend.

“If I knew your name, I’ve forgotten it,” Luther said to the other woman. “I can only think of you as She-Who-Likes-To-Take-Baths-Together.”

“Luther, don’t.” Diane said.

“Didn’t I tell you he is obnoxious and insulting? He’s also drunk,” the woman said. Her hair was blond and cut short. She had fire in her face and Andy Warhol in her resume.

He allowed himself to be driven off, and yet the next day there was Diane De Angelo again, entering a deli on University Place as he was leaving.

“Funny seeing each other in daylight hours,” Luther said. “Guess it proves we are not vampires.”

“That wasn’t very nice what you said to Ellen last night. You got me in a whole lot of trouble with her. She said I had no business telling you her business with me, and I guess she is right.”

“Maybe you told me because you needed to tell me.”

“Ellen is fine. She’s just Ellen. But she can be a bit bossy and mean.”

“Is that what you want? A mean boss?”

“Don’t put words in my mouth,” she said.

“You have a beautiful mouth,” he said.

“I’ve got to go.”

“Where are you off to now?”

“Ellen wants me to go to Key West with her. She has a home down there.”

“How will that help your life?”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“You run around a lot. Why not stay in one place for a while. Besides, Key West in summer is brutal.”

A car horn honked. Lady Love sat glaring at the wheel of a red convertible with the hood down.

“I’ve got to go,” Diane De Angelo said.

And yet, when Luther called two days later, expecting only a recording, she answered. She hadn't gone to Florida after all. It came as a surprise to hear her say that she had listened to him and decided to stay in the city. His hope rose that he had value in her life even if she couldn't see him that night.

That night he was into his second scotch when he heard a voice behind him say, "I never thought you'd be here." There stood Diana with Lady Love and a third person, a black man whom Diana said was Lady Love's real lover after Lady Love and her friend went off to a table. No, Lady Love hadn't gone to Key West either, but not because Diana had decided to stay put. "She has affairs to attend to. Hang around for forty-five minutes and then you can come home with me. But don't come to the table. Karen has not one good word to say about you to him, and so he is likely to punch you in the face or do something more serious. Are you listening?"

"Oh yes I am, and with both ears," Luther said.

"Save that talk for later, if you must speak it at all," Diane said.

For the next forty-five minutes Luther's vigilance was soaring, both in monitoring himself and his environs. If Lady Love's main man had aggressive intentions, he did not show them, not that Luther stared directly at him. The mirror behind that bar was all he needed to be assured no movement had been detected and all was quiet on the northern front. And though it pained him that his isolation and friendless existence were on full view, he thought, let her see me as I am, let her see me in my nakedness. Let her do just that. In this way did he speak to himself in defense against the laughing thing that might be going on in Lady Love and her amour as they and Diane sat at a table with a full view of his aloneness. Because, Celeste, when we accept ourselves as we are and put on no airs, then do we give others the freedom to accept themselves as well, as the seeing that goes on is not only with the eyes but is felt as a vibration in the air.

Now Celeste, Diane was as good as her word. She left that table and came to me, and Lady Love did not hiss and spit nor did her amour say that now he was going to have to hurt me good. There were no obstructions to our progress but the ball and chain of self-doubt and insecurity and of my own life, the one I had with Sarah. I will tell you something. I must tell you something. Diane De Angelo came to me that night not only in that bar restaurant but in the privacy of the apartment she stayed in with the mystery man of the many books, volumes that ranged from Rabelais to Donald Barthelme. She came to me shed of her blue-tinted sunglasses. More able to sustain eye contact, she told me that the man of the house wrote for a Long Island newspaper and spent much of his time in the Hamptons.

“Do you ever dream that the dead are alive” Diane De Angelo asked as they lay in bed.

“I have a friend who was killed in Vietnam. Not a friend, exactly, but someone I spent a lot of time with. I dreamt that I lived on an island with no one else on it and one day in the distance saw him rowing toward me. The sight of him brought fear, not happiness. A tropical island, with serenity in the air, but his appearance was menacing.”

“You thought he was going to kill you because you hadn’t died, too.”

“I was always afraid he was going to kill me, and came to believe the only reason he didn’t was that he died before he could.”

“Did you want him to kill you? Was that why you were with him in the first place?”

“Don’t get alarm bells ringing in my mind,” Luther said.

“You’re funny.”

“How is that?”

“You look like a man who lives on an island, and you take that island wherever you go.”

“It’s pretty shameful.”

“I think it’s kind of interesting.”

“There’s a word.”

“Interesting? What’s wrong with that?”

“It’s what is said of people who don’t have the talent or the power to be dangerous. It’s a word reserved for the feeble, the innocuous.” He had had this discussion before. The word, as applied to him, still served as a red flag.

“Well, I think it’s an interesting word,” Diane said.

“Exactly,” Luther said, and they both laughed.

“You didn’t ask me why I wondered if you ever dreamed that the dead are alive.”

“This is true,” Luther said.

“Why not?”

“Because I sensed what you would say. You would become upset again about your brother.”

“I’m always upset about my brother. Didn’t you say you had a sister who died?”

“That’s different.”

“Why is it different?”

“Because she was meant to die.”

“What does that mean?”

“Not everybody is meant to stay above ground. Some people are meant to have dirt thrown on them. That’s just the way it is for most of my family.”

“You’re sick, aren’t you?”

“I feel pretty OK,” Luther said.

“I mean you’re sick in your emotions. You’re all twisted up. Things don’t come out right. They come out distorted. Talking like that.”

“Talking like what?”

“‘Have dirt thrown on them.’ What kind of talk is that? It’s so disrespectful. This is someone’s life you’re talking about.”

He had underestimated Diane De Angelo, and she was informing him of his mistake. She had a brain to go with her beauty. “It’s just talk,” he said.

“It’s not just talk. It’s the way a murderer thinks. People have no consequence. Just throw some dirt on them. Bury them alive or dead.”

“I would never bury someone alive.”

“Nor would you bury them if they were dead. You wouldn’t care.”

“Where are we going with this?” He was going out. That was where he was going.

He had flipped her switch.

“You men. All you want to be are women. And then you are neither men nor women.”

Celeste, the world was calling to her, in spite of her drinking and her drugs, in a way it would never call to me, and I lacked the power to hold her to me. Thus she was a transient in my life whom I was trying to give a bigger role than she played as a way of letting the world know that women of beauty and I crossed paths from time to time. However, needing to bring me into sharper focus, she began to ask questions. I lacked definition and substance, as any man must who has foregone finding a legitimate place in life, whether humble or exalted, for that of a nonparticipant existing at the margins of society while indulging his fantasy of becoming a great writer. The crime was that I was not really real. I did not tell her I was living on dwindling funds with a woman in a problematic relationship. I sought protection within the drug- and alcohol-induced fog she existed in. A real man would have claimed her for his own. A real man would have placed a foundation under her as she struggled to get a grip on things. Essentially, she began to ask that I be honest, and yet I continued to withhold and evade. Thus her condemnatory comment about men who want to be women—men who cannot be men. The man who could keep her was the journalist, who got paid for the words he wrote and who drove a car and had the means to keep a Greenwich Village flat and also rent a place in the Hamptons and give her the security she needed. What she didn't need was a barfly.

Both Luther and Sarah had heard the song “It’s Crying Time Again” many times, but romantic love was not the cause of the tears they shed that day in their East Village apartment. Luther wept while listening to a reading of Notes from the Underground on WBAI. "I am a sick man...I am a spiteful man..." How shameful that with the writing scholarship he had given himself, Luther had not been able to write a single thing that approximated the truth and power in those opening lines alone and that he should be instead a man with a flagging commitment to the one thing he loved.

Sarah cried not because of a slow leak in her dream of artistic success but because of the distressing condition of her hair. Childhood memories of his mother's tears came to Luther's consciousness as he watched Sarah break down after long hours in her studio. Yes, yes, it was crying time again, and there was nothing he could do.

"So where is this loft?" Dr. Rosner asked.

"It would do you little good to know," Luther said.

"Why is that?"

"Because it's my guess that you never venture below Fifty-Ninth Street and Bloomingdale's, unless you are headed for Wall Street to confer about your millions, but for that you would employ your helicopter."

Dr. Rosner was kind enough to laugh. "You're having a hard time getting untracked."

"Now you're talking my language," Luther said.

"What language is that?"

"The language of trains and the tracks they run on."

"Actually, I was talking about a job. How are you doing with your search?"

“Oh, the things you do to me,” Luther replied.

Celeste, this thing of shame. What man is there, other than those wedded to evil, who doesn't want to be a do right man? But whiskey was speaking loud and clear and wanted to enter me in its ring of fire. (If I sometimes speak in the language of the songs in my head, then so be it. I am of my time and I am in my time until the time when nothing of the kind can be said of me. Are we clear about this? Are we?) And where it called me on a Friday night was to the bar at Waverly Place, where I could sit in the warmth of my dreams. Diane De Angelo did not come for me on this night. She had closed the door, and if truth be told, my heart was aching for her, but no amount of aching could exert a persuasive power on her. She was not there, she was not there. And yet it was impossible for me to believe the door was locked, even if had been closed. And as I drank, the world once again became a place of infinite possibility and I went to the phone as a man desperate and determined will and called out to the universe, Womb, will you have me? Will you take me unto you? But a woman, even a woman with kindness in her genes, will know how to put the hurt on you by substituting the sweetness of her pleasure palace with its absence. She will know to sing “Oh it's crying time again” and she will mean it, for you must pay and pay and pay for not making right what is not right in a woman's life.

Now Celeste, a man should not be an impediment in any woman's life. That night I fell into bed and whether I slept the sleep of the just or the unjust I will leave it for others to say, but when morning came I was still copping some serious z's. It availed Sarah nothing to try to rouse me as her High School of Music and Art girlfriend Carola

Aprile was buzzing on the intercom, having showed up for a planned visit. Sarah had no choice but to vacate the premises and go off with Carola to a neighborhood coffee shop. Fearing they would make a quick return, I performed a hasty ablution and dressed and ran into the street. But a mind in disarray that feeds on its own flawed premises will always lead us into the ditch of discomfort. What we're running from we're running toward, I was to hear years later. What I was running from was the laughing thing, the thing of Harvardian irony, the weapon of those who inhabit the domain of high intelligence and feel free to bestow belittlement on us. That Sarah had a friend of Carola's quality was comforting, as I didn't want to see Sarah isolated and alone, but we cannot forget that Carola had been accepted to Radcliffe and thus had the numbers of the high board score people. Fear was written on my face and would encourage her to new heights of scorn behind that seemingly permanent smile. And so savagery had its way that morning. I sped from the building right into their path. My mind being so full of Carola Aprile, hers could only be full of me, and so she was in a state of high alert and braced for my appearance, like a cat in high vigilance mode next to a rat hole. But her eye were not claws, were not a sharp-toothed mouth with which to tear and secure my flesh. I broke free, ran helter-skelter through traffic to avoid the full defeat she wished to lay on me. The company of our betters can be intolerable, Celeste. We must at all cost and by any means protect ourselves from reproaches to our existence. This is, of course, the illness speaking, not the god of love, but sometimes it strikes full force and crashes over breakwaters to flood our very being. At such times we must simply endure until the filthy waters recede and then continue our journey onto higher ground.

Luther had a lot on his plate. There were things he had to monitor, beyond the movements of Carola Aprile and her kind. Luke's empire of lust love had expanded. Fortified by the confidence shown in him by Simon Weill and Harry Stavigros, as well as his increased earning power, he allowed a young and beautiful woman named Maeve not only into his life but into his apartment. If get-it-on Brenda was upset by this threat to her hegemony, she soon adapted. It felt good to be dominant, coming as Luke did from a family in which women had dominated him. But eighteen-year-old Maeve did not come from a family indifferent to its own. She did not have sisters who pulled out each other's hair and raked each other's flesh with their long nails. She had sisters who looked out one for the other, and these sisters were not the unloved and unwanted of the earth, not those who, afflicted by narcissism or religiosity or a sense of entitlement or other manifestations of a distorted and deformed self, were unable to be part of the world around them because the world, either in its wisdom or cruelty or simply indifference, had not called to them. They were sisters to whom the world beckoned. They were sisters who could live life on its own terms, and when they were knocked down get back up again. They did not have a mother who would assign them rooms in which to be warehoused for the rest of their lives. They understood that there was no womb to return to.

One of those sisters was named Rita, and though she and all her siblings had come from nothing, growing up in a tiny apartment on One Hundred Eleventh Street just west of Broadway, she had made her presence strong upon the earth. She did not stay on One Hundred Eleventh Street. She did not go to the mental institutions of New York City as her second home. She was called to the bright sun of Southern California and with little training powered up as a real estate magnate of the first order. Rita was thirty-one, while Maeve was the baby of the family. Because of Maeve's beauty, the fashion industry had called her to it, but she lacked the navigational power of Rita. It did not sit right with Rita that Luke, a man of her own age, should exert appropriating power over a girl so much younger, and it doubly offended her that he should lead her into a den of lewdness, given his ongoing relationship with get-it-on Brenda. Rita did not do the fancy thing. She did not call it a ménage a trois. She called it depravity.

Rita also called on her cousin, an FBI agent stationed in New York City, to pay a visit to Luke so Luke could see first-hand not only the beauty in her family but the power of it in a rugged masculine frame. And so it was that Donegal Fitz showed up at Luke's door, identified himself, and said he would like to ask a few questions. Question number one was this: "How are things swinging? Are they swinging good?" Question number two followed: "How is your thing swinging? Is it swinging good?" And question three, predictably, was "Would you like things in general, and your thing in particular, to continue swinging good?" Now each question Donegal Fitz punctuated with his right fist gently jabbing the palm of his left hand so as to impress Luke with the seriousness of the visit. To each question Luke said, through his fear, "I don't know. I really don't," because he had taken note of the hardness of Donegal Fitz's fists and the power with which he could apply them to his face and other parts.

Celeste, I report the facts as I see them and when I see them.

Now more will be said about this matter later, as tragedy of a certain kind was to unfold, including murder most desperate if not most foul.

The Democratic Party had a presidential candidate that year, Jimmy Carter, who many believed would match up strong against Gerald Ford, the Republican occupant of the Oval Office, who had played football too long without a helmet in his Yale days, according to the former and totally disgraced president Richard Milhous Nixon. Mysteries appear and sometimes linger and such was the case with Mr. Carter, of Plains, Georgia, and the former governor of the state. That mystery was not in his career path from naval officer to peanut farmer to politician, but in his first name. It was perplexing that someone with his conspicuously manly way should dwell in the land of the diminutive, as he did not appear to have the boyish appearance of little Bobby Kennedy. Luther left open the possibility that the name was attributable to the peculiarities of the South, such as hominy grits and soda pop for breakfast.

If this matter was alive in the mind of Luther, he attributed it to the fact that in the July heat the Democratic horde had come to New York City for its convention and to sing “Happy Days Are Here Again” in acoustics-challenged Madison Square Garden when the peanut farmer from Plains accepted the nomination.

He was not deriding of Jimmy Carter, and no one should say he was. In fact, he had great faith in his executive as well as intellectual capability; there could be no doubt of the virile quality of his mind, given his background in science and his service on nuclear-powered submarines; it took such a mentality to know where the electrons go and the difference between a neutron and a proton and what is fissionable and what is not.

But he did have his question and he did have his feelings, and both were present on the bright sunny afternoon he got behind the wheel of a Checker cab and drove it out of the garage of the Flann Taxi Service, on West Fifty-Seventh Street.

(And yes, it was crying time once again. Before placing his hackie license, with photo ID, in the slot on the dashboard and turning the ignition, he had broken into tears that this should be his life just two months shy of his twenty-ninth birthday. But a sweet peace came to him, as it often did when he wept, and he heard a voice whisper, "It's all right, Luther. It's all all right," even as he experienced at depth the sad waywardness of his journey.)

His first fare was a woman in a black evening gown and wearing a gold necklace.

"Take me to the 21 Club, and step on it," she said. "And while we're on the way, think of something witty for me to say. I'm dining with the big boys."

Luther took his passenger seriously, as she was imperious in her tone and gave evidence that rage could easily dominate her well-made-up face. This is not a humble servant of the Lord but a woman fully engaged in the world's wars, he concluded. But his thought was a critique, not a witticism to offer the men of power with whom she would be dining. These would be men who could only hope that their postprandial snack would be the carefully coiffed, manicured, pedicured, and scented woman they had called to be with them.

“I have put my mind to the task,” he finally said, in the hope of gaining more time, because he heard a clock ticking and he feared it might be her time bomb self.

“How about you put your mind to your driving? Where are you going?”

“I am going to Twenty-first Street, where any sensible person would, and then I will head east to the area of the city known for its exclusiveness.”

“How about you not do that? How about you go to 21 West Fifty-second Street? And how about I not ask what kind of cab driver you are, because I already know?”

“We will get you there.”

“Who is we? Am I being chauffeured by a schizo?”

“It is just a manner of speaking, and you have not struck a nerve with the use of that word. There are things to make my foundation tremble, but that is not one of them. The fissure in my mind has been healing for some months, and like a bone that has been broken, my mind has come together and is stronger than ever.”

“Glad to hear,” she said, as if she wasn’t.

“And may I suggest that your witticism might be that a New York City cab driver thought the 21 Club was on Twenty-First Street? That should be good for some knee-slapping heehaws and yuck yucks and down-home chuckling.”

“Yes, thank you for the material,” she said drily.

“You are welcome,” Luther said, trying to hold his own.

“These are important people I am meeting, members of the Democratic Party in Texas. Drop me off at the entrance so I can be seen stepping out of the taxi. I do not want them thinking I walked in off the street.”

“You are in a chariot that will do you proud in the eyes of the Texas contingent,” Luther said, as he pulled to the curb. The timing was excellent, as tanned, long-legged gentlemen in dark, expensive-looking suits, each with his left hand in his front pocket, were strolling toward the restaurant.

There was much for Luther to note and ponder on this memorable day, and not only the electric buzz in the air now that the world was coming to New York City to do right by the Democratic Party after the attempted criminal hegemony of Richard Milhous Nixon; even with him gone and his more benign successor in the White House, new life was needed in Washington, D.C. No, no, what was astonishing was the feeling that had been unleashed in him. All he could hear in his head for a while was the filthy Young Rascals singing “I’ve Been Lonely Too Long,” not as an accurate description of where he was but of where he had been. He had been lonely. He had been sequestered. He had been the prisoner of a life he wasn’t even sure was suited to him, and now he was in the bright light of day, engaged with the world and its people, difficult as some of them might be. Oh happy day. Oh happy happy day. But it was more than that. It was the capacity of his mind to deceive him. That the prospect of doing the hackie thing should have overwhelmed him with shame and made him weep when in fact it boosted his spirits. Something was going on he needed to know. His mind was capable of gross deceptions. It told him happiness could be found on one path and one path only when possibly it was to be found somewhere else.

That evening he took his cigar box, filled with coins and bills, and his hackie license, and stopped off at his own 21 Club for one regular Mac and one with cheese, an order of fries, and a container of Coke, then sat alone at a table for two eating his utensil-less meal. The world was feeding him and Jimmy Carter (he would never call a man with his gravitas “little”) and the Democratic National Convention and McDonald’s were feeding him. Something big was going on. He was picking up the thread of his life. Not since his days at the audiotapes booth at the Met had he felt useful in America, and now here he was with that feeling again. Connections farther back, to childhood and adolescence, were being restored. All that, and he was committing experience at the same time.

“People exist for a reason. They don’t just come out of nowhere. There is a plan, diabolical or benign, in all of this, and yet, should you insist that we are merely shadows passing through, you might not be mistaken.” So a man on the street declared to passersby as Luther accompanied Sarah uptown the next day. Whether he was referencing Plato or his own madness Luther couldn’t say, but he was impressed with the man’s authoritative tone and manner.

“The sound of conviction is distinct, is it not?” Luther said, pausing to take in the message of the soapbox stranger.

“Stop with the is it not. I’m going to be late,” Sarah said, and so they entered the kiosk at Astor Place and descended to the subway.

After his brilliant debut Luther had been turned away when he showed up at the depot. The manager had dismissed him with rough stuff talk, but Luther hadn’t minded.

He was being initiated into the world of men, and maybe such gruffness was part of the ritual.

“I cannot tell a lie,” Luther said. “I am very happy to be on this subway, knowing our two destinations, as both of them are about the light.”

“What light is that?” Sarah asked. The subway car was not thronged. They had managed to get a seat together.

“The light of Dr. Frodkey and the light of Central Park. You are headed to the one and I am headed to the other. Isn’t that something?”

“I guess it is,” Sarah said.

Since selling their apartment and moving to a smaller one in the same building, the Van Dines had shown less concern about financing Sarah’s therapy. Luther no longer had to worry that her parents would become destitute in supporting Sarah’s quest for mental health. As for his own, with Diane De Angelo out of the picture, his mind could return to a degree of normalcy and a welcome peace could reign. It was not of him James was speaking when he wrote, “A double minded man is unstable in all his ways.” He was not an unstable element but rooted in his love, at least for the time being, though he was two-faced and deserving of being beaten for putting Sarah and her family, not to mention his own family, in his White Line Continue opus.

“Oh, it is a sunny day. Just let it be. Just let it be,” he cried out.

“Let what be?” Sarah asked.

“I was in dialogue with myself,” Luther said.

“Is Dr. Rosner helping you?” Sarah asked.

“Why would you think he isn’t?” Luther replied.

“No reason. I just want us to be happy.”

“Aren’t we happy? Aren’t we?” Luther asked.

The train had come to his station, Eighty-sixth Street. She would continue on one more stop. Anxious as he had been for an answer, they would have to leave the question hanging. He couldn’t say if there were worse things to have pending.

Because nature was calling to him in an urgent way, he mounted the steps of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, made a dollar contribution for admission, and hurried himself to the nearest men’s room, where the air was strong with the smell of human waste. But instead of the much needed relief that he was seeking, he found instead an impediment of a kind to make alarm bells ring in his mind. The sight he saw was instantly recognizable, even with his back turned, a walking work of art himself, none other than Lane Halderman, the Boston genius of Sarah’s dreams, waiting patiently on line for his turn at the urinal. I must run from what is not my own. I must not wait so that he turns and, seeing me, initiates my destruction. I must vacate this space of fear and sheer admiration all in one. Out he fled to another restroom, where in a stall he talked to himself in a whisper while emptying his bladder. Good job, he heard himself say. Good job, sonny boy, the appellation delivered with a degree of tartness and scorn. Then he pressed his forehead against the cool metal and moaned more loudly than he had intended to.

“It’s not the wailing wall in there. Let’s move it,” he heard a voice call out, and so he exited the premises before further remonstrance could be made.

Celeste, Genius had grown a mustache. This I could see when he turned his head slightly to profile. A modest mustache that did not suit him. The dark patch just stood out, as if he was growing hair where it did not belong. That is not to say he was Ron Doug material. He did not have the insensitivity component to be of that kind.

The next morning the phone rang. The Genius was on the line, asking to speak with Sarah. Was he displaying the imperiousness of the wealthy in his manner? Possibly, but my job was not to be a barrier to his desire, and so I handed Sarah the receiver. And if truth, free of exaggeration, is to be my guide, with love as its accompaniment, I could do so because a newfound confidence was growing in me vis a vis the Genius. Yes, you may say I did the vaminoso from the smelly restroom on sighting him the previous day, and I will not stand in the way of this fact. But his rise had not been meteoric. He was not on the cover of any of the big art magazines. If he had started fast, his progress had since stalled. According to Sarah, he had even become discouraged and opened a gallery in Boston to help promote the careers of his artist friends. Was it possible that his father's business skills were now becoming his own as well? As for that chop of mustache, some close monitoring of this development would have been desirable to determine if he was relying on facial hair to boost his manliness quotient.

Celeste, ardor that wanes in one may rise in another. No research is needed to verify this reality.

It happens that you and I had a mutual friend in Hermione Grunfelt, the woman I had met a few years before at a free-form writing class at the New School. The muse visited her most strongly, she said, when she was listening to raspy-voiced Rod Stewart sing "Maggie," and I could easily understand why, as the song brought me to powerful attention whenever I heard it being played, whether I was sitting in a bar or dallying in a pizza parlor.

The day following my encounter with The Genius, I was again told to take it on the lam by the taxi depot manager, and as I lowered my eyes from the towers of the Jefferson Market Courthouse, down in Greenwich Village, there Hermione was, in outsized pants such as a clown might wear, a loose-fitting blouse, and a floppy hat. There is a moment in which one person will see another in a different light and realize she has made a mistake in accepting this other person into her life. She will see that this other person is not cut from the same cloth as her and lacks her pedigree. She will see that his looks and quiet manner fooled her into believing he was more intelligent and thoughtful than he really is. But having established, over drinks, a degree of connection with this person, she cannot bear to correct the error by fully removing him from her life. Should she run into him on the street, she will give him an effusive greeting and a great big hug as a cover for her estrangement from him. Such was the case on that afternoon.

"How good it is to see you," she repeated three times.

I had no appointments and no plans other than eventually to drift home, and so when she invited me to the Lion's Head, that Village bar reputed to draw literary types, I accepted.

Is there any question more tiresome and shaming than to ask a virtually unpublished writer how his writing is going? And is there anything more tiresome and shameful than for him to fall for the seduction and prattle on about his meaningless projects that stand no chance of meeting with worldly success? In this instance I was able to resist the opening, my restraint deriving from the clear memory of the instructor, Bill Gofner, reading the run-on sentences of my sloppy story in that writing class where I first met Hermione because I was too ashamed to read the text myself.

“How is your mythical girlfriend? What is her name again?”

“Sarah. And she’s not so very mythical,” I said.

“Of course she’s mythical,” Hermione said. “She would have to be to be with you.”

In this way did she speak, relentless with the hype machine, having intuited that I as well as she was a prisoner of unwarranted and uninvited narcissism.

Hermione had another invitation to make. It was not to her bed, as she understood that he could not think of her in terms of sex. There was another mythical artist she wanted him to meet. In fact, there were two such mythical artists, married to each other, living in a glorious West Village townhouse. They were rare and exquisite birds. They were Paul and Jane Bowles, she said. Luther had read The Sheltering Sky. He had read about people needing to die, but that did not give him the common ground he was seeking.

“This is not a good fit. I’m a hackie. I’m not in the townhouse league,” Luther said, pulling from his small backpack his cigar box and hackie license. But Hermione overran him with her assurance that he was fully in their league. In that moment he saw that she wished to use him as cover to hide her aloneness. He would be her paltry equalizer with this mythical couple, even if he wasn’t, and while he had every opportunity to turn away as they walked the narrow maze of Greenwich Village, streets, he continued to match her step for step. I have run too much. Let me not run anymore, he said to himself.

Celeste, have I abandoned you by turning away from direct address? You must not think so. It just suddenly seemed too much, that perhaps impropriety had entered the house, or maybe only shyness, and it would be revealed to me too clearly and baldly what I was doing. Only this can I know for certain: that I must finish what I start. White Line, Continue must continue. It must. And love must express itself in the open spaces. It must. It must.

That late afternoon he met the mythical couple. Celeste was lovely, her beauty mesmerizing and on another level from anything he had previously seen or experienced. His attraction to her, he was sure, was visible on his skin, his face, his whole being, so strong was the current of desire shooting through him. She was elegantly thin without being delicate. The cutoff blouse she wore showed off the full length of her graceful arms. And that black, curly hair so provocatively and severely short to place her in the tradition of Jean Seberg and Mia Farrow. But it was more. Her gaze, that smile, hinting as it did that her door was not fully locked. He read the smile as almost a taunt. Did he dare to invite himself in? And what were these strange connections entering his mind as he stared at her? Was that his sister Naomi, with her mocking darkness he was seeing in her face? And was that the man from his childhood who appeared in the doorway of the used magazine store in the Times Square subway station and whose coal-black and glittering eyes were only for him that he was also seeing?

Luther could appreciate Hermione's difficulty in staying on the ground. In his own way, his life testified to a similar problem. But her hype machine was in overdrive that afternoon. "As you know, my father passed away recently. I will spare you, Celeste, the iniquities of my surpassingly wicked stepmother. But do you know what my sister and I found in his wallet? A love letter from my mother written thirty-five years ago, long before she died and this wretch of a woman maneuvered her way into his life."

"How touching," Celeste said.

"But my point is really this. The love you and Peter share has the chance to surpass even their love. In the realm of art and beauty and now matrimony the two of you truly excel."

"But..."

"No buts. True is true and false is false."

"Come sit down and I'll get you both drinks," Celeste said, seeking escape from Hermione's effusion of gas.

Am I betraying you, Celeste? Am I being less than perfect? Is the stick needed to bring me into line? Must I fall down and die? But we will not ask if I am betraying myself should I not move forward.

A space had opened up. Hermione had gone off to the garden out back to say hello to your husband and your baby girl was being tended to by the sitter you had hired. Perhaps it was the intensity of the connection I was quickly forming with you that drove her away, but about this we needn't speculate. We don't have time for such diversions but must get to the heart of the matter, however hard that may be to find.

“What is it that you do?” I heard you say, in a gentle, fearful voice.

“I am a taxi driver,” I said.

“It’s nothing to be ashamed of,” you replied, as if you heard something in my voice that suggested it might be.

“Some of your best friends are taxi drivers.” My reply was not kind, to either you or myself. My class consciousness and my envy manifested. At this point you should have shown me to the door. You might have been better served if you had understood not only the gulf between the rich and the less well off but also the gulf between those who, on the basis of their gifts, had been chosen and those who had not. How much heartache you might have been spared had you stayed within the circle of your own kind.

But I was not to be the only interloper in your life, Celeste. Savagery speaks from the place where it exists. Your husband, Peter, was of this aggrandizing, imposing ilk. As I was to learn some years later, he had you pegged as a finish line when he whisked you away from your first husband only the year before and made you big with child to secure the deal.

We went to the garden, where we had drinks. The earth was still wet from an earlier rain, and the metal chairs sank into the soil. Peter, a small and compact man who wore cuffed wool pants though we were in July, said Hermione and I should join them for dinner at a nearby restaurant, but Hermione begged off, claiming she was committed to seeing a friend that evening. I could have, and perhaps should have, left with Hermione, but Peter insisted that I come along, which offered some protection against the feeling I might otherwise have had that I was an opportunistic tagalong. Along the way Peter showed an impish side. As we passed a produce stand, he took a large, thick squash and confronted me with a representation of priapic power by holding it against his zippered fly. A manic, knowing smile worthy of a lewd mime accompanied the sudden gesture. Was he saying, Celeste, that he, like Luke, had a larger endowment than me? Had he invited me along to establish his superiority?

Peter proved to be more generous than he was friendly. We weren't seated long at the restaurant before he said, "I'll bet you have big red pimples on your ass."

Taken by surprise again, I could only say, "I really haven't noticed." But the mean smile on his face let me know, as if I didn't, that he had scored once more. To this point, I had the impression that I was in the company of a beautiful woman unfortunately married to an unpleasant man, and that, in any case, I could have no real place in your lives. But soon there occurred the following exchange, which added a new dimension to the evening.

"I feel I need to die," you said. Your smile was gone. You suddenly appeared weary, as if you were fighting off sleep.

"It wouldn't be long before I did so too, in that case," Peter replied, with a smile to match his smarmy words. His fake empathy stood in contrast to your genuine suffering.

He excused himself to sit at the bar, which I thought odd, but you explained that Peter was friends with the owner, and in fact was working on a mural for the restaurant.

"He can be rude and unpredictable, but he doesn't mean anything by it," you said, and assured me of his brilliance as an artist.

"Do you really want to die?" I asked.

“Sometimes,” you replied, in a tone that told me the subject was no longer open for discussion.

And yet I disregarded the stop sign and told you of Naomi, and how she had come to sleep with the fishes of the East River.

Celeste, because you were clever, you placed yourself in position to discover that I had chosen sound over substance. “How awful. Was she mixed up with the mob? Did they outfit her with cement boots?”

“Not exactly,” I said.

“Well then, strive for exactness. What really happened?”

And so I told her about the mental hospital and the wolves placed with the lambs and the police patrol boat that had found her floating in the foul water down by the Fifty-ninth Street Bridge.

“Are you sad about her passing?”

“Not in any way that I can understand,” I said.

Several times I said I would leave, as I didn't wish to overdo my stay, but then I would order another gin and tonic. On the third such drink the shadow of your disapproval fell over me, something perceptible in your eyes but impossible for me to describe. Many years later you would confirm the message I believed I was receiving on that night. As your husband's guest more than your own, was it proper for me to run up the bill with more drinks than propriety called for?

But Celeste, if the door closed for the night, it hadn't closed on the future. I had let it be known that I was doggedly pursuing “White Line, Continue” and perhaps it was on the basis of my involvement with words and also to assist me in finding work closer to my heart that you mentioned your father was a publisher and that you were often called upon to read and offer commentary on manuscripts being considered for publication. Should I be interested, you would be happy to effect a contact and, with that, you wrote your number in an elegant script on a scrap of paper.

Luther did not leave the restaurant unscathed, as no person can who has been briefly exposed to a higher realm only to be dispatched back to his own drab existence. On returning home he wrote Celeste's number in pencil on the wall by his desk. He did not attach Celeste's name to the number and sought to disguise the fact that it was a phone number at all by writing the last four digits first and the first three on a separate line minus the dash. While he also placed the number in his journal, he wanted it right out in the open so he would not forget where it was when the time came for him to use it. Not that he would use it. The woman was wealthy. She occupied the genius realm. She was married. If ever there was a no, no, tell her no situation, this was it, but at the same time he had to keep hope alive so he did not die. A man needed air and a man needed light, and Celeste's light was just as her name promised; it came from above while reserving the right, with the glint of the other in her eyes, of coming from below.

In his dream that night, Peter Handke was wearing dark glasses, as anyone who had written a book with the title The Goalie's Anxiety at the Penalty Kick deserved to do. While Peter Handke was dealing aboveground with his celebrity, Luke and Luther had returned to the railroad tunnel of their childhood. No train came for Luther to bash with rocks nor did the men with knives come to relieve him and Luke of their lives. The scene shifted to Riverside Church, where the Van Dines were arranging an exhibit of her artwork for Sarah.

Luther woke in the morning with no sense of wonder as to the power of dreams and seriously doubted if they were any match for the reality of what was going on on the ground where his life was being lived.

A crazed young black man on the Bowery said, “Don’t fuck with me. I won’t take your money. I will take your life.” His voice was strong and emphatic as he addressed himself to the universe.

A woman sitting alone on the bus headed up Third Avenue said, “Sometimes people are so inconsiderate. Sometimes I feel like screaming. I envy those women who talk to themselves right there on the street, where everyone can see and hear them. I’d like to do that for five minutes. I really would.”

Through all these experiences Luther commanded his innocence to maintain itself, so he could remain as a simple witness to human suffering and not inject himself or be injected into engagement with the manifestations of self before him.

Celeste, something else. You let it be known that The Great Gatsby was your favorite book, but I don’t recall that you said why. You made no mention of the opening: “The rich are not like you and me.”

He took his taxi driving seriously, showing up at the depot with good intentions. When a passenger gave him a destination, he got him there, and without the benefit of liquid fire, as he understood where that could lead. He learned the names Van Wyck Expressway and Grand Central Parkway, and how they were connected. It was information he needed for when he hit the jackpot with a fare to JFK. And even if a hysterical and large hackie wanted to part Luther from his senses when he entered ahead of others in the taxi waiting line, his show of contrition brought the irate one within proximity of normalcy.

“One more time and it will be death. This is my livelihood. This is food on the table for my wife and children. I am out here being a man for my family. Do I look like I’m here for some pleasure party or something?”

“No, of course not. It was an accident. I’m very sorry.” Luther did not go smart mouth. He did not say it would be impossible to imagine the aggrieved one in pleasure party mode.

Another driver, with a more pacific message, came to him. “Are you driving high or straight? Because I’ve got some dynamite black chunky.”

“No, no,” Luther said. “Straight I must be so I don’t see patterns where there are none with lines of progress intersecting and continually changing. You see the trouble I have brought without being under the influence of your black chunky, though I do like the name, and it does put me in mind of that little piece of chocolate with the tin foil wrapper.”

“Do what you gotta do, my brother,” the driver said, warming Luther’s heart with the fraternity he had expressed.

Luther got a lesson in living on that day, and even if he quickly forgot it, he had it for the day that he was in. Though he had been too terrified to put the laughing thing on the irate hackie, he recognized that it was still there somewhere in his being and that it was his way to sometimes be amused by those who showed themselves in a state of high dudgeon. Possibly it was familial. Had his mother not put the laughing thing on him when, as a child, he reacted with full outrage to her assertion that they were living in the last days? Had he not screamed at her, “You have had your life. Could you not let me have mine?” And had this outburst not brought on more laughter from his mother? And what of Auntie Eve? Had she not laughed herself onto the floor when the men of the building rose up against her for having them lug heavy mattresses from one floor to another only for her to change her mind and send them back where they had come from with their huge and floppy cargo?

While he liked the normal food that McDonalds offered—the color red could make him very happy and they had a cleanliness thing going, just like Chock Full O’Nuts—he also thought it might not hurt to have a little variety, and so, back in the city, he parked and locked his vehicle and took his accessories into a pizza parlor, where he gave himself the treat of a veal parmigiana hero, because these too were offered at this establishment. Luther sensed right away from his desire to please that the counterman was giving him the respect that as a customer he deserved. This genial attitude was confirmed by the steaming hot sandwich overflowing with red sauce that the counterman soon served up to him. It was a happy evening indeed, as Luther’s insides were screaming for a hot meal. I will devour this huge sandwich slowly, Luther thought, and in a way that maintains order and does not bring disgrace to my face. First I will be sure that the two halves are completely separated, performing that task with my plastic knife. And now I will gently lick the excess sauce so it does not become an adornment around my mouth and then I will begin in nibble mode, a little bite here and a little bite there. And though he stayed faithful to his plan, the veal did slide about and more sauce oozed as he pressed down on the bread to get a grip. Though he had hoped to employ a limit of two napkins, more were called for to eliminate the glaze that appeared and reappeared on his chin as he continued with his consumption.

Luther turned to see staring at him a man neatly turned out in a tan poplin suit, which he wore with a French blue shirt. But it was not the man's summer-weight attire that stood out so much as the adamancy of hate on his handsome face. Luther had the sense that the man had been studying him for a while, his disgust building with every gesture Luther made. The man was saying that Luther was beneath him, that he was a slob of all slobs.

"Are you an exterminating angel? Is that who you presume to be?" Luther heard himself say, if only in his mind, as he met the man's stare. In that moment he was reminded of the lowliness of his status, sitting there with his cigar box. The man was looking down at him as the whole world had been looking down at him since he was a child, and the man thought he was free to do just that. But now he was finding that he wasn't free, the fucking coward. He thought he had picked on a patsy, like all the others had thought they were picking on a patsy, but he wasn't a patsy. He saw himself cutting the man's throat from ear to ear. He saw himself bashing the man's skull. He saw all the things he saw in the man of violence at the airport and in all the men of violence and saw that they were in him, too. And the man saw them as well. He saw them in Luther's eyes and turned away.

Luther did not stay until the man received his order to watch him polish off his meal. He did not stay to watch the man apply napkins to his face to eliminate any glaze or do a count of the napkins the man applied to his face to bring it under control. And he did not do a Travis Bickle walk out of the pizza parlor because it was only later that he thought of Travis Bickle and how he might have said, “Are you talking to me? Are you talking to me?” And that would have been something to see an escalation of the man’s fear when the man heard his words as well as saw his face.

A black woman hailed his cab and he drove her to a brownstone-lined street in Harlem, where she paid her fare but left him no tip. It hurt him that she would do such a thing, but also frightened him to sense the level of antipathy she must feel to be withholding of a gratuity for his service. And then to see young black men, the children of her hate, sitting listless and yet poised for mayhem on a nearby stoop. Like crows, they sit. So he thought, whether he should or not. He was but a white boy on dangerous streets. So he thought too, remembering a time in childhood when the black boys of Harlem swarmed over him as he rode his bicycle in this same neighborhood, taking his bicycle from him in daylight hours and with adults all around, as if the law had fled and anarchy had come and it was the due of the deprivation driven to take what they wanted when they were in greater numbers and even when they weren’t.

That evening he turned in at the East Side Airlines Terminal, hoping for a fare to JFK, but once again he met with disapproval, the dispatcher charging out of his booth and with flailing arms and gruffness in his voice ordering him out of the taxi queue. What was it about the righteous that they should assault the senses with their righteousness, Luther was left to wonder, as if he was a transgressor in the first degree, an unworthy whose only just desert was the opprobrium of the universe.

Luther had been about to step out and stretch his legs when the dispatcher appeared, and left the driver-side door partially open, his left hand between the door and the frame, when he placed the Checker in reverse. Suddenly, and with great authority, only a split second before he pulled his hand inside, did the door slam closed. In backing out, the Checker's door had grazed a pylon, which forced it shut. A shudder went through him as he held his thin hand to his eyes and then imagined a metal claw as a substitute. Oh my God, Luther thought. Oh my God. Vigilance must always soar. Always.

As the night progressed, he took the thought further. A close call. A dodged bullet. Whatever the metaphor, it would apply. Malignity was out there, waiting to crush him in part or in whole, with sudden ferocity. That malignity could be in objects or it could be in people. And he had no doubt that, whether a thing or a person, the force for his destruction would have patience and cunning on its side.

He walked home after his shift, unable to catch a bus at that late hour. At the deli on Fifth Street and Second Avenue, he stopped off for two hot dogs and a six-pack of beer, so he could get filled up and take happy thoughts into sleep. These were not any kind of hot dogs. They were Hebrew National, and so he would be safe. Before entering the apartment, he pulled the tabs on all six cans, not wanting to wake Sarah with any unnecessary noise.

Life was going on apart from him as well.

Two bums were collapsed on top of each other, sleeping off a drunk over on Third Avenue. A street cleaner turned the corner, the bristles of its roller seeming to mash dirt into the road and leaving a putrid smell in its wake.

A man moaned about Schopenhauer in a supermarket aisle, saying the German philosopher had taken away his will to live. “So much despair. So much horror. Existence is intolerable, knowing what is in store.”

I must read Schopenhauer, Luther thought, vaguely recalling that he had seen one of the philosopher’s works in a Penguin classic edition, which could only mean that history had judged him to be very fine indeed. How fine the Germans altogether had been before they became something else.

And on a cable channel he witnessed a woman whose nakedness was hidden by the fruits and vegetables that covered her body. The word “Remember?” was superimposed over her mouth. Were indolence and anarchy the twin beasts rising in the West? And where was Schopenhauer to answer such a question?

And life continued to go on in which he took part even when he wasn’t there, in the dreamland he entered when he was fast asleep. In a dark courtyard he found himself vying for Sarah with her genius boyfriend, Lane. Luther had the inside track, but whether he could keep it was the question, given his competitor’s bounty. Then he was back at Roberto’s apartment on the Upper West Side, where Sarah and he watched as cats climbed down the fire escape and mixed with dangerous-looking dogs.

And there were those dreams in which he had no visible role even though the dreams were his, such as one in which a bearded young man sat on the steps of the Yale University library. When a sweet-looking blond girl offered him a lift to New York, he opened fire. “Do you think I would just go off with an idiot like you? Get lost,” he shouted.

In this last dream Luther could only surmise that he was in fact disguised as the bearded man. The beard gave him a manliness he didn't in his waking life possess or consciously desire. There was something vaginal about beards, and of course, they were also disgusting food traps. But clearly he had achieved a kind of Ron Doug status, albeit not with a mustache. Not only had his testosterone level increased but now he was in the mold of the those prophets of old, those on the path of self-flagellation and repudiation of flesh-driven ways. More than any of that, he was at Yale and thus a certified high board score man whose womb was the library behind him. His value had been established and was intact; he did not need a woman to confer that value on him. And so he could tell her to go away from his window. He could tell her to leave at her own chosen speed. He could do the Bob Dylan thing all over her, just splatter her with the singer's hatefulness.

I do not like this dream, Luther said. I repudiate this dream as forcefully as Mr. Bearded One repudiated the lovely woman who offered him the pleasure of herself and her car and the city to which she would be driving. And I repudiate Yale. I repudiate its measuring coldness. I must go where it is warm.

“I don't envy the rich. I had years to do as I pleased. I believe I am driving a cab for reasons I don't fully understand,” Luther said.

“You're driving because you need a job,” Dr. Rosner said.

“I guess,” Luther said.

“You seem tense.”

“I wish I could do away with you,” Luther said.

“Do away with me?”

“Get rid of you, I mean.”

“Get rid of me how?”

“Not that way. I didn’t mean that at all.”

“What did you mean?”

“I’m worried about money. That’s all. The end is near.”

“The end of what?”

“Just the end.”

Celeste, Dr. Rosner was reading me. He was saying that I might have the killing thing in me, but being in the business of healing, he was committed to my health and assigned to himself the power to effect that healing. The problem is that some of us are not entirely amenable to the influence of good government. Some of us declare our own sovereign nation and resist the impulse toward hegemony of foreign powers. I did not truly want to hurt Dr. Rosner or abolish him from this earth, but there was a directional curve to my development, or lack of it, that placed me in opposition to some I perceived to be in a position of power.

It was not for me to reveal to Dr. Rosner my dreams. We didn’t have time for such indulgence. We were not under the parasol. It was about building a life. For this and other reasons I did not tell him about the woman masturbating violently or of my run through a maze of pornographic images or of my abiding fantasy of copulating contests in the Houston Astrodome and other ballparks and sports arenas in the country, that it was only a matter of time before such public displays superseded all other forms of entertainment. How was I to tell a man of his substance that my mind was filled with orgiastic fantasies?

I did confess to my longing for Diane DeAngelo, she who wore tinted glasses and went panty-less through the streets of New York City, and of being consistently rebuffed by her answering machine. And I entered it into the record that I saw a young woman with riveting physical attributes on York Avenue but could not swing into action and call out to her because I was tethered to my identity as a hackie by the battered Checker I was sitting behind the wheel of. "That sounds a bit dramatic. You have more important concerns than sexual flings at this point," he replied, seeking to bring me back down to the earth on which he lives so well. He then went on to light one of his small cigars and do his snuffling thing. One must bow down to excellence, Celeste, and Dr. Rosner clearly possessed it.

Prostitutes in hot pants were all about the intersection on the Queens side of the bridge. Luther watched one spit as she got out of her John's car and then wipe her mouth on her sleeve, trying to make herself clean after being dirtied by the man. He stopped at a diner on Northern Boulevard, where he ordered a grilled cheese sandwich, and called Diane once again from a pay phone and hung up after three rings. He tried a second time, again hanging up on the third ring. The third time she picked up.

“Was that you who just called and hung up?” she asked.

“Yes,” he said, as if a lie was not an option. He felt as drab as the blue work shirt he wore, the kind that often had a worker’s name stitched on it.

“I was expecting a call from someone,” she said.

“I guess that’s why you answered.”

“Look, you’re beginning to bother me.”

“I can’t help it.”

“I’ve got to go,” Diane said, and hung up before he could reply

I love Sarah. Sarah is formidable. I disappoint her. I disappoint myself. I am a dog running loose in the street, Luther thought, as he got filled up on his grilled cheese sandwich and side order of French fries so he could be strong for his further hours of driving.

This longing for the loins of Diane DeAngelo. Maybe he could do better now that she had thrown cold water on him.

At LaGuardia he stared from the rolled down window of his cab at the jets lowering toward the runway and others beginning their ascent. Arrivals. Departures. The freedom some had to come and go wherever they pleased.

An hour later he was back in Harlem. A black man had entered the cab at the airport and directed him to One Hundred Twenty-third Street between Lenox and Seventh Avenues.

“You don’t have some kind of problem with that, do you? You don’t have nothing against the black man, do you?” the passenger inquired.

“No. Of course not,” Luther said, trying to stay focused on the road.

“All you motherfucking white boys got something going on in your heads about the black man. Afraid he going to take your momma or your girlfriend. That’s the reason why you try to keep the black man down. Tell me you haven’t been afraid of just that kind of shit.”

“I’m afraid everybody’s going to take my girlfriend from me, white or black,” Luther said, so his words, in spite of his fear, could have some relationship to the truth. And evidently they dissipated his passenger’s onslaught.

“You all right for a motherfucking white boy. But let me tell you something, white boy. You ever want to be a man and not some white pussy thing, you got to get yourself a piece and do yourself some killing. You got to be able to fuck people up so bad they praying for their own death. ’Cause the only way you get respect is to give respect to the power you got in you to do the shit you need to do. Understand what I’m saying, motherfucking white boy?”

Luther tried to understand where his passenger had gone with the words he had spoken. “That’s deep. You’ve given me much to ponder,” he finally said.

“Ponder? Ponder? You crack me up, motherfucking white boy. You surely do.”

As he crossed the Fifty-ninth Street Bridge back into Manhattan and turned up Third Avenue, Luther thought of jumping out of the cab at a stoplight and running away, but that would just show him in a racist light. And if he were to level with his passenger and tell him he was afraid, then the man might pistol-whip or shoot him dead with the piece he was surely carrying, given the fondness he expressed for such weaponry, or simply break his face with his powerful fist. And so he stayed the course, wishing he could be any of the anonymous strangers he saw walking about on the avenue.

“I’m sorry. You wanted to go between what and what on One Hundred Twenty-third Street?”

“You fucking with me, white boy?”

“No, no,” Luther said.

“You going to make me hurt you, white boy?”

“I’m trying to do the right thing,” Luther said.

“Trying. Trying. That’s all you motherfucking white boys is good for is trying. You need to be doing a little more doing instead of all this trying bullshit all the time.”

The man should have been a lawyer, Luther thought, seeing the way he could bend language, Luther’s, to his will, and if he was in control of Luther’s words, then he was in control of him, too.

“Hang a left here, motherfucking white boy, and bow down to my blackness while you at it. You in my motherfucking kingdom now.”

A kingdom of squalor, or at least dilapidation, the rows of brownstone buildings turned to a purpose they had not been intended for, and young black agents of enterprise arriving. From the rolled down window, the passenger parceled out the goods.

“This block be getting well now, man. I be the medicine man for its motherfucking needs,” the passenger said.

Luther kept his eyes straight ahead. The corner had been blocked off, a car parked sideways to deny access or exit by another vehicle. Probably the same thing had been done at the other end after he turned into the corner.

“That’s right, motherfucking white boy. You keep your motherfucking eyes where they belong. This be my block, my country. No motherfucking po-lice need be doing their po-lice thing while I be doing my business.”

And yet he couldn’t help but notice those young runners who approached from the front of the cab: the brilliant white teeth of one, the gold medallion dangling from the neck of another, the implacable look of hatred in the eyes of a third. It didn’t occur to him until later that Loud Sound in the back seat might not want to go potty where he ate and that his run and gun and sleep in the streets crew might feel the same, that is, not wish to have the site of their drug bazaar turned into a crime scene. Perhaps they were high in the golden palace of God and shining down their beneficence and had not yet begun their descent into the domain of the devil. For whatever reason, Loud Sound exited the cab, but not before saying, “Later for you, my white brother.” That Loud Sound had stiffed him for the fare Luther could only ponder with indignation when he was rolling down Park Avenue and well free of the danger zone.

But it was not only Loud Sound. There was also the phenomenon of Spread Them Wide appropriating extra space in the subway cars of New York City and defying man, woman, or child to tell them to close those legs and sit within the bounds of their seat. In this way they were calling attention to the quality and size of their apparatus, for sure, and also saying it was for them to take what they needed. If all that might be was an extra subway seat, then that was cool, because they knew, and you knew, that they had gotten into your head, and once there, you couldn't get them out.

And then there were also the space appropriators who stood by the door, cousins of the wide spreads and sometimes the same in the subway cars of New York City.

These were some of the things that occupied the mind of Luther Garatdjian in the summer of 1976, when Jimmy ("don't call me little") Carter, was trying to do right by the country and be rid of Republican rule. And if they weren't big thoughts and concerns, they were his thoughts and concerns, and you were welcome to your own.

In the bar on Spring Street he waited for Diane DeAngelo to appear. Not that she had said she would, but that didn't mean she wouldn't. They did have that night of intimacy to build on, and if he was thinking so much of her, why couldn't he hope that she was doing the same about him? As he struggled to nurse his beer, concern about Sarah began to weigh on him. He felt like a man being carried away by a riptide from the dry land he needed to get back to. And writing. That was the dry land he needed to return to as well. Even without talent it was his only hope.

The urge rose in him to throw the beer stein at the mirror behind the bar and to shout obscenities, but he was distracted by a woman passing him on the way out. Her loose-fitting white blouse offered a glimpse of her black lace bra, turning his anger into an intolerable burst of lust. I am dominated by sexual urges. I am dominated by women. I am alone, alone in a bar. So his thoughts went.

He went to the pay phone. He would tell Diane De Angelo that he was waiting and that he couldn't wait much longer. Instead of a recorded message he got a voice. It was not hers but that of her friend. "He's really turned on by your body," she said. And then it was Diane DeAngelo saying, "Do you think we should call him?"

He had no technical explanation for how he had managed to eavesdrop on a conversation his intended party was having with her girlfriend, and he wasn't seeking one. It had happened once before, only then, the woman had been talking about him with a girlfriend, describing him as sensitive and serious. In that instance he had gotten off the line because he was uncomfortable hearing himself discussed in such sickly sweet terms. Now he got off because he saw that he was a fool. A woman with Diane's appeal would meet a better version of him every day, so what chance could he possibly stand?

He was free to go home, free to make love to Sarah, free to have the best sexual experience ever with her and feel centered once again. Until, that is, the urge to wander returned.

"I had a dream that you liked earthy sex," she said to him that day.

"Earthy sex? What is that?" Luther asked.

"What we just did," Sarah said.

Through the wall came the angry voice of their neighbor.

"You got me back from Alex and think you can take me for granted. You struck me on my temple. I didn't strike myself, did I? You're a lunatic. You should be locked up. I would press charges if I didn't have to go through all the court trouble. I never want to see you again. Is that clear? Get out and don't you fucking touch me, you goddamn bastard."

Luther and Sarah heard the neighbor's door slam shut. The man must have beaten a retreat because quite now reigned.

"I had thought they were through with each other," Luther said, shamed by the neighbor's accusation about physical violence. Hadn't he fought with Sarah, as the neighbor did with her beau? Hadn't he as well been an unmanly man?

"They may never be through with each other."

It was a surprising thing to hear her say.

Marc Gitall had not yet vacated the Bowery space, but Luther had no doubt that he was a man of his word. Soon a new chapter in Luther's life with Sarah would begin. They would elevate above the hoi polloi of the East Village and regain their status as loft dwellers.

Sarah went to see Gone with the Wind at Theater 80 St. Mark's.

"Why do you see the old when you could see the new?" Luther asked.

"Because I like the old and the new," Sarah said, as if it should be obvious.

The old and the new. She could be in both worlds, like her historian father. She would sit through a long movie with just a box of Milk Duds and a small box of popcorn, Now, when he tried to do the same, he would get restless. The thirst would come upon him. She brought her focus to bear not only on movies but books and, of course, her work, managing to maintain a purity of purpose amid the chaos he imposed. He lacked her discipline and center of gravity. Instead, he had his father's waywardness. If his mother had not been there for his father to return to, it would have been bad for him. And Luther saw that it would be bad for him if Sarah were not there to return to.

While Sarah was at the movie theater, Luther made the long walk to the bar on Spring Street. The song "But She's Not There" did not play loud in his head when Diane DeAngelo did not show and he didn't feel his anger coming, not when he had another he could chat with. She said her name was Wendy and she was having a video show at the Whitney, she said.

"A video show. Is that something new? And is what is new necessarily better than what is old? Do you think the new and the old can be friends?"

Wendy held him in a puzzled stare and then began to laugh. "Oh my God, you're serious," she said, after a while, seeing that he hadn't been able to match her laugh storm with one of his own.

"It was just a question. The new and the old have been on my mind. That's all."

"You're either droll or dumb. I can't decide which," she said.

"Would one be worse than the other?"

"I would think so, Wendy said.

"I am shadowed by a fear of dumbness, I must confess," Luther said.

"Shadowed?"

"My life is darkened by it. Maybe I'm not the only one."

"Do you come here a lot?" Wendy asked.

“I do. Too much. It used to cheer me up but now it’s making me sad. From glad rags to sad rags and all that.”

“Why does it make you sad?”

“Because the one I profess to love is not here, and I am half glad and half sad that she isn’t.”

“Why isn’t she here?”

“Because she has beauty in her face and everywhere else and I am not the only one who has noticed.”

“I would take you home but I have recently undergone an abortion so I am not in the game for a while,” Wendy said.

“The game?” Luther asked.

“Where are you, mister? This whole thing is a game,” Wendy said.

“Can there be more than one winner in this game?”

“You bet. Now you take care,” she said, and disappeared.

Though he had not expected her to accelerate into sharpness, at least not that quickly, he could understand why she might. A man had done her wrong or maybe she had done herself wrong as well, the two of them not being careful. There really was much to ponder about the sometime gravity of sex.

Luther went into his dream life that night. He had a journey to make to Havana, home of an “I get the ball for the ball go the street” friend of his from childhood who had left the island with his family. But he was not with that boy now, whose older brother had slammed the boy’s head against a brick wall to maintain his power. Luther was with a high Cuban official, a commissar of revolutionary probity who took him to the cathedral. They went on foot through the bustling streets, and Luther was struck by the gravitas of the official, who proved himself well informed about the cathedral when they arrived. Pointing upward at the ceiling of the massive structure, he explained that the design enabled a minimum of light to reach its remotest recesses. In the presence of the commissar, who wore the same conical cap with the red star Luther had seen atop Trotsky's head in a photograph, Luther was speechless. His seriousness was simply overwhelming. Even on this island paradise, he seemed to be saying that life was hard and work was the order of the day. Then Luther was closer to home. The commissar, with his absurd sternness, had had his day. It was time to visit with Peter and Sarah, both of whom were smoking Tareytos as they faced each other at close quarters. First one would take a drag and then the other, leading Luther to believe it was a synchronized ritual requiring words to be dispensed with so that they might more truly express the essence of their father-daughter relationship. As he watched, Luther noticed that Peter would suck hard on the cigarette and then pull it aggressively away from his mouth, and then Sarah would do the same, as if imitating him. Their smiles showed amusement, as if they understood each other well. Luther couldn't say he liked their manner. He couldn't say he liked it at all.

Luther could only hope that his dreams would shed a heap of understanding about the nature and course of his life.

In the morning Sarah spoke of her love of Bette Davis and of the noisy patrons who almost ruined the movie for her, and Luther spoke of his dream, including the Tareyton cigarettes, but left out that both she and her father had annoyed him with their cigarette -to-and-from-mouth-action and also omitted his real-life conversation with the woman who had received an abortion and made a video showing at the Whitney Museum.

And they spoke with their neighbor, whose temple had been allegedly struck, though wouldn't such a blow cause injury or even death? It gave Luther some pleasure to tell her that they would be vacating the premises and stepping up to a loft life, as he didn't care for her, given the meanness that she had shown in her voice and in her face.

"That's a stroke of good fortune," she said, lightning flying from her mouth.

"Well, it's on the Bowery," Luther said.

"I said it's a stroke of good fortune," Vivian replied, her temperature rising. "I'm thinking of moving later in the year."

"Why would you think of moving?" Luther asked. "Does the building not suit you?"

"Why am I thinking of moving, you jackass? Because I don't want that miserable apartment to be my grave. All I'm doing is growing old in it."

"Sometimes failure has a smell to it. I'm sure I'm right about this," Luther said.

"Did I say anything about failure? You're a failure, mister. You smell of failure. You stink of it. I know your type. Everyone thinks you're intelligent until they find out you're not."

"I wasn't suggesting you're..."

“Never mind what you were suggesting,” Vivian said, and retreated inside her apartment and slammed the door.

The time had come for Luther to take stock. It had been reestablished in his mind that Sarah was beautiful, and now she was beginning to come into her own sexually. That was important. No matter how beautiful the woman, a man would not fully respond to her unless he sensed that she was willing to let go. Luther wanted a pure life, one built around Sarah physically as well as emotionally. He was willing; so was she, he sensed.

If Sarah would agree, he would cancel their telephone service. After all, was the telephone not an intrusion, a downright invasion?

Sarah’s sister was a rock. In fact, she was a boulder. Her Barnard achievement was a crushing weight on Luther. It left him nowhere to turn but into the mirror of self-hate. And he had every reason to believe Claire’s hard, dark eyes had recognized his defeat. And if her eyes did not reveal as much, her words certainly did.

“One psychologist asserts, in a study of creativity, that some extremely talented artists have IQs of 120 or even less. I find it very hard to believe that someone with an IQ that low could contribute anything meaningful in any field. What do you think, Luther?”

“‘Killing Me Softly.’ That’s what I think,” Luther said. He had come calling on Claire with Sarah at Claire’s apartment, some blocks down from where her parents lived.

“No, seriously. What do you think?” Claire continued.

“Killing me softly,” Luther persisted.

“What does that even mean?”

“He means that you’re killing him softly,” Brian said.

“Killing him how?” Claire asked.

“With the truth?” Brian laughed.

“What truth?” Claire asked.

“The truth that he’s not very bright. You just took away his last vestige of hope that he can have a meaningful life.”

“Stop it, Brian. That’s so evil.”

“It’s not evil. It’s apparent. Have you ever heard him say an intelligent thing?”

“Luther’s very intelligent,” Claire said. “He got through college in four years.”

“Four and a half years,” Luther corrected.

“Well, I never could have done that,” Claire said. “It took me six years to get my degree. And you didn’t get through college at all, Mr. Smarty Pants.”

“Gee, Luther, I guess you are intelligent after all,” Brian said.

“But that’s what you meant, Luther, that I was killing you softly?” Claire persisted.

“‘Killing Me Softly’ is a song, sung by Roberta Flack,” Sarah said.

“Well, even if Luther meant that I was hurting him, and I really didn’t mean to, that showed real intelligence and creativity to make reference to a song. He was demonstrating a capacity for complex thinking with that cultural allusion, and I was showing my ignorance by not picking up on it,” Claire said.

“That make you feel better, Luther?” Brian said, and did his little laugh thing.

“Sure. A bunch.” Luther said, too rattled to add anything more.

“No, I meant it,” Claire went on. “You are very intelligent and very creative, too.”

“And very hidden. When are we going to see some of this creativity of yours, Luther?”

“Stop with the needling, Brian. Just stop it,” Claire said.

“I feel like we’re in a Yugoslavian movie by Ridzak Ridzko,” Brian said.

“Pick on the Yugoslavs. Go right ahead,” Claire said.

Brian was single and alone, Claire having divested herself of him sexually. He had settled into a kind of whimsical sadness that could turn caustic. He was content to work as a salesperson in a store that sold gear and clothing for the outdoors.

Luther wished he could just go home. He wanted to take off his clothes and go to bed. They seemed like strangers to each other. And Brian’s lacerating comments. What was the point of such a get-together? Soon it wasn’t him or the Yugoslavs, but Peter and Lydia, Claire remarking that Peter’s homosexuality had been apparent to her high school friends.

That night Luther put himself to sleep with a lot of scotch, and when he came to in the morning he focused on baseball statistics to chase the intruders Claire and Tom from his ravaged mind.

“I have to have some place to live,” he suddenly screamed, waking Sarah.

“What is wrong?” Sarah asked.

“Should I kill him for talking to me like that? Should I?”

“It’s OK, Luther. It’s OK. He’s just unhappy with himself.”

“Unhappy? He’s malignant. I must have a place to myself, where no one can find me. I must,” he said.

“You do. You have that place.”

But he didn’t. Brian Little Laugh had blown off the door and rushed right in, and brought Claire and Sarah with him, where they shone a spotlight on his number and saw its smallness.

Marc Gitall finally made his move, and so Luther and Sarah were free to make theirs.

“You’ll probably want to make some changes. Give it your own personal stamp,” Marc Gitall said, surveying the loft, which had been emptied of his possessions.

“I don’t know, Marc,” Luther said. “We sort of like to live within existing structures. No, I should say that of myself. I don’t much care to break the mold, because chances are, unless you are very resourceful, and handy with your hands, then you have brought anarchy on yourself. With the sea wall gone, what is left but for the sea to come rushing in?”

Marc Gitall’s unshaven face and tousled black hair spoke of his restless energy. His face was now saying that he didn’t have time for the patter produced by another person’s mind, especially when that patter was of the feeble sort. He wanted vigor and resoluteness of the kind that had made his Wall Street career grow great and now his art career to blossom.

“Sometimes we have to launch ourselves into the new,” Marc Gitall finally said, though the avuncular role clearly did not suit him.

“We will take that under advisement,” Luther said. “I mean, I will. I speak for no one but myself.”

“Look, you two. How about if my people and your people all get together for a party when we’re settled into our new places. What do you think?” Marc Gitall asked.

“That sounds really nice,” Sarah said, as Marc Gitall wrote out his new address and phone number and handed it to her.

My people. Your people. For the rest of the day Luther could not free himself of Marc Gitall’s words. What people was Marc Gitall talking about? Marc Gitall had people, for sure. And Sarah. Sarah had some people. But Luther? Luther had no people. An image came to him of a man driven by conflict and fear to withdraw further and further within himself. Once again he saw his aloneness illuminated, as he had some years before, when he contemplated marriage to Sarah during a session with Dr. Dressler only to blurt out, “But who would come?”

He went back to his dreams for more information as to where he was and where he might be going. This time he was in Boston, standing by a red-brick wall, of the kind he had seen, to his delight, in a picture book as a child, only the organ grinder and his monkey were missing. But Genius Lane was there, at least for the minute it took him to write a letter to Elvis Presley before he vanished. Then Luther found himself in a room on an upper floor in his family’s building, where he was living with Sarah, both of them miserable in their compromised situation, the promise of youth gone and their death march into old age commenced. The odor of failure, of the kind that his sister Naomi and her husband Chuck had experienced, attached to the dream. Then the elevator had to go and crash through the roof and make a big ruckus on Broadway when it finally smashed to the pavement.

I am in this life, and this life is in me, Luther thought, when he was woken by the morning sun. Marc Gitall does not have to beat me anymore than he has. My life will be full of movement today.

One move he made was to see Dr. Rosner.

“I have done away with the need for you. Is that OK?” Luther said, as Dr. Rosner was lighting one of his little smokes and then doing his snuffle thing.

“Done away with?” Dr. Rosner queried. He wore a white shirt with his seersucker jacket.

“Don’t be suggesting I am a murderer when I am not.”

“What is this strange talk?”

“I will tell you what it is. When I was a child the element of surprise was everything to me. If I had the advantage of a sneak attack on my brother, then I felt confident and powerful. But if I met resistance, then I fell apart. I must do the same thing with words. I use them to feel powerful, because otherwise I am just a hanging string. So my question is this: will you allow me to be a man and leave?”

“Why would you want to leave now?”

“Because I am out of the East Village and no longer obliged to listen to stinky, smelly WBAI now that I am reestablished in loft living. And though I have a job, it is as part of the hackie corps of New York City, and so I have to be concerned about money.”

“You can’t see hacking as something temporary while you seek out other kinds of employment?”

“I think I have to live in the world to which I have been delivered, like that amateur entomologist in Woman in the Dunes. I can’t escape my fate. Maybe I can develop a relationship with my Checker as he did with the widow. Maybe I can be intimate with something.”

“What we do here isn’t intimacy?”

“Do not frighten me with your maleness,” Luther said, his voice rising.

He returned to his new home on the Bowery to see Sarah flicking her lit cigarette butt out the window onto the short tiled roof of the lumber store below.

“Are you crazy? You could start a fire,” he said.

“There’s not going to be any fire,” she replied.

“It’s not a good idea to throw anything out the window. We’re not kids here.”

“Aren’t we?” she asked.

Maybe it was her unapologetic tone. Maybe he was more undone by the abrupt end to his therapy with Dr. Rosner than he knew. Whatever, they fought that afternoon. Did she want to see them out on the street? He got steadily drunker on vodka and orange juice and passed out in the alcove near the door on two giant pillows left behind by Marc Gitall.

He had signed up for a double shift and drove all the next day and night, blistered and resentful. On a break, he called Sarah because the pain was too much.

“You’re a drunk. That’s what you are. An insane drunk. You ruin everything. Lane was right about you. Your only contribution to me and everyone is destruction.”

He couldn’t say where the idea for vodka and orange juice had come from, but there would be no more screwdrivers, that was for sure. He staggered home in the wee hours and sipped from a six-pack of tallboys while Sarah slept. Oh Jesus, the beer tasted good, as did the slices of salami he had taken from the refrigerator. That was all a man could ask for. A little beer to sort out his thoughts and give him the breathing room everyone could use so he could enjoy the psychic rest he needed to move forward. He hid his empties in a bag so Sarah wouldn’t see the next morning and call him that name again.

With the daylight came love. He was loving her and she was loving him. He crying and she crying, just crying and crying. But they were good and cleansing tears, and they even made love again before he went out on his afternoon shift. He could drive with a clear mind and heart, feeling he was a part of her and she was a part of him.

There was order in driving the streets and taking people where they needed to go. Dr. Rosner had been right. The city did need good cab drivers. And he got to hear certain things, things he might be able to use even if some of it was frightening, like the two veteran hackies talking about the twenty-four-year-old found dead in an alleyway up on One Hundred Fifty-fifth Street, half his head blown off by a gunshot and his cab nearby. Or the Magnum held to the head of another young cabbie. Or the hackie who sped off when a black kid approached with a knife in his hand.

“Drive alert, my young friend. Drive alert,” one of the hackies said to him as he was heading out on his shift.

“Maybe don’t drive at all,” the other said, but Luther saw what he and the other hackie were doing, trying to infect him with their fear so he couldn’t live at all. Not that he wouldn’t be careful. He would. He definitely would. Eyes wide open.

Travis Bickle, the hackie in Taxi Driver, was on his mind again. While he could not emulate his crazy toughness, maybe he could stay within a zone of safety through niceness. Altogether the film had been instructive. He had seen the gaucheness of Travis taking his heart’s desire to an X-rated film on the assumption that she would experience the same viewing pleasure, only to be disabused of that notion when she demanded to leave. There on the screen Luther could also witness the sad loneliness and lowness of Travis’s life in coming to such a deluded place in his thinking. Even so, Luther had to admit that he too had felt the pull of licentiousness and remember that he had similarly, if, only obliquely, sought to involve Sarah.

And on his shift that evening he felt once again the pull of that licentiousness. In the flower district, on Sixth Avenue in the twenties, the potted plants that abounded on the sidewalks during daylight hours had been removed and the shops closed and gated. Outside Club Sensa, next to one such shop, he parked his cab. He had read that the club’s patrons were married couples and others with partners who gave full throttle to their lewdness by pairing off with likeminded couples. The club was there in plain sight for you to see, but the sign announcing it was small and an opaque window spoke to its concealed nature. Oh, if only he could have such a life, and if he couldn't, if he could only see those who did.

Soon a couple emerged, as if to satisfy his curiosity. In their early thirties, Luther estimated, as they entered the cab. On the man's instructions, he drove north half a mile, turning east onto Park Avenue.

"I definitely think the guy was into me," the woman said.

"The woman seemed uptight," the man quickly added.

"She was just nervous, Joe. Trust me, she's up for the game."

Their voices were pitched low and intense. They would go home and talk dirty to each other, tell each other what they wanted to do with their prospective partners.

Up the ramp on the south side of Grand Central Luther drove and around the terminal to the garage in the Pan Am Building, where he turned off the meter and watched as the couple walked a short distance to the car they had parked far from the scene of the crime so as not to incriminate themselves.

The night offered him more. Always in New York City there was more and more, the spectacle of pleasure on one street and of pain on another. There, in front of Maxwell's Plum, over on First Avenue farther uptown, a black girl, her teeth dazzlingly white in the sultry night, spoke ostentatiously with a cool white guy, his tight black shirt unbuttoned halfway down his chest as he stood next to his little red Corvette. Its hood was down. Its leather passenger seat awaited her. Yes, he has got his chariot of fire, Luther could only think, and knows which way the wind blows in this world, and it is blowing in his direction. But he is riding the waves of his own delusion if he imagines this will end well. Danger, danger, Luther wanted to call out, but was stifled by fear, as in a dream. But what was the point? Foolishness does not listen. When does it ever heed the warning call? An angry black man made his appearance, karate-kicking a dent in the driver's side door of white boy's love machine before stinging her cheek with a hard slap.

“You ain't white. Do you hear me? You ain't white, no matter how much shit you put in your hair. You hear me?”

White boy tore off in his dimpled chariot. Coward or not, he needed to live another day and not be fodder for page 3 of the Daily News.

Maxwell's Plum. What kind of name was that? Something esoteric and pot-induced, an image summoned at the moment the stoned creator understood everything while understanding nothing.

A fare took him back down to the Bowery.

“I'm going down to see the fat man. Do you know who the fat man is?”

“No. I am afraid I don't. I mean, I know many fat men, but I can't say I know your fat man,” Luther replied. “Can you tell me something more about him than his girth?”

“I like that. Girth. You're all right. There is the fat man and now there is the skinny man. That's you. That way we have the polarity the world needs. There's no creativity without it. You dig?”

“I guess,” Luther said.

“He wears a construction hat. Now do you know who I mean?”

“I can't say I do,” Luther said.

“Then your ignorance has dominion over you,” the passenger bellowed.

It was not for Luther to remonstrate with the passenger, lest a tidal wave of bellicosity be directed at him. I would only be confusing things to think that my peace is the source of his agitation, and it would be a double mistake to imagine that a protesting manner would quell his riotous tongue, as he is guided by his drug du jour, not his reason. Such was Luther’s assessment of the situation.

While the passenger did not have mystical powers, he did have knowledge. Just south of the flophouse a bar had opened, owned and operated by a fat man named Jilly. Middle-aged and pasty-faced, he did indeed crown his head with a construction helmet, perhaps to cover his fully bald pate. He stood sentry style at the entrance as kids flowed past, and with them the difficult passenger.

By the curb the punk rocker Jerry Filone leaned against a parked car. Even slouched, he was a vertical wonder, a spindly high rise in tight black rocker garb. And yet the word underweight or emaciated could not be applied. Even in duds designed to show him at his skinniest, he had no reason to fear that people would put the laughing thing on him and consign him to the skin and bones hall of fame. Maintaining his languid pose, he indulged the attentions of a blond young woman in her own denim duds whose body language suggested she wanted nothing more than to kneel at his phallic shrine.

I will explore. I will go where I have not been. I will take leave of my cab and enter the kingdom of Mr. Helmet Head. So Luther decided, exposing himself to the amped band holler-heading on the stage. The lyrics had no chance of finding their way through the instrumental tumult, but that was the point, was it not? Words didn't matter here.

Filone had brought his slouch indoors. Now he did his leaning thing against the bar. It was his night off, but his laurels were good laurels, good for another girl to put her body next to his. Not the blonde. She had departed. A dark-haired girl with sullen majesty.

A young Israeli, the star of David painted in blue upon his forehead, leaned against his car, his arms folded.

"I conquer the Arabs. I dominate them on the ground and in the air. But her, her. She does not listen to the word submission. Her will is like steel, her tongue like acid. I have been dispersed by her to the winds. To Toronto will I go, where my brother lives. There will I start my new life."

A girl looked down from a second floor window, her chest covered only by a black bra. Her hair was the red of fire.

"That is her," the Israeli said, speaking as if his throat was clogged.

"The Bible says, 'Whom God has joined, let no man rend asunder.' Do you believe that is so?"

"Do not quote to me the ancient texts. I am in New York City now, not Jerusalem," the Israeli said.

Another stranger, this one summoned from the dark, sought to shed light on unseen doings. "I will tell it to you like this," he said, from the back seat of the Checker.

"The Mafia, like death itself, put in an appearance at a newly opened bar-restaurant. A dialogue like the following ensued: ‘How much do you take in?’ ‘Lots and lots.’ ‘What’s that, lots and lots?’ ‘Loads.’ ‘What are your gross and net?’ ‘Gross and net? Aren’t they the same thing?’ They threw a blanket over him and shot him over fifty times. Tell me what this means? the stranger asked. I really need to know.”

“I couldn’t say,” Luther replied. “Could it be that everyone has his number, and we have to hope that ours isn’t called?”

“You are a better driver than you are a philosopher,” the stranger said.

“Yes. I can see why you would say so.”

“Silence. Not a word more.”

“OK.”

“You’re not listening to me. Did I not say not a word more?”

This time Luther merely nodded in assent.

“You are learning, my friend. You are learning how to keep your number from being called, having your ticket punched, and all the rest.”

The night was more than fatso Jilly and displaced Israelis and quietly menacing passengers. His sex life with Sarah, in spite of his resolutions, was not enough to hold him. He could not say why exactly. It just seemed other doors needed to be knocked on, and not to knock on them was to deprive himself of life itself, as where did you find life more fully than in the act of sex?

Free of his Checker and spurned at the bars and loaded with booze, he was visited once again with the great truth that social machinations were not necessary for sexual release. All he need do was zip over to the steam bath on the lower East Side for the gratification he was seeking. Once again the blinding illumination came to him that male sex was the answer and had always been the answer. And yet, the impulse acted upon, he was left regretful. He had regressed. He had been seeking a substitute for Dr. Rosner. Was it possible that his sexual urges were merely an expression, an inadequate one, for his loneliness and the desire for human contact?

His desperation took him to a brothel in midtown where, for the modest fee of ten dollars, he was offered a South American woman as a vessel for his pain who told him that tipping was permitted. While in the act, he was imagining how he might make her a permanent part of his life, but in the aftermath he wanted only to flee.

During daylight hours he tried for a reset to wipe clean the excesses of the night before with the thought that more maturity, and with it, more staidness, was in his future, even if the progress was slow. In the meantime he tore up a number of old manuscripts as evidence of his ability to let go of some things. Hadn't Isaac Bashevis Singer said, "The wastebasket is a writer's best friend"?

And he tried to put his sadness at his parting from Dr. Rosner in perspective. Therapy promised what, after all? So many people led productive lives without it, and so many remained hopelessly neurotic and unproductive with it. A person had the right to say, "Yes, all very good, but I don't want you." Why couldn't therapists stop reducing their patients' desire to leave to resistance? And what was wrong with resistance in the first place? Evil was resisted. Why shouldn't high fees be resisted as well? There was something pompous and exploitative about those people. They learned from technical books how to relate to human beings. Granted they possessed intelligence, but not necessarily empathy and sensitivity. Those were qualities they could only try to acquire, and the effort was often as ludicrous as a thug trying to practice gentility. Not that that was the case with Dr. Rosner. No, there was no question but that he was solid, rock solid. Still, he wasn't Freud or Jung. Those two were artists—their sons were mere technicians.

The poor man had tried to seduce Luther with the human touch at the end of the last session and weaken his resolve. And yes, he had gotten Luther to commit to a September appointment, but then Luther's common sense had won out. No way was Dr. Rosner going to control him. The proof was that Luther called that very night to cancel, and in that fashion disposed of the good doctor.

Because, as his mother would say, "Do my words mean nothing?" How was a man to live in this world if the doctors and everybody else could just take his words and dispose of them and replace them with their own?

In the days that followed Luther returned in his Checker to the bar of lewdness in the twenties on Sixth Avenue and saw a leather-jacketed man, his face an obscenity of self-hatred, fake several slaps at his female companion before he drove off with her in his big car. The man's gesture was not in good fun but an indicator of things to come when the pain increased and his hand had to find flesh to strike and then strike and strike again. There are men of violence in this city, and I will not allow myself to be one of them, Luther said to himself on this night.

There was the violence of the hand but there was the violence of omission as well, and this too Luther noted in his book of life. There was the drunk who refused to tip him after a drive from one end of Manhattan to the other because in the summer heat the wind had caused a roaring in his ears as it came through the rolled down windows.

“I am withholding my love from you because you withheld your love from me in failing to give me your ear. How else are we to learn except through punishment?” the man said.

While Luther was waiting for the bus that night, having returned the Checker to the depot, a man approached on his bicycle. The hand grips had been turned upside down either to make them more accessible or to give his ten-speed some added distinction, or both. He paused in the bus stop.

“I want to rape you. I’m into that. Not tonight, but some other night. I get into it with some big dudes. They make me fight for what I want. But their heart really isn’t in it after a while, so I usually get what I want. Power will get you where you want to go. I used to teach martial arts and all kinds of shit. But power has to be linked to communication, letting people know where you’re coming from, whatever the consequence. My name is Casper and I can tell you dig what I am saying. You wouldn’t be dressed the way you are if you didn’t want my attention. Understand what I am saying?”

The man was black and wore a porkpie hat and looked out from behind a pair of goggles. He had the physical robustness to make his words credible that he was a force of inevitability you could surrender to now or go through the motions of resisting. The big bulge in his khaki pants suggested lust was not only in his words but in his being.

The bus was coming, but Casper did not yield his space even when the driver tried to honk him free of the space.

“Now I asked you a question,” Casper went on. “Are you going to disrespect me by making me repeat myself?”

“I understand,” Luther said.

“Just so you do,” Casper said, before slowly pedaling away.

He did not get on the bus but waited instead for a cab, which would be harder to follow. Because it was in his mind that Casper, like the ghost for whom he had perhaps been named, might reappear. It was in his mind too that he had allowed Casper to enter his life by wearing the clothes he did. He saw that his narcissism, like Casper, was relentless. He could apply all kinds of words and phrases to his person. He could call himself a hanging string. He could call himself the bag of bones to top all bags of bones. He could call himself His Skinniness and He Who Does Not Fill His Jeans Too Tough and all the rest. But there was also conceit, the desire to be other than he had been for his whole life. If he could not have a head that was round and beautiful, maybe he could add some pounds to his bones. And for this day, he had done just that. His body was more presentable than it had been at any earlier time, and so much so that he could go about in a tight turquoise T-shirt with short, short sleeves that showed off his long arms. Casper had seen his foolish vanity on this night. Luther had allowed him to see it. No one else had given him the attention that Casper had showed him, no one at all. And what was he wearing such a shirt for if he did not want attention? And so, what right did he have to be surprised, let alone outraged, that Casper had come calling? Most importantly, what cause did he have to be surprised that Casper's words of molestation had brought not only fear and horror but also titillation? Because it was something to be wanted in this world. It truly, truly was.

Now Celeste, doubt has been creeping in. On the horizon are the men with big things beginning to gather. And justice do they have on their side, these who finely calibrate their speech with slide rule precision, for I have transgressed, prevailing currents of propriety are absent from my speech. I have dared to give include a black man as part of my narrative, and now are there those who would punish me unto death.

He came as a child to Sarah. He came with his excitement and his fear. Hearing the former but not the latter, she smacked him and smacked him hard, saying, "Stop showing off. It's nothing to be proud of that a depraved man would want you."

He allowed her rebuke to penetrate into all his hidden places. The world of homosexuality was for her to own, being her domain by virtue of her father. It was thus for her to interpret Luther's experience for him and put an end to his silly clamoring for attention. And yet it hurt to be spoken to in such a manner. It felt like the hard slap that Hannah would mete out to him when he was a child and he wondered that even the meekest of women likely had that secret place from which to draw the strength and the audacity to go strong against men in the fullness of their folly and relieve them of it.

In a way it did not matter. He had Camus, the Algerian Frenchman, to turn to. How timely that Camus should note the subtle relationship between experience and knowledge of it. Though Camus always had some sort of mystery going on, Luther heard what he was saying. Luther had offered his experience to Sarah the night before, but it had been for her to provide an interpretation, a corrective, mean though it was.

He also had his dreams. He had a whole treasure trove of things. He just had to put all the things together so they would form a presentable pattern.

In dreamland a policeman kicked down a drunken loner's flimsy balsa wood door and slapped him around, demanding that the tenant pay up the money he owed. In an attempt to preserve some dignity, the man put up some feeble resistance. This response did not go over well with the policeman, who emerged from the tenant's dwelling with a bloody butcher knife.

In horror did Luther scream, "Does my life mean nothing?" when he awoke, but Sarah had already gone off to work.

And there were other dreams to reveal him to himself. Carola Aprile and her boyfriend Hunger Longing came for dinner at his family's apartment, where Luther was alone with them. The apartment as gloomy and shabby as ever. Rendered silent by his shame, he left them to converse with each other. While they baked bread in the unclean oven, a thousand cockroaches kept watch, with battalions more in reserve.

In his journal he wrote (if Albert Camus could write and keep a journal, he could too): "I think about writing to Dr. Rosner. In therapy I feel pressure to be upwardly mobile. A part of me resists this pressure. Is it merely fear of taking on responsibility? I'm not that sure of all that much anymore. One thing, though—driving a cab full-time is no truly sensible way of making a living. What are the options?"

An incident occurred. His Checker broke down in the middle on an exit ramp from the East River Drive. His fare was accepting of the reality and got out. Rather than berate Luther, he paid the amount showing on the meter, proving himself exceptional with his agreeable nature. But the driver of the vehicle behind him was less amiable, hitting her horn repeatedly. Soon others were doing the same. Perplexity was the order of the day. Why would the irate ones queue up behind him? There was space to pass him. Beckoned by the noise, Luther swung into action. He did not remonstrate with the woman behind the wheel but he did inquire as to the need for her insistent noise.

“What ails you?” he asked, as if his mother was speaking through him.

“What ails me? What do you think ails me? Get a move on. I have places to be and things to do. I am important in my life.”

“Do you not see that my taxi is also ailing?”

“This is America, mister. Learn to take care of yourself and the things that belong to you.”

“But it doesn’t belong to me. It belongs to the taxi service. And I am right now on my way to call for assistance.”

“I don’t need to hear your problems, mister. I’ve got problems of my own.”

A police officer arrived. “What seems to be the problem here?” he asked.

Sunglasses hid his eyes.

“My taxi has broken down and I need to get to a phone so the taxi service’s emergency services unit can be dispatched. I drive for a company that takes care of its own. So I have been told.”

After a pause the officer said, “Go find a phone booth and call it in. Your hazard lights are on. You should be all right.”

“The woman behind me is full of complaint. She acts as if I stopped my taxi to read my newspaper in the middle of the road. All the other motorists have driven around me, but not her. She is wedded to her pain.”

“You got shit clogging your ears? I said go and make your call.”

So Luther did, and it remained an unsolved mystery as to the cause of the woman’s lack of reason.

Some hours later, he chowed down at a McDonald’s in the east Thirties, a sweet and clean franchise with the normal food he had come to expect as a child of the Automat. He sat with one burger with cheese and one without and an order of fries, seeking to maintain his strength now that he had been supplied with a healthy and cooperative Checker. A man of competence had come to its aid and applied the healing touch. Feed the face first. Had not Dr. Dressler thundered this, to Luther’s ears, Biblical sounding commandment? And there it was. The food was proving to be not only a nourishment to his body but to his mind. Why? Because a revelation came to him. Marge on the line had been in the car behind him. OK, not her exactly, but the spirit of her, accusing Luther of holding women back, whether they were seeking to climb fences or arrive by vehicle at their destinations. What he was to make of this revelation he was at a loss to say, but where one had come, another was sure, eventually, to follow. Or maybe not.

Sarah went away that weekend. She took the bus up to Camp. She was in good spirits when she left and cast no aspersions at him, and so he did not have to be weighed down with pain and sorrow. Absent Sarah, the loft would not allow him to be alone in it. In fact, it expressly asked him to get out, and so he did, but not before showering and putting on a clean shirt. A more truthful statement, as that is the goal, would have been that he could not abide being alone, and the two beers he drank before leaving had brought on the call of the night.

The bar on Spring Street was waiting for him. He started with two more beers and then switched to rum and coke, three in quick succession. A man on the next stool asked him his sign. Luther said he did not know. Astrology was not something he could retain. The man said he was deep and must be a Cancer. Cancer. That didn't sound like any sign Luther wanted to be. The man had a girlfriend with whom Luther chatted long enough that she offered him her phone number while the man was using the restroom but neither of them had a pen. Luther said he would commit both her and her number to memory as the man returned and thanked him for a meaningful conversation before leaving with the woman.

The bartender bought Luther the next drink. Luther took the gesture as a sign that he should leave. It was possible the bartender had overheard some of Luther's interaction with the woman and deemed it untoward or unmanly or any of the judgments his mind might manufacture to place Luther in a shabby light. The bartender was not a Ron Doug. He did have the requisite mustache of a Ron Doug and his hair was longer than that of a Ron Doug and he had the feminine manner of going to his hair lightly with his hand as well, so Luther did not think the bartender would punch him in the face if he didn't leave. But the complimentary drink had established an intimacy, and it would cause Luther unbearable discomfort should he transgress on the bartender's kindness by not reading correctly what the gesture signified. Luther couldn't very well order another drink after a free one had been placed in front of him. That would be a violation of barroom etiquette. Luther showed his respect by leaving a two-dollar tip.

He went to the bar down the way on Broome Street, the one that had the kitchen just to the side of the door as you entered where the wonderful hamburgers served on pita bread and the out of this world chili were made. A kitchen with the integrity to shun closed doors so you could see what was going on. Luther ordered a cup of coffee and talked with the waitress. He did not ask for her phone number and she did not give it to him either. His sense of decorum, however, was not enough to keep ominous behavior in check. Not far off, the busboy was pointing in his direction as he spoke with the bartender, who then turned and looked Luther's way. This was all right. It was in keeping with the ordering process of the universe, Luther decided. Besides, a title popped into his mind, like an amount in the window of a cash register after depressing the keys. A Spy in the House of Love. For his money, Luther was betting on himself as the latter. No matter that he was in their bar; it was less likely than he himself to be an ambience for love; as for the bartender and busboy, they had left no doubt in Luther's mind as to where the espionage was coming from.

I have no place to go, and yet my path is being illuminated, he said out loud, as he made his way through the desolate cobblestone streets of SoHo back to the loft. Down to pocket change, he took some bills from where he had hidden them in the underwear drawer and headed out again, this time east to the baths.

“This ID has expired,” the cashier said, when Luther tried to get in at the reduced student rate. Embarrassed by the man’s incredulous tone and self-conscious to be entering a gay bath to begin with, Luther paid the full amount without argument. He lasted ten minutes in the steam bath before realizing his mistake, yet again the steam rendering him too sober to continue.

He returned home and sat wearing only his glasses and saw a light burning in the window of a room across the yard. He waited for someone to appear but no one came and as the minutes passed he regarded it as a vicious obstinacy that the universe should be so withholding of people when he needed them.

Sarah returned home from Camp with disturbing news. Her parents had removed the college texts Luther had stored in boxes in the barn when he and Sarah moved from the Chinatown loft and given them a place on bookshelves in that same space. They had brought them out of their hiding place for human eyes to see. And though she said no more, he imagined her parents having a good laugh at the shallowness of his education, based on the thinness of the texts, and once again pressing her hard to relinquish her tie to him, as what future could she have with a young man whose learning was as meager as his physical endowment? Pieces of string did he imagine them tossing to the wind to show his lack of substance in the world.

